"Speaking purely as a military commander, albeit one that understands the value of free and open debate . . . I would want the enemy to feel that there was no hope," Petraeus said during his confirmation hearing before the Senate Armed Services Committee to become the top commander of coalition troops in Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0120898

The general faced pointed questions from senators -- for and against President Bush's plan to boost troop levels in Iraq by 21,500. Both groups tried to draw Petraeus into the swirling political debate on how to confront the administration when polls show that nearly six in 10 American's oppose the plan.

"I don't think it is going to come as any surprise to the enemy that the American people are in fact deeply divided in this strategy," said Sen. Susan Collins, R-Maine, who unveiled a bipartisan resolution on Monday with Sen. John Warner, R-Va. It says: "The Senate disagrees with the plan to augment our forces by 21,500" and calls on Bush to achieve security "with reduced force levels than proposed."

Collins told Petraeus, however, that she wished success for the surge strategy -- and its other economic and political components -- and seemed to express hope that her resolution wouldn't be needed.

"Nothing divides us in our common support that we hope we're wrong," she admitted, "and that this strategy is a success."

Petraeus, a veteran commander in Iraq who co-authored the Army and Marine Corps' new counterinsurgency manual, faced questions from senators on the specifics of his plan to control the streets of Baghdad. In a sharp divergence from his predecessor, Gen. George Casey, Petraeus favors a buildup of American forces to "flood the zone" in insurgent hotspots as part of a three-pronged plan to secure the capital, rebuild local infrastructure and give the political process time to mature in relative calm.

Sen. John McCain, the Arizona Republican exploring a presidential run, asked Petraeus how troop limits would impact his counterinsurgency mission.

"A commander would like to go forward with as much flexibility as he can achieve," Petraeus said. "At some point, we may have to go back and say we cannot accomplish the mission because of the assets that have not been provided."

Petraeus Warns Of 'dire' Situation In Iraq (FT)

By Demetri Sevastopulo

Financial Times, January 24, 2007

General David Petraeus, the incoming US commander in Iraq, warned Congress on Tuesday that the situation in Iraq was "dire" but urged lawmakers not to oppose a military surge.

"None of this will be rapid. The way ahead will be neither quick nor easy and there undoubtedly will be tough days," he said.

Gen Petraeus, who will oversee the military surge in Iraq, said the US would have indications by late summer whether the plan to send another 21,500 US troops to help the Iraqi security forces stamp out sectarian violence was having success.

Earlier this month, however, Robert Gates, defence secretary, said it would be clear whether the Iraq government was living up to its pledges before all of the new US troops arrived in the Iraqi capital, which is expected by early June.

Gen Petraeus was appearing before the Senate armed services committee amid growing congressional opposition to the surge. Democrats and several key Republicans have introduced non-binding resolutions opposing escalating US troop levels.

"You talk about this being a race against the clock, but I wonder if the clock has already run out," said Susan Collins, a Maine Republican, who on Tuesday joined John Warner, the former Republican chairman of the committee, in opposing the surge.

Appearing more confident before the committee than Gen George Casey, the outgoing commander, Gen Petraeus waded into the political debate by agreeing with Republican senators John McCain and Lindsey Graham that congressional resolutions of opposition would send the wrong message to US troops and the enemy in Iraq.

"No matter how well-intentioned, a resolution. . .opposed to this new strategy is a vote of no confidence," said Mr Graham. "The enemy will see it as a weakened resolve . . . those people going to fight this war are going to say, well, I'm going, but the Congress says good luck, but you're going to lose."

Hillary Clinton, a New York Democrat, said: "I. . . have put forward ideas about disapproving the escalation not because we in any way embrace failure or defeat, but because we are trying to get the attention of our government and the government of Iraq."

While senators welcomed the choice of Gen Petraeus, credited with bringing stability to Mosul in 2004, to replace Gen Casey, they grilled him over the Baghdad plan, saying it was inconsistent with the military counter-insurgency manual he wrote.

DOJ_NMG_0120899

Instead of her usual methodical questioning, Mrs Clinton underscored her recently announced candidacy for president with a blistering attack on the Bush administration and the military surge.

"You wrote the book, general, but the policy is not by the book. And you are being asked to square the circle, to find a military solution to a political crisis," she said.

The counter-insurgency manual suggests that 120,000 troops would be needed to curb the sectarian violence in a city the size of Baghdad. Jack Reed, a Rhode Island Democrat, questioned how 41,000 US troops and 50,000 Iraqi forces could succeed.

In defending the plan, Gen Petraeus said US and Iraqi forces would be freed up for counter-insurgency operations because of the use of private security companies.

New Face On A Tough War (WP)

By David Ignatius

The Washington Post, January 24, 2007

For a nation bitterly divided over Iraq, the one point of agreement seems to be that Lt. Gen. David Petraeus is the right commander for U.S. forces in Baghdad. That gives Petraeus a surge of the most important strategic asset in this war -- which is time. But it also locks him into an awkward role for a professional military officer, as chief public spokesman for a war the public has come to doubt.

As long as Iraq was "Bush's war," it looked like a lost cause. This week, it became in part "Petraeus's war." The fundamentals on the ground appear as bleak as ever, and polls show the public doubts the war is winnable. But Petraeus offers something new: He is the last frail hope for a bipartisan consensus on Iraq.

Petraeus won plaudits yesterday from nearly every member of the Senate Armed Services Committee, continuing the celebratory tone that greeted his nomination by President Bush. Even Sen. Edward Kennedy, one of the sharpest critics of the war, had good things to say about the new commander. It was a momentary honeymoon from acrimonious debate.

The accolades for Petraeus symbolize a deeper change, one that carries benefits and risks for the general and the troops he will lead. Bush and his senior advisers have been wrong so many times on Iraq that the public no longer trusts them to frame a successful strategy. So now the public face of the war passes to a bright, ambitious general. It is an intensely political role, and it puts Petraeus in a hot seat that many military officers try to avoid.

Petraeus doesn't want to play politics. He tells friends that he doesn't vote in presidential elections, to maintain his political independence. In that, he emulates Gen. George Marshall, the architect of the Allied victory in World War II. But this is an inherently political command. As Petraeus answered questions yesterday from Sen. John McCain -- who is building his presidential campaign on the need for a troop surge and ultimate victory in Iraq -- it was clear just how charged the commander's job will be. As the publicly anointed "last, best hope" of a failing war, his actions will shape the key issue of the 2008 campaign.

Petraeus has embraced this kind of high-risk mission before. Indeed, he seems to thrive on the public role that many military officers shun. When he took command of the training of Iraqi forces in mid-2004, Newsweek featured Petraeus on its cover and asked, "Can This Man Save Iraq?" That prominence engendered some ill will among other officers, who saw him as too eager for publicity. But, at this point, I sense that senior officers wish him well. He's taking on a supremely demanding job that most know they couldn't do. And he's betting his carefully groomed reputation on the relatively small chance that he can salvage an American victory.

The smartest thing Petraeus has done is to draw Congress into his confidence, as co-manager of the new strategy. In his testimony yesterday, he promised regular progress reports and pledged to tell Congress if he decides that the new strategy can't succeed. The flip side is that Petraeus will tell Congress whether he needs more troops, which may prove to be the case. Petraeus helped draft the new counterinsurgency field manual, which warns that successful operations "often require a high ratio of security forces to the protected population." It's hard to believe that 21,500 more troops will be enough to protect an Iraqi population in the midst of a civil war.

DOJ_NMG_0120900

Petraeus knows how tough his new job will be: He told senators yesterday that many of the e-mails he received over the past two weeks had as their subject line "Congratulations, I think." Asked about troop morale, he gave an answer that will surely apply to him in the wearying, testing days ahead: "One day at a time, sometimes one foot in front of the other."

I spent a week traveling with Petraeus in Iraq in 2004, and another week with him in 2005. As he visited with Iraqi troops, I often heard him repeat one of his trademark phrases: "We'll see who has tiny hearts" -- meaning he would see who among the Iraqi officers was really willing to fight.

Petraeus is no "tiny heart." He believes in the power of his will to overcome adversity and prevail on the battlefield. That confidence is a necessary quality for a commander, but it is not sufficient to ensure success. Congress had a rare moment of unity yesterday in wishing Petraeus good luck as he heads back to Iraq, even as Petraeus himself must be wondering, deep down, whether he has taken on a mission impossible.

The writer co-hosts, with Newsweek's Fareed Zakaria, PostGlobal, an online discussion of international issues athttp://blog.washingtonpost.com/postglobal. His e-mail address isdavidignatius@washpost.com.

A Case Of Hearing Without Listening (NYT)

By Maureen Dowd

The New York Times, January 24, 2007

WASHINGTON

Madame Speaker didn't lean over and boink the president on the head with her gavel, or garrote him with her red pashmina.

No one was gelded or cuckolded or left to bleed on the floor of the Senate, as in HBO's "Rome," that other gory saga of a declining empire with people who can't stop talking.

Still, the nation's capital had the aroma of treachery, as former allies brutally turned on one another. Despite W.'s attempt to salvage his presidency last night by changing the subject and going all domestic-sensitive, Washington was more consumed with betrayal than substance.

The city was riveted by opening statements in the Scooter Libby trial, where the aspens were turning but not in clusters. Scooter's lawyer claimed that the White House had made his client a scapegoat in the Valerie Plame case to protect Karl Rove because "Boy Genius," as W. calls him, was critical to keeping the Republican Party in power.

In light of the 2006 debacle, the White House might have been better off saving Scooter and making Karl the fall guy.

Vice got an extra dose of unflattering limelight in the debut issue of The Politico, a Capitol Hill publication. In an interview with Roger Simon, John McCain stopped pandering to the White House long enough to lambaste Dick Cheney for stirring a "witch's brew" of a "terribly mishandled" war. What took the brave senator so long?

"The president listened too much to the vice president," he said, adding, "Of course, the president bears the ultimate responsibility, but he was very badly served by both the vice president and, most of all, the secretary of defense."

At a critical hearing yesterday, senators happily blew a chance to grill Lt. Gen. David Petraeus, W.'s choice to try to rescue Iraq, on whether those 21,500 additional troops will be cavalry to the rescue or lambs to the slaughter.

Why dwell on the most consequential elements of American strategy when they can linger over something even more repercussive: their own political reputations?

Hillary Clinton, who dodged a recent important Iraq hearing by flying to Iraq, did not have any questions at all for the general. She simply lectured him crisply on her belated discovery that the administration has a "dead-end" and "blank check" policy, as she tried to seem like the kind of gal who could command the most powerful military on earth. This is odd from someone who is running infomercials on her Web site promising "a conversation."

In their questioning, Senator Joe Lieberman and Mr. McCain seemed most interested in enlisting the general's prestige for their own campaign to discredit colleagues in both parties who are tired of passively watching W.'s disaster unfold.

If the Senate sends the additional troops but conveys the belief they cannot succeed, Mr. McCain asked, "what effect does that have on the morale of your troops?"

"It would not be a beneficial effect," the general replied.

DOJ_NMG_0120901

Senator Lieberman also asked whether a Senate resolution expressing disapproval of The Surge would give the enemy in Iraq "encouragement" that the American people "were divided."

The general agreed: "That's correct, sir."

Much of the rest of the hearing was squandered in attempts by Democrats and Republicans who had criticized the war to get the general to back away from his opinion that the troops would be hurt and the enemy emboldened by any impediment that the legislative branch might throw in W.'s way.

"Honorable people have different views, and they will voice their criticisms," chided John Warner, who presented a bipartisan resolution on Monday declaring that the Senate "disagrees with the 'plan' to augment our forces."

He told General Petraeus that as President Nixon's secretary of the Navy, he had sat where the general was, justifying another impossible war. "I hope," he warned the witness, "that this colloquy has not entrapped you into some responses that you might later regret."

The fact that Senator Warner attacked The Surge in a formal way means that a substantial majority of the Senate are willing to stick their necks out. It's the beginning of a slow procession to limit spending on the war and rein in Mr. Bush.

As one does in a job interview, the general tried to oblige everyone. After getting caught in a political mine field, he demurred that he had learned "that mine fields are best avoided and gone around rather than walked through."

The poor man. He probably thought that he came all this way to talk about how to fight the war, not to talk about how to talk about the war.

Senators Say Resolutions On Troop Plan Should Merge (NYT)

By Carl Hulse And Jeff Zeleny

The New York Times, January 24, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 23 — Senate critics of President Bush's troop buildup in Iraq suggested Tuesday that competing resolutions opposing the plan should be merged in an effort to attract the largest bloc of senators in a strong statement of Congressional dissent.

As they prepared for the Senate Foreign Relations Committee to consider the issue on Wednesday, both Democrats and Republicans said the two bipartisan resolutions were in fundamental agreement on objecting to the troop increase.

"The resolutions are so close in terms of the key issue: whether or not we support an increase in military involvement and increasing the number of troops in Iraq or not," said Senator Carl Levin, the Michigan Democrat who is the chairman of the Armed Services Committee and a co-author of one proposal. "There are other language issues, obviously, but they are not particularly significant. The likeness and the similarities far, far, far outweigh any language differences."

Senator Harry Reid of Nevada, the Democratic leader, said a hybrid version of the resolutions would produce a clearer sign of the depth of opposition to the president's plan than either of the proposals could individually. "The bottom line is that the situation we have is unacceptable, and both resolutions clearly indicate that," Mr. Reid said.

But Senator John W. Warner, Republican of Virginia and lead author of the other proposal, said he saw important distinctions between them. He said he was not prepared to enter any negotiations until after he saw wording approved by the Foreign Relations Committee.

"I think there is substantial difference," Mr. Warner said Tuesday, adding that his approach puts more emphasis on specific benchmarks to assess progress in Iraq and calls for military rules of engagement to reflect that American forces are not to play a role in sectarian violence. "There is a lot in ours that is not in the other one."

The proposal from Mr. Warner and Senators Susan Collins, Republican of Maine, and Ben Nelson, Democrat of Nebraska, also declares that the president is the commander in chief and that it is not the Senate's intent to contravene his authority — wording that drew the attention of some lawmakers.

"History tells us that Congress does have power when it comes to the president's authorities as commander in chief," said Senator Richard J. Durbin of Illinois, the No. 2 Democrat in the Senate. He and others said Democrats also raised questions about whether the Warner proposal would allow troops to be increased in areas outside Baghdad, particularly in Anbar Province, which Ms. Collins and others have said is a hub for activities of Al Qaeda.

DOJ_NMG_0120902

Senate Republican officials acknowledged that the prospect of one bipartisan resolution emerging was troubling in a political sense because it held the potential to attract significant numbers of Republicans and nearly all Democrats, producing a vote that would be a major embarrassment to Mr. Bush as he seeks to sell his Iraq plan.

On Tuesday, Senator Gordon H. Smith, Republican of Oregon, announced that he would sign on to the Warner resolution. Supporters of Mr. Bush's strategy used a Senate Armed Services Committee confirmation hearing on Tuesday to raise the prospect that any resolution expressing opposition to the strategy could bolster insurgents in Iraq and demoralize the American military. Other lawmakers dismissed the idea.

Senator Joseph R. Biden Jr., Democrat of Delaware and chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, has said he is open to changes in the resolution he drew up with Mr. Levin and Senator Chuck Hagel, Republican of Nebraska. The panel will consider the proposal on Wednesday, and it could be sent to the Senate floor quickly.

Democrats Work To Clarify Message On Iraq (HILL)

By Elana Schor

The Hill, January 24, 2007

Senate Democrats yesterday worked to bridge the gap between the chamber's two resolutions of disapproval on President Bush's plan to increase troop levels in Iraq, although the stronger language of Foreign Relations Committee Chairman Joseph Biden (D-Del.) will form the basis of that panel's markup today.

Ongoing negotiations are intended to combine Biden's measure, cosponsored by Armed Services Committee Chairman Carl Levin (D-Mich.) and GOP Sens. Olympia Snowe (Maine) and Chuck Hagel (Neb.), with a less critical resolution released this week by Sen. Ben Nelson (D-Neb.) and three senior Republicans, all up for reelection in 2008.

Senate Majority Whip Dick Durbin (D-Ill.) said Democrats have pointed to "two or three" elements of the Nelson resolution's language as potentially problematic, including a portion that could allow a troop surge in Iraq's restive Anbar province and a clause that implies Congress has no power to check presidential authority over the war.

"I'm not sure they're deal-breakers," Durbin said, remaining optimistic that one resolution can come to the floor without a competing substitute. Before that floor vote, which could occur as soon as next week, Senate presidential hopefuls Chris Dodd (D-Conn.) and Barack Obama (D-Ill.) said they are readying amendments for today's Foreign Relations markup that could galvanize debate over capping troop levels.

A First Step In Iraq (USAT)

By Joseph Biden & Chuck Hagel

USA Today, January 24, 2007

Today, Congress takes an important step in what we believe is our constitutional responsibility to actively engage and debate the war in Iraq. We agree with the president that our previous strategy in Iraq was failing. Equally, we are convinced that to succeed in Iraq, America's objective and strategy must enjoy the support of the American people and a bipartisan support in Congress.

The Senate Foreign Relations Committee will vote on a resolution we introduced with our colleagues Carl Levin, D-Mich., and Olympia Snowe, R-Maine. The resolution says what we and many of our colleagues, Democrats and Republicans, believe: America should not deepen its military involvement in Iraq by sending more U.S. troops into the middle of a civil war. More troops in Baghdad will increase the likelihood of more American casualties and will not end the sectarian Iraqi massacres that are occurring every day.

Just as important, our resolution proposes an alternative. The primary objective of America's strategy should be to help Iraqis achieve a political settlement in Iraq, secure support for that settlement from Iraq's neighbors and refocus the mission of our remaining troops on achievable objectives. That is the only way to stop Shiites and Sunnis from killing each other and allow our troops to leave Iraq without leaving chaos behind.

Here are the main elements of our plan:

•Redeploy U.S. forces out of Iraq's cities with a more limited mission focused on defending Iraq's territorial integrity, counterterrorism, border control, and accelerated training of Iraqi forces;

DOJ_NMG_0120903

•Transfer responsibility for internal security and halting sectarian violence to Iraqi forces under an appropriately expedited timeline;

•Continue to support Iraq's political process while making it clear that Iraqi leaders must make the political compromises necessary to help Iraq move forward;

•Engage Iraq's neighbors and the international community to build a regional framework to help support and sustain a political solution and national reconciliation.

Two weeks ago, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice presented the president's plan to the Foreign Relations Committee. The reaction from Democrats and Republicans alike ranged from profound skepticism to outright opposition.

A strong majority of the American people opposes sending more American troops into Iraq. So does a broad cross section of this country's leaders, military and civilian, as we have heard this month in hearings in Congress. In December, the Baker-Hamilton Commission issued a valuable report, suggesting a comprehensive strategy "to enable the United States to begin to move its combat forces out of Iraq responsibly" based on "new and enhanced diplomatic and political efforts in Iraq and the region."

Our fundamental objective is to build a bipartisan majority in Congress to support a U.S. policy on Iraq that stands the best chance of succeeding and bringing our men and women in uniform home.

We welcome debate of our resolution and proposed alternatives. The resolution by Sen. John Warner, R-Va., contributes to this debate. As we have made clear publicly and privately, we are prepared to adjust our resolution to help broaden bipartisan support. Ultimately, this debate will give every senator a chance to say where he or she stands.

We believe that the single most effective way for Congress to engage the president in developing a way forward in Iraq is to demonstrate the depth and breadth of bipartisan concern regarding his policy. The power of our resolution rests in its bipartisan foundation.

Iraq is not a partisan issue. It is a challenge that we must meet as Americans. No one in Congress and no one in America wants to see America defeated. We believe our nation is stronger when Congress fulfills its constitutional duty as a co-equal branch of government.

Sen. Joseph Biden, D-Del., is chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee. Sen. Chuck Hagel, R-Neb., is a member of the committee.

McCain Bashes Cheney Over Iraq Policy (POL)

By Roger Simon

The Politico, January 24, 2007

With his presidential hopes tied to an administration whose Iraq policy he supports but cannot control, John McCain for the first time blamed Vice President Cheney for what McCain calls the "witch's brew" of a "terribly mishandled" war in which U.S. forces are on the verge of defeat.

McCain also for the first time opened the door to the possibility of a U.S. troop pullback to the borders of Iraq should the president's planned troop surge fail.

Although McCain had once lavished praise on the vice president, he said in an interview in his Senate office: "The president listened too much to the Vice President . . . Of course, the president bears the ultimate responsibility, but he was very badly served by both the Vice President and, most of all, the Secretary of Defense."

McCain added: "Rumsfeld will go down in history, along with McNamara, as one of the worst secretaries of defense in history." Donald Rumsfeld served as President Bush's secretary of defense from January 2001 to December 2006. Robert McNamara was Secretary of Defense during the Vietnam War.

McCain has long criticized Rumsfeld, but in July 2004 at a campaign rally in Lansing, Mich., McCain said he had "known and admired" Cheney for more than 20 years and described him as "one of the most capable, experienced, intelligent and steady vice presidents this country has ever had."

But that was then and this is now, and now McCain is making clear his frustrations with the Bush administration, the Iraqi military and "bureaucratic resistance" in the Pentagon to a troop surge.

DOJ_NMG_0120904

McCain said in the interview that the success of the American mission in Iraq "will be directly related to the ability of the Iraqi military to take up responsibilities. Their record is terrible." Also, he said, "There is still enormous bureaucratic resistance (to the troop surge) in the Pentagon, and it bothers me a great deal. The bureaucrats in the military are saying this is a terrible strain on the (National) Guard and the active duty forces, and it is. There is only one thing worse than an over-stressed military, and that's a defeated military. And we are on the verge of that."

McCain said that even the planned insertion of 21,500 new U.S. troops into Iraq, which he supports, may not succeed. "I don't know if this is enough troops or not," McCain said. "I can't guarantee success by doing this."

The Arizona Republican, whose 2008 presidential campaign is well under way even though he has not yet officially announced, is keenly aware of how his support for the Iraq war is making him increasingly unpopular.

"The irony of all this for me is that I am the guy that for three years -- more than three years -- has said, 'You don't have enough troops there! And you are not running this war right! And you've (ital) got (unital) to change!' " McCain said. "And now I find myself the object of scorn because I think we can't afford to leave."

But McCain also said a withdrawal of troops to the borders of Iraq could be an option if the troop surge fails.

"If this strategy doesn't succeed, we will have to devise another strategy," McCain said. "But I have to hasten to add there are no good options." One of those options, McCain said "is to withdraw to the borders (of Iraq) to try to keep other countries from interfering. Maintaining our bases in Kuwait and other places. There are a lot of scenarios." But he also said the current troop surge strategy "has to be given time."

McCain's support for the Iraq war is unpopular with Democrats and Independents and is losing support within his own party, including among some of his fellow Republican senators. Sen. Chuck Hagel, Neb., has called the troop surge "the most dangerous foreign policy blunder in this country since Vietnam, if it's carried out."

Without naming names, McCain said, "It is ironic that many of my colleagues who are now wavering were those who were down the line in support (of the war) and would come back from Iraq saying that everything is fine and the troops are wonderful and it's the media (that is the problem). And I came back from my first trip saying, 'You better get more boots on the ground! You better change this.' Now I am (ital) hung (unital) with it. It's fascinating!"

"Life isn't fair, as Jack Kennedy said," McCain added with his typical mordancy.

McCain will almost certainly announce his presidential candidacy soon, but he said, "This whole Iraq situation has really diverted most of my attention."

In the primaries, McCain is in danger of being whipsawed between Republican conservatives who think he is not really one of them and Republican centrists who are opposed to the war.

"There are still some elements of the party that are very skeptical about me," McCain acknowledged. "I think also, even amongst Republicans, there is a real concern about my position on the war in Iraq."

He did, however, give a peek at his game plan to gain the White House. "Most people in New Hampshire, South Carolina, Michigan, Arizona, people around the country know me rather well," he said. "It's not as if I am a blank slate out there. Most of them, I think, have confidence that I have the experience, knowledge and background that, even though they disagree with me on a specific issue, they think I will do the right thing. Or at least what I believe is right."

Join The Conversation (read all 64 comments)

You need to be a registered user of Politico.com to "join the conversation" If you are not a member yet, what are you waiting for? Register Now!

by Midway1 on 01.23.2007 at 06:38 AM

McCain has himself covered, knowing there will never be 'enough' troops to satisfy him, plus keeps his support for Bush. So now he will put it on Cheney, to take some heat off Bush. Bush must have some secret 'IOU' from McCain to explain his loyalty. McCain is so far down on my list for '08, he could never recover.

by erica on 01.23.2007 at 07:17 AM

imho, McCain is too old to be president.

by kittycago on 01.23.2007 at 08:28 AM

DOJ_NMG_0120905

isn't it nice to be a player John? For starters you are not the only Viet Nam veteran in DC but you are the best marketer of your service.As you said the real heroes never came home.Play both sides in DC eventually your wicks burns out twice as fast. You have n chance of becoming president now so yuu did all that swinging for naught.

by south_yankee on 01.23.2007 at 08:32 AM

I could never support Senator McCain for President. I respect his service to our country with the exception of his refusal to stand up to this President on any issue. Blaming Cheney and Rumsfeld for our big mess is fine and they deserve part of the blame but the buck stops with the President, the Decider in Chief. Senator McCains unwavering support for the President and his policies is nauseating and will cost him in his attempt to capture the Presidency.

by matte on 01.23.2007 at 08:43 AM

All he had to do, was take up a moderately center-stand and stick to it. Instead, he tried this foolish gambit with "The Surge" which bet that Bush would never actually be allowed to do it, or it would be so watered-down, he could always say "See, they never did it my way, and that's why we lost." Now, he thinks he can regain some of that middle ground traction by peeing on Cheney's leg in public. Too little too late, John. You might as well * up a rope.

MOST EMAILED STORIES

ABOUT US | SUBSCRIPTION INFORMATION | ADVERTISTING INFORMATION | PRIVACY POLICY | EMPLOYMENT | RECEIVE EMAIL ALERTS

TM & © The Politico & Politico.com, a division of Allbritton Communications Company

Please read our Privacy Policy. By using this site, you accept our Terms of Service.

Daily Body Count In Baghdad Falls (LAT)

By Borzou Daragahi

The Los Angeles Times, January 24, 2007

BAGHDAD — Iraqi authorities found 19 bodies of young men scattered around Baghdad on Tuesday, a sharp drop from the scores found each day several weeks ago. The reported daily body count for the last week or so has hovered around 30 or lower.

The bodies of late also have not shown signs of torture often associated with Shiite Muslim militias, morgue and hospital officials say.

Officials cautioned that the casualty figures were preliminary and sketchy. Previous drops in Baghdad violence have been followed by upsurges.

U.S. and Iraqi officials hope an increase in the number of American troops, political pressure and aggressive new tactics to protect Baghdad neighborhoods can reduce the level of violence in the capital and pave the way for political reconciliation and an end to the country's undeclared sectarian civil war. In recent days, additional U.S. troops have begun to be deployed in certain volatile neighborhoods.

U.S. military officials in the capital's tumultuous northern district of Adhamiya confirmed the statistical drop shown in morgue and police casualty figures collected daily by the Los Angeles Times.

"During the last two weeks, Task Force 1-26 has seen a decrease in found dead bodies in Adhamiya," said Army Capt. Jared Purcell, spokesman for a Taji-based unit that patrols parts of northeastern Baghdad.

Purcell attributed the decline, which he said was in keeping with The Times' estimate of a 50% drop, to stepped-up pressure on cells of Sunni Arab insurgents and Shiite militiamen, including raids against high-level insurgents. Political pressure and aggressive patrols by the U.S. military and the Iraqi police and army are also factors, he said.

Some observers speculated that the drop in the number of bodies bearing marks of torture indicated a decline in Shiite militia activity, but Purcell said the decrease was not necessarily attributable to Shiite groups lying low.

"In our area of operations there are both Sunni and Shia terrorist groups," he said in an e-mail.

Still, violence continued across Iraq on Tuesday, with at least two U.S. military personnel and 56 Iraqis reported killed. And five Western security officers employed by Blackwater USA were killed in a helicopter crash in a residential neighborhood in east-central Baghdad amid reports of ground fire, officials and witnesses said.

The military said no U.S. forces were involved in the crash, but North Carolina-based Blackwater said the five employees, all American citizens, were killed while working on behalf of the U.S. government. Private security contractors sometimes dispatch small helicopters to accompany vehicle convoys throughout the country.

The incident apparently was the second in which an aircraft was forced down in Iraq in less than a week — the first being Saturday's crash of a Black Hawk helicopter northeast of Baghdad, which killed all 12 U.S. soldiers aboard. An American official in Washington said initial evidence suggested that helicopter was downed by ground fire.

Official word of Tuesday's incident coincided with reports that a chopper had been fired upon while flying low over a Sunni district.

Witnesses said authorities sealed off the area, known as Fadhil. They also reported hearing heavy gunfire and helicopters scouring the district after the apparent crash.

The U.S. military, meanwhile, reported the combat deaths of two service members.

A Marine assigned to the 1st Marine Expeditionary Force died Sunday of wounds from enemy action south of Baghdad. A U.S. soldier assigned to Regimental Combat Team 5 died Monday of wounds from enemy action while operating in Al Anbar province.

The deaths brought to 3,060 the total number of American military fatalities in the Iraq theater since the 2003 U.S.-led invasion, according to icasualties.org.

At least two British soldiers were injured when a Katyusha rocket struck their base in the southern city of Basra, a spokeswoman there said.

Bombings, shootings and rocket fire roiled a wide swath of the country.

In Baghdad, a day after a pair of car bombs killed 88 people in a crowded market, at least nine bomb blasts targeting official vehicle convoys and civilians shook the city, killing 11 people and injuring 36, many of them severely. Among those killed was Diya Meqoter, a business school professor who starred on a popular reality television show in which entrepreneurs received small loans to start businesses.

South of the capital in the religiously mixed province of Babil, gunmen killed a suspected former member of Saddam Hussein's Baath Party and a contractor working for the U.S. military.

Police also discovered the body of a police officer inside an explosives-packed vehicle, a booby trap apparently meant to kill responding officers.

Mortar shells struck various locations in Babil, killing 10 people and injuring six, many of them huddled in a tent during a pilgrimage to Karbala for the annual festival commemorating the martyrdom of Imam Hussein, a revered Shiite saint.

An Iraqi hospital official in Ramadi, Ahmed Jassem, said that at least 10 Iraqis were killed and 13 injured during apparent fighting between U.S. troops and insurgents in the war-torn capital of the western province of Al Anbar. The account could not be confirmed. The U.S. military said it killed nine insurgents and wounded another nine in various clashes with armed men in the city.

Violence also erupted in Iraq's north. In Kirkuk, capital of an oil-rich province claimed by Iraq's Kurds, Sunni Arabs and Turkmens, at least two Iraqis were killed and eight injured in insurgent violence.

Clashes broke out overnight between insurgents and police officers in the mostly Sunni Arab city of Mosul, leaving at least five officers dead and three wounded.

US Cracks Down On Iraq's Shia Militants (FT)

By Steve Negus

Financial Times, January 24, 2007

More than 600 members of Iraq's Mahdi Army are in detention awaiting prosecution, the US military announced in a statement late on Monday – the latest indication that operations against the radical Shia militia have been stepped up and that Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki has withdrawn political protection from the group.

DOJ_NMG_0120907

The statement is unusual in that it detailed the number of operations against specific organisations and seems intended to show that there is a new emphasis on neutralising the Mahdi Army. It said that in the past 45 days, the US-led coalition and Iraqi security forces had carried out 52 operations focused primarily against the militia, compared to 42 targeting Sunni insurgents.

Mr Maliki has been accused of failing to act on his government's seven-month-old pledge to demobilise militias, but in the last two weeks his aides have hinted that the prime minister had authorised a crackdown on the Mahdi Army, some of whose commanders are believed to be responsible for the torture and killing of thousands of Sunni.

Mr Maliki may have decided that he needed to move against the militia to avoid losing US support and to avoid further alienating Iraq's Sunni Arab neighbours, or because he feels that his support among the Shia has been strengthened after the execution of Saddam Hussein.

Reaction from the Sadrists' political branch has been surprisingly muted, with parliamentarians on Sunday ending a two-month long boycott of the government even though a key Sadrist spokesman had been arrested the day before.

The Sadrists' apparent acquiescence to the dismantling of their military wing however might not last, if Sunni insurgents succeed in striking at Shia civilian targets. Many Shia consider Mahdi Army roadblocks, and Mahdi Army strikes against Sunni insurgent mosques, to be their best defence against the car bombers who have killed thousands over the past few years.

Bombers on Tuesday struck two separate Shia targets in the capital, killing at least five people, and on Monday a double car bombing in a Baghdad market district left at least 88 dead, the bloodiest attack in two months. The bombings are particularly sensitive as they come at the beginning of the month of Muharram, during which Shia commemorate the seventh-century martyrdom of the Prophet Mohammed's grandson Hussein.

Five American Security Employees Killed In Baghdad Helicopter Attack (NYT)

By Marc Santora And James Glanz

The New York Times, January 24, 2007

BAGHDAD, Jan. 23 — Five members of a private security detail protecting an American convoy were killed Tuesday when their helicopters came under attack, and one plummeted to the pavement through a tangle of electrical wires in one of Baghdad's most dangerous neighborhoods.

The four-man crew in one helicopter was killed, and the gunner in a second helicopter apparently died when he was struck by gunfire, American officials said. The crash set off a chaotic five-hour battle in which American attack helicopters crisscrossed the skies over Baghdad and fired at least one Hellfire missile into the streets below.

It is unclear if the first helicopter, nicknamed a Little Bird because it is small and nimble, crashed as the result of gunfire, because it got tangled in the wires or as it was trying to land because a passenger was wounded. But an American military official said that at least four of the victims had suffered gunshot wounds to the head, raising the prospect that some of them had been shot on the ground.

American ground forces made their way to the crash site to retrieve the bodies and secure the area, American officials said. It was unclear what condition the bodies were in when they were recovered.

The helicopters were operated by Blackwater, the same private security firm that lost four contractors in March 2004 in an ambush in the desert town of Falluja, their bodies mutilated, set on fire and hung from a bridge. That episode led to a three-week siege of the city by American marines.

This time, the Blackwater contractors were on a routine protection detail in Baghdad, monitoring an official convoy traveling by road, American and Iraqi officials said. The company has a major contract with the State Department to protect officials traveling outside the protected Green Zone.

A company statement said the men, all American citizens, "were killed while working on behalf of the United States government."

An Iraqi military officer said that the convoy being escorted also came under attack, but American and Iraqi officials said no one in the convoy was killed. Lou Fintor, a spokesman for the State Department, declined to comment on who was in the convoy.

DOJ_NMG_0120908

The attack was carried out as the helicopters swooped low over the Fadhil neighborhood, an ancient warren of narrow, twisting streets that is home predominantly to Sunni Arabs and has been the site of numerous battles with insurgents in recent months. The crash took place near the Shorja market in central Baghdad, an military officer said.

On the ground, fierce gun battles lasting several hours could be heard from blocks away. American Apache helicopters took to the sky soon after the attack and could be seen sweeping over the area, making sharp loops over the eastern banks of the Tigris River and then flying low over the neighborhoods.

Initially, according to an American military official, they were just searching for the downed helicopter.

But at one point, they fired at least one Hellfire missile, although military officials could not confirm that it was in response to the downed helicopter. Other small helicopters like the one that carried the Blackwater contractors darted repeatedly over the Baghdad skyline, occasionally disappearing from view as they dipped close to the streets.

Other violence swept the city all day, with multiple bombings in Shiite areas leaving at least seven people dead. Security forces recovered 27 bodies around the city, killed execution style. The killings may have been part of a cycle of revenge following sustained attacks on Shiite areas as they prepared for one of their most sacred holidays, Ashura.

In two other battles on Tuesday, American forces killed 16 insurgents, the military said. North of Baghdad in Haditha, the forces engaged in a hectic chase as a group of armed men tried to escape by boat across a lake. After those men met other insurgents across the lake, they were attacked by an American aircraft, killing seven. Separately, insurgents fled across rooftops in Baghdad before throwing grenades and firing at American forces that were in pursuit. The Americans returned fire and killed six of the insurgents.

Much about the helicopter attack remained unknown late Tuesday. But American officials said that no diplomats or embassy employees were killed. A spokesman for the State Department refused to comment on specifics.

“A small civilian helicopter crashed in Baghdad this afternoon,” Mr. Fintor said. “We are attempting to determine the facts.”

Insurgents have carried out a series of other sophisticated attacks in recent days. On Saturday, insurgents driving Humvees and dressed in American military clothing killed five American soldiers in an ambush in Karbala. The same day, an American Black Hawk helicopter crashed near Baghdad, killing all 12 people aboard.

An American officer who spoke with a witness in a second helicopter said flares from the Black Hawk’s antimissile systems were activated before it exploded in the air, strongly suggesting that it was shot down. As its investigation continues, the American military has so far refused to confirm officially that the Black Hawk was shot down.

Contractor Helicopter Downed In Iraq (WP)

By Ernesto Londono, Joshua Partlow And Karen Deyoung

The Washington Post, January 24, 2007

BAGHDAD, Jan. 24 -- A private security company helicopter was shot down after responding to assist a U.S. Embassy convoy that came under attack in central Baghdad on Tuesday afternoon, U.S. officials said.

One contractor traveling with the convoy and four contractors aboard the helicopter were killed. The contractors, officials said on condition of anonymity, were employed by North Carolina-based Blackwater USA. Blackwater officials declined to comment.

The convoy came under small-arms fire while traveling through a Sunni neighborhood en route to an Iraqi government ministry, officials said. The helicopter, a small, lightly armed surveillance craft, was dispatched to assist. According to a summary of events drafted by a U.S. Embassy employee and made available to The Washington Post, the convoy was also targeted with rocket-propelled grenades.

The helicopter crashed after being "riddled with small-arms fire," a State Department official said. The official said it was unclear whether the men aboard died from gunfire or from the impact of the crash.

No State Department employees were hurt in the attack, but some vehicles were destroyed, according to the summary of events in the report. Other vehicles in the convoy returned safely to the Green Zone.

DOJ_NMG_0120909

Two separate Sunni insurgent groups, Ansar al-Sunnah and the Islamic Army in Iraq, asserted responsibility for the attacks on Web sites used by the groups. The accounts differ in significant detail, although Ansar published photos of what it said were the U.S. Embassy badge, credit cards and dog tags of one of the men killed in the attack.

The authenticity of the statements, translated and made available by the Washington-based SITE Institute, could not be independently confirmed.

The identification posted by Ansar was that of Arthur Laguna, 52, a pilot for Blackwater. His mother, Lydia Laguna, said in an interview that she received a call early Tuesday morning from her other son, also a Blackwater pilot in Baghdad, notifying her that Arthur had been killed.

"As far as any details, we're waiting for representatives from Blackwater to come by tomorrow," said Mary Beth Laguna, 52, Arthur Laguna's wife. "All I know is he's gone."

Arthur Laguna joined Blackwater about six months ago, after a military career that spanned about three decades with the U.S. Army and the California National Guard, she said.

The Pentagon has estimated that there are 100,000 government contractors operating in Iraq. More than 700 civilian contractors have been killed since 2003.

Doug Brooks, president of the International Peace Operations Association, an industry group that includes security contractors, said the type of helicopter downed, known as a "little bird," is among the safest modes of transportation in war zones.

"Their crews are the best -- they really know their stuff," he said in an e-mail. "They are very good at avoiding fire, flying low and fast -- and the tiny helicopters are very hard to hit."

It appears to be the second civilian helicopter downed in Iraq since the war began. The attack occurred three days after a U.S. military Black Hawk crashed north of the capital, killing 12.

In another development, U.S. military officials said Tuesday that they have in custody four people suspected of unleashing a brazen attack on U.S. troops Saturday at a government building in Karbala.

The assailants apparently drove to the building in GMC trucks, slipping through checkpoints by displaying official-looking badges and wearing what looked like U.S. military uniforms. U.S. and Iraqi officials were discussing security plans for a Shiite holiday in the holy city when the assailants attacked the Americans with grenades and other weapons.

Also Tuesday, the military reported the deaths of three U.S. service members. Their deaths bring the death toll of American troops over the weekend to at least 29.

A soldier with the 89th Military Police Brigade was killed Monday in Baghdad by an improvised explosive device; a Marine with the 1st Marine Expeditionary Force died Sunday from wounds suffered in fighting in Baghdad; and a service member assigned to the Marine Regimental Combat Team 5 was killed Monday in Anbar province in western Baghdad.

Newsman Escapes Injury In Iraq Bombing (WP)

By Howard Kurtz

The Washington Post, January 24, 2007

ABC newsman Chris Cuomo narrowly escaped harm in Iraq yesterday when a roadside explosion crippled the armored Humvee he was riding in but the shrapnel failed to fully penetrate the vehicle.

"I got very, very lucky," Cuomo, 36, said in a telephone interview from Baghdad. He praised "the greatness of the soldiers" involved, saying: "I know if I had been there with any other group of individuals, I would not be able to have this conversation."

The harrowing episode unfolded almost one year after another roadside bomb in Iraq badly injured ABC anchor Bob Woodruff, who is still recovering from head wounds.

Two CBS crew members were killed and correspondent Kimberly Dozier was seriously wounded in a car-bomb explosion in Iraq in May.

Cuomo, the news anchor of "Good Morning America" and the son of former New York governor Mario Cuomo, was embedded with a U.S. military police unit in Baghdad when his convoy of four Humvees responded to a report of a burning Iraqi police car. On the side of the road, the unit noticed some bodies, which turned out to be booby-trapped with an improvised bomb. The device exploded with massive force.

"It rocked the entire vehicle, blew out the tires on two of the vehicles, destroyed much of the glass, rocked the vehicles in a very, very big way," Cuomo said on "Good Morning America." "A piece of shrapnel was barely stopped by this armored door. It came within fractions of an inch of going through the entire vehicle."

The unit came under heavy small-arms fire, and Cuomo was trapped inside his disabled Humvee. He said another military unit arrived and provided cover while his and another crippled vehicle were towed to safety. No soldiers were wounded in the incident.

A hubcap-size piece of shrapnel broke the glass of one of the Humvees, creating a five-inch indentation in the armor, Cuomo said. He said his vehicle had less armored plating and that the situation could have been "catastrophic" if it had been hit by shrapnel of that size.

What impressed him most, Cuomo said, was the way the gunner, still spitting glass from a shattered window, sprang into action without complaint. Capt. Jay Shama of the 410th Military Police Company told Cuomo the unit would return to the same area today.

"This is their routine," Cuomo said. "They go out day after day while people are trying to blow them up. . . . It's one thing to question the mission. To question the soldiers is completely without basis."

ABC spokesman Jeffrey Schneider said Cuomo had volunteered for the week-long assignment.

"For a news division that's been through what we've been through, every single person who goes to Iraq -- every cameraman, every sound man, every correspondent, every anchor -- we don't ever stop worrying about them," Schneider said. "It reminds you once again that Iraq is a terribly dangerous place, but a place where we owe it to our audience to tell the story of what soldiers go through on a daily basis."

Asked if he was still shaken up, Cuomo said: "I'm trying not to deal with it. I'm trying to deal with it like a soldier, just do my job."

Martin Luther Al-King? (NYT)

By Thomas L. Friedman

The New York Times, January 24, 2007

It's hard to know what's more disturbing: the barbaric sectarian murders by Sunnis and Shiites in Iraq, or the deafening silence with which these mass murders are received in the Muslim world. How could it be that Danish cartoons of Muhammad led to mass violent protests, while unspeakable violence by Muslims against Muslims in Iraq every day evokes about as much reaction in the Arab-Muslim world as the weather report? Where is the Muslim Martin Luther King? Where is the "Million Muslim March" under the banner: "No Shiites, No Sunnis: We are all children of the Prophet Muhammad."

I can logically understand the lack of protest when Muslims kill Americans in Iraq. We're seen as occupiers by many. But I can't understand how the mass slaughter of 70 Baghdad college students last week by Sunni suicide bombers or the blowing up of a Shiite mosque on the first day of Ramadan in 2005 evoke so little response. Every day it's 100 more.

I raise this question because the only hope left for Iraq — if there is any — is not in a U.S. counterinsurgency strategy. That may be necessary, but without a Muslim counternihilism strategy that delegitimizes the mass murder of Muslims by Muslims, there is no hope for decent politics there. It takes a village, and right now the Muslim village is mute. It has no moral voice when it comes to its own.

"The Koran describes the Prophet Muhammad as a Prophet of Mercy," said Husain Haqqani, the Pakistani-born director of Boston University's Center for International Relations. "Muslims begin all their acts, including worship, with the words: 'In the name of God, the compassionate, the merciful.' The Koran also says, 'To you, your faith, and to me, mine.' But unfortunately, these mercy-focused, peacemaking ideas are lost [today] in the overall discourse in the Muslim world about reviving lost glory and setting right the injustice of Western domination. ...

"For a Muslim Martin Luther King to emerge, Muslim discourse would have to shift away from the focus on power and glory and include taking responsibility as a community for our own situation."

In fairness, for a Martin Luther King to emerge requires some free space, Saad Eddin Ibrahim, the courageous Egyptian democracy campaigner, remarked to me. But right now many liberals in the Arab world are in one way or another under house arrest by their regimes. “While Islamists in Egypt have access to thousands of mosques and can meet with their followers five times a day,” Mr. Ibrahim said, liberal members of his own institute “can barely move in Cairo, let alone organize a march.”

DOJ_NMG_0120911

The Arab regimes want America to believe that there are only two choices: Islamists and the regimes, so it will side with the regimes.

This is one reason Mr. Ibrahim hopes the Islamists will take up the democratic agenda. They could carry it to the masses. One of the most popular Islamist leaders in the Arab world today, he notes, is Hezbollah’s Sheik Hassan Nasrallah in Lebanon. Up to now, though, the leaders of Hezbollah and Hamas seem to prefer being of pawns of Syria and Iran than agents of democratic change and Muslim reconciliation.

There’s a lot at stake. If Iraq is ultimately unraveled by Muslim suicide-nihilism, it certainly will be a blot on our history — we opened this Pandora’s box. But it will be a plague on the future of the whole Arab world.

If Arab Muslims can summon the will to protest only against the insults of “the foreigner” but never the injuries inflicted by their own on their own, how can they ever generate a modern society or democracy — which is all about respecting and protecting minority voices and unorthodox views? And if Sunnis and Shiites can never form a social contract to rule themselves — and will always require an iron-fisted dictator — decent government will forever elude them.

The brutally honest Syrian-born poet Ali Ahmad Said, known as Adonis, gave an interview from Paris on March 11, 2006, with Dubai TV, and warned of what’s at stake (translation by Memri):

“The Arab individual is no less smart, no less a genius, than anyone else in the world. He can excel — but only outside his society. ... If I look at the Arabs, with all their resources and great capacities, and I compare what they have achieved over the past century with what others have achieved in that period, I would have to say that we Arabs are in a phase of extinction, in the sense that we have no creative presence in the world. ...

“We have the quantity. We have the masses of people, but a people becomes extinct when it no longer has a creative capacity, and the capacity to change its world.”

Can Al-Maliki Make The Bush Plan For Iraq Work? (USAT)

By Rick Jervis

USA Today, January 24, 2007

BAGHDAD — They killed more than 60 members of his extended family. They murdered even more of his friends. They issued a death warrant for him.

For most of his life, Nouri al-Maliki, a Shiite Arab, says he has been persecuted and hunted by the Sunnis who dominated the government of Saddam Hussein.

Now, as Iraq's prime minister, al-Maliki must make peace between the two bitterly divided Muslim factions. President Bush has said that al-Maliki's ability to do that, and to shift responsibility from U.S. forces to Iraq's military and police, may determine the nation's fate.

"The prime minister has perhaps the hardest job in the world," says Zalmay Khalilzad, the U.S. ambassador to Iraq. Bush's new security plan for Iraq includes committing 21,500 additional U.S. troops and hinges on whether al-Maliki is willing and able to crack down on the Shiite militias that U.S. commanders blame for much of the violence in the capital.

Al-Maliki's critics accuse him of protecting Shiite allies with blood on their hands. Since taking office last May, al-Maliki has blocked several attempts by U.S. and Iraqi troops to confront the Mahdi Army, a Shiite militia group led by one of al-Maliki's key political supporters, the rebel cleric Muqtada al-Sadr.

Al-Maliki's "personality and background make reconciliation impossible," says Saleh al-Mutlaq, a leading Sunni politician. "What he's trying to do now is buy time. The plan is to push Sunnis out of Baghdad."

In an interview Friday with USA TODAY, Bush said that he believes al-Maliki is "beginning to" go after all militias with equal vigor. Last week, al-Maliki's government announced the arrests of 400 Mahdi Army militants and a high-ranking al-Sadr aide whom the U.S. military accuses of being involved in death squads.

"There will not be any house or party headquarters or any office that has impunity from security operations," al-Maliki told reporters last week.

DOJ_NMG_0120912

The prime minister "is walking a very tight tightrope," says Stephen Biddle, a fellow at the New York-based Council on Foreign Relations. "The central narrative of this conflict, almost from the beginning, has been Shiite vs. Sunni. If he sides too overtly with Sadr, he loses our support. If he falls off the tightrope (by) siding too closely with us, he loses credibility among the Shiites."

Al-Maliki, 56, is a quiet, intense workaholic whose life has been intimately shaped by the long Shiite struggle against foreign and Sunni oppression, say colleagues such as Sami Alaskary, a Shiite lawmaker and close aide. Al-Maliki declined to be interviewed for this story.

Originally from Hindiyah, a small river village near Karbala, al-Maliki spent his youth in Iraq's Shiite-dominated south. His grandfather, Mohammed Hassan Abul Mahasin, was a poet and rebel fighter against British occupation in the 1920s. Al-Maliki studied literature and poetry at the College of Usol al-Din in Baghdad and later based his master's thesis on his grandfather's poetry. He still recites the verses today.

In the late 1960s, al-Maliki joined Dawa, a Shiite group that opposed Saddam and sought to establish an Islamic republic in Iraq. Al-Maliki worked in the political bureau, organizing groups and meetings.

When Saddam's regime mounted a campaign of mass arrests, torture and murder against Dawa members in the 1970s, al-Maliki took refuge in the marshes of southern Iraq. There, he and other Dawa members dressed as locals, moved from village to village and evaded Saddam's agents while trying to help fighters from Iran join Iraqi resistance efforts, Alaskary says.

Like many other opposition members, al-Maliki took on a nom de guerre — Jawad — in an attempt to protect family members from reprisals. It didn't work. His family was routinely targeted as a way to get to him, says Hassan al-Sunneid, an Iraqi Shiite lawmaker and longtime friend.

"People from his tribe and many, many of his friends were killed," Alaskary says.

In 1979, after Saddam's regime issued a death warrant for him, al-Maliki fled to Iran. Despite Tehran's strong support for the cause of Iraqi Shiites, al-Maliki "never felt comfortable around the Iranians," Alaskary says. "He thought the Iranians were dishonest, that they were not true to their word. And their ambitions were not in Iraq's best interest."

After just two months in Iran, Dawa Party leaders sent al-Maliki to Syria. There, his job was to recruit exiled Iraqis into the party and run the Dawa newspaper Al-Mawkif. Even there, al-Maliki still largely kept to himself. "There is a psychological structure inside of him that makes him want to work only with Iraqis," Sunneid says.

Al-Maliki long mistrusted Americans as well, Alaskary says. During the 1991 Gulf War, Bush's father, then-president George H.W. Bush, encouraged Iraqis to rebel against Saddam but didn't send U.S. support. Thousands of Iraqis, many of them Shiites, were killed in retaliatory attacks by the regime.

Al-Maliki was in Syria at the time and played no role in the largely spontaneous Shiite uprising. Many of his friends and tribal members were killed. Other family members fled Iraq, Alaskary says.

That sense of betrayal still lingered on the eve of the U.S. invasion. Alaskary relates how, during a Dawa meeting in Tehran in 2002, al-Maliki asked, "Why will George Bush's son be any different?"

Al-Maliki's difficult relationship with the United States came to the forefront when he was unexpectedly thrust into the premiership last May. Al-Maliki was a compromise candidate who emerged after Sunni, Shiite and Kurdish parties disagreed on two previous candidates.

Al-Maliki was chosen because he had won the respect of many Sunni and Kurdish leaders during negotiations to form the constitution the previous year, said Mahmoud Othman, a leading Kurdish lawmaker. "We have a prime minister who never dreamed of becoming prime minister," says Mithal al-Alusi, an independent Sunni lawmaker who meets frequently with al-Maliki.

At first, al-Maliki bristled at what he saw as U.S. interference and grew frustrated at the lack of control he had over his fledgling Iraqi military, says Sadiq al-Rikabi, his political adviser. "He's not an easy man to ask him to do this and do that," he says. "Sometimes when you pressure him, he becomes tougher, rather than more flexible."

Sectarian violence took a turn for the worse, and the U.S. government pressed al-Maliki to take a tougher stance toward armed groups. However, in an October interview with USA TODAY, al-Maliki said he felt large street fights with the militias, particularly the Mahdi Army, would alienate Shiites from his government and embolden al-Sadr.

DOJ_NMG_0120913

In October, al-Maliki ordered the release of a high-ranking al-Sadr associate arrested by U.S. troops for having links to death squads. A few weeks later, he demanded American troops remove a week-long cordon that had been set up around Sadr City, the volatile Shiite slum that is the stronghold of the Mahdi Army, as part of a search for a missing U.S. soldier.

According to a recent report by the United Nations, 34,452 Iraqi civilians lost their lives in 2006 as Sunnis and Shiites engaged in increasingly bloody revenge killings.

Then came the execution of Saddam on Dec. 30, which was marred by taunts and obscenities yelled by Shiites who took part in the hanging. Even Bush said it looked like "kind of a revenge killing."

The day before the execution, al-Maliki met with U.S. officials at his residence inside the Green Zone and signed stacks of papers to push the execution forward, even as his only son's wedding reception buzzed around him, says Basam Ridha, an adviser.

"The way the Saddam execution took place, the fact that sectarian violence has intensified the past several months, does not help in terms of establishing him as prime minister of all Iraqis," Khalilzad says.

Before becoming prime minister, al-Maliki served as deputy chairman of a committee that sought to remove former members of Saddam's Baath Party from government posts.

That has further deepened suspicions between him and Sunnis, says al-Mutlaq, the Sunni lawmaker.

Khalilzad acknowledges that al-Maliki has had trouble bridging divides between the two sects. "That has been a challenge for him," he says.

Many in the U.S. Congress have publicly wondered whether al-Maliki is the right man for the job.

Following a meeting with al-Maliki in Baghdad this month, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, D-N.Y., said that the prime minister had paid only "lip service" to easing sectarian tensions.

Also this month, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said that al-Maliki's government knew it was operating "on borrowed time." Al-Maliki reacted strongly, saying such statements bolster the morale of terrorists and lead them to believe they are winning. Rice later apologized.

In December, al-Maliki told The Wall Street Journal that he was exhausted and would rather not be prime minister. "I wish I could be done with it," he was quoted as saying.

Yet starting late last year, colleagues such as al-Alusi say they noticed a gradual change in al-Maliki's behavior and policies. He began speaking more favorably of American strategies toward Iraq.

The clearest sign of a broader shift came when al-Maliki agreed to allow U.S. troops into all parts of Baghdad, including Sadr City — a strategy he had previously bitterly resisted, al-Alusi says. "This is a huge development," he says.

Al-Maliki often reminds fellow Shiite leaders that he represents all Iraqis, not just one sect, Alaskary says. "I've heard him say this many, many times," he says.

The prime minister organized a reconciliation conference in Amman, Jordan, last year that brought all of Iraq's groups together. He has routinely met with Sunni tribal leaders from Anbar province to plot ways to combat the al-Qaeda-led insurgency there.

Some Sunni leaders have expressed qualified support. "Since he became prime minister, things have deteriorated," says Nasir al-Ani, head of the reconciliation committee of the Iraqi Islamic Party, a leading Sunni group. "But what makes us optimistic is that he is very loyal to this cause and this country."

Al-Alusi says he has learned to try to meet with the prime minister in the mornings, when al-Maliki fresh and attentive, rather than at night, when the stress of a hard day usually has him in a dour mood. Al-Maliki always listens, he says.

"One of the things unique about him is that he's very direct," Khalilzad says. "He speaks his mind, and when he disagrees with you, you know it."

Al-Maliki sometimes breaks up long, tense meetings by suddenly calling for tea and asking if anyone's heard any good jokes about him, Ridha says. On the rare moments when he's not working, al-Maliki follows the Iraqi national soccer team on TV or reads local newspapers.

The coming weeks will show whether al-Maliki will rise to the occasion and bring Iraqis together, al-Alusi says.

"He's given us a few clues," al-Alusi says. "The question is: How far will he go?"

DOJ_NMG_0120914

Analysts See A Chance For Maliki Success (WP)

By Walter Pincus

The Washington Post, January 24, 2007

The draft of a new National Intelligence Estimate on Iraq says it will be "very difficult" but "not impossible" for the government of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki to succeed in providing better governance in that war-ravaged country, a top intelligence official told a Senate committee yesterday.

"Security is an impediment," said Thomas Fingar, the deputy director of national intelligence for analysis and chairman of the National Intelligence Council. Fingar gave the Senate Select Committee on Intelligence a rare preview of what the classified National Intelligence Estimate (NIE) will say when it is completed at the end of the month.

"Gains in stability could open a window for gains in reconciliation among and between sectarian groups and could open the possibilities for a moderate coalition that could permit better government," Fingar said in response to a question written by Sen. John W. Warner (R-Va.) and read by Chairman John D. Rockefeller IV (D-W.Va.), which sought the intelligence community's judgments as reflected in the NIE.

"It will be very difficult for the Maliki government to do this," Fingar said, "but he [Maliki] does not wish to fail or to preside over the disintegration of Iraq." Fingar added that in the NIE, there are "a lot of conditional statements, but it is not impossible."

Fingar had earlier been asked by several senators about the time it had taken to complete the NIE, which Congress requested in legislation that passed the Senate last August. Sen. Ron Wyden (D-Ore.) raised the issue, saying that under the present timetable, Congress will vote on resolutions questioning President Bush sending additional troops to Iraq without seeing the forthcoming NIE. "Intelligence has got to be available in a timely way," Wyden said.

He said that in 2002, the administration pushed out an NIE on Saddam Hussein's weapons of mass destruction in three weeks. But Sen. Christopher S. Bond (R-Mo.) noted that the result was a flawed document. "We learned the hard way in 2002" to wait for an NIE to be prepared in a timely fashion, Bond said.

Fingar explained that the time for completing the NIE dragged out because the number of highly skilled Iraq analysts is small and they often are called on by the White House and military for quick analyses and assessments. Asked by Sen. Sheldon Whitehouse (D-R.I.) whether the president or vice president had input in the NIE timing or content, Fingar said they did not. The panel's hearing was primarily directed at the workings of the restructuring of the intelligence community under the 2004 legislation that established the Office of the Director of National Intelligence.

Iraq Parliament Finds A Quorum Hard To Come By (NYT)

By Damien Cave

The New York Times, January 24, 2007

BAGHDAD, Jan. 23 — Mahmoud al-Mashhadani, the speaker of Parliament, read a roll call of the 275 elected members with a goal of shaming the no-shows.

Ayad Allawi, the former prime minister? Absent, living in Amman and London. Adnan Pachachi, the octogenarian statesman? Also gone, in Abu Dhabi.

Others who failed to appear Monday included Saleh Mutlak, a senior Sunni legislator; several Shiites and Kurds; and Ayad al-Samaraei, chairman of the finance committee, whose absence led Mr. Mashhadani to ask: “When will he be back? After we approve the budget?”

It was a joke barbed with outrage. Parliament in recent months has been at a standstill. Nearly every session since November has been adjourned because as few as 65 members made it to work, even as they and the absentees earned salaries and benefits worth about $120,000.

Part of the problem is security, but Iraqi officials also said they feared that members were losing confidence in the institution and in the country’s fragile democracy. As chaos has deepened, Parliament’s relevance has gradually receded.

Deals on important legislation, most recently the oil law, now take place largely out of public view, with Parliament — when it meets — rubber-stamping the final decisions. As a result, officials said, vital legislation involving the budget, provincial elections and amendments to the Constitution remain trapped in a legislative process that processes nearly nothing. American officials long hoped that Parliament could help foster dialogue between Iraq's increasingly fractured ethnic and religious groups, but that has not happened, either.

DOJ_NMG_0120915

Goaded by American leaders, frustrated and desperate to prove that Iraq can govern itself, senior Iraqi officials have clearly had enough. Mr. Mashhadani said Parliament would soon start fining members $400 for every missed session and replace the absentees if they fail to attend a minimum amount of the time.

Some of Iraq's more seasoned leaders say attendance has been undermined by a widening sense of disillusionment about Parliament's ability to improve Iraqis' daily life. The country's dominant issue, security, is almost exclusively the policy realm of the American military and the office of the prime minister.

Every bombing like the one on Monday, which killed 88 people at a downtown market, suggests to some that Parliament's laws are irrelevant in the face of sprawling chaos and the government's inability to stop it.

"People are totally disenchanted," Mr. Pachachi said in a telephone interview from Abu Dhabi. "There has been no improvement in the security situation. The government seems to be incapable of doing anything despite all the promises."

Though the Constitution grants Iraq's only elected body wide powers to pass laws and investigate, sectarian divisions and the need for a twothirds majority in some cases have often led to deadlock. Sunni and Shiite power brokers have blocked efforts to scrutinize violence connected to their own sects.

"Parliament is the heart of the political process," Mr. Mashhadani said in an interview at his office, offering more hope than reality. "It is the center of everything. If the heart is not working, it all fails."

Monday's attendance actually surpassed the 50 percent plus one needed to pass laws. It was the first quorum in months, caused in part by the return of 30 members loyal to the Shiite cleric Moktada al-Sadr, whose end to a two-month boycott created a public relations blitz that helped attract 189 members.

But the scene in the convention center auditorium where Parliament meets only underscored the rarity of the gathering. It seemed at times like a reunion. At one point Abdul Aziz al-Hakim, who is head of the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq and a Shiite rival of Mr. Sadr, arrived late — after being marked absent. He spent the first five minutes waving and nodding at colleagues, some of whom he apparently had not seen in months.

Parliamentary officials refused to provide attendance lists for every session, fearing retribution. They said all sects and regions had members who often did not come.

Each representative earns about $10,000 a month in salary and benefits, including money for guards. Yet on Monday, members from Baghdad neighborhoods to small towns in the hinterland — Sunnis, Shiites, Kurds, Christians and Turkmen — were all on the list of no-shows that Mr. Mashhadani read aloud.

The largest group of absentees consisted of unknown figures elected as part of the party lists that governed how most people voted in the December 2005 election. Party leaders in Baghdad said they had urged their members to attend but emphasized that for many, Parliament had become a hardship post.

Representatives who travel from afar stay at the Rashid Hotel in the Green Zone, across a road, two checkpoints and several pat-downs from the 1970s-era convention center. It is not luxurious. It is barely safe. The food is mediocre.

In short, many said, the job is not what members thought they had signed up for.

"Most of them were here for the game, for prestige, for the money," said Muhammad al-Ahmedawi, a Shiite member of the Fadhila Party. "It's upsetting and disappointing. We want the members to come, to pursue the interests of their constituents, especially in this sensitive time."

Mr. Ahmedawi said politicians who had larger shares of power before the elections seemed to view Parliament as a demotion best ignored. Mr. Allawi, for example, who did not return calls to his London aides requesting an interview, has been rallying support in Amman and London among exiles who have fled Iraq's violence.

Of the 25 members of his bloc, only six attended the session on Monday.

Mr. Pachachi, who is in his mid-80s, said he left Iraq a few months ago because his wife needed open-heart surgery and he did not trust that she would be well cared for in one of Baghdad's decrepit hospitals. He said he hoped to return in a few weeks, admitting that "one has to be there — you can't be a member of the Parliament and live abroad."

DOJ_NMG_0120916

But he said the dangers involved with being a public figure in Iraq had made it much more difficult to participate in government. He has 40 guards to protect him when he comes to Iraq, he said, and the salary from Parliament pays for only 20.

"I have protection, and unfortunately the protection is not sufficient for anyone anymore," he said. "The level of violence has become unmanageable."

Other Iraqi politicians take a harder line. Adnan Dulaimi, a member of the largest Sunni bloc in Parliament, put it simply, "If there are some members who think there is no benefit to attending, then they should resign."

Mr. Mashhadani seems to be shaping a slightly softer approach that mixes persuasion with punishment. Like Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki, he has met repeatedly with party leaders, pushing them to ensure the attendance of their members.

During an interview in his office, lined with baroque cushioned chairs with gold trim, he also acknowledged that more money should be set aside for members' security, but only if members show up to pass a budget.

He said the shaming of the absentees at the public session, a first, was the first step. He said the fines and threat of replacement would also help.

There is, of course, only one problem. For the proposals to be put in place, a majority of members in Parliament have to be present to pass them.

Iraq Struggles To Finish Oil Law (WP)

By Steven Mufson

Washington Post, January 24, 2007

Four months ago, about 80 oil company executives and consultants packed an office on St. James's Square in London for a briefing on exploration prospects in Iraq's Kurdish region and a Kurdish draft of an Iraqi national petroleum law.

Despite the immense risks of working in Iraq -- pipeline explosions, kidnappings, insurgency, political infighting -- the oil company executives were lured by the potential rewards, which are immense, too. Outside Saudi Arabia, no country has proven oil reserves as big as Iraq's. And the oil there is high quality, easy and cheap to produce, and bottled up in reservoirs that many major oil companies were familiar with three decades ago before wars and sanctions drove them out.

"Exxon Mobil has more seismic data on Iraq than on Houston real estate," says Fadel Gheit, an oil analyst at Oppenheimer & Co. who used to work for Mobil. "If Exxon had security on the ground, the following day it would have crews there," Gheit said. "And money would be no object."

Gheit estimated that Iraq could easily produce 6 million barrels a day, more than three times its current output and enough to help keep a lid on world prices.

Four months after the London meeting, however, security remains elusive and so does the national petroleum law. Barham Saleh, Iraq's deputy prime minister, said in a recent telephone interview that a compromise was "very, very close."

The proposed law has taken on significance beyond oil. While Iraq and foreign oil companies are eager to tap new revenue, the Bush administration and many Iraqis also hope that the law can be a model for resolving disputes and can bind Iraq's warring factions together.

Agreement has been reached on sharing oil revenue on a per-capita basis, a benefit for Sunnis who live mostly in areas with less production. A deal also has been struck that recognizes the power of regional authorities, such as the Kurdish Regional Government, to award oil contracts, but establishes a national petroleum commission with the power to review contracts within 60 days. A "revamped" national oil company would continue to manage existing production while new regional affiliates would participate in new exploration and production.

"We need to close the deal on one or two small issues," Saleh said. "A number of the major issues have been resolved."

But an adviser to the Kurdish authorities said those "small issues" included some significant details. On Friday, the Kurdistan Regional Government posted an item on its Web site denying news reports that a deal was complete. The "important annexes to the law are still pending," it said.

Outstanding issues include how much oil revenue will go to the central government; a charter for the new national oil company; the role of the oil ministry; and the principles upon which the new commission could reject regionally negotiated contracts. Also unsettled is whether the commission will require a simple majority vote or a two-thirds vote to reject a contract's terms. Those provisions must all be part of one package with the petroleum law, Kurdish leaders said.

DOJ_NMG_0120917

If the Shia-dominated Iraqi central government spends heavily on its own projects, it could deny the Kurds and other regional authorities significant shares of oil revenue.

Even if negotiators agree on a draft, it must win approval from Iraq's cabinet and fractious parliament, which hasn't met in weeks.

The United States has been pressing Iraq to complete the law. "As awful as the Saddam Hussein government was, it did have a record of dealing with foreign investors that wasn't that bad," said James A. Placke, an expert at Cambridge Energy Research Associates. "That's gone and hasn't been replaced."

Now, forging a petroleum law requires a balancing of sharply divided interest and ethnic groups, not just the word of a dictator.

"This is not a regular piece of Iraqi legislation being signed off on," said Jonathan Morrow, an adviser to the Kurdistan Regional Government. If successful, he said, "it . . . might show the way forward in Iraq."

Saleh suggested that a deal might discourage attacks on oil installations and reduce corruption. "Since we all agree on revenue sharing, all elements of Iraqi society will have an interest in maximizing revenues and best business practices," he said.

For now, however, the oil sector is a mess. Since the first attack on a pipeline on June 1, 2003, it has been a struggle to keep oil flowing. Basic production equipment has been looted or destroyed. Many wells still are not working properly. And last year, the U.S. special inspector general for Iraq reconstruction complained that Iraq's oil ministry was not reporting on its budget and had spent "only a fraction" of money set aside for capital costs.

While the Bush administration once thought that Iraqi oil revenue would cover occupation and reconstruction costs, the Iraq government still relies heavily on U.S. technical and financial aid. Placke estimated that Iraq produced 1.85 million barrels a day last year, less than the year before, less than the prewar output and well below the U.S. target of 3 million barrels a day.

Placke, who was part of the Iraq Study Group, estimated that 200,000 barrels a day is siphoned from the main export line through southern Iraq, put on barges, and loaded onto tankers waiting in the Persian Gulf. What's left after discounts and bribes goes to militias or insurgent groups, he said.

In the south, some local Shia militia, clan or clerical groups are trying to claim the rights to some Iraqi fields and a voice in negotiating access for foreign companies. A stake in a billion-barrel field could be more important than a stake in the parliament or cabinet. Some experts worry that, as in Sudan, oil could contribute more to tearing the country apart than to uniting it.

A senior Iraqi government official involved in the petroleum-law talks said that if militias and clans were to cut separate deals with foreign companies, it would be a "recipe for disaster and civil war." He warned foreign companies against signing such deals. "We are very interested in credible investment in the oil sector," he said. "We cannot afford to have these cowboys running around trying to manipulate the situation in Iraq."

The national petroleum law remains a touchy subject in part because of widespread suspicion that the U.S. invasion in 2003 was motivated by designs on Iraq's oil riches.

The Iraq Study Group report contained three pages of recommendations for the sector, including suggestions that international oil companies invest in the country and the government fight corruption on contracts.

"Before embarking on controversial measures such as this law favoring foreign oil firms, the Iraqi parliament and government must prove that they are capable of protecting the country's sovereignty," Kamil Mahdi, a senior lecturer in Middle East economics at the University of Exeter in England, wrote in the Guardian newspaper. "A government that is failing to protect the lives of its citizens must not embark on controversial legislation that ties the hands of future Iraqi leaders, and which threatens to squander the Iraqis' precious, exhaustible resource in an orgy of waste, corruption and theft."

In a telephone interview, Mahdi said, "My main worry is that if I were an official in the ministry of oil negotiating a contract and living under the kind of threats that people in Iraq are daily experiencing, I would probably be in a very weak negotiating position."

While the debate continues, the Kurdistan Regional Government is pushing ahead. In 2002, at the suggestion of Jalal Talabani, the Kurdish leader who is now Iraq's president, the Turkish conglomerate Cukurova Group set up an oil unit called

DOJ_NMG_0120918

Genel Enerji to look for oil in Kurdistan. Genel signed a production-sharing agreement in July 2002 and took over the Taq Taq oil field in February 2003 on the eve of the U.S-led invasion. It signed another exploration contract in July 2005. A Norwegian firm, DNO, and a Canadian firm, Heritage Oil, also struck exploration and production deals in the Kurdish region.

Tariq Shafiq, a former executive of Iraq National Oil and director of the consulting firm Petrolog & Associates, has drawn up three contracts -- service, buyback and production-sharing -- that the government will use in its new petroleum law. He said the Kurdish production-sharing contracts give away too much to the foreign companies; he said that after paying for capital and operations costs, as much as 55 percent of the oil goes to the foreign firms. "These, in the eye of many, are illegal and would have to undergo review to bring them in line with this law," he said.

But Kurdish authorities said they have no intention of submitting existing contracts for review. Duran said Genel's contract was renegotiated last November and falls within the 20 percent share production that would be the ceiling under the new law. "The commercial terms of the PSA are in conformity with internationally acceptable PSA terms," Duran said in an e-mail response to questions. "Therefore, our PSA is not generous at all."

Major U.S. oil companies haven't signed any contracts in Kurdistan yet. Some of them have tried to build goodwill with the central government. Chevron, for example, helped clear mines from the coastline. Others have collected seismic data or trained Iraqi oil company technicians in Dubai.

Some major companies from other nations -- Russia's Lukoil, a Chinese state company, France's Total -- are hoping to get their big Hussein-era concessions back. Their prospects remain uncertain.

Suicide Bomber Kills At Least 8 In Afghanistan (NYT)

By Abdul Waheed Wafa

The New York Times, January 24, 2007

KABUL, Afghanistan, Jan. 23 — A suicide bomber wearing an explosive vest blew himself up Tuesday at the entrance to a NATO base in the southeastern province of Khost, killing 8 to 10 people, officials said.

The attack occurred as Afghan laborers were lining up for security checks at the pedestrian entrance of the base known as Camp Salerno. The bomber was trying to enter the base, NATO said, but detonated the vest when he reached the search point.

Arsalah Jamal, the Afghan provincial governor of Khost, visited the scene after the bombing and confirmed the deaths of eight civilian laborers and two Afghan security guards, though a NATO statement put the toll at six Afghan civilians and two policemen.

“I confirm 10 people, including two Afghan security guards, were killed in a suicide attack at the entrance of the military base,” Mr. Jamal said.

He said 14 others had been wounded in the attack, all Afghan civilian daily workers for the military base. NATO said only five had been wounded.

Khost, in eastern Afghanistan, borders tribal areas in Pakistan that Afghan and Western officials contend offer a haven for militants organizing suicide attacks.

“Suicide attack is not an Afghani phenomenon,” Mr. Jamal said by telephone. “There are madrasas and camps on the other side of the border where some elements promise passport and visa” to “young people for killing themselves and others.”

The attack was one of the deadliest since Sept. 30, 2006, when a suicide bomber blew himself up outside the gates of the Interior Ministry in Kabul, killing 12 people and wounding up to 40.

General: Army Increase Will Cost $70B (AP)

By Pauline Jelinek

AP, January 24, 2007

WASHINGTON (AP) — Increasing the size of the Army, strained by America's two ongoing wars, will cost an estimated $70 billion, a top Army general said Tuesday.

And if yet another conflict were to develop before the force can be bolstered, it would take longer to fight and cost more American casualties than otherwise might be expected, said Lt. Gen. Stephen Speakes, a deputy chief of staff.

DOJ_NMG_0120919

Reversing previous administration thinking, President Bush said last month that he wants a larger military. And Defense Secretary Robert Gates earlier this month recommended that the Army's troop strength be increased by 65,000 soldiers, to a total of 547,000 worldwide and the Marines be increased by 27,000 to 202,000. Almost half of that Army increase already has been achieved under a temporary program that Gates said would be made permanent; the full increase is to be achieved within five years.

The Army's preliminary estimate is that it would cost $70 billion to increase its size and the funds would be spread over budget years 2009 through 2013, Speakes told a defense writers group Tuesday.

Army Chief of Staff Gen. Peter Schoomaker has said that the service budget jumps $1.2 billion with each 10,000 soldiers that it recruits and trains. Speakes said the $70 billion figure includes everything — from equipment to pay to health benefits. No figure was immediately available for the increase in the Marine Corps.

"What we are asking is that Americans make a decision about priorities," he said of the huge new defense cost.

Meanwhile, he acknowledged, fighting the war in Iraq on top of the war in Afghanistan has left ground forces in a weakened state of readiness.

That is, some units are below the standard measure used to determine if they are ready to fight a conventional, high-intensity war. This is because they have substantial equipment shortfalls and their training is focusing on the low-intensity, counterinsurgency battle being fought in Iraq.

"What America needs to do is realize that we can fulfill the national strategy (of defending against another conflict simultaneously), but ... that it will take more time and it will also take us increased casualties to do the job," he said.

"We have an issue, and that's part of what, I think, the recent decisions by the president and secretary of defense have addressed," Speakes said. "We're going to build a more robust Army, we're going to continue to invest in a ground force that has the right capabilities, the right equipment, the right training to do it's job," he said, adding that enormous improvements in the quality of the Army have been made in recent years.

"This is a voyage in progress, it's being measured against the harsh litmus test of combat which has forced some grim realities on all of us," Speakes said.

U.S. Stages 2nd Airstrike In Somalia; Ethiopians Leaving Capital (WP)

By Karen Deyoung And Stephanie McCrummen

The Washington Post, January 24, 2007

A U.S. Air Force AC-130 gunship staged an airstrike against suspected al-Qaeda operatives in southern Somalia on Monday, the second such attack this month, U.S. officials said Tuesday.

There was no immediate information on specific targets or the strike's results. The United States has said that at least three senior al-Qaeda operatives were being sheltered by the Islamic Courts movement that was ousted from power in the Somali capital, Mogadishu, by the Ethiopian military last month.

Word of the new attack came the same day as a long line of Ethiopian artillery, armored vehicles and trucks loaded with soldiers rolled toward the edges of Mogadishu, beginning a withdrawal from a fragile capital that many residents fear will now slip further into chaos.

A spokesman for Somalia's transitional government, Abdirahman Dinari, said that the Ethiopians may take several weeks to complete a full withdrawal from the country and that a large force would remain on the Ethiopian side of the Somalia-Ethiopia border.

The Ethiopians have remained in the capital to protect the nascent transitional government, which hardly has enough forces to secure the oceanside city.

Without the Ethiopian muscle, Somali officials have a "deep concern" about Islamic fighters who remain hidden in the city and have asserted responsibility for a recent string of attacks against Ethiopian and Somali government troops, Dinari said.

Details of a proposal to send in a peacekeeping force of at least 8,000 troops from other African countries are under negotiation, and many analysts doubt that that number can be mustered. Dinari said an initial force of about 1,000 soldiers from

DOJ_NMG_0120920

Uganda will probably arrive next week, and others from South Africa, Malawi and Nigeria will follow. The United States has promised airlift and logistics support.

On Monday, European Union officials tied funding for the African Union peacekeepers to the Somali government's willingness to negotiate with certain ousted Islamic leaders, who are thought to be crucial to preventing a full-scale insurgency. U.S. officials have voiced similar concern.

The European demand infuriated the Somali government. Dinari said it only "gives the Islamic fighters a signal" to continue their attacks.

On the streets of the capital Tuesday, people watched and sometimes waved as the Ethiopians rumbled along the sandy road that eventually reaches the Ethiopian border.

"The elements of the Islamists will come back," said Hassan Abdi Aden, 45, who was eating lunch nearby. "The warlords are already in Mogadishu. The clan fighting will start again. All this is something that can happen in the near future."

Mogadishu has been in an almost perpetual state of clan warfare since the fall of the last central government, the military dictatorship of Mohamed Said Barre, in 1991.

For two weeks, Ethiopian and Somali government troops have been attacked with mortars and rocket-propelled grenades fired from cars.

If Mogadishu descends into another period of clan warfare, some regional analysts say, that is precisely what Ethiopian Prime Minister Zenawi Meles wanted all along. As evidence, they point to an Ethiopian government foreign policy report submitted to that country's Parliament two years ago.

According to an English translation, Ethiopian security officials wrote that Somalia was so divided that it "no longer posed a threat" to Ethiopia.

The two U.S. airstrikes in southern Somalia this month have been undertaken in close cooperation with Ethiopian forces, which have conducted their own ground and air assaults in the same area with shared intelligence and operational information. In addition to the three alleged al-Qaeda operatives, believed responsible for the 1998 bombings of two U.S. embassies in Africa, targets have included Somali Islamic leader Sheik Hassan Dahir Aweys and Aden Ayrow, who served as de facto defense minister of the Islamic government.

U.S. officials have said that none of the targeted individuals was hit in the initial strike Jan. 7, which killed at least 10 and perhaps as many as 20 people. Although a U.S. military team entered Somali territory to assess the strike site and recover bodies, no information has been released on their identities.

Ethiopian Forces Start Leaving Somalia (NYT)

By Jeffrey Gettleman

The New York Times, January 24, 2007

NAIROBI, Kenya, Jan. 23 — The Ethiopian troops who helped install Somalia's fledging government in Mogadishu, its capital, began to pull out Tuesday, officials from each country said.

Many Somalis say they now fear that a power vacuum will form and that the country will slip back into the lawlessness that has dominated it for much of the past 16 years.

"Why can't they stay?" asked Muhammad Omar Ali, a milkman in Mogadishu, as he watched truckloads of Ethiopians chug away. "They're leaving us to the bandits."

Ethiopia played a pivotal role in rearranging Somalia's internal politics last month when it sent tanks, jet fighters and thousands of troops to vanquish an increasingly aggressive Islamist movement that ruled most of south-central Somalia. After routing the Islamist army, the Ethiopians paved the way for Somalia's transitional government, which until then was weak and divided, to take control of the country.

But the Ethiopians always insisted that they would not stay to police Somalia. And though several African countries have mused about sending peacekeepers to help quell Somalia's volatile mix of warring clans, well-armed thugs and now a growing insurgency, a comprehensive peacekeeping force may be months away.

DOJ_NMG_0120921

On Tuesday, 200 Ethiopian soldiers held a short goodbye ceremony at a defunct Somali Air Force base. “We have arrived in Mogadishu in support of the transitional federal government troops,” said an Ethiopian commander. “We have successfully completed our mission. We respect the order of the Ethiopian government to withdraw from Somalia.”

Some Somalis cheered. Others said the equivalent of good riddance.

“Our enemy is finally leaving the country,” grumbled Muhammad Gedi Nur, who was selling second-hand clothes on the street. “Now we can bring back Islamic law.”

Remnants of the Islamist army are suspected of the increasingly frequent attacks on transitional government soldiers and Ethiopian troops. Despite the limited withdrawal that began Tuesday, Ethiopian officials have reassured Somalia’s leaders that many troops would remain until international peacekeepers arrive.

Western diplomats have expressed hope the surrender to the Kenyan authorities last week of Sheik Sharif Ahmed, a moderate leader of the Islamist forces, could be another solution. As a well-respected figure among the Islamists and the influential Hawiye clan, he could help end the insurgency.

On Tuesday, American diplomats said they were eager to talk to him.

“The U.S. ambassador to Kenya plans to meet with Sheik Sharif later this week,” the embassy said. “The ambassador will urge Sheik Sharif to counsel his supporters not to carry out violence and to support the development of an inclusive government.”

Ethiopian Troops Begin To Leave Somalia (AP)

By Salad Duhul

AP, January 24, 2007

Ethiopian troops whose military strength was crucial to helping Somalia's government drive out a radical Islamic militia began withdrawing Tuesday, raising fears of a power vacuum unless peacekeepers arrive soon in this chaotic nation.

Somali government spokesman Abdirahman Dinari said Ethiopia helped chase out the Council of Islamic Courts militia, which had taken over the capital and much of southern Somalia. But it was time for the neighboring forces to leave.

"As of today, the Ethiopian troops have started to withdraw from Somalia. We are grateful that they played an important role in the restoration of law and order in the country," Dinari said.

Ethiopia's government spokesman, Zemedkun Tekle, confirmed Tuesday's pullout but gave no details.

The intervention of Ethiopia last month enabled a military advance that proved a stunning turnaround for Somalia's 2-year-old government. Without Ethiopia's tanks and fighter jets, the administration could barely assert control outside one southern town and could not enter the capital.

But the potential for violence in this Horn of Africa nation remains great because of clan rivalries, resentment of the government's Ethiopian backers and a threat of guerrilla war from remnants of the Islamic movement.

Nearly 200 people gathered at the former National University in Mogadishu, cheering as the Ethiopians moved out on trucks and tanks.

"Leave us alone and let us solve our problems," the crowd chanted.

The withdrawal gave a sense of urgency to the arrival of a proposed African peacekeeping force. The African Union has approved a plan to send about 8,000 peacekeepers for a six-month mission that would eventually be taken over by the U.N.

Many Somalis were angered by the presence of Ethiopian forces. Somalia, a Muslim country, and Ethiopia, which has a large Christian population, fought a brutal war in 1977.

"I am very happy the Ethiopians are leaving because it will end clashes in which civilians are the victims," said Ilmi Shardi Mahad, a resident of Mogadishu's Hurwa district, considered a hotbed of support for the Islamists.

The Islamic council has played on the traditional Somali-Ethiopian rivalry, saying the group would launch an Iraq-style guerrilla war on Ethiopian troops here.

"The withdrawal of Ethiopia will be the end of our ongoing insurgency," said Sheik Ahmed Muumin, a member of the Islamic council who contacted The Associated Press by telephone on Tuesday.

But it was not clear whether his views represented those of the Islamic leadership, which is largely in hiding.

DOJ_NMG_0120922

One top leader of the ousted movement, apparently afraid for his life, turned himself in to authorities in neighboring Kenya on Sunday and is in custody. Sheik Sharif Sheik Ahmed, considered by American officials a moderate who could contribute to rebuilding Somalia, is not believed to be wanted by the authorities.

U.S. Ambassador to Kenya Michael Ranneberger, who also represents U.S. interests in Somalia, plans to meet with Ahmed this week to "urge Sheik Sharif to counsel his supporters not to carry out violence and to support the development of an inclusive government," the U.S. Embassy said.

Ahmed was the chairman of the Executive Council of Islamic Courts and shared the leadership with Sheik Hassan Dahir Aweys, who was chairman of the court's legislative council. Aweys is on a U.S. list of people with suspected ties to al-Qaida, though he has repeatedly denied having ties to international terrorists.

In a newly released videotape, al-Qaida's deputy leader Ayman al-Zawahri vowed that the mujahedeen would "break (the) backs" of the Ethiopians in Somalia.

China Confirms Firing Missile To Destroy Satellite (WP)

By Edward Cody

The Washington Post, January 24, 2007

BEIJING, Jan. 23 -- Breaking 12 days of silence, China confirmed Tuesday that it had fired a guided missile into space to destroy one of its satellites in a test that generated protests from the United States and other nations.

A Foreign Ministry spokesman, Liu Jianchao, said the United States and other governments have now been informed about the secret test through diplomatic channels. He emphasized that the use of anti-satellite technology does not mean China has abandoned its long-standing opposition to the military use of space.

"I should stress at this time that the test was not targeted against any country and does not pose a threat to any country," Liu said at a ministry briefing. He added that he knew of no plans for another such test by the Chinese military.

The Chinese test shot, which culminated in the destruction of an overage weather satellite 537 miles above Earth, was detected by U.S. monitors Jan. 11, but the Chinese government refused to discuss it. The test raised concern in Washington, where officials and analysts interpreted it as a signal by China that U.S. military satellites could be vulnerable to attack.

With the U.S. military heavily reliant on satellites for reconnaissance, navigation, weapons guidance systems and anti-missile defenses, China's ability to shoot down satellites could pose an added threat in the event of hostilities over Taiwan. In addition, China's newly demonstrated ability could threaten Taiwanese satellites monitoring Chinese short- and medium-range missile deployments along the Taiwan Strait.

U.S. officials said they were also dismayed by the Chinese test because the United States and Russia, after testing anti-satellite technology in the 1980s, more recently have abstained from such tests, partly because destroying satellites creates debris that could damage satellites in nearby orbits. Liu declined to address questions on this danger.

Experts estimate that several hundred thousand debris fragments were created by the destruction of the satellite, which orbited in a section of space where as many as 125 other satellites fly.

China, which has embarked on an accelerated military modernization program, has repeatedly emphasized its desire to be able to compete in 21st-century warfare. The military, which runs the space program, has identified space-based communications and sensing systems as key to such efforts. Some Chinese military theorists also have advocated asymmetrical warfare, in which pinpoint weapons would be used to disrupt the more advanced and better-equipped U.S. military.

At the United Nations, China has consistently advocated the peaceful development of space and pushed for an international agreement to prevent it from becoming the theater for a new arms race. The Bush administration has opposed China's suggestion for an international conference to pursue such an accord, arguing there is no need for it.

In that light, Liu was asked whether the anti-satellite test violated the spirit of China's proclaimed position and, in any case, why China kept silent for nearly two weeks while officials around the world were discussing it on the basis of U.S. intelligence reports.

"We have nothing to hide," he responded. "After the relevant parties expressed their concerns, we made our response about the test quickly. We stressed that China opposes weaponization and an arms race in outer space."

DOJ_NMG_0120923

China Verifies Antisatellite-Missile Test (WSJ)

By Jason Dean

The Wall Street Journal, January 24, 2007

BEIJING -- China broke its public silence about its testing of an antisatellite missile this month, but its lack of openness has damaged its efforts to polish its international image, analysts said.

The Jan. 11 test, in which China destroyed one of its own aging weather satellites in orbit, triggered alarm in foreign capitals after news of it surfaced late last week. But Chinese officials had steadfastly refused to acknowledge the test publicly until yesterday, when Liu Jianchao, a spokesman for China's Ministry of Foreign Affairs, confirmed that it had occurred -- but offered no additional detail or explanation.

Mr. Liu, speaking at a routine news conference, offered reassurance that China continues to oppose the "weaponization" of space. And he said that China had briefed several foreign countries, including the U.S. and Japan, about the test after international concern arose. He declined to say when those briefings had occurred, but U.S. State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said Monday that Chinese officials had acknowledged the test to Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill during meetings in Beijing over the weekend. Mr. McCormack said the U.S. is hoping for more information.

Within China, there has been no discussion of the test in the Chinese press or on the Web, which is closely monitored by the government.

China has long tried to soothe international concerns about its rapid economic and military rise by telling the world that it is intent on "peaceful development." But the absence of any official explanation about the antisatellite test has fostered doubts about its intentions and plans, and given ammunition to critics in Washington who argue China is a growing military threat that the U.S. must do more to counter -- including in space. Indeed, analysts say, China's handling of the test could actually help bring about what Mr. Liu said yesterday that Beijing doesn't want: an arms race in space.

Beijing's approach has been "quite counterproductive as far as China's interests are concerned," said Andrew Yang, an expert on the Chinese military who heads the Chinese Council of Advanced Policy Studies, a Taiwan think tank. "I think they didn't really take into account the international concerns about this," said Mr. Yang, who was in Beijing yesterday meeting with Chinese military experts.

Analysts outside China have speculated that the test was aimed both at verifying China's antisatellite capability and at putting the U.S. on notice that it no longer enjoys unchallenged military domination of space. The U.S. military relies heavily on satellites for surveillance, communication and weapons-guidance systems.

The Chinese foreign ministry spokesman's comments are unlikely to calm international anxiety. Mr. Liu told reporters the test wasn't aimed at any particular country, and stressed that China "never has and never will participate in any form of arms race in space." But he offered no explanation for why China had conducted the test or why it took so long to confirm it. When asked about concerns that debris from the destroyed satellite could damage other countries' satellites, Mr. Liu said the issue was too technical for him to address.

Officials at China's Ministry of National Defense continued to decline to comment yesterday.

Mr. Yang said he believes the missile test was directed partly at Taiwan. The U.S. is Taiwan's biggest military backer, and U.S. satellites are an essential element of Taiwan's early-warning system against ballistic missiles that China has aimed at the island. Mr. Liu said the test wasn't directed at any particular country.

Write to Jason Dean at jason.dean@wsj.com1

China Confirms Missile Test (FT)

By Mure Dickie, Michiyo Nakamoto And Kathrin Hille

Financial Times, January 24, 2007

"China has nothing to hide," insisted foreign ministry spokesman Liu Jianchao on Tuesday as he issued Beijing's first public acknowledgment of its test of an anti-satellite weapon earlier this month.

DOJ_NMG_0120924

But even as Mr Liu insisted that Beijing's opposition to any space arms race remained undimmed, his refusal to shed any further light on the test or his government's intentions offered ready ammunition to those who say China's military policy is all about concealment.

For days, Beijing officials have declined to comment on Washington's revelations about the destruction of an old satellite with a missile-launched "kinetic kill vehicle", a test that prompted concern from the US, Japan and other countries.

Even as Mr Liu was offering confirmation, a spokesman for China's defence ministry on Tuesday professed ignorance that the test had taken place. "We don't know anything about this," said the spokesman, who declined to give his name.

China's reticence is already drawing diplomatic fire.

“The failure by China to ensure transparency in the matter will only lead to suspicions," Yasuhisa Shiozaki, Japan's chief cabinet secretary, said on Tuesday.

"It is not sufficient [for China] just to say that it has conducted just one experiment. It is natural for Japan to continue to demand a thorough explanation,” Mr Shiozaki said.

Beijing analysts have long argued that it is understandable for a still relatively weak military power such as China to be reluctant to give too much information about its defence.

But the cost of the belated and terse acknowledgment of the anti-satellite test has been to yield the propaganda field to its critics.

Beijing has yet to defend its much-criticised decision to add new debris to the clouds of space junk orbiting the earth to the hazard of satellites and astronauts.

Questions have even been raised about the degree to which China's leaders control their military. The New York Times at the weekend quoted Stephen J. Hadley, national security adviser to US president George W. Bush, as saying Hu Jintao might not have been kept fully informed – a suggestion Mr Liu dismissed as "baseless speculation".

China's lack of effective public diplomacy on the test of an anti-satellite weapon is not difficult to understand.

The US tested such weapons more than two decades ago and has continued to develop them, ensuring it has at least the potential to threaten China's growing number of military satellites.

Meanwhile, satellites have become a cornerstone of US military might with the US appearing keenly interested in the potential for orbiting weapons that could either provide defence against missiles or attack earth-bound targets.

Finally, Washington has itself been the strongest opponent of efforts by China and Russia to push for an international treaty that would ban the deployment of weapons in space and the use of force against objects in orbit.

Of course, China's lack of military transparency can itself be cited in support of Washington's opposition to such a treaty, given US fears that it would be impossible to guarantee compliance.

However, Robert Karniol of Jane's Defence Weekly says Beijing's test itself was entirely predictable and that suggestions it will trigger an space arms race are a matter of the "pot calling the kettle black".

"There has been such an arms race under way for many years," says Mr Karniol.

"This development may be leapt upon for its propaganda value, but the US programmes were already well under way."

Additional reporting by Michiyo Nakamoto.

China Confirms Space Test; Denies Intent To Intimidate (NYT)

By Joseph Kahn

The New York Times, January 24, 2007

BEIJING, Jan. 23 — The Chinese government publicly confirmed Tuesday that it had conducted a successful test of a new antisatellite weapon but said it had no intention of participating in a “space race.”

The confirmation was made at a regular Foreign Ministry news briefing, 12 days after China used a medium-range ballistic missile to destroy one of its own weather satellites 535 miles above Earth. Several countries, including the United States, Japan, Britain and Australia, pressed Beijing to explain the test, apparently the first successful destruction of a satellite in orbit in more than 20 years.

DOJ_NMG_0120925

Until now, Chinese officials declined to confirm or deny that it had occurred, despite news reports last week that quoted Bush administration officials describing the exercise in detail. Liu Jianchao, the Foreign Ministry spokesman, issued the first official comment.

"This test was not directed at any country and does not constitute a threat to any country," he said. "What needs to be stressed is that China has always advocated the peaceful use of space, opposes the weaponization of space and an arms race in space. China has never participated and will never participate in any arms race in outer space."

Mr. Liu did not say why the Chinese Army had conducted the test. He also did not directly address concerns that the use of a missile to shatter a satellite in a low orbit might be perceived as inconsistent with China's repeated calls to ban the use of weapons in space.

Beijing's prolonged silence about the test, which American intelligence officials said took place on Jan. 11, raised speculation about its intentions and the circumstances surrounding the test.

Senior Bush administration officials raised the possibility that the silence might have reflected the autonomy and isolation of the Chinese military. They said they could not be sure that President Hu Jintao, who oversees the military as well as the Communist Party, had personally authorized or overseen the test.

On Tuesday, Mr. Liu denied that officials had taken too much time before speaking publicly. "China has nothing to hide," he said. "After various parties expressed concerns, we explained this test in outer space to them."

Japanese and American officials said China had not volunteered any information until they had made formal diplomatic inquiries, and then it had taken at least four days to get a reply. The first confirmation apparently came when Christopher R. Hill, an assistant secretary of state, visited his counterparts in Beijing over the weekend to discuss efforts to revive six-nation negotiations on North Korea's nuclear weapons program.

Sean McCormack, the State Department spokesman, said Monday that Mr. Hill had been assured that the test "was not meant as a threat against anybody" and that Chinese officials had acknowledged that it had taken place.

Independent experts on the Chinese military say China has sought a workable antisatellite weapon since the 1980s. One reason is that the United States military depends heavily on satellites for missile guidance, navigation and communications, and any widespread damage to that network could hamper military action overseas.

China has long feared that the United States might intervene in any military conflict with Taiwan, and has invested heavily in new arms that experts say are intended to give it the power to attack Taiwan while keeping American forces at bay.

But others say China's intentions in conducting this test may have been more diplomatic in nature, intended to put pressure on the United States to negotiate a treaty to ban weapons in space. Russia and China have pressed for an international treaty that would limit the use of space for military purposes. The Bush administration has declined to take part in such talks.

Over the summer, President Bush authorized a new space policy that seeks to preserve "freedom of action" in space, and he said the United States reserved the right to use force against countries seeking to disrupt American satellites.

Xu Guangyu, a former Chinese Army officer and an official at the government-run China Arms Control and Disarmament Association, said the antisatellite test amounted to an attempt to redefine the "rules of the game" and press the United States into negotiations.

"What China is saying is, 'Let's sit down and talk,' " Mr. Xu said. "There is a trend toward weaponization of space that no one, especially China, wants to see."

Officials Fear War In Space By China (WT)

By Bill Gertz

The Washington Times, January 24, 2007

China's anti-satellite-interceptor test Jan. 11 is part of a covert space-weapons program designed to cripple the U.S. military in a conflict, defense officials said yesterday as Beijing confirmed it had destroyed one of its weather satellites. China said it had not "weaponized" space.

DOJ_NMG_0120926

The anti-satellite weapon was identified by U.S. government officials as a nonexplosive "kinetic kill vehicle," which destroys its target simply by colliding with it. It was the first success in four attempts by China to destroy an orbiting object in space over the past two years.

Chinese Foreign Ministry spokesman Liu Jianchao said in Beijing that the government briefed the Bush administration on the test and that international fears of Chinese space weapons were groundless.

"This test was not directed at any country and does not constitute a threat to any country," Mr. Liu said. It was the first official confirmation of the test, which was kept secret in Beijing as well as Washington until the magazine Aviation Week reported it Friday.

"What needs to be stressed is that China has always advocated the peaceful use of space, opposes the weaponization of space and arms races in space," Mr. Liu said at a press briefing.

The White House said China's explanation was not sufficient.

China's public and private "assurances" on the test were welcome but "are incomplete and do not answer many of the questions raised by the international community," said Gordon Johndroe, a spokesman for the National Security Council.

Protests were raised by the governments of Japan, Australia, India, Canada and other states, which saw the test as part of increasing Chinese military power that contrast with Beijing's public assurances of being engaged in a "peaceful rise."

"We are concerned about China's lack of transparency," Mr. Johndroe said. "For example, China has not explained the intent of this weapons test, nor has it stated whether or not it plans future tests."

Mr. Liu said he was not aware of plans for an additional test.

Mr. Johndroe also said that China's government failed to explain how the test "is compatible with its public stance against the weaponization of space," noting the issue will be pursued further in diplomatic channels.

U.S. officials familiar with intelligence reports said yesterday that three previous tests were unsuccessful. All four tests involved the launch of a commercial rocket booster carrying an anti-satellite (ASAT) warhead that would separate from the booster in space and seek to crash into the satellite about 530 miles above the earth.

Some U.S. policy and intelligence officials have tried in internal memorandums to play down the significance of the ASAT test, saying that the warhead hit a large, low-earth-orbit satellite and that it would be more difficult to hit higher-orbiting and smaller systems.

Other defense officials, however, said the test has raised alarm bells because it exposed a key strategic vulnerability. They also said that there are major gaps in U.S. intelligence about which other space weapons and capabilities China has or is developing that could cripple or disable U.S. satellites, which handle about 90 percent of all military communications, as well as intelligence and missile guidance.

The Jan. 11 test also alarmed military and defense officials because it undermined American intelligence estimates that China's military trails the U.S. military in terms of weapons and war-fighting capabilities by 10 years.

"The ASAT test showed they are not following us [militarily] but trying to leap ahead," one defense official said.

U.S. intelligence agencies received some advance indications of the test, in which a commercial KT-1 rocket, a version of the medium-range DF-21 missile, was launched from the Xichang space center, in southwestern Sichuan province.

The ASAT weapon separated from the last stage in space and then destroyed the Feng Yun-1C weather satellite, launched in 1999 and orbiting over both poles, by ramming into it at high speed. U.S. officials said debris from the destroyed satellite continues to orbit and poses a risk to some of the 800 satellites now in space, 400 of which are American.

China also illuminated a U.S. satellite with a ground-based laser in another anti-satellite test, according to a report by the congressional U.S.-China Economic and Security Review Commission.

The report, produced by defense analyst Michael Pillsbury, revealed that China has plans for secret space weapons that include ground-based lasers, air-to-space missile interceptors and an exotic plasma bomb that would destroy orbiting satellites by enveloping them in an electronic cloud.

The report also stated that three books written by Chinese colonels in 2001, 2002 and 2005 contain "proposals for covert deployment of antisatellite weapons directed at U.S. assets."

DOJ_NMG_0120927

One author, Col. Jia Junming, stated in his 2002 book that Chinese space-weapons development should be covert and "intense internally but relaxed in external appearance to maintain our good international image and position."

The 2005 book, "Joint Space War Campaigns," by Col. Yuan Zelu, calls for deploying an orbiting network of strike weapons that "will be concealed and launched only in a crisis or emergency" to "bring the opponent to his knees."

De-militarize Space (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, January 24, 2007

We should not let space become a battlefield, but treaties banning weapons there will be difficult.

SPACE WARFARE may be a staple of science fiction, but almost no one in the real world thinks it's a good idea. That's why China's destruction this month of a moribund weather satellite is so alarming: It was the first time in more than 20 years that a ground-fired missile was used against a satellite.

Yet a ban on all weapons in space that could be enforced, while desirable, may be as utopian as some science fiction scenarios. Official U.S. space policy instructs the Pentagon "to ensure freedom of action in space and, if directed, deny such freedom of action to adversaries." The Chinese test, as well as other technological developments, suggest that a rethinking of this position is in order.

Some of the issues are easy. Space junk of the sort generated by the Chinese test now poses a danger to satellites from many nations. Whole orbital zones may become unusable in a decade — at great cost to science and commerce. The world should make more of an effort to reduce space debris. This could be done by amending the 1967 Outer Space Treaty, which bans weapons of mass destruction from space and which most nations, including China and the United States, have joined. Like other anti-litter laws, such a rule might be flouted, but it would at least set a standard for the need for good orbital hygiene. The space treaty's weak provisions against damaging others' satellites should be toughened with the addition of real enforcement mechanisms.

More thorny is whether new ways can be found to prohibit testing and development of anti-satellite systems without fatally compromising the ability to use anti-ballistic missile systems, which operate at altitudes of a few hundred miles. In the 1980s, arms control discussions foundered on disagreements about whether to ban only space-based weapons and ignore ground-based ones that could knock out objects in space. Because the United States had a technological advantage, it could afford to refuse to negotiate.

Now, U.S. government and commercial interests own 53% of the 845 satellites circling the Earth. Many more nations have or soon may have the technology to help put up such satellites or to knock them down. It is in the U.S. interest to work to keep space clean and safe. It will be difficult to design, negotiate, verify and enforce international agreements that both protect U.S. and global security concerns and prevent the weaponization of space. But the Chinese test demonstrates the futility — and danger — of refusing to try.

China May Lower Fines For Poor Who Violate One-Child-Only Policy (WP)

By Maureen Fan

The Washington Post, January 24, 2007

BEIJING, Jan. 23 -- Fines imposed on Chinese who violate the country's one-child-only policy may be reduced for the poor, a top family planning official said Tuesday, as authorities stressed a broader approach to population management.

The announcement came a day after state media reported that many Chinese believe it is unfair that the wealthy can "buy" a second child by simply paying fines for breaking the one-child-only rule for most urban couples.

"Rich people and poor people, they are all equal before the law," Zhang Weiqing, the head of the National Population and Family Planning Commission, told reporters in Beijing.

"With very poor families, we may reduce part of the social compensation fee or waive the fee, depending on the actual situation," he said. "As for their other difficulties, we will help them by all means, including providing compulsory education and medical care."

The announcement appeared to be part of a broader attempt by officials to put a more human face on China's much-maligned family planning policies. As the most populous country on Earth -- China has 1.3 billion people -- the country is struggling with an aging population, a growing rich-poor gap, unemployment pressures and continued reports of family planning abuses, including forced abortions and sterilizations.

DOJ_NMG_0120928

"Our priority is to invest in human development -- to change from a country with a huge population base to a country with rich human capital," Zhao Baige, vice minister of the family planning commission, said last week.

This month, officials released what they said was their first "population development strategy research report," assembled by hundreds of scholars. That report credited China's national family planning policy with preventing the birth of more than 400 million people over the last 30 years.

The policy has also contributed to an imbalanced sex ratio; allowed only one child, many couples choose to abort female fetuses, in keeping with the traditional preference of the Chinese for boys. According to the population report, there are 118 boys for every 100 girls, and the gap is expected to grow. By 2020, if the current birthrate remains stable, marriage-age men will outnumber women by 30 million, a "serious hidden danger which may lead to social disorder," the report said.

A survey conducted Monday by the China Youth Daily and the popular http://QQ.com Web site found that 61 percent of respondents thought it was unfair that wealthy people could essentially afford to have more babies by paying fines. One-third thought officials should develop some punishment other than a fine.

That fines might be eased for the poor shows the great attention the government is paying to public opinion about the rich-poor gap, said Ma Mingjie, director of the Social Research Center of the newspaper, which conducted the survey. "They really want to take some effective measures to ease the tension."

Zhang, the head of the family planning commission, called for the improvement of living standards and the status of women, a social security system for the elderly and stricter laws prohibiting sex-selective abortions. But he did not detail any new major policy changes.

Instead, he and Vice Minister Wang Guoqiang emphasized the complexity of China's population policy, based on residency and other factors. About 36 percent of China's families -- those who live in cities and some rural areas -- are "encouraged" to have just one child; 53 percent are allowed to have a second child if their first baby is a girl. Other families, depending on where they live, are allowed to have two children and, in rare instances, more.

"Actually our policy is a more multidimensional policy," Wang said.

That policy has been abused frequently as local officials manipulated it for financial gain.

In areas where poor, rural families have one child or only two girls, local governments will now give those parents a pension or reward, Zhang said. In an indication of rampant corruption, Zhang said distribution of aid to the poor will be managed by different agencies that will monitor each other.

Ban To Press Sudan President On Darfur (AP)

By Justin Bergman

AP, January 24, 2007

U.N. Secretary-General Ban Ki-moon will pressure Sudan's president next week to speed up the peace process in Darfur, which has been delayed by months of wrangling over the makeup of a larger peacekeeping force, U.N. officials said Tuesday.

Ban, on his first overseas trip as head of the world body, will meet with Sudanese President Omar al-Bashir on the sidelines of an African Union summit in Ethiopia. The meeting could be crucial to pushing through a three-phase U.N. plan to beef up the 7,000-member AU force that is struggling to maintain peace in the vast desert region.

Al-Bashir has refused to allow U.N. peacekeeping troops to replace the beleaguered African force in Darfur. Last month, he appeared to endorse the new U.N. plan that culminates with the deployment of a 22,000-strong "hybrid" AU-U.N. force, but Sudanese officials have since wavered on that support.

"The secretary-general is hoping to make the whole issue of Darfur move forward," his spokeswoman, Michele Montas, said at a news briefing Tuesday. "The U.N. plan for the AU force is still on the table and being discussed. What we will see is how fast the different stages can be implemented."

DOJ_NMG_0120929

Another U.N. official put it more bluntly: "We want unambiguous commitment on the schedule of the deployment. ... (The Sudanese) need to give us firm dates." The official spoke on the condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the negotiations.

Sudan's U.N. mission did not return several phone calls Tuesday seeking comment.

During Ban's week-long, seven-nation trip, which starts Wednesday, he plans to attend a donor's conference in Paris on reconstruction aid for Lebanon, and visit the European Union office in Brussels and the International Court of Justice and Yugoslav war crimes tribunal in The Hague.

But Africa will be the primary focus of the trip, part of what Ban said last week would be a theme throughout his tenure as U.N. chief.

The secretary-general is scheduled to spend a day in Congo, where 18,000 peacekeepers are serving in the world's largest U.N. mission. He plans to address the National Assembly and meet with newly elected President Joseph Kabila.

He will also travel to Kenya to hold talks with President Mwai Kibaki.

The Darfur crisis, in which more than 200,000 people have been killed and 2.5 million displaced, began in February 2003 when rebels from black African tribes took up arms, complaining of decades of neglect and discrimination by Sudan's Arab-dominated government. The government is accused of unleashing Arab tribal militia known as janjaweed against civilians in a campaign of killings, rapes and arson. The government denies the allegations.

The government signed a peace agreement with one of the rebel factions in May, but violence has since worsened in the region and the conflict has spilled over into neighboring Chad and Central African Republic.

In Ethiopia, Ban will seek to bolster support for the U.N. security plan by asking African countries to pressure Sudan to allow the hybrid peacekeeping force into Darfur, said the U.N. official who spoke on condition of anonymity.

Al-Bashir agreed to the force in a letter to former U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan last month, but his country's U.N. ambassador has since said the force must be smaller and have no U.N. peacekeepers in traditional blue helmets, only African troops supported by U.N. technical and logistical experts.

"Sudan has jumped at every opportunity to distance itself from the agreement," the U.N. official said.

Ban has also reached out to China, meeting Tuesday with U.N. Ambassador Wang Guangya. The U.N. official declined to offer details of their discussions, but said, "(Wang) is the one person who could put pressure on Sudan. ... Once we have a Chinese agreement, things will move a lot faster."

China, which is one of Sudan's biggest oil customers, has resisted U.N. attempts to force Khartoum to accept peacekeepers. China's U.N. mission declined to comment on Wang's meeting with Ban.

US Condemns Sudanese Government Assault Of UN Staff, Aid Workers (AFP)

AFP, January 24, 2007

The United States condemned the Sudanese government's arrest and subsequent assault of 20 staff from the UN, African Union and non-governmental organizations in strife-torn Darfur.

Sudanese police raided the International Non Governmental Organization (INGO) compound in Nyala, southern Darfur on Friday and arrested 20 people, including INGO, UN and African Union staff gathered for a social function, according to the United Nations.

US State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said the United States "condemns" their arrest and assault and added that the Sudanese government had an obligation to protect humanitarian aid workers and others providing "life-saving" assistance to Sudanese.

"There is no justification for these appalling recent attacks on humanitarian aid workers," he said in a statement.

But he pointed out that such attacks would not weaken international resolve to assist the people of war-ravaged Darfur.

"Rather, the Sudanese government's actions will only bring about additional international scrutiny," he said.

McCormack called on all parties in Darfur to demonstrate their commitment to peace and serving the needs of the people of Sudan.

DOJ_NMG_0120930

More than 200,000 people have died, according to the United Nations, since the February 2003 civil war broke out in Darfur province where African Union peacekeepers supplemented by UN advisers struggle to maintain order.

Anti-government Protests Paralyse Lebanon (FT)

By Andrew England

Financial Times, January 24, 2007

Supporters of Hizbollah and its Christian allies paralysed Lebanon on Tuesday as they dramatically escalated their campaign to overthrow the government, blocking highways with burning cars and tyres and triggering clashes that killed three people and injured dozens.

The protests – a conspicuous show of strength by the opposition, which had called for a general strike – took place in most parts of the country and ramped up a political confrontation between the Shia militant group and its allies and the pro-western government.

As a result of the demonstrations, Fouad Siniora, prime minister, cancelled a planned flight to Paris, where the government is to present an economic reform package at a donor conference on Thursday. It is seeking aid to rebuild the nation after last year's war between Hizbollah and Israel, which cost Lebanon an estimated $9bn (€7bn, £4.6bn).

"Our hands are stretched out for dialogue," Mr Siniora told reporters. "What happened today was very dangerous, it reminds us of the images of war."

The main road to the airport was among the highways blocked by burning cars, tyres and mounds of sand and dirt.

The Shia group and its allies, including Michel Aoun, who has the largest following of any Christian party leader, have been seeking to capitalise on Hizbollah's claimed success in the 34-day conflict since the United Nations-brokered ceasefire in August. The timing of the protests was seen as a deliberate attempt to draw attention away from the Paris3 conference, where the government will receive strong international support.

The finance and economic ministers, as well as the central bank governor, were already in France ahead of the conference, a government official said.

It was unclear how long the protests would last. "Most of the people of Lebanon are against the [economic] paper of the government and do not want any aid under any conditions," said Hussein Rahal, a Hizbollah spokesman. "The people of the opposition will not surrender to the government because it is illegal and it is supported by foreigners not by [the] Lebanese."

In a speech on Monday, Sayyed Hassan Nasrallah, Hizbollah's leader, launched a fierce attack on Mr Siniora, saying if his administration remained in power Lebanon was "headed to economic collapse".

Mr Nasrallah has vowed that all protests would be peaceful but clashes broke out between government and opposition supporters, particularly between rival Christian groups, whose community has become increasingly divided during the political crisis, as well as between Shia and Sunni.

Sectarian tensions have been escalating dangerously since the opposition began its campaign against the western-backed government. The administration has a parliamentary majority and accuses the opposition of attempting a coup.

In Lebanon and abroad the crisis is seen as part of a wider regional conflict, particularly the standoff between the US and Iran and Syria, which back Hizbollah.

The army took action in some areas where there were clashes and cleared some routes, but it did not attempt to remove blockades in others. The military was criticised by both sides and appeared keen to avoid direct confrontation, which could divide the army – an institution that mirrors the sectarian fabric of Lebanon.

Supporters of the Shia group have been camped outside the prime minister's office in downtown Beirut since the beginning of December as part of the opposition's efforts to pressure the government. But that protest has made little headway and both sides are deadlocked over the issue of the opposition's representation in the cabinet.

The opposition is seeking a blocking minority and wants to force early elections. Hizbollah and the country's highly politicised labour unions have also condemned the economic recovery package.

It includes privatisations, public sector reforms, fuel price increases and an incremental rise in VAT on goods and services, from 10 to 12 per cent, then to 15 per cent.

DOJ_NMG_0120931

Clash Pits Hezbollah Against Rule In Lebanon (NYT)

By Nada Bakri And Hassan M. Fattah

The New York Times, January 24, 2007

BEIRUT, Lebanon, Jan. 23 — Thousands of supporters of the Iranian-backed Hezbollah, which is seeking to bring down the pro-Western government, clashed with government supporters and blocked highways leading into Beirut, the capital, on Tuesday, raising fears that the political crisis might lead to open sectarian conflict.

The police said at least three people died and 100 more were wounded throughout the country in the violence, the worst since Hezbollah began demanding more political power late last year. Mobs of men burned tires, set cars on fire and fought occasional gun battles with their political opponents.

In some cases, partisans yelled slogans with clear sectarian undertones, an especially frightening development for those who lived through Lebanon's bloody civil war from 1975 to 1990.

By nightfall, the opposition began removing most of the makeshift roadblocks in the Beirut area and announced that it would call off the nationwide general strike that had set off the unrest. But the group warned that more protests could follow.

"This is a one-day show of force for the time being," said Paul Salem, director of the Carnegie Middle East Center in Beirut.

The opposition has accused Prime Minister Fouad Siniora, a Sunni, of corruption and graft and has dismissed him as a Western puppet. Opposition forces have called for his resignation and for a "unity" government that would ultimately give Hezbollah and its allies veto power.

The violence on Tuesday occurred two days before a crucial conference of donor nations in Paris to secure $5 billion in loans and aid to rebuild parts of Lebanon destroyed in the Israeli-Hezbollah war last summer. Hezbollah has vied with the government to provide help to residents in the country's south and in Beirut's southern suburbs, which were the worst hit during the monthlong war.

Mr. Siniora insisted Tuesday that nothing would keep him from Paris.

"I urge you to think clearly where they want to take you, away from your interest and that of the country," Mr. Siniora told the protesters on television. "We will stay together against intimidation. We will stand together against strife."

The turmoil started at dawn, when groups of protesters set up roadblocks along major thoroughfares leading into Beirut, blocking roads with burning tires, trucks and rubble said to be from buildings demolished last summer by Israeli bombs. They set fire to vehicles and, on several instances, were filmed attacking cars trying to pass their cordon.

In Beirut, many of the clashes were in mixed neighborhoods, where young men on each side shouted epithets and hurled stones at each other.

Along a thoroughfare, the men got into a brawl amid sporadic gunfire. One side raised photos of Sheik Hassan Nasrallah, the Hezbollah leader and a Shiite, and burned those of former Lebanese Prime Minister Rafiq Hariri, whose assassination in 2005 set off Lebanon's latest political turmoil, a witness said. The other side lined up across the street and raised photos of Mr. Hariri, Mr. Siniora and even of Saddam Hussein, a Sunni.

On the coastal highway north of Beirut, supporters of Gen. Michel Aoun, leader of the Free Patriotic Movement, a Christian group and a Hezbollah ally, fought with men loyal to Samir Geagea, a government ally, in especially violent clashes.

"It is a revolution against us, they are attacking us with stones and burning pictures of our leaders and blocking our roads," said Ibrahim Hijazi, 29, a government backer.

Opposition leaders insisted their supporters were protesting "peacefully" when residents began hurling stones at them. They also said they would not allow themselves to be dragged into a sectarian conflict.

"Blocking roads is a democratic expression that happens all over the world," said Hussein Haj Hassan, a member of Hezbollah's parliamentary bloc. "The government refused all the solutions we proposed, so we were left with only these options, and I warn them that we still have many other means of protest."

Mr. Siniora, on Lebanese television on Tuesday night, insisted that he would not step down and that he still enjoyed the country's support.

"We are at a crossroads today," he said. "Let's choose coexistence, civic peace, unity and stability, freedom and democracy instead of roads that will further split us and waste our energy and increase chances for violence and terrorism."

DOJ_NMG_0120932

Stores and businesses in many parts of Lebanon were closed in support of the general strike called by Sheik Nasrallah, as streets remained empty and many areas were covered in smoke from the burning tires.

At Rafik Hariri International Airport, Hezbollah men in black ski masks and brandishing batons blocked travelers.

According to The Associated Press, two of the deaths were in Tripoli, where two groups — one largely Sunni and one Alawite, a Shiite Muslim offshoot — fought each other in a gun battle. The other death was in a gunfight in the Christian Batroun region, The A.P. said.

Hezbollah Leads A Fiery Strike (WP)

By Anthony Shadid

The Washington Post, January 24, 2007

BEIRUT, Jan. 23 -- The Hezbollah-led opposition cut roads in Beirut and across Lebanon with burning tires, uprooted trees, incinerated cars and barricades to enforce a strike Tuesday aimed at toppling the government, paralyzing the country and embarrassing Lebanese officials ahead of an international aid conference. Clashes erupted along the country's crisis fault lines, leaving at least three people dead and scores injured in the worst violence since the protests began in December.

Fires at dozens of barricades sent black smoke billowing against a pale blue sky, framing the capital in scenes redolent of war. Along the airport highway, the opposition sent trucks and bulldozers to pour more rubble on roadblocks set up by dawn, forcing some passengers to drag their luggage on foot to the airport, where airlines canceled flights.

An overextended army, hewing to a policy of neutrality, rarely intervened to break the blockades, effectively ensuring the success of the most dramatic escalation yet in the two-month campaign led by Hezbollah, the militant Shiite organization, to force the resignation of Prime Minister Fouad Siniora.

Opposition leaders hailed the success of a one-day strike that, by choice or circumstance, closed shops, shut schools, emptied streets of traffic and blocked key roads to the airport and seaport on the Mediterranean. Government supporters spoke darkly of a coup d'etat, warning that the violence would only escalate, and some suggested that elements within the military might be complicit.

"If it goes on like this, nobody will be able to do anything. The government will have to step down," said Mohammed Harb, a 20-year-old Hezbollah supporter, standing at a fiery barricade that blocked six armored personnel carriers from passing. "And what's beautiful? It's not just Beirut. We've shut down all of Lebanon."

Siniora, who was scheduled to travel to Paris for the international conference, remained in Beirut and delivered an address on national television Tuesday evening. He promised to stand firm against what he called "intimidation" and said the military should permit "no flexibility or compromise" in keeping the peace.

More than a fight between a government and its opposition, the struggle here pits two camps that roughly divide the country in half, each sensing the other's victory as an existential threat. The divisions are as diverse as Lebanon itself, with its 18 religious sects: whether the government's patrons in the United States and France will have a greater say here, or Hezbollah's allies in Iran and Syria; what posture the country will take toward Israel; which sect -- Sunni or Shiite Muslim -- will be decisive in politics.

There is a certain cynicism among many Lebanese that the deadlock will be broken only with more bloodshed, forcing a compromise short of civil war. Each camp has mobilized its supporters -- for the government, Sunni, Druze and some Christians; for Hezbollah and Amal, its Shiite supporters, along with allied Christians led by Michel Aoun, a former general and prime minister. Each side has escalated, with a sense it can mount pressure on the other while still controlling passions in the streets.

But Tuesday's clashes, from Sunni-Shiite and Christian fault lines in Beirut to outlying towns that have so far skirted the crisis, may prove most memorable for scenes of strife defying those assumptions: the army and security forces firing into the air and lobbing tear gas; at other times helpless in separating the feuding sides, which threw rocks, sticks and insults across barricades in fights that lasted hours. At least three people were killed in towns north of Beirut, and more than 100 were injured before the opposition declared an end to the strike and began removing barricades late at night.

At times in the confrontations, a dehumanizing language entered the discourse.

"This is not democracy," said Roger Hayek, a government supporter and member of the Phalange Party, a Christian group. He pointed across lines of soldiers separating the sides, standing in a smoky haze. "This is an image of Iraq."

DOJ_NMG_0120933

A friend jumped in: "They're animals."

Hezbollah and its allies launched the campaign against Siniora's government with a sprawling protest in downtown Beirut on Dec. 1. Another one, possibly the largest in Lebanese history, followed Dec. 10, along with a sit-in that continues today in scores of tents pitched at the foot of the barricaded government headquarters.

The government has viewed it as a power grab through the street, vowing not to resign under pressure, and government-allied newspapers routinely refer to the opposition as coup plotters. But the opposition has its own collection of complaints, including what Hezbollah sees as Siniora's subservience to the United States and complicity in Israel's attack, as well as the populist economic grievances stressed by Aoun's supporters.

By any standard, Tuesday's campaign was a feat of logistics on parallel with December's protests. In addition to shutting down the capital, the vital thoroughfare to the Syrian capital, Damascus, was cut, and allied groups blocked roads in predominantly Sunni Muslim areas such as Tripoli and Akkar.

Virtually the only cars on the road to the airport were the incinerated carcasses of vehicles used as barricades, some of them sitting next to a smashed sign that read, "Beirut International Airport."

Hezbollah officials said privately that the strike was timed in part to embarrass the government ahead of Thursday's conference in Paris to consider what Lebanese officials hope will be $5 billion in grants and loans for reconstruction. The government, its priority mainly survival at this point, has made the conference, along with an international court to try the killers of a former Lebanese prime minister, its primary goals.

As the day dragged on, some of the barricades were removed or abandoned, and a smattering of traffic returned to the streets. But this faint sense of a typical weekday followed the worst violence since the opposition began its campaign.

At a road along Death River, one of the city's entrances, Christian foes and supporters of the government fought occasional melees with stones before the army intervened. With sticks, rocks and fists, crowds of government supporters attacked cars that carried orange banners, the color of Aoun, Hezbollah's ally. His partisans, tending blazing barricades, refused to make way for soldiers trying to open the road.

"There is a saying in Lebanon that goes, 'It doesn't get smaller unless it gets bigger,' " said Nayla Abiaad, a 25-year-old Aoun supporter standing at the barricade.

Her sister, Rana, dressed in orange, stood next to her. "This is bigger," she said, smiling, as she pointed at burning tires, "and there's going to be more."

Across town, in the neighborhood of Mazraa, Sunni and Shiite residents fought a battle with rocks that lasted nearly two hours. By its end, they were separated by armored personnel carriers, a charred, rubble-strewn street, a dirt lot and the stones they threw.

In seemingly contradictory ways, the crisis has both politicized and disillusioned the country. Few people are without opinions on the righteousness of one side or the other, but tens of thousands have emigrated since the war ended last summer. Chantal Braidi, a 31-year-old cafe owner in Beirut, called the country "dead."

"I want to live in this country, and it hurts me to leave -- I'm leaving all my family and friends behind -- but I want to live my life," she said. "Everything I have, I put in this country. What did I get in return? Nothing. Absolutely nothing."

"I'm leaving for my sanity," she added. "We're going crazy in this country."

Special correspondents Alia Ibrahim and Lynn Maalouf contributed to this report.

Hezbollah Leads Bloody Clash With Siniora Camp (WT/AP)

By Zeina Karam

The Washington Times, January 24, 2007

BEIRUT -- Hezbollah-led protesters burned tires and cars and clashed with government supporters yesterday, paralyzing Beirut and areas across Lebanon in the worst violence yet in the pro-Iranian group's campaign to topple U.S.-backed Prime Minister Fuad Siniora.

At least three persons were killed and dozens injured as the two camps battled each other around street barricades with stone-throwing and in some cases gunfire. Black smoke poured into the sky over Beirut from burning roadblocks.

DOJ_NMG_0120934

The fighting quickly took on a dangerous sectarian tone in a country whose divided communities fought a bloody 1975-90 civil war. Gunmen from neighboring districts in the northern city of Tripoli -- one largely Sunni Muslim, the other largely Alawites, a Shi'ite Muslim offshoot -- fought each other, causing two of the fatalities.

In the evening, the opposition announced that it would call off the roadblocks and the nationwide general strike that sparked the unrest, saying it had delivered a warning to the government. But it threatened more protests.

Suleiman Franjieh, a Christian opposition leader, told Hezbollah's Al-Manar television that the next steps "will be nothing compared to what we saw today" if the government does not respond to the opposition's demands.

The Hezbollah-led opposition is growing increasingly frustrated after two months of sit-in protests outside Mr. Siniora's offices in downtown Beirut failed to force him to step down or form a new government giving the opposition more power.

Mr. Siniora vowed not to yield, saying in a televised address: "We will stand together against intimidation and to confront sedition."

But he repeated his willingness to discuss a political solution to the impasse and called for a special session of parliament.

The violence called into question whether Mr. Siniora will be able to attend a conference of donor nations in Paris tomorrow aimed at raising billions of dollars in aid for rebuilding Lebanon after the devastation wreaked by the summer's Israel-Hezbollah war.

Cabinet Minister Ahmed Fatfat said the economy and finance ministers already were in Paris and the conference could proceed without Mr. Siniora.

The day's turmoil brought the Beirut airport to a halt, with Hezbollah supporters building earthen barricades on roads to the facility.

Their cars blocked, departing passengers wheeled suitcases past protesters and burning tires on the highway leading to the airport. Airlines canceled flights later in the day, and 400 passengers were stranded at the terminal. Among those stuck for hours were 146 Chinese troops who were joining U.N. peacekeepers in south Lebanon.

Protesters set up barricades of burning tires and cars at major intersections in Beirut and other cities. In many areas, violence erupted when government backers moved in to confront the protesters.

Security forces struggled to contain the violence. In some places, officers moved between battling camps of protesters amid a rain of stones. In others, they broke down barricades only to see them rebuilt.

Protests Bring Lebanon To A Halt (LAT)

By Megan K. Stack

The Los Angeles Times, January 24, 2007

Hezbollah and its allies paralyzed Lebanon on Tuesday, sending thousands of demonstrators to seize control of major roads, brawl with government supporters and choke the seaside capital in the acrid smoke of burning tires.

The swift seizure of the country's roads took many here by surprise, and marked a major escalation in the militant group Hezbollah's campaign to overthrow Lebanon's U.S.-backed government. At least three people died and more than 100 were wounded as clashes flared around the country.

The opposition, dominated by the powerful Shiite Muslim Hezbollah, had called for a general strike Tuesday, and the roadblocks gave people little choice but to stay home.

The roads to Beirut's airport were impassable, blocked by sand berms, garbage and roaring fires. Some flights were canceled, and arriving passengers languished at the airport.

The roadblocks in the capital were being cleared overnight, but the opposition threatened further escalation if the government didn't step down.

Hour after tense hour, the army and security services gave free rein to the protesters. While young men barricaded neighborhoods and halted cars to interrogate the drivers, soldiers and police officers stood by and watched. Security forces in riot gear lined some streets, and armored personnel carriers crunched over the rubble. But to the delight of some Lebanese and the disgust of others, they didn't interfere.

DOJ_NMG_0120935

"They are on our side," crowed Kamal Yehiya, a 20-year-old Hezbollah supporter who was hurling rubble into a fire near downtown.

The blockade tapped into the deep well of tribal rage and sectarian animosities that seem to fester just beneath the surface in Lebanon.

"Welcome to hell," said Mohammed Boukari, 29, who stood watching as his south Beirut neighborhood dissolved into a melee of religious taunts, gunfire and rock-throwing.

Sunnis, Shiites face off

On one side of the road, Sunni supporters of Prime Minister Fouad Siniora clambered onto the roof of a gas station, lobbed stones and cursed Shiite leaders. On the other side, young Shiite men responded in kind, waving the pipes and bedposts they carried as weapons and hollering with rage.

Clad in riot gear, soldiers raced through the streets between the two mobs, shooting into the air and blocking the young men from charging at one another.

"We are from the same neighborhood. We are Lebanese," Boukari said. "But look at this."

Barricaded indoors, the government decried the opposition's tactics as an attempted coup d'etat.

"This is not a strike. This is military action," Cabinet minister Ahmed Fatfat told Al Arabiya satellite channel.

Speaking on Lebanese television, Siniora said the government was ready for talks with the opposition and called for parliament to convene.

"The current explosive crisis needs to be dealt with quickly by moving the fights from the streets to the legitimate political institutions," he said.

For more than 50 wintry days, Hezbollah and its allies have camped on the pavement downtown in a massive sit-in aimed at toppling the government. The demonstrators deride the government as an illegitimate tool of the United States and Israel.

But Siniora's government has dug in its heels, vowing not to relinquish power. When hundreds of thousands of people flooded the capital to demand his ouster, he dismissed their calls as a coup attempt engineered by Syria and Iran, the main backers of Hezbollah.

"The opposition was well aware that it was running out of cards," said Amal Saad-Ghorayeb, a Hezbollah expert and visiting fellow at the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace. "This is perhaps their only remaining weapon."

In Washington, the Bush administration criticized the demonstrators and accused Syria of fueling the turmoil.

"These factions are trying to use violence, threats and intimidation to impose their political will on Lebanon," said chief State Department spokesman Sean McCormack.

But in the Lebanese capital, one of the many demonstrators at an intersection in front of Beirut's museum explained her motivation as fires blazed around her.

"We have to do something to make them hear us, to make them know we exist," said Natalie Rizek, 23, a medical student who supports popular Christian opposition leader Gen. Michel Aoun.

"We tried everything," she said. "They were continuing as if nothing was happening."

Residents who ventured forth held tissues to their noses or wore surgical masks to shield against the black smoke that billowed through the streets.

"This is not democracy," sputtered Noha Qaisi, a 48-year-old homemaker. "My kids are saying they're suffocating from all the smoke inside."

Premier alters plans

As the capital smoldered around him, Siniora was forced to postpone his departure for an international donors conference in Paris. Supporters of the government have been banking on the Paris meeting to help Lebanon recover from the devastation of last summer's war between Israel and Hezbollah.

Like most events backed by Hezbollah, Tuesday's demonstrations were carefully coordinated. Trucks loaded with tires were parked along the roadsides to feed the fires. At intersections, older men with walkie-talkies supervised the fire building. Young men on mopeds buzzed from one corner to the next, passing along news and instructions.

DOJ_NMG_0120936

A red Volvo rolled slowly between stained apartment blocks, a loudspeaker strapped to its roof and the driver's words echoing off the buildings:

"Starting now, and until our demands are met, the noble people of Lebanon must rise up," he said. He closed, as if signing a letter, with a curt "Hezbollah."

Mindful of the risk of igniting Shiite-Sunni tensions, especially as a civil war rages in nearby Iraq, Hezbollah has tried to fight the perception that the push against the government is being led solely by Shiites.

It's true that the old notion of a definitive Christian-Muslim split is now defunct; both religions are present on both sides of the political chasm, and some of the fiercest fighting erupted Tuesday among Christians allied with Hezbollah and those who back the government.

Corniche Mazraa, a boulevard in south Beirut that divides a predominantly Shiite neighborhood from a mainly Sunni area, degenerated into a scene of urban warfare as gangs from each neighborhood battled the army to get at their rivals across the street.

"If the government doesn't fall, there will be a sectarian war," said Ali Shihadi, a 23-year-old Shiite geography student. Behind him, men were smashing cinder blocks on the pavement, breaking them into rubble to hurl across the street. "Syria! Syria! Syria!" some of the Shiite men chanted.

On the other side of the road, Sunni youths stopped hurling rocks long enough to hang the flag of Sunni-ruled Saudi Arabia from an electrical pole.

"Saddam, Saddam, Saddam," chanted the young men, invoking the executed former president of Iraq, who was a Sunni. They thumped themselves on the head, mocking Shiite self-flagellation rites. They chanted for Siniora, beat a tambourine and danced wildly, waving their makeshift weapons.

"They want us to be ruled by Iran and Syria," said Omar Senou, a 27-year-old photography clerk. "That will never happen, even if we have to cut throats."

megan.stack@latimes.com

Times staff writer Paul Richter in Washington and special correspondent Raed Rafei in Beirut contributed to this report.

'We have to do something to make them hear us, to make them know we exist.'

Candidates Court Israel, Cite Iran Risks (WT)

By Joshua Mitnick

The Washington Times, January 24, 2007

HERZLIYA, Israel -- Presidential hopefuls Mitt Romney, John Edwards and John McCain all detoured through Israel on the way to New Hampshire this week, seemingly competing to see who could be strongest in defense of the Jewish state.

Speaking in person or by video link Monday and yesterday, the politicians spelled out tough measures they said were necessary to prevent Iran from acquiring nuclear weapons. Former House Speaker Newt Gingrich also addressed the conference.

Stressing the strong U.S.-Israeli relationship at the Herzliya security conference outside Tel Aviv, the Americans called for the United States to step up sanctions on Iran and leave the possibility of a military attack "on the table."

In less than a decade, the annual conference has become a mecca for Middle East specialists, partly because Ariel Sharon used it to outline his plan to pull out of the Gaza Strip when he was prime minister.

For American politicians, the gathering provides an opportunity to float policy positions and reach out to Jewish voters in the United States.

"This forum has become the Davos for Middle East wonks," said David Makovsky, a senior fellow at the Washington Institute for Near East Policy who also was scheduled to speak. The Swiss town of Davos plays host to World Economic Forum meetings.

"During the Cold War, the Middle East was a backwater of American policy. But with the end of the Cold War, the Middle East has become the center of American policy. [The conference is] a legitimate forum for them to express their views on a region that's important."

DOJ_NMG_0120937

Mr. Romney, a former governor of Massachusetts and potential contender for the 2008 Republican presidential nomination, called for economic sanctions on Iran that are "at least as severe" as those imposed on South Africa during its apartheid era.

He compared the challenge posed by Iran and militant Islam to the great threats of the 20th century -- fascism and totalitarian communism. He also recommended that Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad be brought before an international court and be tried for threatening genocide.

"It is time for the world to plainly speak these three truths," said Mr. Romney, the only one of the four to attend in person. "One, Iran must be stopped. Two, Iran can be stopped. And three, Iran will be stopped."

Mr. Gingrich, speaking by satellite video link, said Israel faced the most serious threat to its existence since the 1967 Arab-Israeli war. But many in Israel and the United States do not fully appreciate the nature, size and scope of the Iranian threat, he said.

"I have two grandchildren," said Mr. Gingrich, who has declared that he would run for president next year only as a last resort, "and I think there is a greater danger of them dying in an action than I faced during the Cold War."

Mr. McCain, Arizona Republican and a presidential front-runner, said he supported exploring a strengthening of ties between Israel and NATO as a means of easing Israel's insecurity.

"A friendly democracy under siege should be closer partners to the world's most successful security alliance," he said via satellite link. "American support for Israel should intensify. The enemies are too numerous, the margin of error too small, and shared values too great."

Mr. Edwards, of North Carolina, the only Democratic presidential candidate to address the conference, similarly called to toughen sanctions on Iran and hold out the threat of military force, but he broke with the others by suggesting that Washington open a dialogue with Iran.

"I support being tough, but I think it's a mistake strategically and ideologically not to engage them on this issue," he said. "America should engage directly on this issue."

Iranian President Derides U.S. Threats (AP)

By Ali Akbar Dareini

AP, January 24, 2007

The United States is incapable of inflicting "serious damage" on Iran, President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad said Tuesday, as a second U.S. aircraft carrier group steamed toward the Gulf as a warning from Washington for Iran to back down in its attempts to dominate the region.

In an interview with Iranian state television, Ahmadinejad said Washington had not stepped up its campaign against Tehran, despite the standoff with the West over Iran's defiance of U.N. demands to halt uranium enrichment. The U.N. Security Council imposed limited sanctions on Iran last month.

"U.S. rhetoric against Iran has not increased," Ahmadinejad said. "In 2003, they openly threatened to attack Iran. Now they have indirectly made such threats."

He spoke with confidence over Iran's ability to withstand a strike. "The United States is unable to inflict serious damage on Iran," the president said. He also noted, "They (U.S.) are not really in a position to carry out this action (of attacking Iran). I believe there are many wise people in the United States who would not let it happen."

Iran says its atomic program is aimed solely at generating energy, but the United States and some of its allies suspect it is geared toward making nuclear weapons.

Ahmadinejad, during a meeting Tuesday with Syrian Foreign Minister Walid Moallem, accused the U.S. of stirring up conflict between rival Muslim sects to maintain influence in the Middle East.

"The U.S. intends to cause insecurity and dispute and weaken independent governments in the region to continue with its dominance over the Middle East and achieve its arrogant goals," Ahmadinejad said, according to the state-run Islamic Republic News Agency, or IRNA.

DOJ_NMG_0120938

Opinion-makers from both ends of Iran's political spectrum have recently criticized Ahmadinejad, accusing him of stirring opposition to Iran by taking a hard line on the nuclear dispute and employing fiery anti-Western rhetoric.

But Ahmadinejad said his goals were peaceful. "Iran is not seeking confrontation with anybody," he told the state television interviewers.

U.S. officials have long refused to rule out any options in the faceoff with Tehran, but say military action would be a last resort.

Nicholas Burns, U.S. undersecretary of state for political affairs, ruled out direct negotiations with Iran and said a rapprochement between Washington and Tehran was "not possible" until Iran halts uranium enrichment.

"The Middle East isn't a region to be dominated by Iran. The Gulf isn't a body of water to be controlled by Iran. That's why we've seen the United States station two carrier battle groups in the region," Burns said Tuesday in an address to influential think-tank Gulf Research Center, based in the United Arab Emirates.

"Iran is going to have to understand that the United States will protect its interests if Iran seeks to confront us," Burns continued.

Some among the audience of Dubai-based diplomats and analysts complained that American wars in the Middle East were already threatening the region's stability and asked Burns to sort out Iraq and the Israel-Palestinian conflict before turning attention to Iran.

"What we are not interested in is another war in the region," Mohammed al-Naqbi, who heads the Gulf Negotiations Center, told Burns. "Iraq is your problem, not the problem of the Arabs. You destroyed a country that had institutions. You handed that country to Iran. Now you are crying to Europe and the Arabs to help you out of this mess."

The aircraft carrier USS John C. Stennis and accompanying warships have been sent to the Gulf as part of a buildup of forces that U.S. Defense Secretary Robert Gates has said is aimed to impress on Iran that the four-year war in Iraq has not made America vulnerable.

The Stennis, which is expected to arrive in late February, will join an aircraft carrier group already in the region, the USS Dwight D. Eisenhower.

The Stennis's arrival in the Middle East will mark the first time since the U.S.-led Iraq invasion in 2003 that the United States has had two carrier battle groups in the region.

Iran conducted missile tests on Monday, the first of five days of military maneuvers. The Islamic republic also barred 38 inspectors from the U.N. nuclear watchdog — the International Atomic Energy Agency, prompting fears that it was seeking to restrict access to its facilities.

"This is obviously not a sign of goodwill, nor a sign of willingness to cooperate with the international community," French Foreign Ministry spokesman Jean-Baptiste Mattei told reporters.

But Ali Larijani, Iran's top nuclear negotiator, said Tuesday that the decision had been misinterpreted and that there had been no change in Iran's cooperation with the IAEA.

___

Associated Press Writer Jim Krane in Dubai contributed to this report.

Red Lines (WSJ)

By Michael Young

The Wall Street Journal, January 24, 2007

BEIRUT -- A recurrent theme in history, literature and, lately, engagé academics is that of brash Westerners trying to possess the East and failing -- or at best leaving a transitory mark. From Alexander the Great to George W. Bush, few have successfully reshaped the Middle East in their own image. In his book "Figures de Proue," the great French historian René Grousset used an excellent formulation to express a discordant interplay between West and East. Describing how the Orientalization of Hellenism under Alexander had removed from Hellenism its "superior humanism," even though concepts were still being expressed in Greek, Grousset wrote: "As so often in history, words would, henceforth, lie to [the reality of] things."

DOJ_NMG_0120939

A similar thought came to my mind when reading from a letter written at the end of December by Iran's supreme guide, Ali Khamenei, to religious pilgrims. In his missive, Supreme Guide Khamenei condemned all those who criticized Hezbollah, who believed in the "illusory danger" of a so-called Shiite arc in the Middle East, who sought to bring down the "Islamic government" in Iraq, and who applied pressure against Hamas. They were "criminals who will be remembered in Islamic history, and by future generations, with hatred and anger as agents of the perfidious enemy." If Iran's supreme guide thought the Arab world would welcome his words, his pushing of ideological buttons in expectation of a rallying response among his listeners, then he underestimated how the Arabs' growing suspicion of Iran means they see his words increasingly as "lying to things."

Western grand projects frequently succumbed to Middle Eastern intransigence. But as Shiite Iran makes a bid for regional hegemony, its leadership should consider that the mostly Sunni Arabs may be as resistant to hubris coming from the East as from the West. That Arab regimes are weak, and because of their autocratic nature enjoy only dubious legitimacy at home, might only harden their resistance. Facing what they see as an Iranian threat, unsure of their ability to contain it, with or without American assistance, aware of the tenuousness of the oil weapon, these regimes may ultimately resort to the most ready defense at hand, one that would briefly enhance their influence: Sunni sectarian mobilization.

Take Lebanon and the Palestinian territories. Since December, the Lebanese government of Prime Minister Fouad Siniora has been facing opposition demands to resign. While that opposition includes members of all religious groups, its vital force and street muscle are the Shiite supporters of Hezbollah. That's why Lebanese viewed the open-ended protests through a sectarian prism. The Sunni community rallied to the side of the government, whose prime minister and a majority of ministers are allied with or members of Saad Hariri's Future Movement, which now represents most of Lebanon's Sunnis. Mr. Siniora, in order to protect himself, asserted that Hezbollah was bent on staging an Iranian- and Syrian-backed coup d'état, by which he effectively meant a Shiite coup.

Not surprisingly, the Sunni Arab regimes entered the fray to bolster the government. They dispatched Arab League secretary general Amr Moussa to Beirut to mediate. Sunni-Shiite tensions remain alarmingly high, and on Tuesday the opposition escalated its confrontation with the government by cutting off roads. Sunnis and Shiites clashed in some neighborhoods, though neither Hezbollah's leader, Hassan Nasrallah, nor Mr. Hariri (nor, for that matter, their respective sponsors in Iran and Saudi Arabia) wants to let the sectarian genie out of the bottle. However, as political interests kick in, sectarianism may emerge as the default weapon that the parties, in Lebanon and outside, may use against each other.

Something similar is happening in the Palestinian territories. Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas's recent call for early elections, like his ongoing differences with Hamas, transcends local politics. His aim is to check Hamas at a time when the organization is consolidating its ties with Tehran. Mr. Abbas failed to reach an agreement last weekend in Damascus with exiled Hamas leader Khaled Mashal, who controls Hamas from Syria, Iran's main Arab partner. In rallies in Palestinian areas, the president's Fatah movement has taken to taunting members of the rival Hamas by calling them "Shiites," though they are Sunni.

Wherever they look today, Arab Sunnis see setbacks, real or imagined. In Iraq, where Sunni dominance ended in 2003, Saddam Hussein's hanging provoked an angry sectarian response. Saudi Arabia's King Abdullah recently warned Vice President Dick Cheney that the kingdom would openly support Iraqi Sunnis if the Americans withdrew. In the Palestinian territories and Lebanon, accusations are now routine that Hezbollah and Hamas are serving Tehran's agenda. In Syria, a minority Alawite regime rules over a mostly Sunni society. In Bahrain, the Shiite majority is affirming itself against a Sunni royal family. And in Saudi Arabia, the oil-rich Eastern Province is home to a sizeable though marginalized Shiite minority. While the notion of a Shiite arc stretching from Iran to Lebanon is crude, Ayatollah Khamenei overlooked that many Arab Sunnis are buying into that view, and do not see themselves as criminals for doing so.

A primarily sectarian Arab counter-reaction to expanding Iranian power would be a disaster. It might halt Iran and its comrades in the short term, but Arab regimes could soon become sorcerers' apprentices, swallowed by the forces they unleash. Iran, wrongly believing that popular anti-Israeli and anti-American sentiment would overcome Sunni suspicions of their true intentions, should realize what a Sunni backlash would mean for their security. Once opened, the floodgates of Sunni-Shiite antagonism could become a Leviathan, sweeping away the fragile reality on the ground: Even in societies where Sunnis and Shiites now peacefully coexist, sectarian discord would become the norm.

DOJ_NMG_0120940

Then there is the United States. Whatever one thinks of the war in Iraq, it will soon become obvious that it was easier for the Americans to enter the country than to leave it. If a departure leads to metastasizing sectarian hostility throughout the Middle East, then the U.S. will have to seriously rethink its strategy. Whatever else happens, the one assured winner of such a fracas would be the Islamists. Only democracy could prepare Arab states to withstand Iran without recourse to sectarianism. But the Bush administration seems to have abandoned that inventive undertaking for the region.

A chain of sectarian wars is not inevitable. But the only way to avoid it is for all sides to understand the existential red lines of the other sides. Iran's overconfidence is no easier for the region to stomach than was America's. For the first time in decades, the nationalism, tribalism or regime-sponsored Islamism of the Sunni Arab states seem incapable of steeling them against a resurgent Iran, but also its allies, striving to fill the vacuum of fading Arab power. Only these regimes' Sunni identity, an offended Sunni identity at that, might do so. The problem is that what shields them will likely lead the Middle East into further disarray.

Mr. Young is opinion editor at the Daily Star newspaper in Beirut and a contributing editor at Reason magazine.

Israeli President Faces Indictment (AP)

By Ravi Nessman

AP, January 24, 2007

Israeli President Moshe Katsav faced indictment Tuesday on charges of rape and abuse of power in the most serious accusation against a top Israeli official in the country's history.

The allegation that Katsav used his position as Israel's ceremonial head of state — a job supposed to serve as the nation's moral compass — to force himself on his female employees has left the nation reeling.

"It is a sad day for the state of Israel," said lawmaker Benny Elon, who called on Katsav to resign to spare Israel further trauma. But Katsav gave no indication he was preparing to step down, despite a wave of demands that he quit.

Attorney General Meni Mazuz's announcement that he intended to indict Katsav on a raft of charges was only the latest corruption scandal roiling the government, with accusations reaching as high as Prime Minister Ehud Olmert.

Katsav has insisted he is innocent and his lawyers said Tuesday they hoped to persuade Mazuz to change his mind before a formal indictment, a step that would make Katsav Israel's first sitting president to be charged with a crime. But many Israelis say the enormity of the scandal has already badly tainted the office of the presidency.

"He should be the symbol of Israel, the uniting person and an ideal model for all the politicians ... So this is a bad sign for Israeli politics," said Gabriel Sheffer, a political science professor at Hebrew University in Jerusalem.

The presidency was once filled by Zionist legends and revered statesmen. Albert Einstein declined an invitation to serve as the nation's first president, with the job eventually going to the scientist Chaim Weizmann, a Zionist leader who was instrumental in creation of the Jewish state. The presidency has also gone to a biophysicist, a historian and other men of letters.

But the office, whose main responsibilities include receiving foreign diplomats and representing Israel at formal ceremonies, has dropped in esteem in recent years.

Katsav's predecessor, the outspoken war hero turned peacemaker Ezer Weizman, resigned in 2000 after the attorney general ruled he had improperly accepted more than $300,000 in gifts from a French millionaire. Weizman was never indicted.

Katsav, 61, has a far less lofty resume than his predecessors. He had been a low-level Cabinet minister and a Likud Party stalwart when the parliament chose him to be president in 2000 in a shocking upset over Nobel Peace Prize winner Shimon Peres, after a revered rabbi said a "vision" showed him that Katsav was favored by the heavens, swinging votes among believers.

But Katsav's relatively quiet presidency was rocked last summer when one of his employees accused him of forcing her to have sex in his office. A flood of other women quickly came forward with similar accusations, describing a politician who had abused his power throughout his career.

In the face of the growing scandal, Katsav disappeared from public life, hunkering down in the president's compound in Jerusalem. He even briefly removed himself from office in September instead of presiding over the inauguration of a new chief justice for the Supreme Court.

On Tuesday, Mazuz said he had collected enough evidence to indict Katsav on charges of rape, harassment, abusing his power for sex, obstructing justice and illegally accepting gifts, stemming from his time as president and Cabinet minister.

DOJ_NMG_0120941

Legal authorities said the charges could carry a sentence of more than 20 years in jail, though in most cases the defendant, if found guilty, would receive a five-to-10-year sentence. A final decision on the indictment would only be made after Katsav is given the opportunity to present his case.

Katsav's lawyers said they believed Mazuz would drop the indictment after hearing his side of the story.

"The president believes that everyone will see that he is the victim of false charges," said his lawyer David Libai. Some of the complainants were motivated by "revenge" after they were fired from their jobs, he said.

The president enjoys immunity while in office and could be tried only after his resignation, his impeachment by three-quarters of the parliament or the conclusion of his term, which ends this summer. Katsav had previously said he would step down if indicted. His lawyers declined to address the issue, and he was expected to hold a news conference Wednesday.

Lawmakers from across the political spectrum — including those from his old party — called on him to resign.

"The fact that he is going to be indicted is neither good for our reputation abroad nor for the morale of this country, and I hope that the sooner the president himself draws the conclusion, the sooner he decides to leave office, the better off we all will be," said Colette Avital of the Labor Party, mentioned as a possible successor.

Kineret Barashi, an attorney for one of the Katsav's accusers, praised the indictment, saying it proved no one was above the law in the Israeli justice system.

The Katsav scandal erupted amid a spate of other political scandals that have darkened the Israeli government's reputation.

Police opened a criminal investigation earlier this month into Olmert's involvement in the sale of a government-controlled bank in 2005. Several other high-level politicians have been implicated in separate scandals.

Jimmy Carter's 'Peace' Mission To Brandeis (WP)

By Michael Powell

The Washington Post, January 24, 2007

WALTHAM, Mass., Jan. 23 -- Former president Jimmy Carter flew north to Brandeis University to speak on Tuesday of his hurt at the personal attacks by some American Jews that followed publication of his latest book, "Palestine Peace Not Apartheid," which urges Israel to turn away from a policy of creating "Bantustans" on the West Bank.

"This is the first time that I've ever been called a liar and a bigot and an anti-Semite and a coward and a plagiarist." Carter paused and squinted at the audience. "This has hurt me."

At the same time, he acknowledged, with a flash of his trademark smile, that he did not simply stumble into the title of his new book. "I can see it would precipitate some harsh feelings. I chose that title knowing that it would be provocative."

Provocative mission accomplished.

Carter, who won the 2002 Nobel Peace Prize partly for brokering peace between Israel and Egypt in 1998, has a long history of involvement in the Middle East. But the former president has encountered much criticism since the publication of his latest book, in which his frustration with the current Israeli policy in the West Bank is palpable. In particular, he has attracted much anger for his use of the word "apartheid," redolent as it is of South Africa's policy of state-sanctioned racism.

Fourteen members of the board of the Carter Center at Emory University in Atlanta recently resigned in protest, and several expressed particular disappointment with the use of the word "apartheid."

Carter did not step back from the word Tuesday. He noted that he and his successors, notably Bill Clinton, have tried and failed to nudge the Palestinians and Israelis toward a lasting peace. The last six years, he said, have been marked by failure on all sides. The administration of George W. Bush all but abandoned such efforts, putting the onus on the Palestinians to turn their back on PLO leaders and now the fundamentalist Islamic Hamas leadership. And the Israelis, too, have all but abandoned negotiation, he said, turning instead to the building of walls.

Carter spoke of Israeli's decision to build barriers and set aside certain highways for Israelis only as creating a "spider web" that constricts and divides historic Arab lands. The West Bank, he said, has become a place of "Bantustans, isolated cantons," referring to the territories created for black South Africans under apartheid. He noted that many liberal Israelis, from newspaper journalists to professors to peace activists, also refer to Israeli policy on the West Bank as apartheid, albeit a policy grounded not in racism but in a religion-based desire to control land.

DOJ_NMG_0120942

Israelis "have all used and explained the word 'apartheid' in much harsher words than mine," Carter said.

The Israeli government and others have defended the barriers as a successful tool to prevent suicide bombings against civilians. Fatalities from such bombings have fallen by 90 percent since the construction of the barriers, according to government officials.

Carter referred several times to the fact that his arguments might stir anger in a largely Jewish audience. But the former president received a mostly polite reception at Brandeis, a nonsectarian college founded by Jews where 50 percent of the students are Jewish. Students and faculty gave him a standing ovation at the beginning and end of his talk. But in between he received a number of tough questions. As a moderator noted, "There are not too many matzoh balls coming your way."

In particular, some students challenged Carter on a sentence that has brought him much grief. On Page 213 of his book, Carter wrote: "It is imperative that the general Arab community and all significant Palestinian groups make it clear that they will end the suicide bombings and other acts of terrorism when international laws and the ultimate goals of the Roadmap for Peace are accepted by Israel."

This sentence, the students noted, suggests that suicide bombings are a tactic of war, to be suspended only when peace is achieved. Carter agreed -- and apologized -- and said this sentence was a great mistake on his part.

"The sentence was worded in an absolutely improper and stupid way," Carter said. "I apologize to you and to everyone here . . . it was a mistake on my part."

He added that Palestinians who embrace terrorism draw no support from him. Calls for the destruction of Israel, he said, "are completely obnoxious to me. I would have no brief for them and no sympathy for them."

But Carter insisted that one botched line in his book should not drain his larger argument of its power. He urged Brandeis to send a delegation of students and professors to the West Bank and to report back on their findings. "You decide if I was accurate," he said, leaving little doubt as to what he thought they would find.

It was an argument that left more than a few students shaking their heads afterward. They said Carter is not quite so rare a voice on college campuses as he might imagine. They said they were familiar with his arguments and acknowledge some of the criticisms of Israel.

Yuval Brokman, a 20-year-old junior majoring in Islamic and Middle Eastern studies, said, "He underestimates how hard it is for Israel to live in that part of the world. It's ridiculous to think that they have a choice. The Palestinian people have been oppressed more by their own leaders."

What If Israel And Syria Find Common Ground? (NYT)

By Michael B. Oren

The New York Times, January 24, 2007

ISRAEL'S newspapers are rife with reports of a peace agreement secretly forged between Israeli and Syrian negotiators. Though both the Syrian and Israeli governments have denied any involvement in the talks, past experience shows that such disavowals are often the first indication of truth behind the rumors.

Certainly, there is nothing new about the details of the purported plan, which involves a staged Israeli withdrawal from the Golan Heights, occupied since 1967, and the full normalization of relations between Damascus and Jerusalem. Nor is there a precedent in the willingness of Israeli and Arab leaders to enter into direct discussions without the participation or knowledge of the United States.

What is new is the Bush administration's apparent opposition to a Syrian-Israeli accord and the possibility that Israel, by seeking peace with one of its Arab neighbors, risks precipitating a crisis with the United States.

On more than one occasion, Israeli and Arab leaders have engaged in clandestine talks without informing the White House. In 1977, the envoys of Prime Minister Menachem Begin of Israel and President Anwar Sadat of Egypt quietly met and laid the groundwork for Sadat's historic visit to Jerusalem and for the advent of the Egyptian-Israeli peace process. Only later, when negotiations snagged, did the parties turn to the United States and request presidential mediation.

DOJ_NMG_0120943

In 1993, Israeli and Palestinian interlocutors, convening in Oslo, worked out the details of a peace arrangement and requested President Bill Clinton's imprimatur on the accord only days before its signing. Jordan and Israel also asked Mr. Clinton to sponsor their peace treaty, initialed the following year, after they had independently agreed on its terms.

And in 2005, Prime Minister Ariel Sharon of Israel unilaterally ordered the evacuation of the Gaza Strip, a move widely welcomed as a stepping stone toward peace but from which the Bush administration, committed to the multilateral process stipulated by the "road map," kept its distance. Syria and Israel have also exchanged peace proposals in the past, sometimes under American auspices, as in the 1991 conference in Madrid.

Yet even when the two sides negotiated bilaterally, as during the secret exchanges between Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and Hafez al-Assad of Syria in the late 1990s, Washington approved of the contacts. American leaders agreed that the Syrian-Israeli track offered a promising alternative to the perennially stalled Israeli-Palestinian talks, and that achieving peace between the Syrian and Israeli enemies would open the door to regional reconciliation.

All that was before Sept. 11, however, and Syria's inclusion, alongside Iran and North Korea, in President Bush's "axis of evil." Once regarded as a possible partner in a Middle East peace process, the Baathist regime of Bashar al-Assad was suddenly viewed as a source of Middle East instability, a state sponsor of terrorist groups and an implacable foe of the United States.

Hostility toward Damascus intensified after the incursion into Iraq, during which administration officials accused the Syrians of abetting the insurgency and concealing unconventional weapons in Iraq. More recently, the United States has accused Mr. Assad of plotting to undermine Lebanon's efforts to achieve independence from Syria, of assassinating anti-Syrian Lebanese and of acting as an Iranian agent in the Western Arab world.

The last thing Washington wants is a Syrian-Israeli treaty that would transform Mr. Assad from pariah to peacemaker and lend him greater latitude in promoting terrorism and quashing Lebanon's freedom. Some Israeli officials, by contrast, see substantive benefits in ending their nation's 60-year conflict with Syria. An accord would invariably provide for the cessation of Syrian aid to Hamas and Hezbollah, which endanger Israel's northern and southern sectors.

More crucial still, by detaching Syria from Iran's orbit, Israel will be able to address the Iranian nuclear threat — perhaps by military means — without fear of retribution from Syrian ground forces and missiles. Forfeiting the Golan Heights, for these Israelis, seems to be a sufferable price to pay to avoid conventional and ballistic attacks across most of Israel's borders.

The potentially disparate positions of Israel and the United States on the question of peace with Syria could trigger a significant crisis between the two countries — the first of Mr. Bush's expressly pro-Israel presidency. And yet, facing opposition from a peace-minded Democratic Congress and from members of his own party who have advocated a more robust American role in Middle East mediation, Mr. Bush would have difficulty in withholding approval from a comprehensive Syrian-Israeli agreement.

Mr. Bush may not have to make that decision for some time, if ever. For all his talk of good will, Mr. Assad has made no Sadat-like gestures to Israel, and many Israelis agree with Mr. Bush that Syria should not be rewarded for its assistance to terrorism and its denial of Lebanese liberty.

But if trust is established on both sides and the conditions are conducive to peace, a settlement between Syria and Israel may yet be attained — and a clash between Israel and Washington ignited.

Noriega Set To Be Released (MH)

By Gerardo Reyes And Jay Weaver

The Miami Herald, January 24, 2007

Former Panamanian dictator Manuel Antonio Noriega, imprisoned in South Miami-Dade on drug-trafficking and racketeering convictions since 1990, will be released on Sept. 9 -- due in part to good behavior and other credits.

Noriega, the military ruler toppled by a massive U.S. invasion of his country in late 1989, was automatically eligible for parole after serving close to two-thirds of his 30-year federal sentence.

"There is no turning back," said Noriega's attorney, Frank Rubino. ``The order is obligatory, and nobody can stop it. He's in good health and he wants to go home. He has no intention of remaining here."

The federal judge who sentenced the former general agreed he has paid his debt.

DOJ_NMG_0120944

"I think under the circumstances, he has served a sufficient sentence," Senior U.S. District Judge William Hoeveler said Tuesday night.

When Noriega steps out of his specially built, apartment-like cell at the Federal Correctional Institution in Southwest Miami-Dade, he probably won't be free. Noriega -- reportedly 68 or 72, depending on conflicting birth records -- is wanted in Panama and in France.

The U.S. attorney's office in Miami is expected to file a request for his extradition on behalf of the French later this year, authorities said.

Panama's foreign minister, Samuel Lewis Navarro, recently told the daily La Prensa newspaper that his government has already filed a petition for Noriega's extradition but has not received a response from U.S. officials.

"As much as Noriega may be celebrating his early release, the truth is it's a celebration for naught," said former U.S. Attorney Guy Lewis, who tried his case along with prosecutors Richard Gregorie and Michael "Pat" Sullivan. ``He's been convicted in absentia on murder charges in Panama, and he's been convicted in absentia on money-laundering charges in France.

"The real question is not whether he will be released from custody," said Lewis. ``The real question is will he be turned over to the Panamanians or the French to continue his prison sentence?"

Rubino said Noriega wants to go home and will deal with the charges in Panama.

An opinion poll conducted by La Prensa showed that 62 percent of 859 respondents believed Noriega must be sent to Panama.

Some say the presence of Noriega followers in the current government might mean he won't pay for his crimes, the newspaper said.

The president is Martin Torrijos, son of Gen. Omar Torrijos, for whom Noriega professed great loyalty. Gen. Torrijos led Panama from 1965 to 1981, when he died in a plane crash.

Noriega eventually seized power, ruling Panama until the U.S. invasion, Operation Just Cause, in December 1989. Noriega took sanctuary in the Vatican Embassy in Panama City but surrendered to U.S. troops a few weeks later. While he was there, the U.S. military played rock music, including Guns 'n' Roses -- at top volume. The music stopped after the Vatican complained of harassment.

The general was whisked to Miami, where he would later stand trial. It took until 1992 for the U.S. attorney's office to convict him.

The case posed legal and political problems, primarily because Noriega was a head of state. "It was the big one," said Tom Raffanello, who headed the team of 22 DEA agents.

Raffanello, his agents and prosecutors convinced imprisoned Medellín cartel figurehead Carlos Lehder to testify against Noriega, who allowed Panama to be used as a transshipment point for tons of U.S.-bound cocaine.

After his conviction and sentencing, Hoeveler declared him "a prisoner of war" who should be accorded special privileges, including the apartment-like cell -- complete with phone, color TV and exercise bike -- at the low-security Southwest Miami-Dade federal prison.

Noriega sought early release four times, starting in 2000. He was denied at every turn.

In March 2000, Noriega lost his bid because former President George H.W. Bush said he feared Noriega would try to assassinate him if he were released early, Rubino said -- calling Bush's involvement in Noriega's request ``outrageous."

"It is a low blow, a cheap shot," Rubino said at the time.

In February 2004, Hoeveler recommended Noriega's early release in a letter to the U.S. Parole Commission -- the first time in 27 years he had done so for a defendant convicted in his court.

"Among other things, which I take seriously myself, he has converted to the Baptist faith," Hoeveler wrote. ``It has been reported to me that while incarcerated, General Noriega has frequently received the pastor who baptized him."

But the next month, a parole commissioner rejected the former general's request.

With good behavior and other prison credits, Noriega became automatically eligible to serve about two-thirds of his 30-year sentence.

DOJ_NMG_0120945

Noriega had spoken well of Hoeveler in the past.

Before the 1991-92 trial began, Noriega said in open court: ``The one shining light through this legal nightmare has been your honor. You have acted as honest and fair as anyone could hope for."

Miami Herald staff writer Carol Rosenberg and translator Renato Pérez contributed to this report. Gerardo Reyes is an El Nuevo Herald staff writer.

Lawmakers Urge Easing Of Cuba Embargo (FT)

By Guy Dinmore

Financial Times, January 24, 2007

Members of Congress who believe Cuba is making a smooth transition of power said on Tuesday they would propose legislation to ease US embargo and travel restrictions.

"Contrary to the notion that once Fidel Castro was gone there would be uproar and the Americans would come marching in, I didn't sense that at all," said Jo Ann Emerson, a Republican representative for Missouri who visited Cuba last month as part of a delegation of US lawmakers.

Ms Emerson and James McGovern, a Massachusetts Democrat, said the House Cuba working group, equally represented by both parties, was agreed on the need to remove travel restrictions and loosen the embargo. This was the "mainstream view" in Congress, Mr McGovern said.

Previous initiatives have failed in committee, but with both houses of Congress under Democratic control for the first time in 12 years, President George W. Bush may be forced to use his veto if he is to keep his hardline Cuba policy intact.

"Our policy to Cuba has done more to keep Castro in power than anything else," Mr McGovern told a seminar hosted by the Council on Foreign Relations think-tank. He said the Cuban people were taking the demise of Mr Castro in their stride, and that the Bush administration was starting to accept this "reality".

John Negroponte, director of national intelligence, said the Cuban "regime" was trying to create a "soft landing" while transitioning power to Raúl Castro. "We don't want to see that happen," he told the Senate intelligence committee. "But what is not known is whether people are holding back. Maybe we're not seeing the kind of ferment yet that one might expect to see once Mr Castro has definitively departed the scene."

Julia Sweig, analyst at the Council on Foreign Relations, says Washington must "finally wake up to the reality of how and why the Castro regime has proved so durable, and recognise that, as a result of its wilful ignorance, it has few tools with which to effectively influence Cuba after Fidel has gone."

The official Commission for Assistance to a Free Cuba, whose recommendations have been accepted by Mr Bush, has proposed maintaining economic pressure on Cuba to undermine its succession strategy. A big humanitarian relief operation is ready to be mounted – once a new Cuban government asks for it. "Our Cuba policy hasn't changed," the State Department said.

Thomas Shannon, assistant secretary of state, on Tuesday spoke of 2007 being the year of engagement and listening in the region for the US. He spoke positively about efforts to get a dialogue going with Venezuela's President Hugo Chávez, but made no mention of Cuba in more than an hour speaking to the Center for Strategic and International Studies.

Russian Court Backs Closing Of Chechen Rights Group (WP)

By Peter Finn

The Washington Post, January 24, 2007

MOSCOW, Jan. 23 -- The Russian Supreme Court on Tuesday upheld a lower court ruling that shut down the Russian-Chechen Friendship Society, a Western-funded grass-roots organization that had challenged the Kremlin's interpretation of events in the continuing conflict in Chechnya.

The society's leadership called the decision a chilling example of the government using a recently enacted law on nongovernmental organizations to quash activism that clashes with official policy. The society, which had a network of correspondents and activists in Chechnya, a republic in southern Russia, reported on rights abuses by Russian forces and their Chechen allies.

DOJ_NMG_0120946

Oksana Chelysheva, one of the group's leaders, promised to fight the ruling. "We are going to take our case to the European Court of Human Rights and, possibly, our Constitutional Court."

Last February, Stanislav Dmitrievsky, co-chair of the society, was convicted of inciting racial hatred for publishing in a society newsletter a statement by Aslan Maskhadov, a Chechen separatist leader, calling for negotiations to end the Chechen conflict. Another published statement cited by prosecutors was a commentary critical of the Kremlin by the London-based Chechen separatist Akhmed Zakayev.

Maskhadov -- who officials here say played a role in the 2004 Beslan school massacre in southern Russia that left 331 people dead, including 186 children -- was killed by Russian forces in March 2005. After that, the society, in its monthly newsletter Human Rights Defender, ran a portrait of the separatist with a black mourning border, a decision that infuriated Russian officials and raised eyebrows among other Russian human rights activists.

Dmitrievsky was given a two-year suspended sentence by a court in Nizhny Novgorod, about 250 miles east of Moscow, where the society was based.

The law on nongovernmental organizations, signed by President Vladimir Putin in January 2006, makes it illegal for grass-roots groups to have people convicted of extremism as leaders or members.

The Russian-Chechen Friendship Society was later prosecuted for failing to remove Dmitrievsky from its board and membership roll. Moreover, the society was supposed to publicly denounce Dmitrievsky within five days of his conviction, which it refused to do.

The judicial assault on the group has drawn protests from Western Europe and the United States. A group of Western politicians and intellectuals wrote an open letter to Putin this month asking him to allow the group to continue to work.

"Neither the act of printing statements by separatist leaders, nor the content of the statements themselves, would be considered extremist in most Western countries, no matter how unpopular the cause involved," said the letter, which was signed by members of the European Parliament, among others.

"Moreover the flood of genuinely extremist material that appears almost daily in the Russian media, which has gone without comment from the Russian prosecutor's office, makes it clear that the law is being selectively applied in order to silence the society."

The Russian-Chechen Friendship Society was almost entirely underwritten by the European Union, the U.S. government-funded National Endowment for Democracy and the Norwegian Foreign Ministry.

Chelysheva said her group would try to work in Russia in another form.

Doha Revival Talks Are Set, But Accord Is Unlikely (WSJ)

By John W. Miller

The Wall Street Journal, January 24, 2007

BRUSSELS -- Global trade negotiators hope to restart the Doha round of world trade talks at the World Economic Forum in Davos, Switzerland, this week, but a return to the bargaining table will likely be more symbol than substance.

The key players -- the U.S. and the European Union -- remain unwilling to cut farm subsidies enough to satisfy emerging economies like Brazil and India.

Trade representatives from 30 leading economies, including the EU, the U.S., China, India and Brazil, will hold one-on-one talks in the Swiss resort before meeting as a group Saturday. They hope to tell the World Trade Organization they are prepared to resume "serious" formal negotiations, said EU Trade Commissioner Peter Mandelson.

Started in 2001, the Doha round is meant to help poor countries gain access to the developed world's markets by cutting subsidies and tariffs in rich markets -- especially in agriculture. In return, wealthy nations would win access to key markets for services such as banking and insurance.

Talks collapsed in July after the EU and U.S. turned down requests by emerging economies such as Brazil and India to trim their generous farm handouts. With little change since then, the ministers are "trying to save face, to show they're working hard for a deal," says an official familiar with the negotiations.

DOJ_NMG_0120947

"We've reached the end game," Mr. Mandelson told businesspeople and lobbyists in Brussels yesterday. "It's up to the EU and the U.S. to show leadership."

In both the U.S. and the EU, however, trade negotiators face resistance from powerful farm lobbies.

Mr. Mandelson proposes a 54% cut in agriculture import tariffs. France, Europe's largest agriculture producer, wants to cut tariffs by just 39% -- and isn't budging. Without France there is no deal: Mr. Mandelson needs support from all 27 EU members in order to reach a global trade deal.

U.S. agriculture subsidies total some $20 billion a year, above the $17 billion ceiling demanded by the Europeans. At a farmers' conference last week, U.S. Rep. Collin Peterson, a Minnesota Democrat and chairman of the House Agriculture Committee, promised that the next round of subsidies would "look a lot like what we have now."

Reworking The A-List (NYT)

By Mark Landler

The New York Times, January 24, 2007

DAVOS, Switzerland, Jan. 23 — The World Economic Forum convenes its annual conference here Wednesday with the theme "Shaping the Global Agenda: The Shifting Power Equation." To judge by the names on the guest list — and those not on it — the phrase aptly reflects the turnout at this high-altitude huddle.

Missing are Davos regulars like Bill Clinton, as well as marquee names from the Bush administration, which is sending only its trade negotiator, a deputy secretary of the Treasury, and a few other officials.

On the list is Prime Minister Nguyen Tan Dung of Vietnam, newest member of the club of rising world economies, as well as Chad Hurley, the head of YouTube, the Internet site that allows anyone to post a video on the Web.

"The power shift is twofold," said Klaus Schwab, the Swiss organizer who has managed to keep Davos a hot ticket for three decades by latching onto the latest political and business trends. "Power is shifting from the center to the periphery, and from the top to the bottom."

Mr. Schwab insists there will be no shortage of familiar names at this Alpine ski resort, with 24 heads of state or government, 85 cabinet ministers and more than 800 corporate chiefs. But the sense of flux in the United States, Europe and elsewhere is hard to miss in the program.

For example, Mr. Schwab played down the absence of a top Bush administration official like Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, who was invited to speak but could not find time. Senator John McCain, a strong presidential candidate, however, will be here to give his views on Iraq and other issues.

"People may be interested to listen to him to get the longer-term perspective," Mr. Schwab said in an interview.

Some of the traditional heavyweights who do plan to attend are themselves victims of fading fortunes. Prime Minister Tony Blair of Britain will close the conference with a speech that amounts to a farewell address — his tenure running out amid recriminations over the Iraq war.

John Browne, the chief executive of BP and a co-chairman of the conference, has announced he will step down from the giant energy company in July, a year earlier than planned, after a team of outside investigators harshly criticized BP for safety lapses that led to 15 deaths at its Texas refinery.

Davos also says it is shunning Hollywood celebrities, even though they have lent this sober event a dash of sex appeal. Angelina Jolie and Brad Pitt, who stopped moguls and ministers in their tracks last year, will not be here, leaving Bono, the Irish rock star who has assumed a statesman's mantle, to twinkle on his own.

"We noticed there was undue publicity given to the attendance of those celebrities at the last meeting," Mr. Schwab said. "We have to be careful that we are not hijacked by the celebrity world."

That does not mean the World Economic Forum is playing down big names in other fields. Among the political leaders scheduled to take part are Chancellor Angela Merkel of Germany; Gordon Brown, Mr. Blair's presumptive heir; King Abdullah of Jordan; and Mahmoud Abbas, the head of the Palestinian Authority, who canceled last year.

Davos lost another sure-fire draw when Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger of California, who had planned to discuss climate-related issues, pulled out after breaking his leg in a skiing accident.

DOJ_NMG_0120948

Climate change will nevertheless be a lively topic of conversation, and not just because the Swiss Alps have had little snow during this Caribbean winter. There will be 17 sessions on climate-related issues, and the organizers are hoping for announcements on a number of initiatives.

From the corporate world, the organizers have booked repeat guests like Bill Gates, Michael S. Dell, Carlos Ghosn of Renault and Nissan, and the Google co-founders Sergey Brin and Larry Page, as well as a few newcomers, like Rex W. Tillerson, the chief executive of Exxon Mobil.

Rupert Murdoch, who last attended the conference when it was held in New York in 2002, is scheduled to come. Mr. Murdoch will take part in a panel about the global agenda.

For anyone with a laptop or a BlackBerry, the future of media will be clear in the Web logs that are proliferating at the conference, including one by The New York Times and The International Herald Tribune. The organizers are aggregating blogs in something called the Davos Conversation.

Already, bloggers are busy debating the merits of minute-by-minute coverage of the doings at Davos. For some, the openness at a gathering of world leaders is welcome. Others wonder whether the ubiquitous scrutiny will reduce the likelihood of anything real getting done here.

In truth, Davos has rarely been a place for political breakthroughs, and while the schmoozing opportunities are nonpareil, it is not a seedbed for business deals, like Allen & Company's annual media conference in Sun Valley, Idaho.

Mr. Schwab views the spread of Web logs as more evidence of the changing power equation. He said he might have to rethink guidelines for reporting events, which put many of the sessions off the record.

The one issue on which progress is possible at Davos — trade — will be discussed behind closed doors. More than 30 trade and agricultural ministers are expected here, including the United States trade representative, Susan C. Schwab, and the chief European negotiator, Peter Mandelson.

On Saturday, the ministers will gather to try to revive the stalled Doha round of global trade negotiations. After reports of a renewed focus on reaching a deal in the United States and Europe, there is cautious optimism that Doha could get a breath of new life in Davos.

"Everyone knows we're just about out of time," said a spokesman for the World Trade Organization, Keith Rockwell, referring to the approaching summer expiration of President Bush's special negotiating authority. "This will mark the negotiations' kicking into a higher gear."

Remote Control (WSJ)

By Marcel Granier

The Wall Street Journal, January 24, 2007

CARACAS -- The president of the Bolivarian Republic of Venezuela, Hugo Chávez, has verbally announced his decision to shut down Radio Caracas Television (RCTV) -- our TV station, the oldest in Venezuela as well as the one with the largest audience.

So continues a long series of attacks against journalists, employees, management and shareholders of many independent media companies. The aim of all this is to limit the citizens' right to seek information and entertainment in the media of their choice, to impede public access to those media where they might express or encounter criticism of the government or their proposals for reform, to stifle the pluralism of opinion in news and talk programs, and to cut off the free flow of information and debate in Venezuela. Instead, the Chávez government seeks to install a system that it has described, without apparent irony, as the "communicational and informative hegemony of the state."

On June 14, 2006, President Chávez -- dressed in military fatigues -- gave a speech on the occasion of the delivery of a batch of Kalashnikov AK-103s to an army battalion. He brandished a weapon, then pointed it at a cameraman and said: "With this rifle, which has a range of 1,000 meters, I could take out that wee red light on your camera." Moments later, he declared: "We have to review the licenses of the TV companies."

In the weeks that followed the incident, various government officials repeated the same threat and started to monitor the editorial positions of the media. "There have been qualitative changes in programming, in news selection, and in the editorial line" of some media, an official observed; "[but] there are other cases in which we have not seen this change, this rectification . . ." He reminded us all that the government "has the ability not to renew a [media] license."

DOJ_NMG_0120949

On Nov. 3, 2006, a month before the Venezuelan presidential elections, President Chávez repeated his threat: "I'm reminding certain media, above all in television, that they mustn't be surprised if I say, 'There are no more licenses for certain TV channels.' . . . I'm the head of state."

On Dec. 28, 2006, President Chávez, again in military uniform, declared that the broadcasting license for RCTV would not be renewed: "The order has already been drafted, so they should start shutting down their studios." He provided detail: "the license ends in March"; but two weeks later, in the National Assembly, he contradicted himself, saying that our license would end in May. At that same time, he launched a campaign of attack ads in all state-run media, paid for with public funds, aimed at discrediting our station in the eyes of the country.

On Jan. 13, in his annual address to the National Assembly, he changed his tune again and said: "The transmission signal belongs to the Venezuelan people and will be nationalized for all Venezuelans." He added: "RCTV has only a few days left . . . they can scream, stomp their feet, do whatever they want, but the license is finished. They can say whatever they want, I don't care, it's over."

These verbal threats constitute, de facto, a public decision to silence RCTV. But RCTV has never been informed legally or formally of the measures that are to be taken against it; nor have we ever been told what exactly are the accusations against us, which makes it difficult for us to defend ourselves. President Chávez has violated the presumption of innocence and has denied us due process.

The actions against RCTV of President Chávez and his subordinates are in violation of the Venezuelan constitution, the American Convention on Human Rights, and the Inter-American Democratic Charter. They are a clear example of abuse of power, and violate the right to work of all those in the media industry, not to mention a violation of the freedom of thought and expression of millions of citizens who seek information and ideas of their own free choice.

We are faced, in effect, with an aggressive campaign to extinguish all thought that differs from that which is officially dubbed "revolutionary."

In fact, President Chávez's threat to shut down RCTV has even led Jose Miguel Insulza, secretary general of the Organization of American States, to express his dismay publicly: "The shut-down of a large media company is a very rare occurrence in the history of our continent, and has no precedent in the last decades of democracy."

Organizations such as Human Rights Watch and the Committee to Protect Journalists, among others, have also raised the alarm. But the reaction of Hugo Chávez has been typically crude. It's the way he reacts whenever faced with someone who has the temerity to disagree with him. He says, and has said repeatedly, that there's nothing to discuss. "RCTV has only a few days left. They can scream, stomp their feet, do whatever they want. But it's all over."

Mr. Granier is chairman of Radio Caracas Television. (This piece was translated from the original Spanish by Tunku Varadarajan.)

DOJ_NMG_0120950

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE NEWS CLIPS

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, US DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 24, 2007 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Terror Suspect Denied Bond; Affidavit Shows He Admits To Lying (PROJO) ... 4
Held In Contempt, Al-Arian Launches Hunger Strike (TAMPTRIB) ... 5
House Dems Seek Gates Briefing (HILL) ... 6

Homeland Response:

Judge Weighs Contested Rail Law (WP) ... 6
Man Questioned In LA Subway Mercury Spill (CCT) ... 7
Transient Held In MTA Mercury Spill (LAT) ... 7
Group Attempting To Simplify Byzantine Terror-Alert System (WP) ... 8
Travel Security Rules Take Effect Smoothly (WP) ... 9
New Demands For Armed Pilots (WP) ... 10
All Quiet On Israel's Eastern Front? Not Quite. (WP) ... 11
Locked In Squalor (WP) ... 12
State Farm Settles Mississippi Claims From Katrina Surge (AP) 12
State Farm Agrees To Pay Up For Katrina In Mississippi (USAT)13
Big Insurer Will Pay 640 Katrina Claims (NYT) ... 14

War News:

A Bid To Rescue A Presidency (LAT) ... 15
The State Of The President: Beleaguered (WP) ... 17
Bush Urges Congress, Nation To Give His Iraq Plan A Chance (WP) ... 18
Bush Offers Plan To Curb Reliance On Foreign Oil (WSJ) ... 20
Bush Turns Domestic, But War Won't Go Away (CHIT) ... 22
Bush Asks For Time On Plan For Iraq (BSUN) ... 23
A Shift In Power, Starting With 'Madam Speaker' (NYT) ... 25
Energy, Healthcare Are Major Points Of Bush's Address (LAT) . 26
'We Must Not Fail In Iraq' (WT) ... 29
President Strays Into Democrats' Priorities, Themes (WP) ... 31
Bush Challenges Foes Of Iraq Troop Plan (AP) ... 32
Bush Reaches Out To Skeptical Democrats (MCT) ... 34
Bush Defends Iraq Plan To Skeptical Congress, Nation: 'America Must Not Fail' (USAT) ... 34
Tone Not As Bold As A Year Ago (USAT) ... 35
The Speech's Key Points And Their Context (USAT) ... 36
Bush Can't Reclaim Bipartisanship That Never Existed (MCT)... 38
Guests In The Gallery Punctuate Key Aspects Of The Address (USAT) ... 39
Guests Speak Louder Than Words At Capitol (WT) ... 40
Bush: Give Iraq Plan "A Chance To Work" (AP) ... 41
President's Portrayal Of 'The Enemy' Often Flawed (WP) ... 43
Bush Insists U.S. Must Not Fail In Iraq (NYT) ... 44
Bush Urges Congress To 'find Resolve' On Iraq (FT) ... 45
Getting A Read On The Speech Makes For Quite A Snapshot (WP) ... 46
Some 2008 Contenders Disagree, Politely (WP) ... 47
The State Of The Union (NYT) ... 48
Speaking On Demand (LAT) ... 49
The State Of The Union (USAT) ... 50
State Of Troubles (WP) ... 50
State Of The Economy (WSJ) ... 51
Democrats Slam Bush War Policy (AP) ... 51
Va.'s Webb Offers A Blunt Challenge To Bush (WP) ... 52
Democratic Sen. Webb Rebukes Bush's Handling Of Iraq (MCT)53
Democrats Hit Bush On Iraq And Economy (USAT) ... 54
To Deliver Their Remarks, Democrats Opt To Put A Fresh Face Front And Center (NYT) ... 55
Sending A Clear 'Daddy' Message To The Public (FT) ... 55

DOJ:

Attorney General Skips Speech (AP) ... 56
Editorial: Questionable Firings (LVS) ... 56

Corporate Scandals:

Broadcom Restates $2.22 Billion, Blames Former Chief (Update3) (BLOOM) ... 57
Broadcom Co-Founder Nicholas Faces Much Of Backdating Onus (WSJ) ... 58
N.Y. Pension Fund To Lead Lawsuit Over Apple Options (WP/AP) ... 59

Criminal Law:

Defense Says Libby Was 'Sacrificed' (LAT) ... 59
Liar Or 'Scapegoat'? 2 Depictions Of Libby As Trial Opens (USAT) ... 60
Libby Portrayed As 'Sacrificial Lamb' At Trial (WT) ... 61
Defense Portrays Libby As Scapegoat (WP) ... 62
Libby Defense Portrays Client As A Scapegoat (NYT) ... 63
'Scapegoat:' Scooter's Stunning Defense (NSWK) ... 65
Libby Asserts He Was The Fall Guy (WSJ) ... 66
Libby: White House Wanted To Sacrifice Him For Rove (FINDLAW/AP) ... 67

Prosecution Calls Libby A Liar During Opening Arguments (LAW) ... 68
Libby Lawyers Attack Witness Credibility (NSDY/AP) ... 69
8 Arrested In 1971 Police Killing In San Francisco (AP) ... 70
Ex-militants Charged In S.F. Police Officer's '71 Slaying At Station (SFC) ... 71
8 Ex-radicals Arrested In '71 Police Slaying (LAT) ... 73
Held In '71 Cop Slay (NSDY/AP) ... 75
8 Arrested In 1971 Killing Of San Francisco Police Officer (NYT) 75
Busted In Cop Slay (NYDN) ... 77
New Arrests In A Decades-Old Slaying Of Police Officers (NYS) 77
36 Years Later, Suspect Caught (WMBB) ... 78
Feds: Details Of ISP Snooping Haven't Been Decided (CNET) ... 78
Hearings Sought On FBI Predator Probes (MH) ... 79
Kolbe May Use Campaign Funds For Legal Defense (AP) ... 79
Feds: Idaho Suspect Admitted 3 Slayings (FINDLAW/AP) ... 80
Judge Reduces Bullock's Prison Sentence (WT) ... 80
Tax To Fight Gangs Set For Ballot (LAT) ... 81
Family Found Safe After Amber Alert (CHIT) ... 82
Judge Hears Request For New Trial From Vigil's Attorneys (AP) 83
COKE SECRETS TRIAL: Defense Denied 'Core' Evidence (AJC) ... 83
Former Boyfriend Tells Court Coke Theft Suspect Wanted Him To Lie About A Package (AP) ... 84
Coke Co-conspirator On The Stand (WXIA) ... 85
Former Indianapolis Patrolman Gets 57 Months For Fraud (AP) 86
Bribery Case Alarms Governor (OREG) ... 87
Food Service Manager Investigated For Alleged Kickbacks (AP) 88
Contributor To Gossip Column Won't Be Charged (NYT) ... 88
Lawyers Question Lab's DNA Results (BOS) ... 89
GOP Urges Berger Lie Test (WT) ... 90
Schools Act To Short-Circuit Spread Of 'Cyberbullying' (WSJ) ... 91

Civil Law:

'Bankruptcy Boot Camps' Gird Attorneys For Battle (WSJ) ... 92

Civil Rights:

Party Primary System Wins Federal Approval (BRADV) ... 93
No Court Consensus On Voter ID Laws (USAT) ... 94
Media Outlets Battle It Out Over Free-speech Rights (USAT) ... 95

Antitrust:

Antitrust Issues 'key Barrier' To Delta Merger (FT) ... 96
Big Bank Stops Effort To Change Law Limiting Growth (NYT) ... 97
Stolt-Nielsen Sues To See Other Justice Antitrust Amnesty Agreements (LAW) ... 98
Judge Dismisses Online Phone Suit (AP) ... 99
MAN Withdraws €10.3bn Bid For Scania (FT) ... 99
Ruling Blocks Bid For Dofasco (BSUN) ... 100

Environment:

Bush Seeks Vast, Mandatory Increase In Alternative Fuels And Greater Vehicle Efficiency (NYT) ... 100
Energy Plan Seeks Better Gas Mileage (USAT) ... 102
Bush: Expand Alternative Energy Use (CHIT) ... 102
Gas-reduction Proposals Raise Questions (LAT) ... 103
Volatile Markets May Crimp Energy Plan (WSJ) ... 105
Bush Vows To Cut US Petrol Demand (FT) ... 106
Critics See Little Meaningful Change (WP) ... 106
Bush Oil Reserve Plan Sparks Price Surge (FT) ... 107
Blindness On Biofuels (WP) ... 108
Decoding Climate Politics (WSJ) ... 109
Push To Replace New US Mercury Plan (CSM) ... 110
Cruise Line Fined For Striking, Killing Whale (ADN) ... 111

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Mexican Attorney General Cites 'alarming' Increase In Drug Consumption (AP) ... 112
4 Extradited Drug Cartel Leaders Appear In Houston Court (SDUT) ... 112
Man On Lam Flown Back To U.S. (MON) ... 113
Mexico Praised Over Extraditions (SAE) ... 114
The Monitor's View (CSM) ... 114
Gang Task Force Nabs 11 In Sweep (RMA) ... 115
Prosecutors: Car Dealers Were In Drug Business (CHIST) ... 115
Taxpayers Footing Bill For Illegal Immigrant's Defense (KNOXNS) ... 116
Bloomberg, Other Big-city Mayors Hold Gun Summit In D.C. (AP) ... 117
Mayors Unite On Gun-tracking Effort (WT) ... 118
Former Federal Agents Suing City, Charge Police Corruption (BVND) ... 118

Immigration:

President Renews Push For Bill On Immigration (WT) ... 119
Immigration Proposals Reverse Party Loyalties (WSJ) ... 120
Southern California Immigration Raid Nets 761 Arrests (FINDLAW/AP) ... 121

Tax:

Back Taxes Sought From Closed Center (BUFFNEWS) ... 121

Congress-Administration:

Bush Unveils Health Plan Tied To Tax Deduction (USAT) ... 122
Bush's Insurance Plan Looks DOA (RC) ... 122
Bush Revives Some Past Proposals And Offers A New Initiative On Health Insurance (NYT) ... 123
'We Must Not Fail In Iraq' (WT) ... 124
Bush's Focus On Health Care Draws Criticism, New Hope (WSJ) ... 126
Bush Wants Tax Code Changes To Spread Health Care (CHIT) 127
Bipartisan Cooperation On Health Care Is Dead On Arrival (WP) 128
The Knee-Jerk Opposition (WP) ... 129
Health And Taxes (WSJ) ... 130
Bush's Better Health-care Policy (WT) ... 131
State Of The Union: Bush's Health Plan (PTR) ... 132
EDITORIAL: State Of The Union Faces Stiff Challenges (FREEP) ... 132
Rx For Our Corporate Culture (USAT) ... 133
Bolten: Divided Leaders Have Shared Interest In Success (pol) 134
Republicans In Retreat To Work On Resurgence (POL) ... 135
House GOP Reflects (RC) ... 137
Hill Pensions For The Convicted May End (WP) ... 138

DOJ_NMG_0120952

House Passes Bill Denying Pensions To Convicted Lawmakers (WSJ) ... 139
Pelosi Cements Grip On Caucus (RC) ... 139
'08 Race Looms Over Agenda (RC) ... 141
FEDERAL DIARY: GAO Questions Administration's Decision To Decline Drug Subsidy (WP) ... 142
State Of The Union: Another Take (NYT) ... 143
Spending Sincerity Test (WSJ) ... 144
As The Democrats Dither (WP) ... 145
Return Of The Drug Company Payoffs (NYT) ... 145

Other News:

Court Rules Against Foster Parents (WP) ... 146
6-year Custody Fight Ends In Tenn. Court (USAT) ... 147
Candidate Who Thinks She Won Gets Gallery Seat (MH) ... 147
No Money, No Problem (RC) ... 148
Watergate Figure E. Howard Hunt Dies (AP) ... 149
Ex-Spy Crafted Watergate, Other Schemes (WP) ... 151
Who Cares About The Poor? (WSJ) ... 152
A Healthy, Well-Regulated Wall Street (NYT) ... 153
Petraeus Supports Troop Increase In Iraq (AP) ... 153
General Says New Strategy In Iraq Can Work Over Time (NYT) 155
Petraeus Expresses Confidence In Buildup (WP) ... 156
America's New Round In Iraq (CSM) ... 157
Blunt Commander Nominee Says 'Hard Is Not Hopeless' (LAT) 158
Anti-surge Efforts Called Enemy Hope (WT) ... 159
Petraeus Criticizes Anti-surge Resolutions During Hearing (HILL) ... 160
Leave Politics To Us, Warner Tells General (WP) ... 161
General: Iraq Situation 'Dire' But Not Hopeless (USAT) ... 162
Petraeus Discourages Anti-war Resolutions (POL) ... 162
Petraeus Warns Of 'dire' Situation In Iraq (FT) ... 163
New Face On A Tough War (WP) ... 164
A Case Of Hearing Without Listening (NYT) ... 165
Senators Say Resolutions On Troop Plan Should Merge (NYT) 166
Democrats Work To Clarify Message On Iraq (HILL) ... 166
A First Step In Iraq (USAT) ... 167
McCain Bashes Cheney Over Iraq Policy (POL) ... 168
Daily Body Count In Baghdad Falls (LAT) ... 169
US Cracks Down On Iraq's Shia Militants (FT) ... 170
Five American Security Employees Killed In Baghdad Helicopter Attack (NYT) ... 171
Contractor Helicopter Downed In Iraq (WP) ... 172
Newsman Escapes Injury In Iraq Bombing (WP) ... 173
Martin Luther Al-King? (NYT) ... 173
Can Al-Maliki Make The Bush Plan For Iraq Work? (USAT) ... 174
Analysts See A Chance For Maliki Success (WP) ... 177
Iraq Parliament Finds A Quorum Hard To Come By (NYT) ... 177
Iraq Struggles To Finish Oil Law (WP) ... 179
Suicide Bomber Kills At Least 8 In Afghanistan (NYT) ... 180
General: Army Increase Will Cost $70B (AP) ... 181
U.S. Stages 2nd Airstrike In Somalia; Ethiopians Leaving Capital (WP) ... 181
Ethiopian Forces Start Leaving Somalia (NYT) ... 182
Ethiopian Troops Begin To Leave Somalia (AP) ... 183
China Confirms Firing Missile To Destroy Satellite (WP) ... 184
China Verifies Antisatellite-Missile Test (WSJ) ... 184
China Confirms Missile Test (FT) ... 185
China Confirms Space Test; Denies Intent To Intimidate (NYT) 186
Officials Fear War In Space By China (WT) ... 187
De-militarize Space (LAT) ... 188
China May Lower Fines For Poor Who Violate One-Child-Only Policy (WP) ... 188
Ban To Press Sudan President On Darfur (AP) ... 189
US Condemns Sudanese Government Assault Of UN Staff, Aid Workers (AFP) ... 190
Anti-government Protests Paralyse Lebanon (FT) ... 190
Clash Pits Hezbollah Against Rule In Lebanon (NYT) ... 191
Hezbollah Leads A Fiery Strike (WP) ... 192
Hezbollah Leads Bloody Clash With Siniora Camp (WT/AP) ... 194
Protests Bring Lebanon To A Halt (LAT) ... 194
Candidates Court Israel, Cite Iran Risks (WT) ... 196
Iranian President Derides U.S. Threats (AP) ... 197
Red Lines (WSJ) ... 198
Israeli President Faces Indictment (AP) ... 199
Jimmy Carter's 'Peace' Mission To Brandeis (WP) ... 200
What If Israel And Syria Find Common Ground? (NYT) ... 201
Noriega Set To Be Released (MH) ... 202
Lawmakers Urge Easing Of Cuba Embargo (FT) ... 204
Russian Court Backs Closing Of Chechen Rights Group (WP) 204
Doha Revival Talks Are Set, But Accord Is Unlikely (WSJ) ... 205
Reworking The A-List (NYT) ... 205
Remote Control (WSJ) ... 207

DOJ_NMG_0120953

TERRORISM NEWS:

Terror Suspect Denied Bond; Affidavit Shows He Admits To Lying (PROJO)

By Karen Lee Ziner, Journal Staff Writer

The Providence Journal, January 24, 2007

BOSTON — Mohammed Yousuf Mullawala, a central figure in a national antiterrorism investigation, admitted lying to Rhode Island state police numerous times about his whereabouts and activities since he arrived in this country in 2002, according to a state police affidavit made public yesterday.

Federal ImmigrationJudge Matthew J. D'Angelo cited those alleged lies and Mullawala's "evasive and far-fetched explanations" in denying bond yesterday for Mullawala, whom he called a danger to the community and "an extreme flight risk."

The 28-year-old Indian national has been held in federal detention on a violation of his student visa since Rhode Island state police arrested him last month. D'Angelo ordered Mullawala returned to the Suffolk County House of Detention until a deportation hearing next Tuesday.

Mullawala's behavior at the Nationwide Tractor-Trailer Driving School, in Smithfield, triggered Homeland Security concerns that have since widened into an investigation by an FBI Joint Terrorism Task Force.

According to the school's instructor, that behavior included Mullawala's expressed interest in buying software or videos on hazardous materials and his stated interest in only learning how to drive the truck forward — not how to back it up or any other required technical maneuvers.

"I do not find his responses or explanations to be credible," said D'Angelo. "The court is concerned about his conduct at the tractor-trailer school. … He has been evasive in both his residential and work history, and also, interestingly, he has no work authority — he's acting like he's lawfully working in this country. He's an extreme flight risk and it's very unlikely he will appear at a future hearing."

During a 1½-hour hearing at the JFK Building, Mullawala raised his manacled hands and told the judge, "Yes, I will tell the truth." Then he sat calmly, wearing prison clothes that billowed around his small frame.

Prosecutor Mary Kelley underscored Mullawala's alleged multiple lies, related to his numerous addresses, work history, school enrollments, trucking school application, behavior at the trucking school and more. She also argued that he posed a flight risk because he has no family or friends in the United States.

The affidavit, obtained by The Journal after it was filed in court yesterday, states that Mullawala first told investigators he lived at 181 Carpenter St. in Providence, then recanted after the police confronted him with evidence to the contrary.

Kelley said although Mullawala's application to the trucking school lists the Carpenter Street address, investigators learned from tenants "that there's no such person who lives here."

"He lied," said Kelley. "He lists a reference at 181 Carpenter, but no such person existed when they went out there … . He indicated he never had any speeding tickets — that was a lie."

When immigration agents were brought into the investigation, Kelley said, they learned that Mullawala enrolled at Johnson & Wales University "but then he drops out and re-enrolls. So he's not attending school … ."

"He lied after he was Mirandized about his numerous addresses, including 'I can't tell you where I lived,' " said Kelley. "He lies about where he worked. He doesn't even show up for traffic court … so I hardly think he's going to show up for a hearing here."

Kelley also said Mullawala's explanation for his "extreme mobility" — at least seven addresses that authorities have been able to confirm he lived at — doesn't wash.

Defense lawyer June Beack said Mullawala told her he moved numerous times in New York City because he wanted to avoid areas where the police ticket heavily for traffic violations, and said that as a young single man, "he wanted to learn about different parts of the city."

Kelley maintained that Mullawala also lied when he said trucking-school instructor Ed Mowry steered him toward a hazardous-materials license, and not the other way around, and when he said investigators lied when they contradicted his statements during an initial questioning.

Pointing to Mullawala, Kelley said, "What he's asking you to believe is that everybody's lying except the man sitting 10 feet in front of you."

DOJ_NMG_0120954

The affidavit was filed by state police detectives Michael J. Winquist and Kevin M. Barry. Winquist is assigned to the Rhode Island State Fusion Center, which handles investigations concerning Homeland Security. Barry is assigned to the FBI Joint Terrorism Task Force.

It includes a timeline that shows Mullawala's zigzag path between 2002 and last year.

The path leads from Rhode Island in 2002; to India and back in 2003; to India via Kuwait in the spring of 2003; to Bridgeport, Conn., then Shelton, Conn., in 2004; to the Bronx, N.Y., in 2004 and '05; to Jackson Heights, then Hicksville, Hyde Park, Kew Gardens and Floral Park in New York last year; to Hackensack, N.J., last year; back to Kew Gardens a month later; and then to Jamaica, N.Y.

Investigators have been able to verify that he lived briefly at seven of those addresses, but have been unable to establish whether he ever lived at the four others.

The affidavit also states that Mullawala provided false information on his application to the trucking school.

While Mullawala stated that he lived on Carpenter Street, "he was actually residing in the state of New York." When asked whether he had driver's licenses in other states besides Rhode Island, Mullawala noted his New York license but failed to mention a New Jersey license. He also said he had never been issued a traffic summons, when in fact, "he received summonses from the Rhode Island State Police and in New Jersey."

The affidavit provides a glimpse into the days leading up to Mullawala's arrest last month and into questions posed by police on that day.

On Dec. 1, state police called Mullawala on his cell phone "under the guise that an accident was being investigated that involved a Rhode Island registration plate" previously issued in his name.

"Mohammed Y. Mullawala was very argumentative and advised your co-affiant that he was unable to respond [to] Rhode Island since he was working in New York driving a limousine," the affidavit states.

Mullawala also said his parents had arrived from India "and that he planned to take them to California on a sight-seeing trip." The affidavit notes that Mullawala "later admitted that he lied when making this statement."

At the state police's request, the owner of the trucking school "made numerous fruitless attempts to reach Mohammed Y. Mullawala on his cell phone" regarding a refund on money paid to the school since he attended for only two days. Mullawala "never returned her calls."

On Dec. 5, Mullawala arrived at state police headquarters unannounced "for the purpose of making a complaint" against one of the detectives involved in the case. When a trooper at the front desk recognized Mullawala from a bulletin, Mullawala was taken into custody.

"During his interview, Mohammed Y. Mullawala appeared to be extremely nervous. Detectives also found several inconsistencies in his answers to the questions being asked. When detectives confronted him with those inconsistencies," the affidavit states, "Mohammed Y. Mullawala admitted to being untruthful."

Held In Contempt, Al-Arian Launches Hunger Strike (TAMPTRIB)

By Elaine Silvestrini

Tampa Tribune, January 24, 2007

TAMPA - Sami Al-Arian has begun another hunger strike after being held in contempt for refusing to testify before a grand jury in Virginia, his supporters say.

In the meantime, Al-Arian has appealed an order with the 11th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals that says his plea agreement in Tampa does not protect him from having to testify in Virginia.

Al-Arian, a former University of South Florida professor, pleaded guilty in April to providing support to the Palestinian Islamic Jihad, designated by the U.S. government as a terrorist organization.

In May, U.S. District Judge James Moody sentenced Al-Arian to 57 months in federal prison, 11 months longer than recommended by prosecutors in his plea deal. Had Al-Arian received the recommended sentence, his attorneys said, he was expected to be deported last June.

The federal Bureau of Prisons now calculates Al-Arian's projected release date as April 13. That date could be extended by as much as 18 months because of the contempt finding in Virginia.

Al-Arian's plea came after a five-month trial in which jurors failed to convict him of a charge but deadlocked on nine counts.

During the trial, the government presented evidence that Al-Arian's think tank, World and Islam Studies Enterprise, received funding from the International Institute of Islamic Thought, based in Herndon, Va. The institute's offices were raided in 2002 as part of the investigation into the think tank.

At the time of the plea agreement, his attorneys stressed Al-Arian would not cooperate with the government.

In September, the U.S. attorney's office in the Eastern District of Virginia contacted attorneys for Al-Arian seeking his testimony before a grand jury investigating the institute.

The defense filed a motion asking Moody to enforce the plea agreement and protect Al-Arian from having to cooperate. However, the judge ruled that cooperation is not the same as compelled testimony and said the plea agreement does not protect Al-Arian from grand jury subpoenas.

An Al-Arian supporter, the Tampa Bay Coalition for Justice and Peace, issued a news release Tuesday saying he was held in contempt Monday and has started his second hunger strike to protest "continued government harassment."

The news release gave a summary of a statement Al-Arian made to a Virginia federal judge complaining about his prison conditions. Al-Arian said he had to share his food with rats and roaches, and was forced to wear dirty and inadequate clothing.

Al-Arian's first declared hunger strike started shortly after he was arrested in February 2003 and continued for 140 days, his supporters say. Jail officials said Al-Arian drank Carnation Instant Breakfast during that hunger strike because he has diabetes and required nutrition along with his medication.

House Dems Seek Gates Briefing (HILL)

By Roxana Tiron

The Hill, January 24, 2007

Several House Democrats plan to grill Secretary of Defense Robert Gates on the Pentagon's use of private contractors in interrogations at the military prison in Guantánamo Bay, Cuba.

Chief Deputy Democratic Whip Jan Schakowsky (Ill.) and 26 other members wrote to Gates Tuesday asking for a briefing on interrogation practice after the FBI revealed allegations this month of torture by contractors at Guantánamo.

All interpreters and half of all jail workers at Abu Ghraib were private contractors, according to Schakowsky, a member of the intelligence committee.

Reps. Barney Frank (D-Mass.), David Price (D-N.C.) and George Miller (D-Calif.) also signed the letter demanding a briefing.

"As you assume your new duties, we would like to alert you to our concerns about the use of military contractors," they wrote. "The lack of proper oversight of military contractors results in wasted funds and frustrated missions. It also sends a message to contractors that they will not be held accountable for squandering taxpayer dollars at the expense of supporting our service members."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Judge Weighs Contested Rail Law (WP)

By Henri E. Cauvin, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, January 24, 2007

CSX Challenging Suspended D.C. Ban on Hazardous Cargo

The fate of a District law banning rail shipments of hazardous materials was back before a federal judge yesterday, nearly two years after the prohibition was enacted by the D.C. Council.

The law, which was prompted by fears that the Capitol and other landmarks are vulnerable to a terrorist attack on rail lines that skirt downtown, was quickly challenged in 2005 by CSX Transportation Inc., which controls the key freight routes through the District. The law has never taken effect. Yesterday, a judge heard arguments to determine whether it ever will.

U.S. District Judge Emmet G. Sullivan set no timetable for a decision in the case, which is being monitored by cities and states throughout the country.

CSX said that the District is overstepping its legal authority and that the law, if allowed to stand, could lead other local governments to pass similar bans, crippling the transportation of hazardous materials nationwide.

Under federal regulations, rail operators bear much of the responsibility for assessing risks and determining how to deal with them -- an arrangement that critics say puts public safety at the mercy of profit-driven businesses.

Tighter federal control may be coming. Last month, the federal government, which has sided with CSX, proposed more stringent regulations on the transportation of hazardous materials.

But such changes may be months or years away, if enacted at all, and in any case, the proposals fall short of the ban that the District wants to impose.

When CSX first contested the law, Sullivan sided with the District and the Sierra Club, which had joined the city in defending the law. Sullivan ruled that the law could take effect while the broader legal issues were reviewed.

DOJ_NMG_0120956

But after hearing the company's challenge as an expedited emergency matter, the U.S. Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit reversed Sullivan's decision and ordered that the ban be put on hold pending review.

After gathering evidence and taking preliminary steps for nearly a year, lawyers for the two sides appeared before Sullivan yesterday for nearly two hours -- on one side, Robert Utiger of the D.C. attorney general's office and James R. Wrathall of WilmerHale for the Sierra Club; on the other, Virginia Seitz of Sidley Austin for CSX and Arthur R. Goldberg of the Justice Department.

Much of the arguments focused on whether the District's law could be preempted by federal law. The Federal Railroad Safety Act allows states to enact laws related to rail safety or security until the U.S. Department of Transportation or the U.S. Department of Homeland Security issues a regulation covering the subject of the state requirement.

Opponents of the District's law say the federal government, through existing federal regulations on rail security, has rejected a hazardous-materials ban as part of any federal regulation, thereby precluding such a prohibition by a local government.

Supporters of the law say that such a ban was never considered during the drafting of current regulations and that the regulations were put forth by the Department of Transportation, not Homeland Security, as would have been required to preempt a local law related to rail security.

After the arguments were presented, Sullivan proposed that both sides submit additional briefs addressing the question of which agency had the power to preempt a local law such as the District's.

Man Questioned In LA Subway Mercury Spill (CCT)

The Contra Costa Times, January 24, 2007

LOS ANGELES - The FBI on Tuesday arrested a man they believe spilled toxic mercury on a subway platform.

Armando Bustamante Miranda, 27, was being questioned but it did not appear he was involved in any terrorist activity, FBI spokeswoman Laura Eimiller said.

He was arrested and held for a parole violation unrelated to last month's spill, Eimiller said.

She declined to reveal other details.

"We're not going to have anything more until we sort this thing out," she said.

A videotape showed a man crouching down and dropping something onto a platform at a downtown subway station on Dec. 22. The man appeared startled and walked to a Metropolitan Transit Authority call box, where he reported the mercury spill.

The county is conducting an investigation to determine why transit officials waited eight hours to alert authorities after they were told about the spilled mercury.

No injuries were reported, and officials believe the small amount of mercury would have been harmful only if someone touched it or drank it.

A Los Angeles County sheriff's hazardous materials team confirmed the substance was mercury and removed it.

Transient Held In MTA Mercury Spill (LAT)

By Andrew Blankstein And Jean Guccione, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, January 24, 2007

Authorities say the man told them he found it in trash on the Westside and hoped to sell it for money to buy drugs.

Federal and local authorities on Tuesday arrested a 27-year-old man they believe spilled mercury on a downtown L.A. subway platform, ending a weeklong dragnet that raised more questions about the handling of the incident.

Armando Bustamante Miranda was being questioned by FBI agents and Los Angeles County sheriff's investigators, who are trying to determine why the hazardous chemical was dropped in the station on Dec. 22 by a man who then called an MTA operator to say what he had done.

Detectives expressed frustration at the difficulty in finding the suspect, at one point creating more than a dozen potential profiles, including a prankster, a screenwriter working on a script, an actor seeking attention, a student working on a project and even a terrorist.

Officials repeated Tuesday that they doubt the incident was related to terrorism.

Sheriff's Det. Danny Regalado described Miranda as a transient who told authorities he found the mercury while scavenging through a commercial dumpster on the Westside for items he could sell to support his drug habit.

Miranda, according to Regalado, said during the two-hour interview with detectives that he was "fixated" on the mercury and the way it moved in the vial, adding that he recognized the substance from a "Terminator" movie. He told authorities he took it out of his pocket at the station and was showing it off, hoping another passenger would purchase it. When he spilled the mercury, he told police, another passenger told him to report it.

DOJ_NMG_0120957

Detectives said an acquaintance of Miranda recognized his photo and contacted authorities, setting up a meeting with the suspect in Hollywood. Regalado said he was "very cooperative."

Authorities are concerned that some business was disposing mercury in the trash, and they plan to go door-to-door questioning owners about their disposal tactics.

The arrest comes amid a growing dispute about how MTA surveillance tapes were handled. An MTA tape of the Pershing Square station showed a man dropping a vial of mercury on the platform and later getting into a subway car.

But four law enforcement sources familiar with the investigation said investigators didn't receive all the videos taken inside the subway car.

Los Angeles County's top transit cop said his detectives reviewed the videos they received but didn't see the man.

"You can never have too much evidence," said Sheriff's Cmdr. Dan Finkelstein. "As it turned out, we didn't need anything else."

He added that another platform camera recorded the suspect getting off the train, a clue that helped in his capture.

Nonetheless, Los Angeles County Supervisor Gloria Molina, who chairs the Metropolitan Transportation Authority, asked agency officials Tuesday for a detailed account of what happened to all the videos from that night. She specifically wants information on whether some were recorded over before they could be analyzed.

Federal and local law enforcement sources said there was an internal debate early in the investigation about whether to go public with the search for the suspect.

The MTA initially described the mercury release as an accident. But the county's joint terrorism task force later reviewed the incident and decided last week to go public with the tape in hopes that authorities could find the suspect, the sources said.

Since 9/11, the MTA has spent $9 million on security enhancements that include equipping buses and trains with state-of-the-art cameras to monitor and record passenger activity.

Ten fixed cameras have been installed on each subway train over the last two years. The MTA has also added platform cameras that pan, tilt and zoom.

The platform recordings are kept for 14 days, MTA officials said. Recordings from trains are held for 80 hours, then recorded over.

The dispute over the tapes comes as MTA officials admitted that the agency's response to the mercury incident was highly flawed.

The MTA waited eight hours after being told mercury was on the platform before clearing the station and cleaning up the spill. Police and transit officials said the workers erred by not immediately contacting law enforcement to cordon off the area and calling in hazardous-material experts. The incident also exposed the fact that many MTA workers are not trained to handle dangerous materials, including mercury.

The MTA said it is investigating the way its employees handled the incident.

At least four people touched or stepped on the mercury during the period, including one woman who tracked it home. Mercury can be hazardous if ingested, inhaled or touched, but there were no reports of health problems.

According to authorities, the man who spilled the mercury used an MTA intercom to tell an operator: "Yes, there's some mercury that's spilled down there," according to a transcript obtained by The Times.

He continues: "There's a jar that had mercury in it and it broke. It's on the floor down here on the, by the Wilshire, or I mean Western, North Hollywood sign."

The operator responds, "So, it needs a — a glass broke…. OK. I'll send somebody to clean it up."

But for unclear reasons, no one was sent for hours, until another passenger called authorities to report the spill.

Miranda was being held on a probation violation related to a previous drug charge.

andrew.blankstein@latimes.com
jean.guccione@latimes.com

*

Times staff writer Richard Winton contributed to this report.

Group Attempting To Simplify Byzantine Terror-Alert System (WP)

By Elizabeth Williamson

The Washington Post, January 24, 2007

Inside an unmarked, secured office near the White House, intelligence officials, lawyers and police work to close a gaping hole in the nation's counterterrorism system: the failure of people in the government to communicate with one another.

The Sept. 11 commission report singled out official resistance to sharing information as a key reason the government failed to thwart the 2001 terrorist attacks. In response, Congress authorized the president to create the group now based near his office, known as the "information-sharing environment" (ISE) program. Its goal is to create a system for moving terrorism-related information among officials -- be it the president or a small-town mayor -- quickly and securely.

DOJ_NMG_0120958

In coming days, the group will send the president its recommendations for taming an explosion of "sensitive but unclassified" (SBU) documents. These reports, papers and memos -- not classified but not meant for public eyes -- bear "markers": from the basic "For Official Use Only" or "Trade Secret" to the mind-bending "Information Related to a Continuity of Operations Plan." So far, the ISE has collected 108 markers, and McNamara says more probably exist. Each marker dictates the rules for handling, distributing and storing the document that bears it. Confusing things further, the rules vary by agency, even for the same marker.

The result is "chaos," said ISE program manager Thomas McNamara, a former State Department counterterrorism official who now reports to the director of national intelligence. Studies by the National Governors Association and the Government Accountability Office have found that the SBU mess undermines the effectiveness of terrorism alerts from Washington. In one example, a local police official received a confusing SBU memo from Washington, wrongly thought it was classified, and scrambled for days to find a secure phone line so he could ask about it.

SBU stands at the center of a trend toward greater government secrecy that "threatens accountability in government and promotes conflicts of interest," according to a report on the phenomenon released last year by the advocacy group OpenTheGovernment.org.

"You need an anthropologist to understand how these bureaucracies function," said Steven Aftergood, an open-government advocate who runs the Federation of American Scientists' Secrecy News blog. "But it's not their own information. It's government information, and it should be handled in a uniform manner."

McNamara said his goal is to narrow the number of SBU markers from more than 100 to a dozen or fewer, develop one set of handling rules, and make the documents available to all who need them.

Once approved, the new program will be rolled out in Washington and across federal and local agencies. That could take years.

The SBU system is a throwback to the Cold War, McNamara said, "when we as a government paid particular attention to classified information" that falls into "Secret," "Top Secret" and "Secret Compartmented Information" categories, with corresponding security clearances for those who use it. To be classified, documents must refer to defense, foreign policy or national intelligence. Since most agencies can't classify, McNamara said, they devised the SBU system to control information such as law enforcement evidence, personal records and trade secrets.

But just as governments tend to overclassify, the agencies used SBU designations so often that they created an insurmountable mountain of documents -- and undermined confidence in the system.

"Information flows are so dramatically large now that we can't depend on the old system," McNamara said. "We either create a new one or we're going to be very, very sorry we didn't."

Travel Security Rules Take Effect Smoothly (WP)

By N.c. Aizenman

The Washington Post, January 24, 2007

Passengers experienced few difficulties yesterday as new border security rules went into effect requiring citizens of the United States, Canada, Mexico, Bermuda and some Caribbean islands to present a passport when entering the United States by air, officials said.

Previously such passengers were able to prove their identity with a variety of documents, including a combination of a birth certificate and a driver's license. Now, under select circumstances, two other documents, the Merchant Mariner Document and the Nexus Air card, will be permitted instead of a passport.

The new rules do not extend to travelers flying to and from U.S. territories in the Caribbean.

The shift to the passport requirement at airports is the first phase of a broader initiative to strengthen scrutiny at all points of entry, an initiative recommended by the commission that investigated the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, 2001. The new rules are likely to be instituted at land and sea ports as soon as Jan. 1, 2008.

Yesterday's smooth transition was largely because of the high percentage of travelers who had obtained a passport, said authorities.

More than 1.1 million U.S. citizens applied for passports in November, when the date for the new rule was announced, compared with 648,000 applicants in November 2005, said Derwood Staeben, senior adviser for the initiative at the State Department. According to the Department of Homeland Security, 90 percent of U.S. citizens flying into the country over the last week arrived with passports, compared with 81 percent during the week of Dec. 11.

DOJ_NMG_0120959

Citizens of the other affected countries also rushed to obtain passports from their governments, with the percentage of air travelers now carrying them reaching 97 percent for Canadians and nearly 100 percent for Mexicans and Bermudans.

"People have got the message, and that's good news," Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff said Thursday in an appearance with Canadian Minister of Public Safety Stockwell Day.

For now, those rare travelers who arrive at airports without passports are generally being accommodated rather than turned away, said Kelly Klundt, a spokeswoman for U.S. Customs and Border Protection.

"The goal is not to strand travelers -- it's to advise them of the change," Klundt said. "If for whatever reason they haven't heard of it, we have emergency mechanisms to deal with the situation. . . . We will work with them with whatever documentation they present to try and verify the information we need."

Tourism officials in Mexico and Canada have expressed concern that potential tourists -- particularly those traveling by land -- will be turned off by the new passport requirement.

J. Willard "Bill" Marriott Jr., chairman and chief executive of Marriott International, dedicated an entry on his corporate blog Monday to the new passport regulation, part of the Western Hemisphere Travel Initiative.

"I'm afraid, if it's not properly implemented and communicated, that WHTI could have a serious negative impact on legitimate commerce and tourism, as well as our diplomatic relationships with our two largest trading partners, Canada and Mexico," wrote Marriott, who belongs to an association that has lobbied for changes in security programs.

Similarly, Mexican Tourism Secretary Rodolfo Elizondo Torres predicted that 318,000 fewer Americans would visit Mexico in the next year because of the new requirement. "The lost income could reach $254 million a year," Torres said in a statement.

Correspondent Manuel Roig-Franzia in Mexico City, staff writer Spencer S. Hsu in Washington and researcher Natalia Alexandrova in Toronto contributed to this report.

New Demands For Armed Pilots (WP)

By Del Quentin Wilber

The Washington Post, January 24, 2007

As the number of armed pilots aboard U.S. jetliners has steadily expanded in recent years, the program is showing signs of growing pains. Pilots and their labor groups complain about a lack of supervision and the difficulty in finding time to participate in training courses.

Worried that pilots' handgun skills may be eroding, federal security officials are launching a refresher training program next month. Armed pilots must attend a two-day mandatory course at a training facility near Atlantic City three to five years after getting their guns. Some pilots have already taken prototype refresher courses that are being evaluated by authorities, said officials with the Federal Air Marshal Service, which runs the program.

"Using a weapon is a perishable skill, and we want to ensure they have the appropriate training," said John A. Novak, an assistant director with the air marshal service. "We are taking the law enforcement culture and applying it to the experienced professionals of the aviation community."

The controversial gun program, which started in 2003, was backed enthusiastically by pilots and their unions as a way to prevent terrorist hijackings after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks. When the program began, union officials said as many as 30,000 pilots would eventually carry firearms in cockpits.

The number of armed pilots is well short of that number, but there are now more armed pilots than there are federal air marshals, according to sources familiar with the program.

Federal officials requested that The Washington Post not publish the exact number of armed pilots for security reasons.

To be allowed to carry handguns in cockpits, pilots undergo psychological testing and a seven-day training course. They must visit a firing range to demonstrate their shooting skills every six months. So far, there have been no incidents in which a pilot has fired his weapon aboard an airliner.

Pilots said the refresher course was a good idea but could prompt some to leave the program. Those who participate are not paid for their time. They also are not reimbursed for travel, lodging or food expenses.

"This is going to cost me $2,000," said one pilot, who spoke on condition of anonymity because his membership in the program does not permit him to speak publicly. "If this was a really great program, they would treat us like adults."

Federal officials said they were working to find other sites across the country for the training. They said they have not noticed any increase in pilots quitting the program and that the number of applicants has remained steady. There was a 300 percent surge in applicants in the weeks after British authorities said in August that they uncovered a plot to blow up jetliners, according to the officials.

Pilots said they also wish there were more supervision between visits to firing ranges and the longer refresher training. Among the ideas they have passed to federal officials: offering periodic classes at airports, more Internet-based training and a monthly newsletter on tactics. Pilots groups say such measures are needed to ensure that the program keeps pace with its growth.

DOJ_NMG_0120960

"In 2003, this was a noble experiment," said Bob Hesselbein, an airline pilot and chairman of the national security committee for the Air Line Pilots Association. "Today, it's an institution. . . . As the institution grows, the institutional pillars aren't being built with it."

Officials said they were working to improve communication with pilots but added that they must also satisfy the demands of training armed pilots while minting new ones. Each week, several dozen newly armed pilots graduate from a training facility in New Mexico. The program's budget has remained steady, about $25 million a year, despite increases in the number of armed pilots.

Federal officials said they were taking other steps to address complaints raised by pilots. They plan to issue police-like badges to pilots in coming months to help them better identify themselves in a crisis. And they said they are taking undisclosed steps to make it easier for pilots to transport their weapons to and from work.

Hesselbein said his group would push for legislation requiring airlines to grant unpaid leave for the training, which could be tough for some pilots because of their schedules. The airlines, which generally resisted the creation of the program, are expected to fight such a proposal.

All Quiet On Israel's Eastern Front? Not Quite. (WP)

By Al Kamen

The Washington Post, January 24, 2007

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice's trip last week to the Middle East produced some odd moments.

For example, in London, Rice chatted with reporters, explaining how "the removal of Saddam Hussein set in motion a number of other circumstances, other changes in the Middle East: the removal of an eastern-front threat for Israel, for instance."

We pause here, just for a moment, to suggest that perhaps a map of the region be consulted. Okay, let's see. On the "eastern front" of Israel we find Syria and Jordan on the borders. Iraq would have had to go through hundreds of miles of desert -- not a lot of ground cover -- or through Damascus -- to get there. The threat on Iran's western front, however, has been neatly eliminated.

Barbara Slavin of USA Today asked: "What is new and different? It seems to me that [Ehud] Olmert now is weaker, frankly, than [Ehud] Barak was, and certainly [Mahmoud] Abbas is weaker than [Yasser] Arafat was."

"Let's look at where it really was in 2000, all right?" Rice countered. "You had Yasser Arafat, who I think . . . had one foot in terror and one foot in politics." Well, better than both feet in terror.

"It's also the case that you had at that time a Palestinian Authority that was overrun by corruption, overrun by its ties with terrorism," Rice pointed out. "And strangely, you had Hamas, of course, sitting out as a resistance movement," and not involved.

"Resistance movement"? We pause here once again and set aside the map to pick up State's 2000 list of terrorist groups and find that, in Section H, Hamas, which now controls the Palestinian legislature, is listed as a terrorist group. Ditto on Page 118 of our National Counterterrorism Center 2007 daily planner.

"In fact, the United States had been, in past times, and not too far in the distant future -- or in the distant past, opposed to the establishment of a Palestinian state," she said. "And so when you have a Palestinian state -- the president declared that a Palestinian state is going to be the outcome here, it begins to change the -- it begins to condition the environment."

The administration has often trumpeted the notion that President Bush was the first president to call for creation of a Palestinian state. He certainly appears to be the first Republican president to have called for a Palestinian state. But President Bill Clinton, just before he left office, said a peace deal would mean "an independent and sovereign state with al-Quds [East Jerusalem] as its capital, recognized by all."A Wild Time in Minerals Management

Speaking of the environment, the Interior Department's Minerals Management Service has been making news lately because of allegations that it has been too cozy with the offshore oil industry it helps regulate and from whom it collects royalties and lease money.

But that won't stop them from partying on. So they'll be celebrating the ninth annual industry awards programs this year at a bash in Houston on April 17. Last year's drew 700 folks from the agency and the companies.

A regular attendee and prior award winner is David Deal, a former American Petroleum Institute lawyer, who got an MMS award in 2003 for "utilizing expertise gained from his years of participation in numerous MMS regulatory initiatives to . . . propose viable options for resolving differences, reducing litigation, and developing simplified royalty processes."

Deal may go to the awards ceremony again this year, he told our colleague Elizabeth Williamson yesterday. He has his own law practice these days and has been working on the MMS's royalty-policy committee, which advises the agency on collecting fees for the oil the industry pumps out of public property. Deal's a "public at large" member -- one of three people on the committee who are supposed to represent non-aligned folks like you and me. "I nominated myself," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0120961

And there was a party just yesterday at the main Interior Department auditorium to celebrate the 25th anniversary of the founding of the MMS. MMS invited all Interior employees to come celebrate.

Many surely did. As one Interior wag noted, folks at other Interior agencies are relieved at all the attention MMS is getting. "Thank God for MMS," he said. "They're not going to be coming after us for a while."Painting a Clinton as Kerry

The Republican National Committee was out quickly this week with an early attack line on presidential candidate Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.). The initial feint is a flip-flop jab, comparing Clinton to the hapless 2004 candidate Sen. John F. Kerry's line about voting for the war in Iraq before voting against it.

"Hillary's Kerryoake on Iraq," the headline said.

"Hillary Campaign Kicks Off With A Kerry Classic: Use Of Force Vote Was Not A Vote For Use Of Force," citing her vote giving Bush authorization to wage war in Iraq. No need for a quotation from Clinton. The ad cited a comment by "Clinton advisor Terry McAuliffe" that sounded much like Kerry's comments.A Swing Through the Revolving Door

This just in. Homeland Security general counsel Philip J. Perry will resign effective Feb. 6, Secretary Michael Chertoff announced after business hours yesterday, adding that he fully supported Perry's decision "to put his family first."

That would include wife Elizabeth Cheney, daughter of Vice President Cheney, and their five children, the youngest of whom arrived last summer. Liz Cheney has stepped down as principal deputy assistant secretary of state for Near Eastern affairs, although she had time to publish an opinion column yesterday criticizing Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) on Iraq. Our colleague Spencer S. Hsu reports that the vice president's son-in-law will rejoin his the Washington office of his old firm, Latham & Watkins, as a partner in its litigation department.

Locked In Squalor (WP)

The Washington Post, January 24, 2007

NO MATTER your position in the debate over immigration policy, you no doubt agree that the United States ought to treat those accused of violating immigration law humanely. As it happens, so does U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE), which for years has had guidelines on the books governing the treatment of detainees (about 27,500 of whom are locked in its facilities every night). And, according to the agency's spokesman, ICE is very good at meeting its standards.

But a report released by the Department of Homeland Security's inspector general last week suggests the opposite. The study examined five facilities and found violations of basic ICE guidelines in every one. Among the more upsetting: roach and rat infestations; limited access to clean underwear; dirty food trays and undercooked poultry; faulty ventilation; and, perhaps most disturbing, constricted access to counsel. Unlike other types of prisoners in the United States, noncitizens held for violations of immigration law have no right to state-provided legal representation, but ICE's guidelines specify that they must have access to law libraries and to working telephones with up-to-date phone numbers connecting to free legal aid services. The inspector general found that phones often did not work and that the law libraries were often obsolete. In one facility, not one of the 12 numbers for legal services worked.

In its defense, ICE says that the report's findings are not statistically significant because the inspector general examined only a small number of facilities and that the report does not reflect the state of other detention centers. A spokesman points to the results of inspections ICE regularly conducts across the whole system as evidence that the agency does not have a problem complying with its own rules. Yet the very inspections ICE touts found each of the five facilities the report examined to be acceptable, failing to catch many of the problems the inspector general identified. This suggests that internal information describing better conditions in other detention centers is probably also inaccurate.

In a written response to the report, ICE agreed that it needs to review its inspection regimen. That's a start. The next step should be promulgating the guidelines it professes to have no problem meeting as agency regulations, which would give them the force of law and provide a greater incentive to comply. If ICE's claims are true, it should have no argument with making regulations of its own guidelines. If the inspector general's portrait is indicative, the nation is failing a basic standard of human decency.

State Farm Settles Mississippi Claims From Katrina Surge (AP)

By Michael Kunzelman

AP, January 23, 2007

State Farm Fire & Casualty agreed yesterday to settle hundreds of lawsuits by policyholders and reopen thousands of other disputed claims, a deal potentially worth hundreds of millions of dollars to homeowners devastated by Hurricane Katrina, a company spokesman said.

DOJ_NMG_0120962

The settlement calls for State Farm to pay about $80 million to more than 600 policyholders who sued the company for refusing to cover damage from the Aug. 29, 2005, storm. State Farm also agreed to pay at least $50 million -- but possibly hundreds of millions more -- to thousands of Mississippi policyholders whose claims were denied but didn't sue the company.

State Farm's agreement with Mississippi Attorney General Jim Hood and policyholders' lawyers resolves a civil lawsuit that Hood filed against the company for refusing to cover damage from Katrina's storm surge nearly 17 months ago.

The accord also resolves Hood's criminal probe of allegations that the insurer fraudulently denied claims after the August 2005 storm.

"It's been like a death roll with an alligator for the last two months in these negotiations," Hood said.

"The agreement greatly reduces the time, the risk and the expense of defending multiple claims in individual litigation," said Phil Supple, a spokesman for State Farm.

Mississippi's mass settlement -- the first of its kind since Katrina spawned hundreds of lawsuits against State Farm and other major insurers -- does not involve any claims in other states.

The deal was to have been presented to U.S. District Judge L.T. Senter Jr. in Gulfport, Miss., yesterday.

Supple said the company will review claims filed by policyholders in Mississippi's three coastal counties whose claims were denied but didn't sue the company. They can have their claims reevaluated or resolved by binding arbitration, he said.

State Farm, the state's largest home insurer, says it already has paid roughly $1.1 billion for about 84,000 property claims in the state. State Farm and other insurers paid for Katrina's wind damage, but Hood and hundreds of policyholders sued the companies over their refusal to pay for more than $2 billion in damage from the storm's wind-driven surge.

The settlement comes less than two weeks after a federal jury in Gulfport awarded $2.5 million in punitive damages to a couple who sued State Farm for denying their claim after Katrina. A judge took part of that case out of jurors' hands, ruling that State Farm is liable for $223,292 in storm damage to the Biloxi home of Norman and Genevieve Broussard.

After Katrina, a legal team led by Richard "Dickie" Scruggs sued several major insurers on behalf of hundreds of Gulf Coast policyholders. Scruggs, a Gulf Coast native whose home in Pascagoula was destroyed by Katrina, rose to national prominence when he helped negotiate a multibillion-dollar settlement with tobacco companies in the mid-1990s.

Besides State Farm, Hood sued Allstate, Mississippi Farm Bureau Insurance, USAA and Nationwide. In addition, Hood has investigated allegations that State Farm and other insurers have fraudulently denied claims after Katrina. Last week, a grand jury in Pascagoula began hearing testimony on those allegations.

State Farm attorneys say a federal grand jury has been probing similar allegations.

State Farm Agrees To Pay Up For Katrina In Mississippi (USAT)

By Kathy Chu

USA Today, January 24, 2007

State Farm has agreed to pay thousands of Mississippi homeowners hit by Hurricane Katrina likely hundreds of millions of dollars in a landmark settlement that's expected to reverberate across the storm-ravaged Gulf Coast.

The company agreed to a deal under which it will reopen thousands of homeowners' claims and is likely to pay as much as $500 million, Mississippi Attorney General Jim Hood announced Tuesday. There's no cap on the payout. The insurer will have to pay at least $50 million under the deal negotiated with the Scruggs law firm, which represents the majority of Mississippi homeowners who sued State Farm.

In a related development, State Farm will settle more than 600 individual Mississippi homeowners' Katrina claims for roughly $80 million, according to a person with direct knowledge of the negotiations who didn't want to be named because the settlement is confidential.

The settlement applies only to Mississippi homeowners — not to the thousands in Louisiana who are suing State Farm and other insurers, arguing that wind and rain ravaged their homes. Homeowners' policies cover wind and rain damage, but not flood damage, which is covered by federal flood insurance.

Homeowners could begin receiving insurance checks within a few weeks, after the class-action settlement is approved, as expected, by U.S. District Court Judge L.T. Senter Jr. As part of the agreement with State Farm in Mississippi, Hood agreed to drop a criminal probe against the insurer related to its claims-handling process.

Phil Supple, a spokesman for State Farm, the USA's largest home insurer, said its goal has always been to "reach a just, speedy and efficient resolution to these matters." A settlement "is in the best interest of our policyholders," Supple added.

About 35,000 Mississippi homeowners are eligible to have their claims reopened. For about 1,000 Mississippi residents whose homes were reduced to slabs by Katrina, State Farm will offer at least 50% of the homeowner's insurance on the property structure. The average house in Mississippi costs about $200,000, Hood estimates. Thousands more will receive lower amounts.

DOJ_NMG_0120963

Homeowners who don't want to settle with State Farm can still sue the insurer. But the deal "gives a new opportunity for thousands of people to recover their insured losses through a quick process," says Zach Scruggs, an attorney who, with his father, Richard Scruggs, negotiated with State Farm.

State Farm is fighting hundreds of other Katrina-related lawsuits along the Gulf Coast, including in Louisiana. Attorneys in those cases said they hoped the Mississippi development would cause State Farm and other insurers to settle quickly.

"State Farm knows where to find me," says Madro Bandaries, who represents dozens of Louisiana homeowners disputing State Farm's payouts after Katrina. "They cannot, in my estimation, go to Mississippi and do one thing and then not go to Louisiana."

Big Insurer Will Pay 640 Katrina Claims (NYT)

By Joseph B. Treaster

The New York Times, January 24, 2007

In a move that is expected to jump-start rebuilding along the Mississippi Gulf Coast, State Farm Insurance said yesterday that it had reached an agreement with state officials to pay hundreds of millions of dollars to owners of homes along the coast that were wrecked by Hurricane Katrina.

The agreement settles lawsuits filed by 640 homeowners and allows thousands of others to reopen damage claims that State Farm previously closed. Insurance executives said they expected the outlines of the deal to be adopted by other carriers.

The agreement does not apply to New Orleans, where the failure of the levees left much of the city underwater for days. Lawyers and insurers say no similar settlement talks are in progress there.

For State Farm, the nation's largest home insurer and the biggest in Mississippi, the settlement allows for "a just, speedy and efficient resolution," as a spokesman, Phil Supple, put it.

It would also remove a major public relations headache. While State Farm and the other insurers may have had some strong legal arguments, they have been widely perceived as insensitive. In many cases, residents whose houses were reduced to concrete slab foundations received just a few thousand dollars in payments. Some received nothing.

Under the settlement, 300 homeowners who lost everything will receive their full insurance coverage. Mississippi officials said 1,000 others would receive at least half, with the opportunity to negotiate for more.

"A lot of people on the coast are going to see money in their pockets sooner, rather than have to go through a long, drawn-out process of court proceedings," Mississippi's insurance commissioner, George Dale, said yesterday.

The core of the dispute was whether the damage to the houses was caused by high winds or surging floodwaters as Hurricane Katrina swept across the coast on Aug. 29, 2005. The insurers said their policies covered only wind damage. But in many cases, they also refused to pay for damage caused by a combination of wind and water.

The settlement does not affect the terms of coverage in the insurers' policies, but some insurance experts said they expected that the carriers would ultimately rewrite their policies to specifically bar coverage of damage from storm surges.

In the settlement talks, which began last fall, State Farm insisted that the Mississippi attorney general, Jim Hood, drop a criminal investigation of the company's handling of storm damage claims. It also demanded that he abandon a civil suit against it and other insurers.

The final sticking point in the agreement had been over the framing of a few sentences that would end the criminal investigation. Mr. Hood convened a grand jury last week that began hearing evidence.

The two sides reached agreement in a meeting yesterday afternoon in Jackson, the state capital. Then lawyers for State Farm and Richard F. Scruggs, who represents hundreds of storm victims and played a major role in drafting the settlement, flew to Gulfport on the coast, to seek the endorsement of Judge L. T. Senter Jr., the federal district judge overseeing most of the insurance disputes.

Judge Senter had suggested that he would like to see a global settlement, and some participants in the talks said the first money could begin to flow to storm victims as early as next week.

Under the agreement, State Farm will pay an initial $130 million and perhaps several hundred million more by the end of the year, depending on how many policyholders requested that their claims be reopened. About 35,000 homeowners along Mississippi's 70-mile-long coast are eligible. Among the homeowners who will benefit from the settlement are Senator Trent Lott and Representative Gene Taylor, both of whom lost their homes in the storm and were denied payment by State Farm.

Since Hurricane Katrina struck, the insurance companies have paid $5.3 billion for damage to more than 330,000 homes in Mississippi and $10.3 billion for nearly a million homes in Louisiana.

They have raised rates sharply because, they say, the risk of severe storms has increased. They have also refused to renew many policies in vulnerable areas. The settlement disclosed yesterday is expected to have minimum effect on the cost of coverage.

DOJ_NMG_0120964

State Farm got a vivid picture of the hostility toward it in the first jury trial a little more than a week ago. Judge Senter abruptly declared that State Farm had failed to prove its case and the jury quickly came back with a decision requiring the company to pay $2.5 million in punitive damages to a couple in Biloxi who lost everything in the storm. The judge also awarded the couple the full value of their insurance policy: $223,000. State Farm had maintained that it owed them nothing.

Randy J. Maniloff, a lawyer at White & Williams in Philadelphia who represents insurance companies, said yesterday that it was clear that the bad publicity had been a big factor in State Farm's decision to settle. "They spent 80 years building up a brand," he said, "and the adverse publicity from these lawsuits has been clearly doing damage to the brand. It just flies in the face of their portrayal of themselves as good neighbors."

Indeed, according to people close to the talks, it was State Farm that first suggested a settlement in a telephone call early last fall to Mr. Scruggs, the lawyer.

Mr. Scruggs, who came to prominence by filing lawsuits against the tobacco industry, reached an agreement in principle with State Farm two weeks ago.

But Mr. Hood, the state attorney general, and Mr. Dale, the insurance commissioner, expressed reservations. Both officials said they wanted to make sure that homeowners got the best possible deal. Mr. Dale, though, said it was also important that any agreement not be overly burdensome for the insurance companies.

Mr. Scruggs, whose home in Pascagoula was destroyed along with those of many neighbors, said that resolving the coverage dispute had been "the most personal and most difficult" work in his 30-year career. He has not settled with his own insurer. But for his work on the settlement, he will share as much as $46 million with lawyers from half a dozen firms — to be paid by State Farm on top of its payments to homeowners.

In the agreement, State Farm said it would pay $80 million to settle the 640 lawsuits and to reopen, at the request of homeowners, up to 35,000 other claims. The insurance company agreed to pay at least $50 million more on the previously closed claims.

Participants in the talks estimated that State Farm could pay a further $250 million to $600 million, depending on how many people reopened claims. For the 300 homes that were swept away, State Farm agreed to pay the full insured value. Those homes were insured for $69,700 to $2.34 million. The owners of the 340 other homes, with varying degrees of damage, are to receive an average of $124,400.

In the review of closed claims, homeowners may accept a new offer from State Farm or insist on binding arbitration in hopes of receiving more money. Storm victims are also free to ignore the settlement and file separate lawsuits against State Farm. But few are expected to do so.

WAR NEWS:

A Bid To Rescue A Presidency (LAT)

By Janet Hook

The Los Angeles Times, January 24, 2007

WASHINGTON — Can this presidency be saved?

That's the question that loomed Tuesday as President Bush gave his State of the Union speech in the most inhospitable climate he has ever faced for his annual address to Congress.

In proposing a short list of initiatives on healthcare, immigration and energy, Bush gave more attention than he has in past speeches to domestic issues. That agenda was potentially more appealing to Democrats - or at least harder for them to dismiss out of hand - than his ill-fated plan to overhaul Social Security, which was to be the crown jewel of his second term legacy.

But his plans may be too modest to accomplish the broader challenge facing Bush: How to rescue the last quarter of his presidency from irrelevance and patch his tattered legacy. Bush is trying to regain his footing when Iraq is littered with carnage; Democrats are calling the shots on Capitol Hill; and vast majorities of the public are disenchanted with his leadership.

"This represents the end of the Bush era," said Michael Tanner, a policy analyst for the Cato Institute, a libertarian think tank. "This speech shows that outside Iraq, he is increasingly irrelevant."

In the speech, Bush tried to remain gracious and optimistic about finding common ground with Democrats.

"Like many before us, we can work through our differences and achieve big things for the American people," he told the joint session of Congress.

The moment is reminiscent of the position Bill Clinton was in after Republicans won control of Congress in 1994. Clinton seemed so marginalized that he felt obliged to assert at a press conference that he was still "relevant."

DOJ_NMG_0120965

But Clinton went on to work with the Republican-controlled Congress and rack up notable legislative accomplishments, including a balanced budget plan, an overhaul of welfare, a minimum wage increase and expansion of health insurance coverage.

Burdened by an unpopular war, Bush is not aiming as high on the domestic front. And he is following, more than leading, in a political environment where the agenda is increasingly being set by others - by Democratic leaders in Congress, the nation's governors and the crowd of politicians campaigning for president.

Bush is chiming in on a burgeoning national debate about how to expand health insurance coverage. Republican governors - Arnold Schwarzenegger of California and Mitt Romney, late of Massachusetts - have broken the partisan mold and crafted ambitious healthcare plans.

Business and labor groups are making odd-bedfellow alliances to promote expanded coverage. Former Sen. John Edwards (D-N.C.) has made universal health insurance coverage a central plank of his presidential campaign. Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) offered a plan to broaden coverage on the first day of her campaign.

Bush's contribution is a proposal that has already been declared dead-on-arrival on Capitol Hill because it could hurt many who are already insured. He is proposing a change in the tax system to cap deductions for employer-provided health insurance and provide new tax breaks for people who buy their own insurance. It is a plan that is in keeping with Bush's aversion to government mandates.

"In all we do, we must remember that the best healthcare decisions are made not by government and insurance companies but by patients and their doctors," he said.

But the tax change would increase the number of people covered by only about 5 million, when nearly 47 million are uninsured. The plan is opposed by labor unions and many business leaders are not enthusiastic about it. It would face formidable obstacles even if Bush had introduced it at the height of his powers.

Bush also proposed giving states more leeway to use Medicaid funds to devise their own plans to expand health insurance coverage. But that initiative amounts only to redeploying money, not increasing the federal commitment, and it is unclear how many of the uninsured would be covered.

On energy, Bush seems on the defensive against Democrats who are trying to bring a new sense of urgency to the effort to combat global warming. House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-San Francisco) has appointed a special committee to study the issue. Al Gore won an Oscar nomination for his documentary on global warming. Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), one of the leading presidential candidates, is making it a signature issue.

Bush proposes tackling the issue by aiming to cut gasoline consumption by 20% in 10 years, mostly by promoting the use of alternative fuels. He did break new ground and move toward Democrats by proposing stricter fuel emission standards, but he did not go as far as most Democrats believe is needed to reduce global warming.

And Democrats remained skeptical about his commitment. "It's not just about what he says. It's about what he does," said Pelosi. "In the past he has talked the talk on climate change. But he hasn't walked the walk."

Two other issues that Bush promoted are old standbys: renewal of his landmark school reform law, No Child Left Behind, and an overhaul of immigration laws to allow illegal immigrants to become citizens.

Both measures put Bush at odds with conservative activists. They oppose his more intrusive federal role in schools and kept last year's immigration legislation from including what they called "amnesty" for illegal immigrants.

Even the parts of the speech that were touted as groundbreaking and bold by the White House are echoes of past speeches. Last year's State of the Union included plans to end the country's "addiction to oil." And his 2006 speech also spotlighted another tax-break approach to improving medical coverage, through tax-advantaged health savings accounts. Neither of those issues advanced even in a Congress controlled by his own party.

Joe Lockhart, a former Clinton aide and co-founder of the political website hotsoup.com, said Bush may have missed an opportunity to put Democrats on the defensive with a bolder agenda on issues such as global warming, healthcare and immigration.

"He offered only piecemeal approaches to dealing with these issues," said Lockhart. "Add to that no flexibility on Iraq and the speech is destined to be forgotten almost as soon as it's completed."

If Bush and the Democrats do not find a way to forge bipartisan deals, election day 2006 will turn out to be the beginning of the end of Bush's presidency. Then, some allies say, the best thing he can do in the next two years will be to recognize the limits of his legislative power and focus more on framing the debate for 2008.

"There's nothing good or useful that can be passed out of this Congress in the next two years," said Grover Norquist, a Bush ally and president of Americans for Tax Reform. "It's not as if he can bend Congress to his will. He can veto things, he can stop things, he can introduce ideas and repeat ideas. That is his power.

DOJ_NMG_0120966

The State Of The President: Beleaguered (WP)

By Dan Balz

The Washington Post, January 24, 2007

President Bush used his State of the Union address last night to try to revive his presidency against what may be the greatest odds any chief executive has faced in a generation.

Other presidents have encountered difficult moments and have been dealt electoral setbacks, but few have faced the combination of obstacles that now confront this White House. Bush arrived at the Capitol at his lowest point in public-opinion polls, facing new Democratic majorities in the House and Senate and lame-duck status as attention turns rapidly toward a 2008 presidential campaign that will choose his successor.

Bush's problems all stem from the same issue. The public has lost confidence in his Iraq war policy, and, in the face of evidence that Americans are looking for a change in course, the president has chosen with his new plan to deploy additional troops to the conflict -- a direction the public overwhelmingly opposes.

But his response last night was a speech that was very much in keeping with the style of leadership he has demonstrated repeatedly in office. If he was humbler in tone and rhetorically generous to his Democratic opponents in calling for cooperation, he was anything but defensive.

"This is not the fight we entered in Iraq, but it is the fight we're in," Bush said. "Every one of us wishes this war were over and won. Yet it would not be like us to leave our promises unkept, our friends abandoned and our own security at risk. Ladies and gentlemen: On this day, at this hour, it is still within our power to shape the outcome of this battle. Let us find our resolve and turn events toward victory."

Last night's address was two speeches in one. Bush plowed through the domestic initiatives with little emotion, but suddenly came alive when he turned his attention to Iraq and terrorism, as passionate and determined as always when he speaks about the war that has defined his presidency.

The atmosphere in the House chamber also changed, signifying the divisions over the president's Iraq policy. House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.), who had basked in Bush's praise as the nation's first female speaker at the beginning of the speech, sat stony-faced as he exhorted the country to follow his lead in Iraq. As the president asked for a chance to make his Iraq policy work, Republicans leaped to applaud. Pelosi and the Democrats remained seated.

There were three underlying messages in the president's address. The first was a familiar argument about the terrorist threat and plea for patience on Iraq, a chord struck earlier in the day by Lt. Gen. David H. Petraeus, the expected new commander of U.S. forces there. Although about two in three Americans disagree with the decision to send more troops to Iraq and members of Congress are preparing nonbinding resolutions to declare their opposition, Bush asked for time to show that the strategy can succeed.

He recalled that the country was largely united at the time of the invasion in 2003 and acknowledged the divisions that have emerged since. But he argued that whatever motivated members of Congress at the time of the invasion, there was a consensus that the United States must win the war.

Bush may have been speaking into the void. Over the past six months, there has been a critical turn in public opinion. Long ago, a majority of Americans concluded that the president's decision to go to war was a mistake. The administration tried to shrug that off by focusing attention on the consequences of failure, believing that as long as Americans saw some chance for success they would continue to support the mission.

Today Bush has lost that battle for public opinion as well. NBC News-Wall Street Journal polls have tracked public confidence on the question of whether there will be a successful conclusion in Iraq. A year ago, the public was mildly pessimistic, with 41 percent saying they had confidence in a successful outcome and 49 percent saying they did not. Attitudes remained generally in that range throughout the summer, but last fall they took a sharp negative turn. By October, 27 percent saw hope for a successful conclusion, and 61 percent did not. In December, attitudes turned even more sour, with a 50-point gap between those who believe the United States can win and those who doubt there can be a successful conclusion.

"The American public thinks it's time to start wrapping up," said Republican pollster Bill McInturff, who jointly conducts the poll with Democratic pollster Peter D. Hart. "The president's doing something that is very difficult. It's the core of presidential leadership, and that is to stick to what he believes is the right policy in the face of an American public that has decided they disagree with him. . . . The president has very little capacity to change their mind."

The second message from the president was a call for bipartisan cooperation, particularly on domestic issues such as budget deficits, earmarks, immigration, energy, health care and education.

DOJ_NMG_0120967

"We are not the first to come here with government divided and uncertainty in the air," Bush said. "Like many before us, we can work through our differences and achieve big things for the American people. Our citizens don't much care which side of the aisle we sit on -- as long as we are willing to cross that aisle when there is work to be done."

Administration officials expressed optimism yesterday that they can reach agreement with the Democrats in Congress on the path to a balanced budget, on the reauthorization of the No Child Left Behind education law and on some elements of a strategy to wean the nation off imported oil.

But even as Bush was calling for bipartisan cooperation, Democrats were seeking coalitions with Republicans to advance their own agenda. The Senate Foreign Relations Committee will begin working this morning on a resolution opposing Bush's Iraq plan, a measure that has the support of a growing number of Republican senators. In the House, Democrats completed work on the first six items of their agenda last week, attracting a substantial number of Republicans to several of the measures.

Sen. Charles E. Schumer (N.Y.), the third-ranking Democrat in the Senate, said yesterday that Bush so far has shown no evidence of wanting real compromise with Democrats on issues such as Iraq and health care.

"This year, I don't think the change is the president, who is staying in his ideological tower, but Republicans in the Senate, who have said we just can't keep following this president," he said. "That's where you will see the bipartisanship."

A Republican strategist, asked not to be identified in order to speak freely about the administration's problems, said Democrats are not in any mood to be generous to Bush. Referring to the president's approval rating, he said, "When you're sitting at 35 and you're telling them what to do after they won an election, they've got to chuckle."

Bush's third message last night was perhaps the most robust domestic agenda of his presidency, a way of saying to those who are ready to write him off that he still has the power of the bully pulpit to inject ideas into the national debate and force others to react to them. It was a message that said he should not be regarded as a lame duck.

"Either we're going to see progress on that agenda or it will be a banner to which our allies on the Hill, Republican or Democrat, can repair," a senior White House official said.

Even Republicans outside the White House questioned that optimism. "My view is that Bush's speech tonight, especially the domestic policy side, is an attempt to set the agenda for the 2008 Republican primaries, not for the 2007 Congress," said Daniel Casse, a strategist and writer. "I think their motivation is to make sure candidates in '08 are running on ideas established by George Bush, not running away from them."

Bush is by nature a competitor, and the State of the Union address reminded the country that he will continue to push his ideas even in the face of enormous public skepticism. Given the political balance in Congress, the chances of him getting his way domestically are slender. Prospects in Iraq appear even more difficult.

That is why, though he certainly did not intend to steal a page from Democratic Sen. Barack Obama's best-selling book, his speech last night may be remembered as "the audacity of hope."

Bush Urges Congress, Nation To Give His Iraq Plan A Chance (WP)

By Peter Baker And Michael Abramowitz

The Washington Post, January 24, 2007

President Bush implored lawmakers and the nation last night to give him one more chance to win the war in Iraq and avoid the "nightmare scenario" of defeat while presenting a domestic agenda intended to find common cause with the new Democratic Congress on issues such as energy and immigration.

Politically wounded but rhetorically unbowed, Bush gave no ground on his decision to dispatch 21,500 more troops to Iraq despite a bipartisan cascade of criticism. Addressing for the first time a Congress controlled by the other party, Bush challenged Democrats to "show our enemies abroad that we are united in the goal of victory" and warned that the consequences of failure in Iraq "would be grievous and far-reaching."

"I respect you and the arguments you've made," Bush told skeptical lawmakers from both parties in his sixth State of the Union address and the fourth since the invasion of Iraq in March 2003. "We went into this largely united -- in our assumptions and in our convictions. And whatever you voted for, you did not vote for failure. Our country is pursuing a new strategy in Iraq, and I ask you to give it a chance to work."

With new House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (Calif.) sitting behind him in a vivid sign of the power shift on Capitol Hill, Bush congratulated Democrats on their victory in the November elections and paid tribute to the first woman to serve in the nation's third-highest office. "Tonight, I have a high privilege and distinct honor of my own as the first president to begin the State of the Union message with these words: 'Madam Speaker,' " Bush said, then turned to shake Pelosi's hand as she beamed and lawmakers cheered.

The president further reached out to Democrats in the 49-minute speech with ideas to expand health-care coverage, overhaul immigration laws and improve education performance, ideas that he framed as efforts to provide "hope and opportunity," a phrase he used six times. In his most ambitious new proposal, he laid out a plan to reduce projected gasoline consumption in the United States by 20 percent over the next 10 years.

DOJ_NMG_0120968

"Congress has changed, but not our responsibilities," Bush said. He added: "We're not the first to come here with a government divided and uncertainty in the air. Like many before us, we can work through our differences and achieve big things for the American people."

Yet his approach contrasted with the last two presidents to address an opposition Congress after their parties lost midterm elections. Ronald Reagan conceded "serious mistakes" in 1987, as did Bill Clinton in 1995. Clinton moved to the middle so conspicuously that the opposition leader who gave the official response noted that he "sounded pretty Republican." Although Bush acknowledged two weeks ago that "mistakes have been made" in Iraq, he appeared unchastened last night and took no responsibility for his party's defeat or errors in office.

Democrats seemed unimpressed by his latest governing blueprint and signaled that they are in no mood to meet him in the middle. Long before Bush arrived in the House chamber to deliver his remarks, Democratic leaders and allied interest groups rushed out statements blasting his domestic proposals as rehashed ideas, empty rhetoric or flawed concepts that would create other problems. But the divide between president and Congress was most inflamed by his leadership of a war that will soon enter its fifth year.

"The president took us into this war recklessly," said freshman Sen. James Webb (D-Va.), a former Marine who was tapped to give the formal response. Accusing Bush of disregarding warnings by national security experts before invading Iraq, Webb added: "We are now, as a nation, held hostage to the predictable -- and predicted -- disarray that has followed."

In a joint statement released after the speech, Pelosi and Senate Majority Leader Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.) chided Bush's Iraq troop increase and vowed to hold nonbinding votes on it. "While the president continues to ignore the will of the country, Congress will not ignore this president's failed policy," they said. "His plan will receive an up-or-down vote in both the House and the Senate, and we will continue to hold him accountable for changing course in Iraq."

The speech came at the nadir of the Bush presidency to date, with the war grinding on, ever-widening bloodshed and no end in sight, two-thirds of the public turned against him in opinion polls and Democrats controlling both houses of Congress.

Even as they sought to revive his political viability with the national address, White House officials spent yesterday monitoring reports from Iraq, where a U.S. security helicopter crashed and five American civilians were killed, amid disputed claims that it was shot down. And they nervously watched the opening of the perjury trial of Vice President Cheney's former chief aide, I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby, whose lawyer asserted the White House made him a scapegoat in the CIA leak case to protect Deputy Chief of Staff Karl Rove.

Bush devoted about half of his speech last night to Iraq, terrorism and foreign policy, largely recapitulating his familiar argument that the war is the central front in a broader battle with terrorists and represents a "generational struggle that will continue long after you and I have turned our duties over to others." He linked Sunni insurgents, Shiite extremists, al-Qaeda terrorists and Hezbollah militants as arms of a broader "Islamist radical movement" but acknowledged that the mission in Iraq has changed from deposing Saddam Hussein to stopping sectarian violence.

"This is not the fight we entered in Iraq, but it is the fight we're in," he said. "Every one of us wishes this war were over and won. Yet it would not be like us to leave our promises unkept, our friends abandoned and our own security at risk. Ladies and gentlemen, on this day, at this hour, it is still within our power to shape the outcome of this battle. Let us find our resolve and turn events toward victory."

He did not directly debate proposals by some Democrats to cut off funding for more troops in Iraq but asked them to let him try his new plan. "In the end, I chose this course of action because it provides the best chance for success," he said. "Many in this chamber understand that America must not fail in Iraq because you understand that the consequences of failure would be grievous and far-reaching."

The immediate consequence he envisioned was an Iraqi capital plunged into anarchy. "If American forces step back before Baghdad is secure, the Iraqi government would be overrun by extremists on all sides," Bush said. "We could expect an epic battle between Shia extremists backed by Iran and Sunni extremists aided by al-Qaeda and supporters of the old regime. A contagion of violence could spill out across the country -- and in time the entire region could be drawn into the conflict."

Many in the chamber appeared unpersuaded. Pelosi sat grim-faced through the discussion of Iraq and did not clap when Republicans rose to support some of the president's statements. Although Iraq alone represented about a quarter of the speech, it generated applause just six times out of about 60 interruptions.

To reach out to skeptics, Bush repeated his call to create a bipartisan advisory council on the battle with terrorists and promoted his plan to permanently expand the U.S. military by 92,000 soldiers and Marines over five years to ease the burdens of fighting simultaneous wars in Iraq and Afghanistan.

DOJ_NMG_0120969

Sitting with first lady Laura Bush's box in the gallery during the speech were five decorated Iraq veterans, including Air Force Tech. Sgt. Michelle Barefield, who survived three attacks by makeshift bombs at Baghdad International Airport, repelled an enemy assault with her M-16 rifle and was awarded the Bronze Star. The White House also invited a domestic hero, Wesley Autrey, a New York construction worker who earned acclaim by jumping onto subway tracks to save a man who had fallen during a seizure.

While harboring little hope of changing minds on Iraq, White House aides said the president's ideas on domestic policy could appeal to Democrats. "We do believe it's one that can serve as a basis for bipartisan outreach," said Deputy Chief of Staff Joel D. Kaplan.

The biggest previously undisclosed initiative announced last night was Bush's proposal to reduce U.S. gasoline consumption by 20 percent by 2017, largely by stimulating the growth of ethanol and other alternative fuels but also by increasing fuel efficiency of automobiles. Bush has spoken in past State of the Union addresses about his desire to break U.S. dependency on foreign oil and last year declared that "America is addicted to oil," but his speech last night represented his most aggressive effort to curtail the habit.

The president proposed an ambitious campaign to expand the use of ethanol, methanol, hydrogen and other alternative fuels by requiring oil refineries to use 35 billion gallons of renewable and alternative fuels by 2017, a fivefold increase in the current target. Aides calculated that doing so would displace about 15 percent of projected gasoline use.

Bush also asked Congress to overhaul the mileage standards for automobiles. Rather than forcing automakers to raise fuel-efficiency standards for new cars across the board, Bush is pushing for flexibility to set different standards for different sizes and makes so manufacturers do not make smaller cars that are less safe. Officials forecast raising fuel standards by 4 percent a year, which would reduce overall gasoline use by 5 percent by 2017.

Bush also announced plans to double the capacity of the Strategic Petroleum Reserve to 1.5 billion barrels by 2027 to further insulate the United States from short-term disruptions in foreign oil supplies. "Achieving these ambitious goals will dramatically reduce our dependence on foreign oil," he said.

Although the president did not embrace any plans specifically to combat greenhouse gases generally believed to contribute to global warming, as some in Washington urged him to do, he argued that technology and his energy plans "will help us to confront the serious challenge of global climate change."

Democrats said Bush's plans contain significant loopholes or are not tough enough. The alternative-fuel plan could allow for more use of fuels that emit toxic gases, critics said. And on Monday, 11 senators, including eight Democrats, two Republicans and an independent, proposed an across-the-board increase in fuel standards to 35 miles per gallon by 2019.

As aides disclosed in recent days, Bush also called for a major change in the tax code in an effort to make health insurance more affordable. Under his plan, health insurance coverage would be taxable income but families would receive a $15,000 deduction. The plan would make it easier for those who buy health insurance out of pocket while increasing taxes on those who receive employer-funded health care worth more than $15,000 to eventually offset the cost.

"Changing the tax code is a vital and necessary step to making health care affordable for more Americans," Bush said. He added that he would also direct more federal money to states to cover low-income residents, although aides did not specify how much money would be provided.

Bush used the speech to press Congress to approve his long-standing immigration bill, which couples increased funding for border security with a plan for a temporary-worker program. The plan was blocked by the Republican-led Congress last year, but administration officials hope it may be more appealing to Democrats. "We need to resolve the status of the illegal immigrants who are already in our country -- without animosity and without amnesty," Bush said.

Bush also urged Congress to reauthorize -- and not weaken -- his signature No Child Left Behind education law, which is aimed at holding schools accountable through greater testing to make sure students meet minimum standards of achievement. And he repeated his vow to produce a plan next month that will balance the budget in five years while demanding that Congress cut special-interest projects in half by the end of this congressional session.

Bush Offers Plan To Curb Reliance On Foreign Oil (WSJ)

By John D. McKinnon, John J. Fialka And Yochi J. Dreazen

Wall Street Journal, January 24, 2007

WASHINGTON -- President Bush yesterday offered a blueprint he said would lead toward U.S. energy security and independence, calling for a 20% cut in gasoline consumption over the next decade through new fuel-economy standards and a massive boost in federal mandates for using ethanol and other alternative fuels.

DOJ_NMG_0120970

Amplifying the theme of weaning the country from its reliance on oil, Mr. Bush used a State of the Union address weighted heavily to domestic issues to urge a doubling of the nation's strategic-petroleum stockpile to protect against a sudden cutoff of foreign supplies.

"For too long our nation has been dependent on foreign oil," he said, echoing his famous declaration of last year's speech that the country was "addicted to oil." "The dependence leaves us more vulnerable to hostile regimes and to terrorists," he added.

The politically weakened Mr. Bush's latest energy initiative marks the start of his attempt to try to define himself as something other than a lame-duck president, facing a hostile Democrat-led Congress and consumed largely with Iraq. His call for alternative fuels, with a brief nod toward global-warming concerns, was just one of many ways he tried to find common ground with the Democrats who will determine the fate of his agenda.

In his 50-minute address, the president also put forth plans for expanding health coverage to the uninsured, renewing calls for a comprehensive immigration package that was rejected by the previous Republican-led Congress, extending his "No Child Left Behind" education program and offering new overseas assistance to combat AIDS and malaria.

"Our citizens don't much care which side of the aisle we sit on -- as long as we are willing to cross that aisle when work is to be done," Mr. Bush said as a Democratic Speaker of the House, Nancy Pelosi, sat prominently behind him for the first time in his presidency.

While the White House touted the energy agenda as one of the most significant parts of Mr. Bush's agenda, achieving its goals rests on the uncertainty of technological breakthroughs, and the administration is promising relatively little money to subsidize what would be a major redirection in the country's energy markets.

Mr. Bush also asked Congress for the power to "reform and modernize" fuel-economy standards, yet continued to reject calls for legislation mandating specific higher fuel standards. He maintains that regulators, rather than lawmakers, are better situated to set new higher requirements for auto makers.

And the president avoided widespread demands to embrace new economy-wide caps on so-called greenhouse gases, instead asserting that greater use of cleaner energies would lead to a reduction in these emissions, widely believed to cause global warming. "The way forward is through technology," he said.

By seizing on the goal of "energy independence," Mr. Bush has chosen a topic on which the public thirst for action is growing. It is also an initiative with significant consequences for national-security policy: If the country actually succeeded in significantly cutting its appetite for oil, its stake in the Middle Eastern problems that so bedevil the president would be reduced.

Though Mr. Bush focused on issues popular with Democrats -- and shunned old favorites he touted before the more friendly Republican majority, such as broad tax cuts -- it remains unclear how much he will be able to set the agenda in Washington. Virginia's newly elected Sen. James Webb, giving the Democrats' formal response to the address, asked Mr. Bush to move closer to Democrats on foreign policy and domestic issues. "If he does, we will join him," Mr. Webb said. "If he does not, we will be showing him the way."

Farm-state Democrats are likely to embrace -- and expand upon -- Mr. Bush's plans for a big bump in ethanol and biodiesel production. They are likely to take his proposals for increased research funding as an opening bid, and go up from there. Mr. Webb praised Mr. Bush's energy proposals and said: "We look forward to working with the president and his party to bring about these changes."

Mr. Bush's call for immigration-law changes seems likely to gain traction as well -- and drew a standing ovation from lawmakers. But his plans for overhauling fuel-economy standards face longer odds in Congress, as do proposals to give a big tax deduction to spur health-insurance purchases and to cull funds from federal low-income health programs for state efforts to create insurance pools for poor people.

Though Mr. Bush devoted the first half of his address entirely to domestic issues, he couldn't avoid the Iraq war and it consumed most of the second half. He included specific warnings to the country that failure would give Iraqi extremists a haven for plotting attacks against U.S. targets while emboldening Iran to pursue nuclear weapons. And he asked -- almost pleaded -- for a skeptical Congress to support his "new strategy in Iraq," saying, "I ask you to give it a chance to work."

But the significance the White House attached to the energy plan was underscored by the decision to send Mr. Bush on a first post-speech appearance this morning to Delaware with Energy Secretary Samuel Bodman, to visit a DuPont Co. research facility working on biofuels.

Last year, Mr. Bush called for doubling the research for fuels made from farm wastes such as corn stalks and straw. However, his proposed funding for the first commercial-size plants was stymied in Congress.

The centerpiece of Mr. Bush's newest energy plan is a significant increase in federal targets for use of renewable and alternative fuels, categories that include ethanol made from corn. The current standard aims for consumption of 7.5 billion gallons by 2012, a level the U.S. is likely to hit within about a year, thanks to ethanol's growing popularity. The new target would be 35 billion gallons of renewable and alternative fuels by 2017 -- an amount Mr. Bush hopes will reduce projected gasoline consumption by about 15%.

DOJ_NMG_0120971

The White House said oil companies would be required to mix a certain proportion of renewables into the fuel they distribute. If they don't, they would face a penalty.

Democrats and Republicans, particularly those from Midwestern states, cheered the idea. But boosting ethanol use isn't as easy as the president made it sound. There isn't currently enough corn in the U.S. to make all the fuel the White House says will be used, and environmentalists worry that adding to corn production would increase pollution. Making ethanol from cleaner sources such as wood chips isn't yet commercially proven.

The energy plan's second main element is a rewrite of federal fuel-economy standards that assumes the administration will raise passenger-car mileage standards by 4% more each year. By 2017, those changes would shave another 5% off projected gasoline use, for a total reduction of 20% in 10 years. Together, the proposals also would speed up by eight years Mr. Bush's goal from last year's speech of eliminating the equivalent of 75% of current Middle East oil imports.

The increase in the Corporate Average Fuel Economy (CAFE) standard is about twice the increase the administration imposed last year on light trucks and is in line with several proposals on Capitol Hill. Industry and environmental lobbyists both consider 4% a year to be a significant increase, though some are skeptical the administration will follow through.

While the CAFE change is likely to upset some auto makers, the administration has designed it with a feature that could be appealing to some: a provision for creating CAFE credits for manufacturers that exceed one or more of the standards, which could be traded or banked for future use.

The White House said in materials distributed earlier in the day that the energy plan would also serve as the administration's climate-change policy -- asserting it would "help confront climate change by stopping the projected growth of carbon emissions from cars, light trucks and SUVs within 10 years."

In his health-care package, Mr. Bush is offering to raise taxes on generally higher-income earners in the name of making health care more available for lower-income people. The White House plan would make employer-provided health insurance taxable for the first time. But it would create a big new tax deduction -- $15,000 for families and $7,500 for singles -- for everyone who gets insurance, whether at work or on their own. The plan would also help states extend insurance coverage by diverting money that now supports hospitals that care for the poor into state-created programs that subsidized basic insurance plans.

The foreign-policy component of Mr. Bush's remarks contained an implicit acknowledgment of how much U.S. power has ebbed in recent years because of the war in Iraq -- and how the conflict has significantly reduced leverage over adversaries such as Iran and North Korea. White House aides privately conceded before the speech that U.S. failures in Iraq had sharply increased Iran's influence, and that Tehran seemed to be gambling the U.S. would be unable to wage a military campaign against Iran because the American military was so overstretched.

Mr. Bush's public remarks about the Middle East have in the past focused heavily on Sunni Muslim extremist groups like al-Qaeda, but Mr. Bush last night said, "The Shia and Sunni extremists are different faces of the same totalitarian threat."

The speech also featured a revival of Mr. Bush's argument that the fighting in Iraq shouldn't be looked at in isolation, but as part of a broader confrontation with Islamic militants and as a more ideological conflict between forces of moderation and extremism. Both wars, Mr. Bush said, would last long after he had left office.

Bush Turns Domestic, But War Won't Go Away (CHIT)

By Michael Tackett

Chicago Tribune, January 24, 2007

WASHINGTON -- It was no small irony that President Bush seemed to be channeling Al Gore on energy policy on the very day that Gore's documentary film on global warming, "An Inconvenient Truth," was nominated for an Oscar.,

After several years of using war and terror as the defining themes of his State of the Union message, the president who came to office with little inclination toward foreign affairs tried to recast his presidency Tuesday night with a notable emphasis on domestic issues. Indeed, the president was more than 3,100 words into his speech before his first invocation of Iraq.

He did spend considerable time on energy. And while he didn't mention global warming specifically, he did emphasize a call to reduce U.S. gasoline usage by 20 percent over 10 years. Though he has mentioned energy independence seven straight years, his proposals have advanced only sporadically. Now the president's tone is far closer to the man he denied the White House in 2000, with talk of "hybrid vehicles," "biodiesel" and "solar and wind energy."

The president also made pitches for changes in health care, education and immigration. Much of it had the ring of George W. Bush, circa Sept. 10. 2001, which is to say an agenda focused tightly within America's borders.

But he confronts an older and more formidable reality. No matter the merits of his plans offered Tuesday night, his presidency almost certainly seems destined to be defined by his stewardship of the war in Iraq.

His audience was much different this time as well, at least in terms of relative power. Democrats, who for six years had in essence served as the loyal opposition, now hold effective veto power over anything the president sends up to Capitol Hill. And instead of having his ever-applauding wingmen of Dennis Hastert, as House speaker, and Vice President Dick Cheney, the president had new House Speaker Nancy Pelosi staring over his left shoulder, her vibrant sea foam ensemble a vivid contrast to the dark suits who have held her post.

Bush began with a grace note about Pelosi, the first woman speaker to preside over the chamber during a State of the Union speech. Those words came easily. Others, though didn't seem to roll naturally off Bush's tongue, such was when he talked of the State of the Union as a "rite of custom" and spoke of "endeavors underway."

In body language, and in words, the Democrats were skeptics. And now they have the votes to go with it. This might well mark the night that the president formally ceded control of the national agenda.

Presidents use their State of the Union addresses to try to shape national priorities in their own vision. By using the first half of his address to talk about things close to home, the president signaled a new intention for the final two years of his term in office.

"…We are all held to the same standards and called to serve the same good purposes: to extend this nation's prosperity, to spend the people's money wisely, to solve problems, not leave them to future generations," the president said.

Many of his proposals, though, were studies in incrementalism. Wrong though they might be, there's hardly a national firestorm over earmarks, the dark-of-night practice by members of Congress of inserting pet projects into spending bills.

The early signs from Democrats evidenced their serious doubts about Bush's sincerity.

In many important respects, Bush really gave his State of the Union speech two weeks ago when he announced his plan to flood Iraq with about 21,500 additional troops to try to halt the sectarian violence. And on that score, the president must also shore up support among Republicans, including Sen. John Warner (R-Va.), a leading voice on military affairs who just a day ago rejected the Bush plan. Democrats seem to be ever more vocal in their opposition, a viewpoint forcefully expressed by Virginia's other senator, the newly elected Democrat, James Webb, who delivered his party's response.

Beyond specific proposals tied to issues, the president offered what in another context might be seen as a poetic appeal for bipartisanship. But if ever a twist was born of necessity this was it, and Democrats didn't seem to be in a reciprocal mood.

Webb seemed outwardly combative, particularly on Iraq, a conflict he opposed even before the first shots were fired. A decorated Marine in Vietnam, the son of a soldier, and the father of a Marine now serving in Iraq, Webb has a special credibility on military matters.

"This country has patiently endured a mismanaged war for nearly four years," Webb said.

"… The president took us into this war recklessly. …We are now, as a nation, held hostage to the predictable {ndash} and predicted {ndash} disarray that has followed." The barbed tenor of Webb's words sent a strong signal of just how much the center of gravity has shifted in Washington.

And how much the debate has shifted on Iraq. While the president was slow in coming to Iraq in his speech, he nonetheless devoted nearly half of his time to the war, with a now familiar narrative. That war, however, will occupy a much larger space in the history of his presidency.

Bush Asks For Time On Plan For Iraq (BSUN)

By Julie Hirschfeld Davis

The Baltimore Sun, January 24, 2007

WASHINGTON -- President Bush appealed to a recalcitrant Congress and an anxious public Tuesday night to give his Iraq troop increase a chance, seeking to revive his waning influence with plans to reduce gasoline usage and expand access to health coverage.

Bush offered a conciliatory tone and a suite of proposals on hot-button domestic issues for his first State of the Union before a Democratic Congress, one in which his aides said he was trying to be "gracious" and acknowledge a new dynamic on Capitol Hill.

"Congress has changed, but not our responsibilities," Bush said, after congratulating Democrats for their victories.

With his poll numbers sagging and war criticism swirling, the president called on Congress to work with him on issues of shared concern such as energy and health care. He renewed his calls for an immigration overhaul that would allow some illegal immigrants the chance to become citizens and a reauthorization of the "No Child Left Behind" education law.

"We are not the first to come here with government divided and uncertainty in the air. Like many before us, we can work through our differences and achieve big things for the American people," Bush said.

Singling out House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, Bush said he had the "high privilege and distinct honor" of being the first president to begin his annual address with the words "Madam Speaker."

DOJ_NMG_0120973

"In his day, the late Congressman Thomas D'Alesandro Jr., from Baltimore, Md., saw Presidents Roosevelt and Truman at this rostrum. But nothing could compare with the sight of his only daughter, Nancy, presiding to night as speaker of the House of Representatives," Bush said, turning to clasp hands with a beaming Pelosi as he began his 50-minute speech.

But the specter of Iraq hung heavily over the speech, which came a day after House and Senate Republicans signaled grave reservations about Bush's 21,500 troop build-up, adding their skeptical voices to the nearly unanimous chorus of Democrats who oppose the move.

The president acknowledged the doubts -- "I respect you, and the arguments you have made," he said -- but he made it clear that he was not about to change his mind.

"Whatever you voted for, you did not vote for failure," Bush said. "Our country is pursuing a new strategy in Iraq, and I ask you to give it a chance to work."

Democrats tapped Sen. James Webb of Virginia, a Vietnam veteran who has been a vocal critic of Bush's war strategy, to give their official response. He had scathing criticism for the president, who he said "took us into this war recklessly" and had bungled every aspect of it and who he blamed for presiding over an economy where "benefits are not being fairly shared" with the average worker.

Invoking the examples of Theodore Roosevelt and Dwight D. Eisenhower, two popular Republican presidents who he said took on steep economic and national security challenges, Webb called on Bush to turn things around on both fronts: "If he does, we will join him. If he does not, we will be showing him the way."

Republicans, for their part, said the president had provided a basis for bipartisan compromise on important issues.

Bush "outlined an agenda that addresses our nation's most pressing challenges and lays the groundwork for continued economic growth and prosperity," Sen. Jon . Kyl of Arizona, the Senate's No. 3 Republican, said in a statement.

The president "brought serious proposals to the table to begin the debate," Kyl added.

Rep. John A. Boehner of Ohio, the House Republican leader, said Bush had "laid out a series of ambitious proposals addressing the nation's priorities, and I hope Congress will give each a fair hearing. If Democrat leaders are going to oppose the president's agenda, they have an obligation to present their own alternatives."

Bush defended his choice to add troops amid raging sectarian violence in Baghdad and elsewhere in Iraq, first announced in a speech he gave two weeks ago from the White House.

"Our military commanders and I have carefully weighed the options. We discussed every possible approach," Bush said. "In the end, I chose this course of action because it provides the best chance for success."

He did not specifically mention the tangle of measures opposing the strategy that could come before Congress in the coming weeks and instead focused on articulating the stakes for Americans if the mission in Iraq were to fail, something he called a "nightmare scenario."

"Nothing is more important at this moment in our history than for America to succeed in the Middle East, to succeed in Iraq, and to spare the American people from this danger," Bush said.

Pelosi and Senate Majority Harry Reid of Nevada said they welcomed the bipartisan spirit in which Bush spoke but said he "continues to ignore the will of the country" on Iraq and promised an "up-or-down" vote on his plan.

Bush faced an audience that reflected a new and very different political reality from the one surrounding his past appearances in the well of the House: one where Democrats outnumbered Republicans in a crowd dotted with the faces of presidential aspirants of both parties, whose intense competition is already sucking attention and influence from the current White House occupant.

The president laid out a narrowly tailored set of domestic proposals designed to build on possible areas of compromise with Democrats, but it was fraught with risks and challenges.

Aiming to make a splash with a proposal to reduce gasoline consumption by 20 percent within 10 years, Bush called weaning the country off of oil a national-security imperative. He said he would do so by substantially increasing federal mandates for the amount of ethanol blended into fuel each year -- a step the White House said would reduce gasoline usage by 15 percent. In addition, Bush proposed raising fuel efficiency standards for cars, which could displace gas by an additional 5 percent.

Taking a new -- and somewhat controversial -- approach to expanding health insurance access, the president proposed making employer-provided coverage taxable, then creating a standard deduction of $15,000 per family or $7,500 per individual for those receiving it or purchasing their own private plan.

He said he would work with Health and Human Services Secretary Michael O. Leavitt to help states find ways to help uninsured patients afford private health coverage.

Bush plans to take his domestic proposals on the road starting Wednesday, with remarks on his energy initiatives in Wilmington, Del., and a roundtable on his health care proposals tomorrow in Lee's Summit, Mo.

DOJ_NMG_0120974

Many senior Democrats are adamantly opposed to Bush's new health care proposal, which would open at least some middle- class workers who receive generous employer-provided benefits -- the White House estimates about 20 percent -- to higher income taxes.

Rep. Pete Stark, a California Democrat who chairs a key health subcommittee, said he would not even hold hearings on the proposal, saying it would "make a bad problem worse."

Rep. Charles B. Rangel, a New York Democrat who chairs the Ways and Means Committee, said Bush "really should have done more to reach out to Democrats before his speech to see if we can come together, rather than simply exchange policies and press releases." <

Democrats also say Bush's energy plans do not go far enough in encouraging the development of alternative fuel sources and combating global warming, such as through mandatory limits on carbon-dioxide emissions.

Some in Bush's own party are dead-set against his immigration plan, which crumbled last year amid conservative opposition to an approach that was branded as "amnesty" for lawbreakers.

Still, there were obvious attempts to reach out to Democrats and entice them with policy prescriptions they support. Bush promoted the potential benefits of his energy initiatives, for instance, on curbing carbon dioxide emissions believed to be a main culprit in global warming -- a problem Democrats have vowed to address. Expanding the use of alternative fuels including ethanol also has substantial bipartisan appeal.

Many Democrats have backed Bush's immigration plan, which has a ready-made bipartisan coalition left over from last year's abortive attempt to enact a new law.

Bush "has been a leader on this issue, and I am hopeful that he will continue his efforts with members of his party so that we can pass legislation that that will solve the problem once and for all," said Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, a Massachusetts Democrat who was a main sponsor of a Senate-passed immigration plan that tracked closely with the president's ideas.

Some Democrats also have supported the president's educational reforms, though many have complained since their 2001 enactment that Bush has shortchanged them in his annual budgets, and they are sure to oppose his call to move poor children in underperforming schools to private schools.

The president's speech also was notable for what it did not include.

Burned by his disastrous Social Security overhaul attempt in 2005, Bush steered clear of offering any specific plan for tackling the growth of huge government entitlement programs -- Social Security, Medicare and Medicaid -- that are eating up unsustainably large portions of the federal budget each year. He said only that policymakers were "failing in [the] duty" to fix them and invited Congress to join with him in doing so.

A Shift In Power, Starting With 'Madam Speaker' (NYT)

By Kate Zernike

The New York Times, January 24, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 23 — From the president's very first words of the evening, it was clear how much had changed in the capital.

"Tonight, I have the high privilege and distinct honor to begin a speech with the words 'Madam Speaker,' " President Bush said Tuesday night in the House, setting off a wave of thunderous applause.

He referred, of course, to Representative Nancy Pelosi of California, the first woman to be speaker of the House and the first Democratic one of Mr. Bush's presidency, whom he greeted with a smile and a warm handshake. In preparation, her staff had coached Ms. Pelosi, an ardent critic of the president, to keep a neutral face, warning her that the cameras trained on him would capture any raised eyebrow or pursed lip.

But while Ms. Pelosi emphasized that she would be "respectful," her very choice of words earlier in the day signaled the new dynamic. "We always give the president a warm welcome as our guest in the chamber," she said, with the operative word, "guest."

The day was full of such reminders of how power has flowed away from the president in the new Washington. Not just because he spoke before a Democratic-led Congress for the first time in his presidency. Not just because his poll numbers are dismal. Not just because the mayor of the nation's capital had rejected the White House's invitation to sit with the first lady, Laura Bush, in her box and instead came as Ms. Pelosi's guest.

Even Republicans, while noting that it was "the president's day," as Senator John W. Warner of Virginia described it, yielded him only a share of the spotlight.

Mr. Warner and others were working with Democrats, whom six months ago they derided as Defeatocrats, on resolutions opposing Mr. Bush's proposal to increase the number of troops in Iraq. They had unveiled their resolutions in the days before the speech and planned to take them up the morning after.

DOJ_NMG_0120975

The guests in the boxes on either side of the chamber — Ms. Pelosi's on one, the first lady's on the other — were a tableau of change.

In years past, Mr. Bush invited Iraqis to make his case for the war, including Ahmed Chalabi, the exile-turned-advocate for the war who has now fallen from favor, as well as ordinary Iraqis with ink-stained fingers to prove that they had cast their ballots in their first democratic elections. This year, the only reminders of Iraq were a few soldiers, but the box was mostly filled with educators, entrepreneurs, an energy researcher and those with heartwarming 9/11 stories.

The Democrats, meanwhile, invited people who symbolized the legislation they have passed in their first two weeks in office: people who support embryonic stem cell research, those who fought for national security reforms after the Sept. 11 attacks, and labor leaders who backed an increase in the minimum wage.

The city itself offered reminders of how much has changed for Mr. Bush; in a boxy courtroom down the street, I. Lewis Libby Jr., the former chief of staff to Vice President Dick Cheney, was on trial on perjury charges stemming from the administration's efforts to promote its Iraq policy. Democrats had decided it not in their interests to look churlish during the speech. Lawmakers were advised to take their cues when to stand up and sit down, when to applaud from Ms. Pelosi, who sat on the dais next to Mr. Cheney, her junior by several months, but a reminder of an older generation of white male politicians. They exchanged few words as they stood waiting for the parade of lawmakers to assemble. At some points, she beat him in jumping to an ovation.

Her caucus said that they expected Ms. Pelosi to, in the words of Representative John B. Larson of Connecticut, show "poise, dignity, comity."

Appearances were obviously important to Ms. Pelosi, who had changed from the brown suit she had worn earlier in the day to a soft green one, which offered more contrast to her leather speaker's chair.

The noise level in the chamber seemed more muted, as Democrats exercised their new majority by sitting on their hands and staying off their feet during many applause lines. Republicans, who had promised to be "boisterous" to make up for their diminished numbers, greeted Mr. Bush with a series of "ho's!"

Democrats, in turn, shouted, "Hey!" and "Yeah!" when the president introduced Ms. Pelosi as the first female speaker. The president's congratulations to the "Democrat majority" won only polite applause from both sides The chamber erupted most unanimously and loudly for Wesley Autrey, the man who leapt into the tracks of a New York subway to save a fellow passenger. (The only ones not clapping, it appeared, were Mr. Autrey's two young daughters, who napped beside him in their bubblegum-colored dresses.)

Democrats leapt to their feet with the Republicans when Mr. Bush said he wanted to balance the federal budget, provide affordable health care, leave medical decisions to doctors and patients rather than bureaucrats, reduce gasoline consumption and increase alternative fuels.

But the applause was more Republican-only when Mr. Bush said he could balance the budget without raising taxes. Almost no Democrats clapped when he said his candidates for federal judgeships should get quick "up or down votes."

And there were lines that got little support from Mr. Bush's own side of the aisle. When he pledged to uphold the "tradition of the melting pot," the Republican House leader, Representative John A. Boehner of Ohio, grimaced and clapped just once. When Mr. Bush went further and vowed "comprehensive immigration reform" — code words for the plan the House rejected the Senate approved last year — two top House Republicans, Roy Blunt of Missouri and Adam Putnam of Florida, stayed seated, hands quiet.

And when the president addressed the issue that has dominated discussions on Capitol Hill in recent weeks, his proposed increase in troops in Iraq — there was little unanimity between the parties, or within them. Most Democrats remained seated as the president urged the chamber to "find our resolve." Senator Charles E. Schumer of New York cast a disapproving eye on those who stood, including Senators Joseph I. Lieberman and John Kerry. And while Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice sat forward in her seat and nodded as he described the increase in troops, Republicans who have criticized the plan, including Mr. Warner, stayed off their feet. Perhaps the most poignant commentary on the war and the plan to increase troops came in the Democratic response to the speech, given by Senator James Webb of Virginia. He had been chosen because, as Senator Harry Reid, the Democrats' leader, said, he understood what it meant to go to war. A former secretary of the Navy and ex-marine, his son is serving in Iraq.

During his speech, he held up a tattered photograph of his own father serving as an Air Force captain serving in Germany. He had carried it with him for most of his life, he said. And as a child, he had taken it to bed for three years as he prayed for his father's safe return.

Energy, Healthcare Are Major Points Of Bush's Address (LAT)

By Doyle Mcmanus And Maura Reynolds

The Los Angeles Times, January 24, 2007

Washington — President Bush, seeking to regain political ground lost to the new Democratic-led Congress, called Tuesday for bipartisan action on energy and other domestic issues while forcefully defending his unpopular decision to send more U.S. troops to Iraq.

Delivering his annual State of the Union Address before both houses of Congress with the nation's first woman speaker of the House, Rep. Nancy Pelosi (D-San Francisco), seated behind him, Bush acknowledged that millions of voters deserted his Republican Party in November. Still, he asserted that as president he could set the nation's agenda.

"We're not the first to come here with government divided and uncertainty in the air," he said. "Our citizens don't much care which side of the aisle we sit on, as long as we are willing to cross that aisle when there is work to be done."

But on the nation's most divisive issue — the war in Iraq — Bush stuck to his guns. "Many in this chamber understand that America must not fail in Iraq, because you understand that the consequences of failure would be grievous and far reaching," he said.

Yet before the president arrived at the Capitol, the Democrats' designated spokesman, in comments to reporters, brusquely dismissed Bush's plan to add 21,500 troops to Iraq as feckless.

"They don't have a plan," said Sen. Jim Webb (D-Va.), a Vietnam veteran whose upset election in November was key to giving the Democrats their majority in the Senate. "What they have put on the table is more a tactical adjustment."

Inside the House chamber, the atmosphere was cordial and polite. Bush drew cheers from members of both parties when, at the start of his speech, he noted that he was the first president in history to begin his State of the Union Address with the words "Madam Speaker."

In domestic policy, Bush presented a series of proposals that aides said were designed to appeal to Democrats as well as Republicans, with the aim of enticing at least some of the president's opponents to acknowledge that his ideas were worth considering.

He proposed cutting the nation's consumption of gasoline 20% in 10 years by requiring energy companies to use more alternative fuels such as ethanol, which can be produced from grains and grasses, and by raising fuel efficiency standards for automobiles.

He also expanded on a proposal he unveiled Saturday to make spending on health insurance tax deductible up to a ceiling of $15,000 per family, a plan that would make insurance more affordable for some but more expensive for others.

Democrats largely applauded Bush's energy proposal — Webb said they "look forward to working with the president and his party" to encourage alternative energy sources — but criticized his healthcare plan as a threat to traditional employer-provided insurance.

For Bush, the stakes went beyond those individual issues: he sought to demonstrate that in the final two years of his presidency, he can still command enough popular support to compel both Democrats and Republicans to pay him heed.

During his first six years in the White House, Bush enjoyed the support of a solidly Republican majority in the House and, for most of that time, in the Senate. He wielded both his personal popularity and his fundraising prowess as weapons to keep his party in line. But now he faces a Democratic congressional majority that wants to overturn many of his policies — at a time when his own popularity has been badly diminished by the war.

In his official response, Webb did not echo the president's notes about bipartisanship, saying simply: "We in the Democratic Party hope that this administration is serious about improving education and healthcare for all Americans, and addressing such domestic priorities as restoring the vitality of New Orleans."

Bush did not mention New Orleans or Hurricane Katrina, which devastated the city in 2005, in his speech.

Instead, Webb focused on two issues on which he said the parties stand "in contradiction" — the state of the nation's economy and Iraq.

"Wages and salaries for our workers are at all-time lows as a percentage of national wealth, even though the productivity of American workers is the highest in the world," he said.

On Iraq, he charged that Bush "took us into this war recklessly" despite warnings from many senior military officers.

"The war's costs to our nation have been staggering," Webb said. "The majority of the nation no longer supports the way this war is being fought; nor does the majority of our military. We need a new direction."

On energy, Bush's call for reducing gasoline consumption by 20% in the next decade rested on two specific initiatives:

He proposed raising the federal government standard for motor fuel to require the nation's energy supplies to include a much higher percentage of alternative fuels such as ethanol. The White House estimated that their proposed standard would reduce by 15% the amount of gasoline used to fuel cars.

DOJ_NMG_0120977

Second, Bush called on Congress to alter the federal fuel efficiency requirement for passenger cars from the average standard of 27.5 miles per gallon to about 34 miles per gallon. White House officials estimated that this change would reduce gasoline consumption by another 5% over 10 years.

Environmentalists welcomed the administration's support for reduced energy consumption. In earlier years, the Bush administration focused its energy policies almost exclusively on increasing U.S. energy production.

"This could be the breakthrough we have been waiting for on fuel economy," said David Friedman, research director at the Union of Concerned Scientists.

But Friedman, along with other environmentalists and some Democratic lawmakers, complained that Bush's proposal fell short of their hopes of broader action against global climate change.

On healthcare, Bush outlined a two-part strategy to reduce the number of Americans who do not have health insurance, now nearly 47 million. But he stopped short of making a commitment to covering all the uninsured.

The first part of his plan would create the new health insurance tax deduction of $15,000 for families and $7,500 for individuals. That would make it easier for people who don't get coverage through an employer to purchase their own private plan. But those with employer plans that have annual premiums worth more than the deduction would have to pay taxes on the difference.

An analysis by Senate Democrats estimated that more than 7 million people could face higher taxes as a result.

The second part of Bush's health plan calls on each state to design its own plan to cover uninsured residents. To support the states, the federal government would redirect a portion of the billions of dollars it now spends on care for the poor and uninsured.

For instance, instead of paying hospitals and other providers to treat the uninsured after they get sick, states could use the funds to help the poor obtain their own private coverage.

On immigration, Bush returned to familiar territory — reaffirming a proposal he first made in his 2004 State of the Union address, only to find that his ideas divided his own party.

The president stressed the need for a guest worker program to fill America's future labor needs. He also called for unspecified measures to "resolve the status of the illegal immigrants who are already in our country," without offering a path to automatic citizenship or "amnesty."

Advocates and opponents of Bush's vision for immigration reform said his comments did little to advance the debate, leaving it to Congress to hammer out the details.

There was no sign that Bush's comments swayed the GOP lawmakers who want to focus solely on tougher enforcement of immigration law and who last year thwarted efforts for the broader approach pushed by the president.

Rep. Dana Rohrabacher (R-Huntington Beach) harshly criticized Bush's position, saying he "has destroyed his own base."

On education, Bush cited the "No Child Left Behind" law he passed with Democratic help in the early stages of his presidency as an example of how the two parties can and should work together on domestic policy. He called on Congress to renew the law, which expires this year.

At the same time, Bush risked Democrats' ire by calling for a so-called voucher system that would permit parents to use government money to send their children to private schools. The president did not use the term "voucher," but he called for building on the success of No Child Left Behind "by giving families with children stuck in failing schools the right to choose something better."

Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.), the principal Democratic sponsor of the 2001 education law, charged that Bush's proposal would dilute the successes the president touted.

"Once again, he proposes siphoning crucial resources from our public schools — already reeling from increased requirements and budget cuts — for a private school voucher program," Kennedy said.

After outlining his domestic proposals, which aides described as the core of the speech, Bush offered a vigorous reiteration of his view of the war in Iraq and its relationship to the world-wide struggle against terrorism — evidence of the president's passion for the issue, which he has called his central mission.

The fight against terrorism "is more than a clash of arms — it is a decisive ideological struggle," he said. "And the security of our nation is in the balance."

Bush said that in the last two years, the forces of democratic change have advanced in the Middle East, from Lebanon, to Afghanistan and Iraq, only to see a violent reaction by those who oppose it.

"We have been sobered by the enemy's fierce reaction," he said.

He said the war in Iraq, with its sectarian fury, "is not the fight we entered in Iraq. But it is the fight we are in It is still within our power to shape the outcome of this battle. So let us find our resolve, and turn events toward victory."

DOJ_NMG_0120978

He said that he and U.S. military commanders had chosen the new strategy in Iraq after discussing "every possible approach."

"In the end, I chose this course of action because it provides the best chance of success," he said. "Many in this chamber understand that America must not fail in Iraq — because you understand that the consequences of failure would be grievous and far reaching."

Following tradition, each party invited special guests to watch the speech from the galleries and released lists of their names.

First Lady Laura Bush's guests included basketball star Dikembe Mutombo and New York City subway hero Wesley Autrey, who recently jumped onto the tracks to save a man suffering from a seizure from being hit by a train. Pelosi's guests included AFL-CIO President John Sweeney, Los Angeles Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa and several relatives of the victims of the Sept. 1, 2001 terrorist attacks.

Times staff writers Ricardo Alonso-Zaldivar, Stacy Anderson, Nicole Gaouette, Noam N.. Levey, Johanna Neuman, Adam Schreck and Richard Simon contributed to this report.

'We Must Not Fail In Iraq' (WT)

By Joseph Curl

The Washington Times, January 24, 2007

President Bush pleaded with Congress last night to give his new strategy for victory in the struggle in Iraq a chance because "America must not fail in Iraq."

Defeat in Iraq, he said, would be "grievous and far-reaching" because the fighting in Iraq is part of a broader struggle against Islamic extremists across the Middle East and stretching to the farther reaches of the globe.

He proposed wide-ranging domestic goals in his 50-minute State of the Union address, proposing to balance the budget with no new taxes over the next five years, slash gasoline consumption by 20 percent over the next 10 years, double the Strategic Petroleum Reserve to 1.5 billion barrels of oil over the next 20 years, offer tax benefits for Americans who buy their own health insurance, create a "temporary worker program" as the first step in comprehensive immigration reform and "remain a clear voice for freedom" in Cuba, Belarus and Burma.

The domestic goals were relatively modest, but the president was at his most impassioned in arguing that the war in Iraq must not be abandoned.

America faces "a generational struggle that will continue long after you and I have turned our duties over to others," he said. "That is why it is important to work together so our nation can see this great effort through.

"For all of us in this room, there is no higher responsibility than to protect the people of this country from danger. ... To win the war on terror, we must take the fight to the enemy. Both parties and both branches should work in close consultation."

Democrats, who now control both the House and the Senate, sat quietly as Republicans stood in a raucous ovation when the president declared "nothing is more important at this moment in our history than for America ... to succeed in Iraq." Vice President Dick Cheney often stood to applaud as House Speaker Nancy Pelosi remained seated, unsmiling.

Mr. Bush avoided a focus on major initiatives on contentious matters that divide the two parties, as he did in 2005, for example, when he made major Social Security reform a central theme of his speech, only to see it fail.

He focused instead on Democrat-friendly issues, calling on Congress to enact immigration reform this year, set up new health care tax breaks by 2009, increase the military by nearly 100,000 members in the next five years, double the Strategic Petroleum Reserve by 2027 and cut congressional earmarks in half in the next fiscal year.

As he did two weeks ago, the president said the only way to secure the war-torn country is to send in thousands of additional troops.

"Our military commanders and I have carefully weighed the options. We discussed every possible approach. In the end, I chose this course of action because it provides the best chance of success. Many in this chamber understand that America must not fail in Iraq -- because you understand that the consequences of failure would be grievous and far-reaching," he said.

Democrats, many of whom support resolutions of opposition to the president's plan, quickly repeated their opposition in the wake of the speech.

"The president took us into this war recklessly," said Sen. James H. Webb of Virginia, who has been in office less than a month, who delivered the Democratic response. "The majority of the nation no longer supports the way this war is being fought; nor does the majority of our military. We need a new direction," including "strong regionally based diplomacy" and "a formula that will in short order allow our combat forces to leave Iraq."

The president urged Congress to unite in the struggle against international terrorism as Americans did in the days after the September 11 terrorist attacks.

DOJ_NMG_0120979

"We went into this largely united -- in our assumptions and in our convictions. And whatever you voted for, you did not vote for failure. Our country is pursuing a new strategy in Iraq, and I ask you to give it a chance to work," Mr. Bush said. "And I ask you to support our troops in the field, and those on their way."

Mr. Bush acknowledged that terrorists have made inroads across the Middle East and said sectarian violence and insurgents have outstripped American forces in Iraq.

"This is not the fight we entered in Iraq, but it is the fight we are in. Every one of us wishes this war were over and won, yet it would not be like us to leave our promises unkept, our friends abandoned, and our own security at risk."

He said the United States cannot withdraw.

"If American forces step back before Baghdad is secure, the Iraqi government would be overrun by extremists on all sides. ... For America, this is a nightmare scenario. On this day, at this hour, it is still within our power to shape the outcome of this battle. So let us find our resolve, and turn events toward victory."

Mr. Bush sought at several points to soothe harsh partisan feelings, opening his address by noting the ascendancy of House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, the first woman to head either chamber of Congress.

It was "high privilege and distinct honor," he said, echoing Mrs. Pelosi's words introducing him, to be the first president ever to start the address by thanking "Madame Speaker." As the gathered lawmakers and officials gave a standing ovation, Mr. Bush turned from his lectern and shook Mrs. Pelosi's hand.

At that moment, Rep. Stephanie Tubbs Jones, Ohio Democrat, flexed her arms in the boxer's stance, as Mrs. Pelosi did at her swearing-in week.

After a rare round of bipartisan applause, Mr. Bush reached out to Democrats, challenging the new majority to work with Republicans to get things done.

"Congress has changed, but our responsibilities have not," the president said. "We are not the first to come here with government divided and uncertainty in the air. Like many before us, we can work through our differences and achieve big things for the American people."

Despite growing rancor between the two parties -- Mrs. Pelosi last week accused the president of swiftly enacting his "surge" plan to prevent opponents on Capitol Hill from blocking the strategy, words the White House labeled "poisonous" -- Mr. Bush said that "both parties and both branches should work in close consultation."

"Our citizens don't much care which side of the aisle we sit on -- as long as we are willing to cross that aisle when there is work to be done," he said.

Mr. Bush urged the congressmen to increase funding for his signature No Child Left Behind Act and reconsider school vouchers, urging Congress to give "families with children stuck in failing schools the right to choose some place better."

He repeated his rejection of new taxes, touted the booming economy -- in its 41st straight month of job growth, he noted -- and vowed to erase the federal deficit within five years.

Mr. Bush won far more applause from Democrats than from Republicans when he called for a "comprehensive" immigration bill and when he called for action to combat global warming. The entire Democratic side of the room stood for both, while many Republicans remained sitting and some of them shook their heads in seeming dismay.

Cameras in the chamber cut away to Rep. Tom Tancredo, the Colorado Republican who leads the House immigration caucus. Mr. Tancredo shook his head "no."

The biggest applause line of the night for Mr. Bush among Republicans was his call for an up-or-down vote in the Senate on his judicial nominees. But on the Democratic side just two stood -- Sens. Ben Nelson of Nebraska and Joe Lieberman of Connecticut, an independent who caucuses with the Democrats.

Mr. Bush made only a brief undetailed call for reform of Social Security, Medicare and Medicaid. "Somehow we have not found it in ourselves to act," he said. "So let us work together and do it now."

One Republican-friendly feature of previous State of the Union addresses was notably absent. Mr. Bush made no mention of efforts to amend the Constitution against homosexual "marriage" by defining the union as joining a man and a woman.

In keeping the tradition, one Cabinet member -- last night it was Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales -- did not attend the speech in case of a major attack on the Capitol.

The White House sought to highlight the president's energy initiative, holding an afternoon briefing for reporters featuring senior administration officials and lifting the usual embargo on specific proposals in the address. "It is in our vital interest to diversify America's energy supply, and the way forward is through technology," he said.

According to the president's proposal, Americans could cut gasoline consumption by 20 percent within 10 years by sharply increasing the amount of ethanol and other alternative fuels that the government mandates must be blended into the fuel supply.

Under current law, fuel blenders must use 7.5 billion gallons of renewable fuel annually by 2012; Mr. Bush wants to increase that to 35 billion gallons by 2017, which would achieve a 15 percent cut. The president's plan also calls for raising the fuel economy standards for passenger cars, a plan that Mr. Bush has proposed in the past but failed to win from Congress. Doing so would reduce annual gasoline consumption by 8.5 billion gallons, a further 5 percent reduction.

DOJ_NMG_0120980

"Achieving these ambitious goals will dramatically reduce our dependence on foreign oil, but not eliminate it," he said.

Mr. Bush, who last year declared in his State of the Union that Americans are "addicted to oil," again urged lawmakers to move forward to reduce U.S. reliance on foreign petroleum.

Another major initiative in Mr. Bush's speech called for tax breaks for employer-financed health care benefits, analogous to the current child allowance. Instead of paying for health insurance with wages that already had been taxed, persons could pay for a significant part of their health insurance -- $15,000 per family and $7,500 for individuals -- with pre-tax dollars.

The White House said 80 percent of workers with health insurance through their jobs would see a tax cut as a result of the change. Still, analysts say some 20 percent could see a tax increase, including those workers whose health insurance cost more than the standard deduction.

As evidence of the partisanship in the House, Rep. Pete Stark, California Democrat and chairman of the Ways and Means health subcommittee, said he would not even consider holding hearings on the plan.

Other proposals in Mr. Bush's speech included a call for "new resources" to expand the No Child Left Behind education act, which requires testing in elementary and middle schools to make sure students are learning. The president wants to expand the program and is seeking to give poor students the right to private-school vouchers.

The administration's proposal calls for giving vouchers to students in schools that repeatedly fail to meet standards set by the federal law, but Democrats blocked that idea when the bill was drafted five years ago.

Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, Massachusetts Democrat and new chairman of the Senate committee overseeing education, said again yesterday that he would work to keep vouchers out of the education law.

·Stephen Dinan contributed to this report.

President Strays Into Democrats' Priorities, Themes (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman And Michael A. Fletcher

Washington Post, January 24, 2007

In an overture to the new majority in Congress, President Bush strayed into Democratic territory last night with proposals on health insurance, gasoline efficiency and even the first real tax increase of his presidency.

Rhetorically, the shift was remarkable. The language he used to sell his health plan dwelled on the plight of the uninsured and on a tax on the well-to-do, a pitch that Republicans have dismissed as class warfare. His energy plan asked for new authority to raise automotive fuel-efficiency standards, a regular theme of the Democratic Party's liberal wing.

But senior Democrats for the most part responded with icy disdain, saying that Bush may be on their turf, but that he continues to clutch his conservative, free-market principles with little regard to the radically changed political terrain he faces.

Democratic displeasure stemmed from both the substance of the proposals Bush laid out and the way he did it: Fully formed, without prior consultation and without an acknowledgment of who controls Capitol Hill. If White House officials want to work with Democrats to reach a compromise, then take credit, that would be fine, Democrats said yesterday, before the speech. But they blanched at being dictated to on policies vital to their constituents.

"For some people to think this is bringing us together, I don't get it," said House Ways and Means Committee Chairman Charles B. Rangel (D-N.Y.), whose panel will decide the fate of Bush's centerpiece proposal on health insurance and taxes. "To be honest with you, I feel sorry for the guy. It seems to me somebody ought to talk to the guy and see if he can get some goodwill going for him down here."

In calling for an end to the Iraq war and a new emphasis on economic equality, Sen. James Webb (Va.) implored Bush to embrace those Democratic priorities. "If he does, we will join him," Webb said in the Democratic response to the State of the Union address. "If he does not, we will be showing him the way."

White House officials said they are mindful of the new political order in Washington. "Like many before us, we can work through our differences and achieve big things for the American people. Our citizens don't much care which side of the aisle we sit on -- as long as we are willing to cross that aisle when there is work to be done," Bush said in his speech.

But Democrats said they did not see much movement toward them beyond the rhetoric. At particular issue is Bush's proposal to encourage the purchase of individual health insurance policies through tax deductions financed by a new tax on the value of employer-provided health insurance. Under the plan, the government would allow each family to deduct $15,000 a year from its taxable income to offset the cost of health insurance -- and those who file their tax returns as individuals would be allowed $7,500 each. To pay for this tax break, the value of employer-provided health insurance exceeding the deductions would be taxed as income.

DOJ_NMG_0120981

White House officials framed the proposal as a progressive plan to help cover the uninsured by taxing those with Cadillac-style health coverage, primarily well-paid workers and executives.

But Democrats did not buy it. Instead, they said they view it as a continuation of Republican efforts to drive workers away from employer-provided health insurance and into the free market. Even some conservatives questioned how it could help the uninsured. The conservative Tax Foundation said 53 percent of Americans without health insurance pay nothing in federal income taxes and would, therefore, get nothing from a tax break on such taxes.

Low-income workers would get a reduction in their Social Security and Medicare taxes, but probably not as large as the White House suggests, Democrats said. Half of those payroll taxes are paid by workers and half by employers. To reach their generous assessment of the proposal for the working poor, White House economists assume that employers would pass on their payroll tax cut to their workers in the form of raises.

"C'mon," scoffed Rep. Pete Stark (D-Calif.), chairman of the House Ways and Means subcommittee on health.

Democrats did marvel that Bush proposed a significant tax boost, but they were not about to embrace what they called a tax increase on the middle class while the president was simultaneously calling for Congress to make permanent the first-term cuts on income and inheritance taxes on the super-rich. The White House said its proposal would affect the highest 20 percent of incomes, starting at around $75,000 to $80,000 a year. That threshold is well above the U.S. median income, but to senior Democrats from high-cost West Coast and Northeastern districts, those are their constituents' incomes.

"I'm all for progressive tax policy," Stark said, " but they are being rather selective here."

Perhaps the biggest problem Bush faces in Congress is the question of trust. Rep. Chris Van Hollen (Md.), the chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, called it a "large credibility gap."

"He's good at identifying the challenges we face as a country," he said. "But he has failed to enact concrete solutions. The challenges he talked about tonight he's talked about for the past six years."

The president's call for an extension of the landmark No Child Left Behind education law might have been expected to be well-received by one of the its authors, House Education and Labor Committee Chairman George Miller (D-Calif.). But in an era of no-growth domestic budgets, Miller was not impressed.

"The task of renewing the law will be made much more difficult if the president's budget fails to provide a substantial increase in funding for schools to carry out their responsibilities under the law," Miller warned.

Bush Challenges Foes Of Iraq Troop Plan (AP)

By Terence Hunt

AP, January 24, 2007

A politically weakened President Bush implored a skeptical Congress Tuesday night to embrace his unpopular plan to send more U.S. troops to Iraq, saying it represents the best hope in a war America must not lose. "Give it a chance to work," he said.

Facing a political showdown with Democrats and Republicans alike, Bush was unyielding on Iraq in his annual State of the Union address. He also sought to revive his troubled presidency with proposals to expand health insurance coverage and to slash gasoline consumption by 20 percent in a decade.

Democrats — and even some Republicans — scoffed at his Iraq policy. Unmoved by Bush's appeal, Democrats said the House and Senate would vote on resolutions of disapproval of the troop buildup.

"We need a new direction," said freshman Sen. Jim Webb, picked by the Democrats to deliver their TV response. "The majority of the nation no longer supports the way this war is being fought; nor does the majority of our military," said Webb, a Vietnam veteran opposed to Bush's invasion of Iraq.

Republican Sen. Norm Coleman of Minnesota, also took issue with Bush. "I can't tell you what the path to success is, but it's not what the president has put on the table," he said.

It was a night of political theater as Bush went before the first Democratic-controlled Congress in a dozen years with his lowest approval ratings in polls.

Democratic Speaker Nancy Pelosi of California, the first woman to lead the House, sat over Bush's shoulder, next to Vice President Dick Cheney. Reaching out to the Democrats, Bush opened with a tribute to Pelosi and paused to shake her hand. He also asked for prayers for Democratic Sen. Tim Johnson, hospitalized for more than a month after suffering a brain hemorrhage, and Republican Georgia Rep. Charlie Norwood, suffering from cancer.

The speech audience included up to a dozen House and Senate members who have announced they are running for president or are considered possible contenders.

Bush divided his 49-minute address between domestic and foreign issues, but the war was topic No. 1.

Pelosi set the tone for Democrats. She sat silently and did not applaud as Bush warned of high stakes in Iraq and said American forces must not step back before Baghdad is secure.

DOJ_NMG_0120982

With Congress poised to deliver a stinging rebuke on his troop increase, he made a personal plea to lawmakers.

"I have spoken with many of you in person. I respect you and the arguments you made," Bush said. "We went into this largely united, in our assumptions and in our convictions. And whatever you voted for, you did not vote for failure."

"Our country is pursuing a new strategy in Iraq and I ask you to give it a chance to work," Bush said. "And I ask you to support our troops in the field and those on their way."

Pelosi and Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid gave Bush a swift answer. "While the president continues to ignore the will of the country, Congress will not ignore this president's failed policy," they said in a joint statement after his address. "His plan will receive an up-or-down vote in both the House and Senate, and we will continue to hold him accountable for changing course in Iraq."

Bush said the Iraq war had changed dramatically with the outbreak of sectarian warfare and reprisals.

"This is not the fight we entered in Iraq, but it is the fight we are in," the president said. "Every one of us wishes that this war were over and won. Yet it would not be like us to leave our promises unkept, our friends abandoned and our own security at risk.

"Ladies and gentlemen: On this day, at this hour, it is still within our power to shape the outcome of this battle," the president said. "Let us find our resolve and turn events toward victory."

Key Republicans have joined Democrats in drafting resolutions of opposition to the plans he announced two weeks ago to send an additional 21,500 troops to Iraq. Bush said his approach had the best chance to succeed, but clearly many lawmakers — and overwhelming majority of Americans — disagreed.

"Many in this chamber understand that America must not fail in Iraq because you understand that the consequences of failure would be grievous and far reaching," the president said. "If American forces step back before Baghdad is secure, the Iraqi government would be overrun by extremists on all sides."

In such a case, he forecast "an epic battle," Shiite extremists backed by Iran against Sunni extremists aided by al-Qaida and supporters of Saddam Hussein's government, leading to violence that could spread across the Middle East. "For America, this is a nightmare scenario," Bush said.

On domestic matters, he pressed Congress to help find ways to overhaul entitlements such as Social Security, Medicare and Medicaid before they impose huge problems for future generations.

"Somehow we have not found it in ourselves to act," he said. "So let us work together and do it now."

On immigration, too, the president made a plea to lawmakers that he has made before, seeking comprehensive changes including a guest worker program, that go beyond tougher border controls. Members of his own party were the main obstacle to success in that area — a fact Bush acknowledged even as he pressed for a better result now than Capitol Hill is run by Democrats more amenable to his ideas.

"Convictions run deep in this Capitol when it comes to immigration," he said. "Let us have a serious, civil and conclusive debate."

Bush said his energy proposals would cut American imports by the equivalent of 75 percent of the oil coming from the Middle East. His prescription, as always, relied primarily on market incentives and technological advances — not government mandates.

"America is on the verge of technological breakthroughs that will enable us to live our lives less dependent on oil," he said. "These technologies will help us become better stewards of the environment — and they will help us to confront the serious challenge of global climate change."

Bush called for changing the tax code to encourage more people not covered by medical insurance to buy a plan, and to discourage others from keeping the most costly health care plans.

Under Bush's proposal, employer-financed health care benefits would be considered taxable income after a deduction of $15,000 for families and $7,500 for individuals. Those buying their own plan would get the same deductions on their taxes.

The White House said 80 percent of workers with health insurance through their jobs would see a tax cut as a result of the change. But about 20 percent would see a tax increase — those workers whose health insurance cost more than the standard deduction.

"With this reform, more than 100 million men, women and children who are now covered by employer-provided insurance will benefit from lower tax bills," Bush said. "At the same time, this reform will level the playing field for those who do not get health insurance through their job."

The administration sought to make Bush's energy initiatives — in particular a 20 percent cut in gasoline usage by 2017 — an eye-catching centerpiece of his address, the one major element not revealed until hours before the speech. "It is in our vital interest to diversify America's energy supply, and the way forward is through technology," Bush said.

DOJ_NMG_0120983

The cut would be achieved primarily through a sharp escalation in the amount of ethanol and other alternative fuels that the government mandates must be blended into the fuel supply. The rest would come from raising fuel economy standards for passenger cars, a plan that Bush has proposed in the past but failed to win from Congress.

Acknowledging that some would say such a drastic increase in alternative fuels is unrealistic, the White House argued that the new mandate — which would need approval from Congress — would spur investments in the industry and give technological research a boost.

While setting cutback goals, the president spurned appeals from environmentalists and some major corporations to impose mandatory ceilings on U.S. greenhouse gas emissions in hopes of slowing climate change.

Bush Reaches Out To Skeptical Democrats (MCT)

By Ron Hutcheson

McClatchy Newspapers, January 24, 2007

WASHINGTON - Facing a Democratic-controlled - and hostile - Congress for the first time, a politically weak President Bush bowed to political reality in his State of the Union address Tuesday night by advancing domestic policies that he hoped might win bipartisan support.

Little consensus was apparent, however.

The president proposed to boost alternative fuels, reduce auto emissions and offer a tax break for buying health insurance - unless your employer buys an expensive plan for you, and then Bush would make you pay tax on it.

On the dominant issue of the day, the president was unyielding on Iraq and his plan to send 21,500 more U.S. troops there, despite bipartisan congressional opposition and polls showing that a large majority of Americans are against it.

"On this day, at this hour, it is still within our power to shape the outcome of this battle. So let us find our resolve and turn events toward victory," Bush told a joint session of Congress in the packed chamber of the House of Representatives.

"Our country is pursuing a new strategy in Iraq - and I ask you to give it a chance to work."

Yet the war is so divisive that it may overwhelm chances for bipartisan compromise on anything, despite Bush's invitation to try.

"We are not the first to come here with government divided and uncertainty in the air. Like many before us, we can work through our differences, and achieve big things for the American people," Bush said.

Democrats reacted with skepticism and, on some issues, outright hostility.

On Iraq, "the majority of the nation no longer supports the way this war is being fought; nor does the majority of our military. We need a new direction," said Sen. James Webb, D-Va., delivering his party's official reaction to Bush's speech.

On health insurance, Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., said: "Punish people because they have good insurance? I don't think they would agree with that. Taxing people who have health insurance doesn't make sense to me."

The one major initiative where Bush won what appeared to be genuine bipartisan response was his call to revive his stalled plan to overhaul immigration law, including a guest worker program and a path to citizenship for illegal immigrants here now. That won a standing ovation.

Still, that was the exception.

On prospects for bipartisan partnership, Rep. Charles Rangel, D-N.Y., chairman of the powerful House Ways and Means Committee, said, "I appreciate the president's visit tonight, but he really should have done more to reach out to Democrats before his speech to see if we can come together, rather than simply exchange policies and press releases."

While Republican leaders rallied behind the president, even some of their rank-and-file backbench GOP lawmakers seemed hard-pressed to cheer.

"He's facing a legislative body that's changed as a result of his policies, in large part because of his way of running the worldwide war on terror, especially in Iraq," said Rep. George Radanovich, R-Calif.

Bush Defends Iraq Plan To Skeptical Congress, Nation: 'America Must Not Fail' (USAT)

By David Jackson

USA Today, January 24, 2007

WASHINGTON — President Bush appealed Tuesday to a skeptical Congress to give his new Iraq plan "a chance to work" and called on lawmakers to help expand health insurance coverage and reduce gasoline use by 20% over the next decade.

In his first State of the Union address before a Congress controlled by Democrats, Bush said failing in Iraq would create "a nightmare scenario" and urged support for his plan to boost U.S. troop levels by 21,500. The Senate Foreign Relations Committee begins debate today on a resolution opposing the Bush proposal.

STATE OF THE UNION: The speech's key points | Full speech text

DOJ_NMG_0120984

"On this day, at this hour, it is still within our power to shape the outcome of this battle," Bush said. "Let us find our resolve and turn events toward victory."

With his popularity and Americans' support for the Iraq war both sagging, Bush devoted less than half his speech to domestic initiatives that he believes Democrats can accept. Among them: reducing U.S. dependence on foreign oil, tax breaks for health insurance, and flexible education rules.

"Our citizens don't much care which side of the aisle we sit on — as long as we're willing to cross that aisle when there's work to be done," he said.

Sen. Jim Webb, D-Va., whose victory in November helped oust Republicans from power, said Bush's domestic proposals fall short and his plan for Iraq holds the USA "hostage" to chaos and disarray.

"The majority of the nation no longer supports the way this war is being fought," said Webb, a Vietnam War veteran chosen to give the formal Democratic response. "We need a new direction."

Bush's plan for Iraq, unveiled two weeks ago, has also been criticized by Republicans such as Sen. John Warner of Virginia.

The president did not mention the Senate resolution but said the boost in troop strength was necessary to stabilize a country riven by sectarian violence. The plan "provides the best chance of success," Bush said, while failure in Iraq would strengthen terrorists who want to strike the USA again.

On energy policy, Bush said Americans' dependence on imported oil "leaves us more vulnerable to hostile regimes and to terrorists." The president said increasing the supply of alternative fuels will help to reach his goal for cutting gas consumption over 10 years. He also asked Congress to help improve fuel-efficiency standards for passenger vehicles.

Other issues:

·Immigration. Bush again asked Congress to send him a bill that includes more opportunities for temporary workers from other countries. "Convictions run deep," he said about "guest workers" and immigration. He urged "a serious, civil and conclusive debate."

·Military size. He asked Congress to authorize an increase in the active-duty Army and Marine Corps by 92,000 troops over five years.

·Entitlements. Bush again urged Congress to work on addressing the long-term solvency of Social Security and controlling the costs of Medicare and Medicaid. He did not offer specifics.

Tone Not As Bold As A Year Ago (USAT)

By Susan Page

USA Today, January 24, 2007

WASHINGTON — A year ago, President Bush bragged in his State of the Union address that the United States was "writing a new chapter in the story of self-government" across the Middle East and pledged to "seek the end of tyranny in our world."

On Tuesday night, the president's tone was less confident and his promises considerably more constrained. He pleaded for patience from lawmakers who are moving toward resolutions that urge a new course in Iraq and oppose his decision to commit another 21,500 U.S. troops to the fight.

WARTIME ADDRESSES: A look at speeches by previous presidents

Sitting behind him was a new speaker of the House, Democrat Nancy Pelosi of California, elected to the post after Republicans lost control of Congress in November elections driven in large part by opposition to the war.

As he begins his seventh year in office, Bush finds his presidency held hostage to a war that has drained his political standing and divided his party. Amid bipartisan criticism and a dismal 34% approval rating in the latest USA TODAY/Gallup Poll, some question whether Congress and the public are open to hearing Bush's case on Iraq or the domestic initiatives that he sought to spotlight in his speech.

Wartime presidents from Franklin Roosevelt during World War II to Lyndon Johnson during Vietnam have found domestic proposals difficult to deliver, says Robert Dallek, a presidential historian and author of Flawed Giant: Lyndon Johnson and His Times. "Energy is very hard to focus" during war, he says. "War, especially a war that's going badly, is an all-encompassing concern."

'Achieve big things'

Bush called for reducing Americans' gasoline consumption by 20% in 10 years, providing a path to legal status for illegal immigrants now in this country and modifying the tax code to help those without health insurance buy it. "We can work through our differences and achieve big things for the American people," he declared.

DOJ_NMG_0120985

His proposals deal with some of the priorities of the new congressional majority — including global climate change and the problems of the 46 million who are uninsured — although Bush's prescriptions were dismissed as inadequate or ill-conceived by some Democrats. Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid of Nevada, for one, called Bush's health care plan "ridiculous."

Still, scoring progress on these domestic issues would bolster Bush's legacy, now defined by the war. It also would demonstrate that he still can command the powers of his office during the final two years of his tenure.

"He has a very attractive, very aggressive proposal on health coverage that has been long overdue," says Michael Franc, a former Republican House aide now at the conservative Heritage Foundation. "But I don't think anyone is going to listen, unfortunately."

The White House is calculating that the president can tap Americans' desire for action on the domestic front even as the war continues to rage. In a nationwide poll by the non-partisan Pew Research Center released Monday, there was an almost even split between those who said Bush should focus on domestic issues or foreign ones.

"There's a great appetite to hear about domestic issues," says Andrew Kohut, director of the center. And for bipartisanship, even among Democrats: 4 in 10 said their party leaders should "work with President Bush" rather than "stand up" to him.

Bush opened his speech with a tribute to Pelosi as the first woman to be elected speaker of the House. As his speech continued, however, there was a visible partisan divide between the Republicans to his left, the Democrats to his right.

That was particularly true when, near the midpoint of the 49-minute address, he turned from domestic issues to Iraq. When he said U.S. forces couldn't withdraw until Baghdad was secure, many Republicans rose and applauded while Pelosi and most Democrats sat in their seats, silent.

Russell Riley, a presidential scholar at the University of Virginia's Miller Center of Public Affairs, says members of Congress "will be inclined to pay more attention to the message that they got in November from the electorate than the message coming from the well of the House" by Bush.

In surveys, Americans overwhelmingly oppose the increase in U.S. force levels. Most now say the invasion of Iraq was a mistake.

Bush was braced for a mixed reception, aides said beforehand.

"Our country is pursuing a new strategy in Iraq, and I ask you to give it a chance to work," he said almost plaintively. "And I ask you support our troops in the field — and those on the way."

Rallying support

In a State of the Union nearly 200 years ago, James Madison argued that British aggression demanded "manly resistance" and justified the War of 1812. Since then, wartime presidents have used the annual addresses to rally support and chastise critics. Many of them, even Franklin Roosevelt, asked for patience when war fatigue rose.

"If we put forth our best efforts this year — and next year — we can be 'over the hump' in our effort to build strong defenses," Harry Truman said in 1952. He added, "This is a time for courage, not for grumbling and mumbling."

In his 1966 State of the Union, Lyndon Johnson said there was "no cause to doubt the American commitment" in Vietnam. He focused on promoting his Great Society domestic initiatives. A year later, he spoke at length about both, acknowledging, "Abroad, the question is whether we have the staying power to fight a very costly war."

And in 1968, Johnson promised that the United States would "persevere" in Vietnam. Two weeks later, however, the Tet Offensive crystallized opposition to the war. Beset by protests, his popularity sagging, Johnson unexpectedly decided not to run for re-election.

Dallek sees parallels between the situation Bush faces in Iraq and the one that Johnson faced in Vietnam — including efforts by Johnson and his successor, Richard Nixon, to push the government that the United States was backing to adopt reforms and take charge, freeing U.S. troops to come home. "The echoes are so powerful," he says.

The Speech's Key Points And Their Context (USAT)

USA Today, January 24, 2007

What the president said on the critical issues of the coming year.

Balanced budget

What President Bush said: "In the coming weeks, I will submit a budget that eliminates the federal deficit within the next five years. I ask you to make the same commitment. Together, we can restrain the spending appetite of the federal government and balance the federal budget."

Context: Bush inherited a $128 billion budget surplus. Within three years, a recession and the war on terrorism turned it into a $412 billion deficit. Rising tax receipts fueled by record corporate profits have since driven the deficit down to $248 billion.

Getting back to balance won't be easy if the president is realistic about the future costs of the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan and the impact of extending his tax cuts, which he vows to do. Bush will be long gone before any balanced budget is enacted.

DOJ_NMG_0120986

Even if balance is achieved, the long-term growth of Medicare, Medicaid and Social Security threaten much larger deficits in the future.

Economy

What Bush said: "A future of hope and opportunity begins with a growing economy — and that is what we have. Unemployment is low, inflation is low, and wages are rising."

Context: The economy, while slowing, continues to be a bright spot for the president. Americans' earnings are keeping ahead of inflation, interest rates have stabilized, the jobless rate remains low at 4.5%, and more jobs have been created for 40 consecutive months. Gasoline prices are down from their summer peak; health care inflation, while high, is the lowest since 1999. Tax collections are running 8.2% higher than a year ago.

Whether this is tied to Bush's tax cuts in 2001 and 2003 remains in dispute. Bush says he can balance the budget by 2012 while making all his tax cuts permanent. Democrats are focused on the uneven nature of the recovery, which has left lower-income families behind. They want to redirect spending on tax cuts and the Iraq war to their priorities, such as health care, education and alternative energy. Expect a major clash of priorities over the 2008 budget, which Bush will unveil Feb. 5.

Education

What Bush said: "Five years ago we rose above partisan differences to pass the No Child Left Behind Act … And because we acted, students are performing better." Bush wants the act reauthorized.

Context: No Child Left Behind, Bush's ambitious 2002 education overhaul law, remains one of his few bipartisan successes. It expires this year, and Congress must reauthorize it. That effort could meet stiff resistance as lawmakers try to hold it off until after the 2008 election.

Members on both sides of the aisle have good reasons to wait: Many Democrats don't like the law's annual tests and punishments for failing schools. They don't want to give Bush a victory on education, traditionally a Democratic issue. Republican lawmakers in states such as Utah and Virginia have criticized the law for allowing too much government intervention.

Ethics

What Bush said: "Let us work together to reform the budget process … expose every earmark to the light of day and to a vote in Congress … and cut the number and cost of earmarks at least in half by the end of this session."

Context: Congress has required more public disclosure of earmarks, as the special projects that lawmakers quietly insert in spending bills are known. Lawmakers have not called for reductions; many defend the practice because they know best what their states and districts need.

Bush wants to go further; he even wants line-item veto power to eliminate earmarks, an idea Democratic leaders reject.

The use of earmarks has mushroomed in recent years — with $67 billion in taxpayer money going to these special projects in fiscal year 2006 alone, according to the Congressional Research Service.

Global disease

What Bush said: "We hear the call to take on the challenges of hunger, poverty and disease — and that is precisely what America is doing."

Context: In 2003, Bush announced a five-year, $15 billion initiative to combat AIDS, the largest international health campaign to target a single disease. The program targets 15 countries that are home to about half the world's 39 million people who are HIV-positive. Bush has also called for Congress to reauthorize the $2.1 billion Ryan White Care Act, the largest federal program for people with HIV/AIDS.

The White House says that before the program, 50,000 people were receiving drug treatment for AIDS, while today, more than 800,000 people are receiving medications. Democrats have acknowledged the treatment success of the 2003 Bush initiative but have complained that it focuses too much on promoting abstinence in trying to prevent HIV infections.

Bush announced a $1.2 billion, five-year plan in 2005 to control malaria in Africa. The goal of the initiative is to reduce malaria deaths by half in 15 target countries.

Homeland security

What Bush said: "For all the people in this room, there is no higher responsibility than to protect the people of this country from danger."

Context: Immigration reform and border security will continue to be hot political issues in 2007 and beyond.

House Democrats have said they will reconsider legislation passed last year to build 700 miles of fence along the Mexican border. Government auditors have said the project could cost $30 billion. The Homeland Security Department, meanwhile, plans a new "virtual fence" that would help Border Patrol agents with cameras, sensors and other high-tech equipment.

Beyond the border, House Democrats this month passed a sweeping bill that would require inspections of all cargo on passenger airplanes and screening of cargo containers before they're loaded on ships headed to U.S. ports. The White House and some senators in both parties have questioned how the government will pay for the inspections.

DOJ_NMG_0120987

Immigration

What Bush said: "Extending hope and opportunity in our country requires an immigration system worthy of America, with laws that are fair and borders that are secure. … Let us have a serious, civil, and conclusive debate — so that you can pass, and I can sign, comprehensive immigration reform into law.

Context: Immigration is one issue where Democrats and Bush are likely to reach a deal. Bush has been pressing since taking office for a major overhaul of immigration laws that would include giving legal status to an estimated 12 million people now living in the country illegally.

Last year, the Senate approved a bipartisan bill that met the president's requirements, but House Republicans blocked it. Now Democrats are in charge and are making it a priority.

Bipartisan negotiations already are underway to begin writing a bill that would beef up border security, create a secure ID system to help employers determine who can legally work for them and strengthen penalties on those who hire illegal employees. Still to be determined: how many of those now here illegally will be given a chance at citizenship, and how many conditions they will have to meet.

Iran

What Bush said: "The United Nations has imposed sanctions on Iran and made it clear that the world will not allow … Tehran to acquire nuclear weapons."

Context: The Bush administration has intensified pressure on Iran to stop trying to make nuclear fuel and to stop backing Iraqis who target U.S. troops. European nations, such as France and Germany, urged the United States to talk to Iran; in May, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said the United States would take part in multinational talks if Iran suspended uranium enrichment. Iran continued the program.

The United Nations Security Council passed a resolution in December forbidding trade that could help Iran's nuclear or missile programs.

The Bush administration rejected the Iraq Study Group's call for U.S.-Iranian talks. Instead, the administration increased pressure to ban foreign investment in Iran's oil industry and to stop Iranian banks from using U.S. dollars. Bush also sent a second aircraft carrier group to the Persian Gulf.

Iraq

What Bush said: "Our military commanders and I have carefully weighed the options. We discussed every possible approach. In the end, I chose this course of action because it provides the best chance of success. Many in this chamber understand that America must not fail in Iraq — because you understand that the consequences of failure would be grievous and far-reaching."

Context: Attacks on U.S. troops and sectarian violence continue to plague Iraq. The Pentagon's most recent report to Congress in November noted a 22% increase in attacks, with 68% of them directed at U.S.-led coalition troops.

That has prompted Bush to forge a new strategy. The president's "new way forward" includes sending 21,500 additional U.S. troops and $1 billion in aid. The plan also would bolster the number of U.S. advisers in Iraqi security units.

Bush's plan has met opposition in Congress and among the public. Several Republican senators have joined Democrats behind a resolution expressing disagreement with Bush.

More than 60% of Americans surveyed by USA TODAY said they support a non-binding congressional resolution that opposes sending more troops.

Bush Can't Reclaim Bipartisanship That Never Existed (MCT)

By Steven Thomma

McClatchy Newspapers, January 24, 2007

WASHINGTON - George Bush tried to go home Tuesday night.

His goal was what he thought he left behind in Texas when he was a Republican governor with a Democratic legislature. But the mythical bipartisan place he tried to reach out to in his State of the Union address Tuesday was never like the one he romanticized in Texas. It's not what he's built in six years in Washington. And today it's as elusive as Oz.

"We can work through our differences," Bush said hopefully Tuesday.

He spoke the language of cooperation, singling out four big issues on which he and Democrats both want action: education, energy, health care and immigration.

But his proposals were mostly familiar, and on energy, notably small-bore. There's little prospect that either he or the Democrats will shed their mistrust of each other, or that they'll compromise enough to find genuine agreement, with the possible exception of overhauling the nation's immigration policies.

DOJ_NMG_0120988

"They're difficult issues. They're ones that have been attempted to solve in the past and have come up short," White House counselor Dan Bartlett said Tuesday. "We go into this process with no illusions about the atmosphere in which we're operating in."

Bush wanted to convince Americans watching on television that he's heard them and that he wants again to work with Democrats.

"Our citizens don't much care which side of the aisle we sit on," he said, "as long as we're willing to cross that aisle when there's work to be done."

Yet the chasm between the parties is wide and deep, the politics between them are poisonous and Bush bears much of the blame.

After reaching out to Democrats his first year, Bush governed after the 2001 terrorist attacks as the leader of a one-party state.

In Congress, his party locked Democrats out of negotiations, then hammered votes through without chance of input.

From the White House, Bush tacked "signing statements" onto bills he signed and used the threat of terrorism in three successive elections to attack Democrats as weak or, worse, aiding the enemy. Last fall he warned that if the Democrats won control of Congress, "terrorists win and America loses."

That makes it hard for Democrats to take his olive branch Tuesday without looking for thorns.

Democrats, too, share responsibility for the nation's polarized politics. These aren't the go-along, get-along, conservative Democrats that Bush ruled with in Texas.

"Dangerously incompetent," was the way Sen. Harry Reid, D-Nev., described Bush during last year's campaign. "A loser," he said another time.

Then there's the Iraq war.

Bush didn't spend the entire speech on the Iraq war, a political loser on which he's alienated virtually all Democrats and even many Republicans in Congress.

And it might not matter.

He said he's sending more troops to Iraq regardless of what the Democrats, the Congress or the country thinks.

The Democrats signaled in response that they're not in the mood for compromise either - on Iraq or at home. They want Bush to get U.S. troops out of Iraq and shift the government away from the wealthy and toward the poor.

"If he does, we will join him," said Sen. James Webb. D-Va., who gave his party's formal response to Bush's speech. "If he does not, we will be showing him the way."

Guests In The Gallery Punctuate Key Aspects Of The Address (USAT)

By Alan Gomez

USA Today, January 24, 2007

The adulation continued Tuesday for the Harlem construction worker who jumped onto subway tracks in New York City this month to save a man. Wesley Autrey was a guest of Laura Bush during the State of the Union address.

Autrey has received the Bronze Medallion, New York's highest award for civilians; a trip for his family to Walt Disney World; and $10,000 from Donald Trump. Tuesday, he was among two dozen guests of the first lady for President Bush's speech.

Many of the guests were representative of the themes Bush laid out. They included one servicemember each from the Army, Air Force, Navy, Marines and Coast Guard for a speech that focused largely on the war in Iraq. Among the military invitees was Air Force Tech. Sgt. Michelle Barefield, a Bronze Star recipient who survived three attacks with improvised explosive devices while patrolling the Baghdad airport.

Nancy Ho, a molecular biologist at Purdue University who is researching yeasts necessary to develop ethanol, was on hand as Bush called for a massive increase in ethanol use to help cut gasoline consumption by 20% within 10 years.

Dan Jones of Kansas City owns a technology firm that he says cannot afford to pay for health insurance for its three full-time employees. A news release from the White House said Jones would save $2,272.50 a year if he purchased health insurance under Bush's health care proposal.

Listening to Bush's call for immigration reform was Alejandro Monteverde, a Mexican filmmaker who became a U.S. citizen last year. Monteverde got visas for his final year of high school and later to attend the University of Texas film school. As he worked to become a permanent resident and later a U.S. citizen, Monteverde won the People's Choice Award at the 2006 Toronto International Film Festival.

Bush asked Congress to help curb the spread of malaria and AIDS. Joining the first lady was retired admiral Tim Ziemer, former director of World Relief, who now leads the President's Malaria Initiative.

DOJ_NMG_0120989

And with the recovery of New Orleans ongoing, Laura Bush hosted Craig Cuccia, who co-founded Reconcile New Orleans. The program started as Café Reconcile, a restaurant that provided culinary training for disadvantaged young people. The non-profit operation began feeding emergency workers and city residents in the weeks after Hurricane Katrina and has expanded to provide construction training to help rebuild the ravaged city.

House Speaker Nancy Pelosi invited 21 guests, including former speakers Jim Wright and Tom Foley, 9/11 widows Carrie Lemack and Mary Fetchet and officeholders from around the country.

Guests Speak Louder Than Words At Capitol (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, January 24, 2007

Presidents use their State of the Union speeches to send a message to Congress, but lawmakers are increasingly using their guest tickets to send a message right back at him.

For last night's address, Rep. Jim Langevin, Rhode Island Democrat, invited actor Michael J. Fox, whose campaign commercials in favor of expanded embryonic stem-cell research may have helped Democrats win control of the Senate.

From the other side of the aisle, Rep. Dana Rohrabacher, California Republican, invited the wife of a U.S. Border Patrol agent whom the administration prosecuted for a shooting incident involving a suspected drug smuggler.

Meanwhile, Adrian M. Fenty, who as D.C. mayor would usually sit in first lady Laura Bush's box, refused as a protest against the District's lack of a voting representative in Congress. But the Democrat was present, as the guest of new House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, California Democrat.

"This has gotten to be such a big production about everything other than the address," said one Senate aide. "It's become a forum for everybody who wants to air grievances to a national audience rather than a forum to hear from the president on the state of the union."

Mr. Rohrabacher, who has been a vocal critic of President Bush's immigration plans, said inviting Monica Ramos "sends a powerful message" to the Bush administration.

Ignacio Ramos, Mrs. Ramos' husband, and fellow agent, Jose Alonso Compean, have been imprisoned for shooting a drug-smuggling suspect in the buttocks after he assaulted one of them, dumped nearly 800 pounds of marijuana along the Rio Grande and then fled into Mexico. They are serving 11- and 12-year sentences, respectively.

"As these two fine men sit in federal prison cells unjustly, I am put in the position of consoling a devastated wife whose life has been destroyed, instead of having the opportunity to reward these men and their families for their brave service as law-enforcement officers," Mr. Rohrabacher said.

Mr. Langevin, a quadriplegic and disabilities advocate who has pushed for broader stem-cell research, said he tries to invite guests who have a high profile on big issues. In 2005, he hosted Dana Reeve, wife of actor Christopher Reeve.

"Michael will help to further Chris and Dana's legacy and underscore for the president just how serious I am about pursuing the promise of stem-cell research," Mr. Langevin said after issuing his invitation to Mr. Fox.

A guest invited by Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, New York Democrat, to highlight the health plight of his father, a September 11 emergency worker, learned that his father died last night just before the speech, according to the Associated Press.

The most coveted invitation at a State of the Union address is to sit in the first lady's box.

As mayor of the host town, Mr. Fenty would sit with her by tradition. But instead he joined a host of Democratic luminaries in Mrs. Pelosi's section. The new speaker invited former House Speakers Tom Foley and Jim Wright, both Democrats; Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley; Los Angeles Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa; and Bruce Gordon, president of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People.

Because of the way the chamber is situated, Mrs. Bush, sitting to the president's left, looked directly at Mr. Fenty and Mrs. Pelosi's other guests as her view across the chamber.

Among Mrs. Bush's 24 guests this year was Dikembe Mutombo, a pro basketball player and recently naturalized U.S. citizen who spends his off-season working to improve conditions in his native Democratic Republic of the Congo.

Mr. Mutombo, who played basketball at Georgetown University, towered over Mrs. Bush as he stood after the president recognized him.

"He came to Georgetown University on a scholarship to study medicine -- but Coach John Thompson got a look at Dikembe and had a different idea," Mr. Bush said, drawing a giant smile from Mr. Mutombo.

The president also pointed out Wesley Autrey, who saved the life of a man who fell onto the subway tracks in Harlem. Mr. Autrey pulled the man into a space between the rails as the train went by.

DOJ_NMG_0120990

In the past, Mrs. Bush has hosted then-Afghan Interim Authority Chairman Hamid Karzai; the then-president of the Iraqi Governing Council, Adnan Pachachi; and a military German shepherd bomb-sniffing dog who had been deployed to Iraq.

The tradition of recognizing guests was started by President Reagan in his first State of the Union speech in 1982, when he acknowledged the presence of Lenny Skutnik, who just 13 days before had dived into the Potomac River to rescue a victim of the Air Florida plane crash.

Last year, the guest who garnered the most attention was anti-war activist Cindy Sheehan, who was arrested for demonstrating in the Capitol and removed from the House gallery minutes before Mr. Bush spoke. She was the guest of Rep. Lynn Woolsey, California Democrat.

The public galleries in the House have 623 seats occupying the tops of two sides and the wall the president faces. All but a few seats were taken, and the chamber was so packed that dozens of ticket holders ended up sitting on the steps in the aisles between the seats.

Not everyone gets into the act with his tickets.

Both Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, Nevada Democrat, and Minority Leader Mitch McConnell, Kentucky Republican, gave tickets away to other offices who needed extra tickets.

And many offices offer tickets to mayors or other officials from back home.

Bush: Give Iraq Plan "A Chance To Work" (AP)

AP, January 24, 2007

(CBS/AP) A politically weakened President Bush implored a skeptical Congress Tuesday night to embrace his unpopular plan to send more U.S. troops to Iraq, saying it represents the best hope in a war America must not lose. "Give it a chance to work," he said.

Facing a political showdown with Democrats and Republicans alike, Mr. Bush was unyielding on Iraq in his annual State of the Union address. He also sought to revive his troubled presidency with proposals to expand health insurance coverage and to slash gasoline consumption by 20 percent in a decade.

Democrats — and even some Republicans — scoffed at his Iraq policy. Unmoved by Mr. Bush's appeal, Democrats said the House and Senate would vote on resolutions of disapproval of the troop buildup.

"We need a new direction," said freshman Sen. Jim Webb, picked by the Democrats to deliver their response to the president's speech. "The majority of the nation no longer supports the way this war is being fought; nor does the majority of our military," said Webb, a Vietnam veteran opposed to Mr. Bush's invasion of Iraq.

Republican Sen. Norm Coleman of Minnesota, also took issue with Mr. Bush. "I can't tell you what the path to success is, but it's not what the president has put on the table," he said.

It was a night of political theater as the president went before the first Democratic-controlled Congress in a dozen years with his lowest approval ratings in polls.

A CBS News poll conducted by Knowledge Networks immediately after the speech found that 82 percent of viewers generally approved of the president's proposals while 18 percent disapproved. However, 68 percent of viewers said Mr. Bush will not be able to accomplish his goals, while 32 percent think he will.

Mr. Bush rallied some support for his Iraq plan among those who watched the speech, according to the poll. Before the State of the Union, 43 percent of them backed the plan, while 52 percent of them supported it after the speech.

"This was a much better speech and a much better argument for his position than he made when he made the speech announcing the troop increase two weeks ago," CBS News chief Washington correspondent Bob Schieffer said. "But frankly, it comes down to this: If the president is right on this, this is going to be seen as a great profile in courage. If he's wrong, it will be seen as something much different."

With debate over the Iraq war sending Republicans scurrying away from the president, Mr. Bush's job approval rating stood at a new low of 28 percent in the latest CBS News poll.

Democratic Speaker Nancy Pelosi of California, the first woman to lead the House, sat over Mr. Bush's shoulder, next to Vice President Dick Cheney. Reaching out to the Democrats, the president opened with a tribute to Pelosi and paused to shake her hand. He also asked for prayers for South Dakota Democratic Sen. Tim Johnson, hospitalized for more than a month after suffering a brain hemorrhage, and Republican Rep. Charlie Norwood of Georgia, who's suffering from cancer.

The speech audience included up to a dozen House and Senate members who have announced they are running for president in 2008 or are considered possible contenders.

Mr. Bush divided his speech between domestic and foreign issues, but the war was topic No. 1.

Pelosi set the tone for Democrats. She sat silently and did not applaud as Mr. Bush warned of high stakes in Iraq and said American forces must not step back before Baghdad is secure.

DOJ_NMG_0120991

With Congress poised to deliver a stinging rebuke on his troop increase, the president made a personal plea to lawmakers.

"I have spoken with many of you in person. I respect you and the arguments you made," Mr. Bush said. "We went into this largely united, in our assumptions and in our convictions. And whatever you voted for, you did not vote for failure."

"Our country is pursuing a new strategy in Iraq and I ask you to give it a chance to work," he said. "And I ask you to support our troops in the field and those on their way."

The president said the Iraq war had changed dramatically with the outbreak of sectarian warfare and reprisals.

"This is not the fight we entered in Iraq, but it is the fight we are in," he said. "Every one of us wishes that this war were over and won. Yet it would not be like us to leave our promises unkept, our friends abandoned and our own security at risk.

"Ladies and gentlemen: On this day, at this hour, it is still within our power to shape the outcome of this battle," the president said. "So let us find our resolve and turn events toward victory."

Key Republicans have joined Democrats in drafting resolutions of opposition to the plans he announced two weeks ago to send an additional 21,500 troops to Iraq. Mr. Bush said his approach had the best chance to succeed.

"Many in this chamber understand that America must not fail in Iraq because you understand that the consequences of failure would be grievous and far reaching," the president said. "If American forces step back before Baghdad is secure, the Iraqi government would be overrun by extremists on all sides."

In such a case, he forecast "an epic battle," Shiite extremists backed by Iran against Sunni extremists aided by al Qaeda and supporters of Saddam Hussein's government, leading to violence that could spread across the Middle East. "For America, this is a nightmare scenario," Mr. Bush said.

On domestic matters, the president pressed Congress to help find ways to overhaul entitlements such as Social Security, Medicare and Medicaid before they impose huge problems for future generations.

"Somehow we have not found it in ourselves to act," he said. "So let us work together and do it now."

On immigration, too, the president made a plea to lawmakers that he has made before. Members of his own party were the main obstacle to success in that area — a fact Mr. Bush acknowledged even as he pressed for a better result now than Capitol Hill is run by Democrats more amenable to his ideas.

"Convictions run deep in this Capitol when it comes to immigration," he said. "Let us have a serious, civil and conclusive debate."

Mr. Bush said his energy proposals would cut American imports by the equivalent of 75 percent of the oil coming from the Middle East. His prescription, as always, relied primarily on market incentives and technological advances — not government mandates.

"America is on the verge of technological breakthroughs that will enable us to live our lives less dependent on oil," he said. "These technologies will help us become better stewards of the environment — and they will help us to confront the serious challenge of global climate change."

Mr. Bush called for changing the tax code to encourage more people not covered by medical insurance to buy a plan, and to discourage others from keeping the most costly health care plans.

Under the president's proposal, employer-financed health care benefits would be considered taxable income after a deduction of $15,000 for families and $7,500 for individuals. Those buying their own plan would get the same deductions on their taxes.

The White House said 80 percent of workers with health insurance through their jobs would see a tax cut as a result of the change. But about 20 percent would see a tax increase — those workers whose health insurance cost more than the standard deduction.

"With this reform, more than 100 million men, women and children who are now covered by employer-provided insurance will benefit from lower tax bills," Mr. Bush said. "At the same time, this reform will level the playing field for those who do not get health insurance through their job."

The administration sought to make Mr. Bush's energy initiatives — in particular a 20 percent cut in gasoline usage by 2017 — an eye-catching centerpiece of his address, the one major element not revealed until hours before the speech. "It is in our vital interest to diversify America's energy supply, and the way forward is through technology," Bush said.

The cut would be achieved primarily through a sharp escalation in the amount of ethanol and other alternative fuels that the government mandates must be blended into the fuel supply. The rest would come from raising fuel economy standards for passenger cars, a plan that Mr. Bush has proposed in the past but failed to win from Congress.

Acknowledging that some would say such a drastic increase in alternative fuels is unrealistic, the White House argued that the new mandate — which would need approval from Congress — would spur investments in the industry and give technological research a boost.

DOJ_NMG_0120992

While setting cutback goals, the president spurned appeals from environmentalists and some major corporations to impose mandatory ceilings on U.S. greenhouse gas emissions in hopes of slowing climate change.

President's Portrayal Of 'The Enemy' Often Flawed (WP)

By Glenn Kessler

The Washington Post, January 24, 2007

In his State of the Union address last night, President Bush presented an arguably misleading and often flawed description of "the enemy" that the United States faces overseas, lumping together disparate groups with opposing ideologies to suggest that they have a single-minded focus in attacking the United States.

Under Bush's rubric, a country such as Iran -- which enjoys diplomatic representation and billions of dollars in trade with major European countries -- is lumped together with al-Qaeda, the terrorist group responsible for the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks. "The Shia and Sunni extremists are different faces of the same totalitarian threat," Bush said, referring to the different branches of the Muslim religion.

Similarly, Bush asserted that Shia Hezbollah, which has won seats in the Lebanese government, is a terrorist group "second only to al-Qaeda in the American lives it has taken." Bush is referring to attacks nearly a quarter-century ago on a U.S. embassy and a Marine barracks when the United States intervened in Lebanon's civil war by shelling Hezbollah strongholds. Hezbollah has evolved into primarily an anti-Israeli militant organization -- it fought a war with Israel last summer -- but the European Union does not list it as a terrorist organization.

At one point, Bush catalogued what he described as advances in the quest for freedom in the Middle East during 2005 -- such as the departure of Syrian troops from Lebanon and elections in Iraq. Then, Bush asserted, "a thinking enemy watched all of these scenes, adjusted their tactics and in 2006 they struck back." But his description of the actions of "the enemy" tried to tie together a series of diplomatic and military setbacks that had virtually no connection to one another, from an attack on a Sunni mosque in Iraq to the assassination of Maronite Lebanese political figure.

In his speech, Bush argued that "free people are not drawn to violent and malignant ideologies -- and most will choose a better way when they are given a chance." He also said that terrorist groups "want to overthrow moderate governments."

In the two of the most liberal and diverse societies in the Middle East -- Lebanon and the Palestinian territories -- events have undercut Bush's argument in the past year. Hezbollah has gained power and strength in Lebanon, partly at the ballot box. Meanwhile, Palestinians ousted the Fatah party -- which wants to pursue peace with Israel -- from the legislature in favor of Hamas, which is committed to Israel's destruction and is considered a terrorist organization by the State Department.

In fact, many of the countries that Bush considers "moderate" -- such as Egypt and Saudi Arabia -- are autocratic dictatorships rated among the worst of the "not free" nations by the nonpartisan Freedom House. Their Freedom House ratings are virtually indistinguishable from Cuba, Belarus and Burma, which Bush last night listed as nations in desperate need of freedom.

Bush also claimed that "we have a diplomatic strategy that is rallying the world to join in the fight against extremism." But Monday, a poll of 26,000 people in 25 countries was released that showed that global opinion of U.S. foreign policy has sharply deteriorated in the past two years. Nearly three-quarters of those polled by GlobeScan, an international polling company, disapprove of U.S. policies toward Iraq, and nearly half said the United States is playing a mainly negative role in the world.

In his State of the Union address a year ago, Bush said that progress in Iraq meant "we should be able to further decrease our troop levels" but that "those decisions will be made by our military commanders, not by politicians in Washington, D.C." Bush now proposes to increase troop levels, after having overruled the concerns of commanders. In his speech last night, he sidestepped this contradiction, saying that "our military commanders and I have carefully weighed the options" and "in the end, I chose this course of action."

On domestic policy, Bush at one point said that "the recovery" has added more than 7.2 million jobs since August 2003. But the net number of jobs created since Bush became president in January 2001, is much lower -- just 3.6 million. The Bush administration's performance is fairly mediocre for the sixth year of a presidency, according to historical statistics maintained by the Bureau of Labor Statistics. Nearly 18 million jobs were added by the sixth year of Bill Clinton's presidency -- and nearly 10 million were added at this point in Ronald Reagan's presidency.

Bush claimed credit for cutting the budget deficit ahead of schedule and proposed to eliminate it over the next five years. He did not mention that he inherited a huge budget surplus -- $236 billion in 2000 -- compared with a $296 billion deficit in the 2006 fiscal year, largely as a result of Bush's tax cuts and spending increases. Bush claimed that the No Child Left Behind Act has helped students to "perform better at reading and math, and minority students are closing the achievement gap." But states made stronger average annual gains in reading during the decade before the law took effect, education researchers have found, and half a dozen recent studies have shown little progress in narrowing the test-score gap between minority and white students.

DOJ_NMG_0120993

Staff writer Amit R. Paley contributed to this report.

Bush Insists U.S. Must Not Fail In Iraq (NYT)

By David E. Sanger And Jim Rutenberg

The New York Times, January 24, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 23 — President Bush tried to resuscitate his ailing presidency Tuesday night, using his State of the Union address to present a modest agenda of energy and health care proposals while warning an increasingly assertive Congress against undercutting his new Iraq strategy.

It was a speech that reflected Mr. Bush's difficult circumstances. It was limited in ambition and political punch at home, with no proposals to rival his call two years ago to remake Social Security, no mention of rebuilding New Orleans and no allusions to limiting stem cell research or banning gay marriage.

And when it came to his plan to send additional troops to Iraq, he was forced to plead with the Democrats who now control Congress — and with a growing number of Republican critics — to "give it a chance to work."

In an admission that the United States now finds itself trapped in the cross-fire of a sectarian conflict, Mr. Bush said, "This is not the fight we entered in Iraq, but it is the fight we are in." While he insisted that America could not afford to fail, he also warned the Iraqi government that "our commitment is not open-ended."

His freshest initiative was setting a goal of reducing projected gasoline consumption 20 percent over the next 10 years. This hit a theme tailored to his appeal for bipartisanship in a city where the balance of power has shifted markedly against Mr. Bush since the last State of the Union address. Although he did not propose any measures to deal with emissions from power plants and factories, the main sources of greenhouse gases, he spoke of "the serious challenge of global climate change."

The other main element of his domestic agenda, a package of proposals intended to improve access to health insurance, had drawn intense opposition from Democrats long before Mr. Bush walked to the well of the House chamber on Tuesday night, a scene he could not have relished but handled graciously. Behind him sat a Democratic House speaker, Representative Nancy Pelosi, sitting alongside Vice President Dick Cheney. In front of him was an audience of Democrats growing increasingly comfortable with their new power, including quite a few who are jockeying to take his job and reverse the policies he has put in place.

Mr. Bush gamely ticked off other goals he would like to achieve before leaving office in three days short of two years. They included overhauling immigration laws, taking steps toward a balanced budget, dealing with the long-term financial condition of Social Security and Medicare, and imposing tighter standards on schools.

Yet the proposals were overwhelmed by the Iraq debate.

"Many in this chamber understand that America must not fail in Iraq," Mr. Bush said, "because you understand that the consequences of failure would be grievous and far-reaching."

While Mr. Bush has traditionally used these speeches to present a hopeful vision of Iraq's future, he could not do so on Tuesday night. His own nominee to take over the command of United States forces in Iraq, Lt. Gen. David H. Petraeus, told the Senate Armed Services Committee earlier in the day that "the situation in Iraq is dire."

Mr. Bush started his speech 12 hours before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee was to begin working on a bipartisan resolution in opposition to his plan to send additional troops to Iraq. Despite his proposal of a bipartisan council to advise him on the battle against Islamic extremism, Democrats immediately assailed him, and members of his own party continued to show signs of edging away.

In the Democratic response to his address, Senator Jim Webb of Virginia, whose son is a marine serving in Iraq, said that Mr. Bush "took us into this war recklessly," and that the United States was now "held hostage to the predictable and predicted disarray that followed." Mr. Webb called for "a formula that will in short order allow our combat forces to leave Iraq," and said that if Mr. Bush did not change course in Iraq and in his economic policies, "we will be showing him the way."

Mr. Bush got a polite reception, but one far more muted than in previous appearances. He waited until the end of his nearly 50-minute speech to deliver the assessment that typically opens these addresses, that "the state of our union is strong." For a man who finds himself struggling to maintain public and political support, Mr. Bush delivered the speech in a confident tone, with easy and relaxed smiles.

Seeking new ground for consensus, Mr. Bush reached back to a theme that marked the first days of his presidency, when he would regularly appeal for bipartisanship. "Our citizens don't much care which side of the aisle we sit on, as long as we are willing to cross that aisle when there is work to be done," he said.

But the power dynamic on Tuesday night was completely different. In the six years in which Republicans controlled one or both houses of Congress, Democrats said they saw little of that bipartisan instinct at work, and despite vows to behave differently, they have not shown much in return.

DOJ_NMG_0120994

In fact, Mr. Bush's argument on Tuesday night for embracing his Iraq plan amounted to a reverse of the argument that he made from the same podium four years ago, when he contended that dealing with Saddam Hussein would help the United States bring other rogue states to heel. This time, Mr. Bush spoke of a "nightmare scenario," of an Iraq "overrun by extremists on all sides." He said the violence in the country would turn contagious, spread beyond Iraq's borders and inflame the entire Middle East.

And he appealed to Democrats to remember the votes many of them cast in 2002 to authorize the invasion, throwing some responsibility their way in the process.

"We went into this largely united, in our assumptions and in our convictions," he said, recalling the days when his approval ratings were sky-high. "And whatever you voted for, you did not vote for failure."

Mr. Bush was careful in describing what many in his administration believe could be a coming confrontation with Iran. While he vowed that the world would never allow Iran to obtain a nuclear weapon, he made no threats, saying he was relying on diplomacy to deal with both Iran and North Korea, the two countries that, five years ago, he declared in a State of the Union address made up an "axis of evil" with Saddam Hussein's Iraq.

There were no such labels on Tuesday, a reflection of the reality that with American forces tied down in Iraq, Mr. Bush's options are limited.

But the effect of Iraq extends to the domestic front. Even his allies say the war threatens the prospects of the new initiatives he described.

"Iraq casts a huge shadow over anything in the domestic policy arena that the president talks about," said Glen Bolger, a Republican pollster. "The situation makes it very difficult for the president to get Americans to pay attention to what he's saying on issues like energy and health care."

Dan Bartlett, the White House counselor, argued otherwise. "If you talk about the issues the public cares about, and you put forward innovative, bold ideas," Mr. Bartlett said, "the American people, regardless of what the polls say that day, will say, 'This is worth study, this is worth engaging the Democratic Congress on.' "

Ms. Pelosi and Senator Harry Reid of Nevada, the Senate majority leader, said in a joint statement that Mr. Bush's goals on energy were "commendable," but suggested they would seek to achieve them through different policies.

Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York, speaking on ABC News, said Mr. Bush would find "a receptive audience" for his energy and health care goals, though she later said she found the early details of his health care plan "really troubling." The Republican minority leader in the Senate, Mitch McConnell of Kentucky, said the two parties should find innovative ways to tackle the issues.

Mr. Bush's aides and allies argue that he could exert some leverage by accusing Democrats of intransigence and "do-nothingness" should they flatly shoot down his proposals, as they were starting to do even before his speech.

"The real question is not whether he can make it work; he's extended his hand several times now," said Senator Jon Kyl, Republican of Arizona. "The real question is how much do the Democrats want to cooperate with him."

But the Democrats have been in control only a few weeks, and polls indicate that for now the public is more likely to side with them in a fight. And it is not clear that Mr. Bush's new proposals would do anything to reverse the political balance of power.

Bush Urges Congress To 'find Resolve' On Iraq (FT)

By Caroline Daniel

Financial Times, January 24, 2007

President George W. Bush on Tuesday night made his most pessimistic and assertive defence of his new policy on the war in Iraq as he warned of a "nightmare scenario" of sectarian violence that could draw the entire region into the conflict.

In his annual State of the Union address, Mr Bush - battling criticism over the rationale for going to war and his strategy - sought support of Congress and the American people for sending an additional 21,500 more troops to Iraq.

"It is still within our power to shape the outcome of this battle. So let us find our resolve and turn events toward victory," he said.

He also offered a stark warning to senators and members of Congress who have opposed the surge.

"We could expect an epic battle between Shia extremists backed by Iran, and Sunni extremists aided by al Qaeda and supporters of the old regime. A contagion of violence could spill out across the country - and in time the entire region could be drawn into the conflict," the president said on Tuesday night.

"Chaos is their greatest ally in this struggle. And out of chaos in Iraq, would emerge an emboldened enemy with new safe havens, new recruits, new resources and an even greater determination to harm America. To allow this to happen would be to ignore the lessons of September 11 and invite tragedy."

DOJ_NMG_0120995

The president's speech set no new policy on Iraq and painted a positive domestic agenda. At the centre of this was a new energy policy.

For the first time in his presidency he called the threat of global climate change a "serious challenge" and outlined plans to address the rise in greenhouse gas emissions by calling for Americans to cut demand for petrol by 20 per cent over the next 10 years.

His comments reflected a chastened president bowing to rising international and domestic criticism of his policy on global warming, and seeking to forge a legacy based on shifting the US from its dependence on foreign oil, echoing last year's most memorable line that "America is addicted to oil."

Mr Bush outlined his plans for an aggressive shift to alternative fuels such as ethanol, a politically popular stance in the Midwest, and a greater focus on energy efficiency with a call to increase fuel economy standards in the US, which remain below those of China. "These technologies will help us become better stewards of the environment and they will help us to confront the serious challenge of global climate change."

According to a White House document the plan "will confront climate change by stopping the projected growth of carbon dioxide emissions from cars, light trucks and SUVs within ten years."

The so-called "Twenty by ten" goal marks a significant shift for the White House towards recognising that it must give a higher priority to addressing domestic demand for oil as well as bolstering supply. It bows to pressure from international leaders, corporations and domestic concern to act on climate change, and recognises that Democrats have radically shifted the focus of energy policy towards energy efficiency. Mr Bush's first five State of the Union speeches have not directly addressed climate change, and in 2001 he summed up his energy policy as "We can't conserve our way to energy independence."

Mr Bush said he would achieve his goal of cutting US demand for petrol by raising fuel economy standards and shifting to alternative fuels. About three-quarters of the shift will come from moves towards fuels such as ethanol, rather than a more aggressive stance on fuel economy.

President George W. Bush triggered the biggest one-day jump in oil prices in 16 months on Tuesday when he set out plans to double US strategic oil reserves.

Oil prices rose 4.7 per cent to $55 a barrel after Mr Bush pledged to double the size of the reserves by 1.5bn barrels by 2027. Sam Bodman, energy secretary, said his department would start "purchasing crude oil in the spring at a rate of about 100,000 barrels per day".

In an echo of last year's most memorable line that the US is "addicted to oil", Mr Bush on Tuesday night warned: "For too long our nation has been dependent on foreign oil. And this dependence leaves us more vulnerable to hostile regimes, and to terrorists who could cause huge disruptions of oil shipments."

Mr Bush's address comes as he faces the lowest approval ratings for any president ahead of a State of the Union since Richard Nixon in 1974. A recent Washington-Post/ABC News poll gave Mr Bush a 33 per cent approval rating. Dan Bartlett, White House counselor, said it reflected the fact that officials were "under no illusions about the atmosphere we are operating in."

Faced with opposition from Democrats and rising Republican dissent about his plans for a troop surge in Iraq, Mr Bush defended his strategy. "Many in this chamber understand that America must not fail in Iraq – because you understand that the consequences of failure would be grievous and far reaching."

Although Mr Bush called for bi-partisan co-operation in Iraq Democrats swiftly attacked his proposals. Jim Webb, the newly elected senator from Virginia, who was selected to give the Democratic party's rebuttal to the speech, criticised the president.

"He took us into this war recklessly. He disregarded warnings from the national security adviser during the first Gulf war, the chief of staff of the army, two former commanding generals of the central command, whose jurisdiction includes Iraq, the director of operations on the joint chiefs of staff."

The White House energy policy fell short of hopes it would engage in international discussions about a post Kyoto accord after 2012 to control greenhouse gases or support tougher economy wide mandatory caps on carbon dioxide.

Higher oil prices pushed energy stocks up sharply. The S&P's energy sector rose 2.4 per cent with shares in Exxon Mobil up 2.2 per cent at $74.49 and Chevron 1.9 per cent to $72.56.

Getting A Read On The Speech Makes For Quite A Snapshot (WP)

By Tom Shales

The Washington Post, January 24, 2007

George W. Bush flirted with eloquence only at the end of his so-so, nuts-and-bolts State of the Union speech last night: "The state of our union is strong," he said, "our cause in the world is right, and tonight that cause goes on." With a quick "God bless" he bolted from the podium as members of Congress, almost applauded out by that time, gave him his final ovation of the night.

DOJ_NMG_0120996

Bedecked in yet another of his pale blue neckties, Bush began the speech on a conciliatory and bipartisan note, declaring himself "the first president to begin the State of the Union message with these words: Madam Speaker" -- a reference, of course, to Democrat Nancy Pelosi, who now presides over the House. Bush also congratulated "the Democratic majority" that he was facing en masse for the first time.

As seen on all the major and minor networks, the speech was workmanlike and the presentation presentable. Bush seemed determined to keep it low-key. Campbell Brown, reporting for NBC News, called it "extremely subdued." Brown had an unusual perspective, at least for a correspondent. Before the speech began, anchor Brian Williams told viewers that a journalist was being allowed to report from the floor of the House, right down there with the legislators, for the first time.

Brown was heard but not seen, however; she was not accompanied by a camera.

On CBS, Bob Schieffer called Bush's address "a much better speech" than the one in which he announced his plan to send more than 20,000 additional troops to Iraq, a speech delivered from the White House library earlier this month. Bush spoke of that plan last night as a fait accompli, not something he wants to talk over with anybody on Capitol Hill. "We are deploying" additional troops, he said -- not "we want to deploy" or "I would like to deploy."

To its credit, ABC News, alone among the three major networks, stayed on the air with coverage for the rest of the hour after Bush finished talking. Charles Gibson anchored from outside the Capitol in a topcoat. Even more exhaustive coverage was available on HDNet, a high-definition network whose anchor is Dan Rather. Yes, that Dan Rather, who preceded and followed the speech with interviews and features, signing off at 11 p.m.

On C-SPAN, which went to live pictures from the House chamber 15 minutes before the speech began, commentator Kenneth Walsh, of U.S. News & World Report, noted the presence of guest stars in the balcony both in the first lady's box and in the section controlled by Democrats. He predicted "dueling images of heroes and celebrities" during the speech.

Actually, it was more a case of dueling standing ovations as Republicans and Democrats took turns jumping to their feet to express approval for something Bush said. When the president used the terms "global warming" and "global climate change" -- probably for the first time in one of his State of the Union speeches, if not ever -- Democrats rose and clapped away. A moment later, when he called for quick approval of judges nominated to federal courts -- "a prompt up-or-down vote" in Congress, it was the Republicans' turn to stand and applaud, while most of the Democrats stewed in their seats.

Some members of Congress, forgetting they might be in a reaction shot at any moment, also forgot that it's best not to read along with the president from printed copies of his speech that they'd been given in advance. In a telling two-shot, viewers saw Illinois Sen. Barack Obama in the foreground reading from the speech, and thus appearing almost to be asleep, and right behind him New York Sen. Hillary Clinton, quite possibly Obama's major foe in pursuing the Democratic presidential nomination for 2008, looking bright-eyed (and for all we know, bushy-tailed) and appearing to give the president her full and eager attention.

Sen. Edward Kennedy (D-Mass.) was caught by cameras reading the speech, too, but he looks so venerable and distinguished by now that it's hard to get a bad picture of him. In fact he seems more and more to resemble Claude Rains as a veteran white-haired senator in Frank Capra's classic movie "Mr. Smith Goes to Washington." Life imitating art's imitation of life.

Although Katie Couric is the presiding anchor on CBS, she increasingly relies on the expertise of Schieffer when covering big political events. They are now virtual co-anchors. While Couric read from prepared historical information about past State of the Union addresses, Schieffer did the up-to-date political analysis. In fact, he seemed to get even more screen time than Couric in the minutes leading up to the speech.

MSNBC's Keith Olbermann told viewers the speech was to begin at 9:01:30 but allowed as how it could take 12 minutes for the president to make his way down the aisle to the podium, depending on how many hands got shaken. A lot did. And Bush didn't enter the chamber until 9:09; he finally began speaking at 9:13 (concluding at 10:03).

The Democratic response to the speech -- delivered last night by Virginia Sen. Jim Webb -- traditionally doesn't air until the president is out of sight. Could Bush have intentionally been delaying it by grasping every hand in sight and giving countless autographs when he got to the exit from the chamber? Whatever, he was, as the cliche goes, all smiles at this point, seemingly oblivious to the fact that he is now, according to polls, as unpopular as Richard Nixon was when wallowing in Watergate.

Some 2008 Contenders Disagree, Politely (WP)

By Shailagh Murray And Anne E. Kornblut

Washington Post, January 24, 2007

President Bush's audience at the Capitol last night included at least 10 Republicans and Democrats who hope to succeed him, and their response to his State of the Union address ranged from enthusiastic to tepid.

The most generous was Sen. John McCain of Arizona, a leading contender for the GOP nomination and Bush's chief defender on the Iraq war, including the administration's latest plan to deploy an additional 21,500 troops.

DOJ_NMG_0120997

"This strategy ought to be given a chance, because the consequences of failure are immense, and we'll be back again some day," McCain told ABC News in a post-speech interview. "This is going to be long and hard and tough."

Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (N.Y.), the Democratic front-runner, was more skeptical, urging Bush to seek a more "comprehensive approach" to the Iraq crisis. Bush's troop escalation proposal, she said, was "really more of the same. We've gone down this road before."

"Most Americans believe that escalation will not bring the war in Iraq to a responsible end, and that's why I've proposed not just a troop cap, but a phased redeployment that will start bringing our troops home," added Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.), another major contender.

Bush was the main event last night, but the 2008 contenders created their own media sideshow. As lawmakers milled around on the House floor prior to the speech, cameras caught Obama joking with colleagues and Sen. Sam Brownback (R-Kan.) and applauding politely as Cabinet secretaries filed into the chamber. Obama sat directly in front of Clinton during the speech, while McCain sat with his head bowed, following along with a written version.

Presidential prospects dominated post-speech television coverage, with the national networks staking out a separate interview staging ground for party VIPs in the Russell Senate Office Building rotunda, away from the hoards of local television crews that packed Statuary Hall in the Capitol. Obama showed up first, immediately after the speech ended at 10:15 p.m., and announced that he hadn't heard anything surprising, although he did describe the mood in the chamber as "courteous."

Meanwhile, Clinton stood a few steps away, noting the "very crowded rotunda" as she peered around for a way to duck past Obama.

As of last night, Obama had been booked on all the major morning news programs, while Clinton declined to appear. Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr. (D-Del.), another 2008 contender, had been scheduled on several programs, but was bumped, according to a senior Democratic Senate aide.

John Edwards, a former senator and the 2004 Democratic vice presidential nominee, watched the speech from Miami and made a series of television appearances from there. He responded to Bush's speech with a full-page ad today in the Capitol Hill newspaper Roll Call that asks Congress to use its power to stop President Bush from sending more troops to Iraq.

The text reads, "Last night, you heard the president speak. Today, listen to the American people," and is followed by a list of voters who have endorsed Edwards's proposal that Congress block funding for a troop increase.

Sen. John F. Kerry (D-Mass.), the 2004 presidential nominee, offered some of the harshest criticism of the night, saying Bush "glossed over the disastrous war and its multibillion-dollar price tag and implied again that our presence in Iraq is somehow improving the situation in that chaotic and turbulent country."

Kerry added that he would soon introduce legislation to demand that the White House set a date for withdrawing troops from Iraq.

Democratic candidates were most generous in their response to Bush's domestic proposals, particularly ideas to expand health coverage and cut gasoline consumption. "The president offered some serious proposals tonight on two issues -- energy and health care -- that we all agree must be addressed," Obama said in a post-speech statement. "I'm glad he did and I think it's important to respond in a constructive way."

Clinton echoed Obama's more conciliatory response to the president's domestic proposals. "I'm willing to work with anyone," he said. "Let's try to get something done."

On the Republican side, former New York mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani, another major contender for the GOP presidential nomination, had warm things to say about Bush's speech during an interview on Fox.

"I thought the speech was a very good one and I thought it did what the president had to do, which is to get us kind of beyond Iraq, meaning there are a lot of other things we have to concentrate on," he said.

The State Of The Union (NYT)

The New York Times, January 24, 2007

The White House spin ahead of George W. Bush's seventh State of the Union address was that the president would make a bipartisan call to revive his domestic agenda with "bold and innovative concepts." The problem with that was obvious last night — in six years, Mr. Bush has shown no interest in bipartisanship, and his domestic agenda was set years ago, with huge tax cuts for wealthy Americans and crippling debt for the country.

Combined with the mounting cost of the war in Iraq, that makes boldness and innovation impossible unless Mr. Bush truly changes course. And he gave no hint of that last night. Instead, he offered up a tepid menu of ideas that would change little: a health insurance notion that would make only a tiny dent in a huge problem. More promises about cutting oil consumption with barely a word about global warming. And the same lip service about immigration reform on which he has failed to deliver.

DOJ_NMG_0120998

At times, Mr. Bush sounded almost as if he'd gotten the message of the 2006 elections. "Our citizens don't much care which side of the aisle we sit on — as long as we are willing to cross that aisle when there is work to be done," he said.

But we've heard that from Mr. Bush before. In early 2001, he promised to bring Americans together and instead embarked on his irresponsible tax cuts, a divisive right-wing social agenda and a neo-conservative foreign policy that tore up international treaties and alienated even America's closest allies. In the wake of 9/11, Mr. Bush had a second chance to rally the nation — and the world — only to squander it on a pointless, catastrophic war in Iraq. Mr. Bush promised bipartisanship after his re-election in 2004, and again after Hurricane Katrina. Always, he failed to deliver. He did not even mention New Orleans last night.

When Republicans controlled Congress and the White House, Mr. Bush's only real interest was in making their majority permanent; consultation meant telling the Democrats what he had decided.

Neither broken promises nor failed policies changed Mr. Bush's mind. So the nation has been saddled with tax cuts that have turned a budget surplus into a big deficit, education reform that has been badly managed and underfinanced, far-right judges with scant qualifications, the dismantling of regulations in order to benefit corporations at the expense of workers, and a triumph of ideology over science in policy making on the environment and medical research. All along, Americans' civil liberties and the constitutional balance have been trampled by a president determined to assert ever more power.

Now that the Democrats have taken Congress, Mr. Bush is acting as if he'd had the door to compromise open all along and the Democrats had refused to walk through it.

Last night, Mr. Bush also acted as if he were really doing something to help the 47 million people in this country who don't have health insurance. What he offered, by the White House's own estimate, would take a few million off that scandalously high number and shift the burden to the states. Mr. Bush's plan would put a new tax on Americans who were lucky enough to still have good health-care coverage through their employers. Some large portion of those are middle class and represented by the labor unions that Mr. Bush and the Republicans are dedicated to destroying.

Mr. Bush's comments on Iraq added nothing to his failed policies. He did, at last, propose a permanent increase in the size of the Army and Marines that would repair some of the damage he has done to those forces. But that would take years, and it would do nothing to halt Iraq's spiral. Mr. Bush failed to explain how he would pay for a larger force, which would almost certainly require cutting budget-busting weapons programs. That would mean going up against the arms industry and its lobbyists — something Mr. Bush has never been willing to do.

Mr. Bush almost certainly didn't intend it, but his speech did reinforce one vital political fact — that it's not just up to him anymore. There was a big change last night: the audience. Instead of solid Republican majorities marching in lock step with the White House, Congress is controlled by Democrats. It will be their task to give leadership to a nation that desperately wants change and expects its leaders to work together to deliver it. The Democrats' challenge will be to form real coalitions with willing Republicans. If they do, Mr. Bush may even be forced, finally, to compromise.

Say what you will about the flaws and shortcomings of the two-party system. After six years of the Bush presidency, at least we know it's a lot better than the one-party system.

Speaking On Demand (LAT)

Los Angeles Times, January 24, 2007

The State of the Union address, a constitutional requirement, seemed more forced than ever this year.

IT IS ALWAYS tempting to take the State of the Union address seriously. It is the Constitution, after all, that requires that the president "from time to time give to the Congress Information of the State of the Union," and even if the substance of the address rarely inspires, there is always the spectacle itself: the full chamber, the shouts and applause of the audience, the surprise guests in the gallery.

This year, however, the speech felt even more compulsory than usual. President Bush seemed at times to be going through the motions, reasserting his position or making proposals on a number of issues — immigration, healthcare, education, the war in Iraq, energy independence — in an effort to remain relevant in the face of a Democratic Congress and plummeting public support. It's difficult to know how many of his ideas will amount to anything. On a few fronts, however, they're either interesting or relevant (though not often both).

Immigration reform is the most pressing domestic business left from the previous Congress. It's also the policy area in which Bush's goal of establishing a "legal and orderly path for foreign workers to enter our country to work on a temporary basis" became more feasible, rather than less so, with the Democratic takeover of Congress.

Given that this is not a new debate, it would have been nice if the president had been more specific. But, in any event, the burden is now on the Democratic congressional leadership to, as Bush said, "resolve the status of the illegal immigrants who are already in our country." Alluding to the excessively prolonged legislative battle over immigration, Bush was right to plead for a "conclusive" debate on Capitol Hill.

DOJ_NMG_0120999

Like his remarks on immigration, Bush's rhetoric on the need for affordable healthcare was hardly new; he has cited the issue in four previous State of the Union speeches. On Tuesday, Bush did tout two interesting proposals: offering a standard tax deduction that would make health insurance more affordable to workers without benefits, and letting states use some federal healthcare funds to provide insurance to low-income residents. Both ideas have merit. Yet both are long shots politically.

It's worth noting that on more than a few items on the president's domestic agenda, the real action is in the states. It's hard to say how much Bush's thinking owes to leaders such as former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney (on healthcare) and Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger (on healthcare and global warming), but they can claim that they helped put these issues on the agenda. Both problems can only be solved at the national level, so the president's attention is encouraging.

Of course, much of the president's speech concerned Iraq, although he said little that was particularly original or helpful. What happens there, even more than what he said Tuesday night, will be the true test of the president's seriousness and resolve in the months ahead.

The State Of The Union (USAT)

USA Today, January 24, 2007

As President Bush delivered his State of the Union address Tuesday night, the scene around him was as telling as his words. On camera over his left shoulder sat Nancy Pelosi, the first Democratic House Speaker in 12 years and a symbol that the compliant Republican Congresses that rubber-stamped the president's Iraq policies are gone. For the first time in his presidency, Democratic majorities of both houses filled the chamber.

The president acknowledged that new reality in several ways. But not on Iraq. Bush appeared to be wedded Lyndon Johnson-like to a vision that is failing in the field, under bipartisan attack in Congress and opposed overwhelmingly by a public that expresses increasing restlessness in the polls.

He argued for his new plan but largely with his old ideas: that the stakes are so high there is no option but to succeed, and that failure would embolden radicals, posing a threat to U.S. allies throughout the Middle East and ultimately a threat to Americans.

All are distinct possibilities, but whether Bush's plan "provides the best chance of success," as he put it, is questionable.

The president didn't sound like a man down to his last chance, but he is. With voters already restless and angry over a war that was sold as a quick strike but is now almost four years old, no candidate of either party wants to go into the 2008 elections with nothing changed. That makes the end of this year the practical outside limit for Bush's policy to show success. Testifying to Congress earlier Tuesday, David Petraeus, the Army general who would carry out Bush's plan, called the situation in Iraq "dire" and said it might take until late summer to know whether the new strategy is working. That leaves a very small window for success.

Bush's hope is that the United States and its Iraqi allies can gain the upper hand by "surging" 21,500 additional U.S. troops to help subdue violence in Baghdad and hunt al-Qaeda in Anbar province. With the surge already under way, Americans should wish the troops well and hope for success. Even a glimmer of hope that the violence might begin to subside could change the equation. At the very least, it would give the United States leverage it hasn't had since the heady days after the fall of Baghdad to rally international support and bargain from strength with interventionist neighbors such as Iran and Syria.

But even Bush's staunchest backers concede success will take time and initially increase American casualties, which will at some point wear away what little is left of American support. The president has too often staked his credibility on plans for victory that turned out to be terribly flawed.

Today comes the inevitable price for that, as the Senate Foreign Relations Committee takes up nonbinding resolutions to disapprove Bush's surge policy. In the short run, the worst Bush can expect is a symbolic but politically painful rebuke.

Eventually, though, if Bush remains at odds with Congress, he could find himself pushed toward the sort of phased withdrawal outlined by the Iraq Study Group and largely backed by the senators pushing the resolutions. Among other things, they advocate refocusing a smaller U.S. force on training the Iraqi army to handle most security and positioning Americans to strike against al-Qaeda.

No president can sustain a war without support from the voters, and, as President Ford discovered when he pushed Vietnam to a final confrontation in 1975, no war can continue if Congress refuses to fund it.

Time is running out.

State Of Troubles (WP)

Washington Post, January 24, 2007

PRESIDENT BUSH offered the usual assurances last night about the healthy state of the union, but the state of his presidency has never been worse. He faces a Democratic majority in both chambers of Congress and a public increasingly unhappy about the war in Iraq and disenchanted with his leadership. By the time he delivers next year's State of the Union address, the primaries will be underway, and Mr. Bush's relevance will be fading. If he is to have a final chance to shape policy, this is it.

DOJ_NMG_0121000

For that reason, Mr. Bush was probably right to save discussion of foreign policy for the second half of last night's speech. At this point, there isn't much he can do to convince skeptics in Congress or the public about the correctness of his approach in Iraq; the time to craft a policy with more public support and bipartisan agreement passed with Mr. Bush's speech two weeks ago. Mr. Bush's goal last night was not so much to argue anew for the troop increase but to drive home the point that the "consequences of failure would be grievous and far reaching." On this, Mr. Bush is assuredly correct.

There are more opportunities for bipartisan cooperation domestically, but here what was most significant -- and disappointing -- was what Mr. Bush left off his agenda. Once again, he did not offer a sustained and broad-scale effort to address climate change, instead choosing to treat progress on the issue as just a fortuitous byproduct of his effort to cut gasoline consumption. Similarly, Mr. Bush -- having tried and failed to reform Social Security, having promised a commission on entitlements in last year's State of the Union that he never managed to convene -- referred only briefly, and without specifics, to the need to tackle the coming explosion in entitlement spending. And at a time when the country could benefit from a serious discussion of the importance of free trade and the parallel need to mitigate the disruptions of globalization, Mr. Bush referred just glancingly to trade.

Mr. Bush concentrated his pitch on four domestic areas: energy, health care, immigration reform and reauthorization of his signature education measure, the No Child Left Behind Act. He called for reducing gasoline consumption by 20 percent in the next decade, in part by adopting new fuel economy standards but mostly through increased reliance on alternative fuels. These initiatives are attractive, but it's not clear that the president's ambitious plan -- he'd increase alternative fuel use from the current 4 billion gallons per year to 35 billion by 2017 -- is feasible.

On health care, Mr. Bush would cap the currently unlimited tax deduction for employer-sponsored health insurance; he'd replace that with a standard deduction -- $15,000 for a family policy -- available for all insurance, whether offered by employers or bought privately. This would improve progressivity and fairness, and help contain health-care costs. As written, the proposal has flaws, but those can be addressed -- if Democrats are willing to do more than hurl criticism.

"Our citizens don't much care which side of the aisle we sit on -- as long as we are willing to cross that aisle when there is work to be done," Mr. Bush said last night. He missed key opportunities to put forward areas for such cooperation -- and in the past six years, he's done much to persuade Democrats that they have little to gain from partnership. Nonetheless, in the new political order that will dominate the final two years of the Bush presidency, it may be in the Democrats' interest as well as the nation's to seek bipartisan accomplishment. On energy, health care, education and immigration, Mr. Bush last night offered at least a reasonable basis for further discussion. Congress should engage, not reflexively dismiss.

State Of The Economy (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, January 24, 2007

Meanwhile, back at the economy, you may have noticed that 2006 ended without a recession. This follows the recessions of 2003, 2004 and 2005, all of which also never occurred, though they were widely warned about in the press and even forecast by many economists at some point during each of those years.

The big economic story going into this New Year is that growth is accelerating. Jobless claims have dipped, as the labor market stays tight amid a low 4.5% unemployment rate and rapidly rising real wages. Corporate profits continue to defy gravity, growing at nearly double-digit rates some five years into this expansion. Economist Ed Hyman's ISI Group reports that as of last Friday some 57% of companies had beat profit expectations for the fourth quarter.

Then there's the "trade deficit," which was supposed to have produced a crisis any day now but is instead contributing to faster growth as American exports soar. Peppier growth abroad is helping, especially in Europe, assuming Germany's big increase in value-added taxes this month doesn't get in the way. Oil prices have come down, and even the housing slump seems to have stabilized in some parts of the country.

If Bill Clinton were still President, he'd have used last night's State of the Union address to hail all of this as a triumph, taking political credit and claiming it was all due to his policies, with supportive headlines to match. It hardly matters what President Bush said last night; he still won't get any credit.

Democrats Slam Bush War Policy (AP)

By Laurie Kellman

AP, January 24, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0121001

Democrats blistered President Bush's war policy Tuesday night, challenging him to redeem the nation's credibility — and his own — with an immediate shift toward a diplomatic end to the bloody conflict in Iraq.

"The president took us into this war recklessly," the Democrats' chosen messenger, Sen. Jim Webb of Virginia, said in response to Bush's State of the Union address Tuesday evening. "We are now, as a nation, held hostage to the predictable — and predicted — disarray that has followed."

Webb, a Vietnam veteran who was Navy secretary during Republican President Reagan's administration, called for a new direction.

"Not one step back from the war against international terrorism. Not a precipitous withdrawal that ignores the possibility of further chaos," said Webb. "But an immediate shift toward strong regionally based diplomacy, a policy that takes our soldiers off the streets of Iraq's cities and a formula that will in short order allow our combat forces to leave Iraq."

Bush offered no such plan in his speech before the most unfriendly joint session of Congress of his tenure.

Instead, the president focused on making the case that "failure would be grievous and far-reaching" and he defended his plan to send 21,500 more troops to Iraq in a short-term surge. He also issued a long list of domestic policy initiatives centered on such pet Democratic issues as energy independence and health care.

Newly installed majority Democrats welcomed his overtures of bipartisanship but weren't interested in changing the subject.

"Unfortunately, tonight the president demonstrated he has not listened to Americans' single greatest concern: the war in Iraq," Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., and House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., said in a joint statement. "We will continue to hold him accountable for changing course in Iraq."

In a speech written himself and previewed by senior Democratic officials, Webb challenged Bush to support the House-passed minimum wage increase and nurture an economy that restores the middle class. And he said Democrats would work with Bush to promote energy independence.

But he chose harsher rhetoric for what he framed Bush's abuse of the public's loyalty, trust and welfare in the rush to war.

"The war's costs to our nation have been staggering," said Webb, whose son is serving in the military in Iraq. "Financially. The damage to our reputation around the world. The lost opportunities to defeat the forces of international terrorism, and especially the precious blood of our citizens who have stepped forward to serve."

Democrats also hammered home a message that achieving bipartisanship must be as much a part of Bush's agenda as proposals on the war, energy independence and health care.

"We hope to begin working with him to move our country in a new direction," Reid and Pelosi said in their statement.

"If he does, we will join him," Webb said. "If he does not, we will be showing him the way."

The speech capped the Democrats' effort to have the first, most frequent and last words on the president's annual address.

Seated in the gallery above the chamber was a reminder of a key factor in the Republicans' loss of congressional control and the lone veto of Bush's presidency. Actor Michael J. Fox, who has Parkinson's disease, attended as the guest of Rep. Jim Langevin, D-R.I., who is a quadriplegic, Langevin's spokeswoman said.

Both men have health problems that some scientists believe might someday be cured or treated by embryonic stem cell research. Bush last year vetoed a bill that would have allowed taxpayer money to speed up those studies, arguing that public funds should not be spent on research that destroys budding human life.

Fox then appeared in several campaign commercials for candidates that support the bill, sparking a controversy and helping tilt the election in the Democrats' favor. The House earlier this month passed the same bill by a margin far short of the two-thirds majority required to override a second veto.

Va.'s Webb Offers A Blunt Challenge To Bush (WP)

By Michael D. Shear

The Washington Post, January 24, 2007

Sen. James Webb (D-Va.) delivered a forceful nine-minute response to President Bush's State of the Union address last night, promising an aggressive challenge to Bush's Iraq and economic policies from the newly empowered Democratic majority in Congress.

Speaking live from a historic Capitol Hill meeting room, Webb displayed the same blunt manner that won over Virginia voters in November and later generated headlines after a face-to-face exchange with Bush at the White House.

Webb accused the president of taking the country into Iraq "recklessly" and forcing it to endure "a mismanaged war for nearly four years."

DOJ_NMG_0121002

"Many, including myself, warned even before the war began that it was unnecessary; that it would take our energy and attention away from the larger war against terrorism; and that invading and occupying Iraq would leave us strategically vulnerable," Webb said.

Webb held up a picture of his father as a young Air Force captain. As a small boy, he said, he took the picture to bed with him to remind him of his father's sacrifice. Now, Webb's son is serving in Iraq as a Marine infantryman.

"We need a new direction," said Webb, a decorated Marine veteran of the Vietnam War. "Not one step back from the war against international terrorism, not a precipitous withdrawal that ignores the possibility of further chaos, but an immediate shift toward strong, regionally based diplomacy."

Democrats owe their newfound control of the Senate to Webb's slim and improbable victory over former Virginia senator George Allen. Webb -- who served as secretary of the Navy under Ronald Reagan -- also embodies his party's central message: a determination to oppose the Iraq war while supporting the troops who are there.

Webb has become a folk hero among liberals and Democratic bloggers for brusquely telling Bush at a White House event that questions from the president about Webb's son are "between me and my boy."

So after just three weeks as a U.S. senator, Webb became the choice of the Democratic leadership in the Senate and House of Representatives to carry their blunt warning about Bush's new war strategy.

"He represents to me what the new America is all about," said Senate Majority Leader Harry M. Reid (Nev.) as he faced about 40 reporters with Webb and House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (Calif.). "Someone who understands what it means to go to war, what it means to have peace, what it means to work on a bipartisan basis. I think he's the perfect person to answer the president."

For the second year, Democrats turned to a newly elected Virginian for their response to Bush. Last year, they picked Gov. Timothy M. Kaine, fresh from victory in the conservative state.

Kaine offered an upbeat, hopeful message tinged with a few jabs at Bush. Webb, a former boxer, offered a harsher critique of the president's six years in office. With his party in control of Congress, Webb gave a speech that was more aggressive and confident.

On the economy, he described a growing divide between rich and poor during the Bush presidency. "In short, the middle class of this country, our historic backbone and our best hope for a strong society in the future, is losing its place at the table," he said.

For Webb, the speech capped a remarkable year that began with an underfunded, largely dismissed campaign to unseat a leading presidential hopeful. For most of the year, his campaign was ignored by pundits and criticized by suspicious Democrats.

But his bid for office caught on as Allen's was rocked by gaffes and scandal. After his 9,000-vote victory, Webb thrust his son's combat boots over his head, the first time Webb had had them off his feet in public since the Senate campaign began.

Webb began yesterday by spilling a cup of coffee on his blue shirt, prompting an aide to urge a change of clothes rather than just a buttoning of his jacket. "I told him this was one of the biggest appearances he'd make in his life, so maybe we should change the shirt," said Jessica Smith, Webb's communications director.

For the first time, networks planned to broadcast the State of the Union and Webb's response in high-definition television. That prompted Webb's staff to hire a makeup specialist who could make sure that Webb looked good in crystal-clear pictures.

Aides said Webb took the speech seriously, vigorously rewriting the initial draft suggested by the offices of Reid and Pelosi. But like past State of the Union responders, Webb received much unsolicited advice. Asked why the speech grew from five minutes to more than eight, Smith said, "That's what happens when you have input from everyone."

Webb concluded his speech with references to former presidents Dwight Eisenhower and Theodore Roosevelt and a warning for Bush:

"These presidents took the right kind of action for the benefit of the American people and for the health of our relations around the world. Tonight, we are calling on this president to take similar action in both areas. If he does, we will join him. If he does not, we will be showing him the way."

Democratic Sen. Webb Rebukes Bush's Handling Of Iraq (MCT)

By Margaret Talev

McClatchy Newspapers, January 24, 2007

WASHINGTON - In a stinging Democratic Party response to President Bush's State of the Union address, freshman Sen. James Webb of Virginia said Bush "took us into this war recklessly" and "we are now as a nation held hostage to the predictable and predicted disarray that has followed."

Webb, whose Marine son is serving in Iraq, said Bush has lost the support of the majority of the country and the military.

DOJ_NMG_0121003

Webb called for "not one step back from the war against international terrorism, not a precipitous withdrawal that ignores the possibility of further chaos, but an immediate shift toward strong, regionally-based diplomacy, a policy that takes our soldiers off the streets of Iraq's cities and a formula that will in short order allow our combat forces to leave Iraq."

The Democratic-led Senate and House of Representatives plan to pass nonbinding resolutions opposing the president's troop buildup, but as of now they aren't threatening to withhold funding for it.

Before Webb was a Vietnam War hero, or President Reagan's Navy secretary, or a best-selling author, or the Republican-turned-Democrat who beat Sen. George Allen last year to give Democrats the last seat they needed to take control of the Senate, he was a boxer at the U.S. Naval Academy.

On Tuesday night, he delivered his harshest blows against the war in Iraq.

But he also jabbed at other openings, saying that now that Democrats control Congress for the first time in Bush's presidency, they'll hold him to deliver on promises to improve public education, health care, the plight of Hurricane Katrina survivors and economic conditions for the working class.

Invoking the legacies of two past Republican presidents - Theodore Roosevelt for taking on corporate robber barons and Dwight D. Eisenhower for ending the Korean War - Webb challenged Bush to follow their examples.

"If he does, we will join him," he said. "If he does not, we will be showing him the way."

Democrats Hit Bush On Iraq And Economy (USAT)

By Kathy Kiely

USA Today, January 24, 2007

WASHINGTON — Sen. Jim Webb of Virginia accused President Bush of presiding over a "mismanaged war" and an imbalanced economy Tuesday in a bluntly worded speech that reflected the new Democratic majority's willingness to flex its muscle in Congress.

Webb, who won last November in an upset after a campaign centered largely on his opposition to the war in Iraq, focused on the war in a nationally televised speech that served as his party's official response to the president.

A decorated Vietnam War combat veteran, Webb invoked his family's tradition of military service. His father, an Air Force colonel, is buried in Arlington National Cemetery, and his son, Jimmy, is a Marine serving in Iraq.

"We owed them our loyalty, as Americans, and we gave it," he said. "They owed us sound judgment, clear thinking, concern for our welfare — a guarantee that the threat to our country was equal to the price we might be called upon to pay for defending it."

Bush and his advisers, he added, repaid the loyalty of the troops in Iraq by going to war "recklessly."

On the economy, Webb struck a populist note, decrying the widening disparity between the earnings of corporate executives and average workers, and the outsourcing of manufacturing jobs. "The middle class of this country, our historic backbone and our best hope for a strong society in the future, is losing its place at the table," he said.

The aggressive note struck by Webb in the Democrats' official rebuttal reflected the changed political reality on Capitol Hill. For the first time since assuming the presidency in 2001, Bush was addressing a Congress that his party does not control.

The change was personified by the presence of Nancy Pelosi, a California Democrat and the nation's first female speaker of the House, sitting next to Vice President Dick Cheney behind the president as he spoke. Even Republicans, having lost the majority, seemed less inclined to be generous with the huzzahs and ovations that have punctuated Bush's past appearances.

"There's a lot of angst," said Sen. Mel Martinez, a Florida Republican who served in Bush's Cabinet and now chairs the Republican National Committee. In a sign of how far the president's star has fallen on Capitol Hill, Martinez expressed concern about Bush's reception. "I hope it's respectful," he said before the speech.

Members from both parties made it plain the deference shown the president wouldn't last much beyond Bush's one-hour visit to the Capitol.

Rep. Patrick McHenry, R-N.C., called Bush's health care proposal "dead on arrival." He blamed Democratic leaders, but McHenry made it plain that he isn't enthused about a plan that would increase taxes on some Americans. "I'd rather see us focus on free-market measures, like health care savings accounts," he said.

Rep. John Murtha, D-Pa., dismissed Bush's call for a bipartisan task force on Iraq as "ridiculous." He said the president should instead consult with congressional committees on defense and foreign affairs. "It's a gimmick," Murtha, the top-ranking Democrat on the House panel that controls the defense budget, said of Bush's proposal.

Others saw it differently. "The president's bold, specific challenge to the Congress is to work together to tackle the big issues facing our nation," said Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell, R-Ky. "I believe we can find big solutions to big problems but only if the debate is aimed at accomplishment over political gain."

DOJ_NMG_0121004

In his speech, Webb said the Democrats are "serious" about wanting to achieve bipartisan agreement. But he questioned Bush's sincerity by noting "this is the seventh time the president has mentioned energy independence in his State of the Union message."

Pelosi shared Webb's skepticism, telling reporters that Bush's deeds have so far not matched his rhetoric when it comes to weaning Americans from fossil fuels. "He has talked the talk, but he hasn't walked the walk," she said.

While Bush was seeking to work with Congress on domestic issues, Democrats and some Republicans were preparing to challenge him on Iraq. This morning, less than 12 hours after the president leaves Capitol Hill, the Senate Foreign Relations Committee is set to begin debating a resolution to express congressional disapproval of his plan to commit more troops to the Iraq war.

To Deliver Their Remarks, Democrats Opt To Put A Fresh Face Front And Center (NYT)

By Jeff Zeleny

The New York Times, January 24, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 23 — When President Bush concluded his State of the Union address, Democrats did not turn to the House speaker, Nancy Pelosi, or to the Senate majority leader, Harry Reid, to deliver their response. They chose a different face for the party: a former Republican, an ex-marine and a secretary of the Navy in the Reagan administration.

That Democrat, Senator Jim Webb of Virginia, who won his seat at least in part through his tenacious opposition to the Iraq war, wore his son's combat boots on the campaign trail last year. And on Tuesday evening, Mr. Webb invoked his own biography, and his family's three generations of military service, as he declared that today's soldiers could no longer trust the judgment of their commander in chief.

"The majority of the nation no longer supports the way this war is being fought, nor do the majority of our military, nor does a majority of our Congress," Mr. Webb said. "We need a new direction."

The choice of Mr. Webb was intended to provide a symbol, through his words and appearance, for the new majority in Congress. In a commanding voice, the senator chastised the administration for its economic and foreign policies, but said Democrats would try to work with Mr. Bush to change course.

"If he does not," Mr. Webb said, "we will be showing him the way."

Late last year, before being sworn into the Senate, Mr. Webb created a minor furor when he declined to stand in line for a photograph with the president at a White House reception. When the two men finally came face to face, Mr. Bush asked Mr. Webb about his son, who was deployed in Iraq, to which Mr. Webb replied tersely, "That's between me and my boy."

In a city that cherishes photo opportunities, where even political rivals are inclined to extend a hand and smile, the private moment highlighted deep tensions of the day. The conservative columnist George F. Will derided Mr. Webb as a "pompous poseur" disrespectful of the president, while liberal bloggers hailed him as a burst of fresh air.

Mr. Webb, 60, is a leading member of the freshman class of Democrats who arrived here with a mandate of change. His triumph over Senator George Allen, a one-term Republican, made him a hero among Democrats, particularly among antiwar activists, and prompted Representative Pelosi, of California, and Senator Reid, of Nevada, to tap him for the marquee position.

"He represents to me what the new America is all about," Mr. Reid, "someone who understands what it means to go to war, what it means to have peace, what it means to work on a bipartisan basis, someone who understands Reagan Democrats and the non-Reagan Democrats and independents and Republicans out there."

At the same time, Mr. Webb also illustrates the internal challenges facing Democrats as they settle on a response to the president's Iraq strategy. His five-minute speech did wade into the thorny question of whether the party will go beyond a symbolic resolution denouncing Mr. Bush's plan to send more troops to Baghdad.

"We are now, as a nation, held hostage to the predictable — and predicted — disarray that has followed," Mr. Webb said, speaking against a backdrop of a United States and Virginia flag on the Capitol's second floor. "The war's costs to our nation have been staggering."

In his speech, which was approved by Democratic Congressional leaders, Mr. Webb also criticized Mr. Bush as presiding over an era of economic injustice.

"It's almost as if we are living in two different countries," Mr. Webb said, noting that corporate profits might be reaching new highs, but that those benefits were reserved for the few. "The middle class of this country — our historic backbone and our best hope for a strong society in the future — is losing its place at the table."

Sending A Clear 'Daddy' Message To The Public (FT)

By Edward Luce In Washington

Financial Times, January 24, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0121005

Often referred to as the "Mommy party", the Democratic party's choice of Jim Webb – the newly-elected senator from Virginia – to respond to Tuesday night's annual State of the Union address by President George W. Bush was designed to send a clear "Daddy" message to the public.

A former navy secretary in Ronald Reagan's administration and a veteran of the Vietnam war, Mr Webb holds the ideal credentials to criticise Mr Bush's "escalation" of the Iraq war while insulating the party against any charge of being soft on national security.

"Obviously Jim is a combat veteran who has very strong views on Iraq," said Jim Manley, spokesman for Harry Reid, the Democratic Senate majority leader. "During the [November mid-term] election campaign Jim spoke from the heart against the war and captured the mood of the American public."

So strongly does Mr Webb feel about the Iraq war that he refused last month to have his picture taken alongside Mr Bush in the White House. The two also had a testy exchange when the president asked about Mr Webb's son, who is serving as a marine in Iraq.

Mr Webb said that he wanted to bring the soldiers home. "That's not what I asked you. How's your boy?" Mr Bush asked again. "That's between me and my boy," the senator shot back.

Mr Webb was criticised by some for his alleged discourtesy to the president. But others felt the exchange reflected what they most admired in the freshman senator – a reputation for plain-speaking and strong convictions.

Tuesday night's short speech by Mr Webb, seen by the FT beforehand, also focused on the other key issue that motivates the senator and many of the new intake of Democratic lawmakers from last November's congressional election victory.

In addition to his opposition to the Iraq war, Mr Webb based his election campaign on a platform of "economic fairness" couched in a language of suspicion of free trade and globalisation.

The 60-year-old self-described "Scots-Irish", whose wife, Hong Le, is Vietnamese, has railed against the "internationalisation of corporate America" and identified what he describes as a "growing class divide" in the US.

This month, he said Mr Bush should spend money on rebuilding New Orleans and other parts of the south damaged by Hurricane Katrina in 2005 rather than "wasting billions on Iraq".

Democratic strategists say the choice of Mr Webb was also intended to send a strong signal about the party's economic agenda in the 110th Congress. This is likely to include proposals to expand healthcare coverage to the 47m Americans who are uninsured, new tax breaks for the middle classes and a much tighter rein on the president's scope to pursue trade agreements with developing countries.

"The Democratic party's economic fairness agenda is something you will see evidence of in the committee hearings and debates on Capitol Hill over the next weeks and months," said J.B. Poersch, head of the Democratic Senate campaign committee. "It is something Jim Webb is very well qualified to symbolise."

As is virtually obligatory in Washington, Mr Webb also spoke on Tuesday night about the need for bipartisan co-operation. Mr Bush, who used similar sentiments, desperately needs to create a new "era of bipartisanship" on Capitol Hill to give the White House a chance of pushing through what remains of the president's relatively ambitious agenda.

In order to do so, however, Mr Bush will have to win over people like Mr Webb who, in spite of being a prize-winning novelist, is not easily impressed by high-sounding words.

DOJ:

Attorney General Skips Speech (AP)

ASSOCIATED PRESS

AP, January 24, 2007

WASHINGTON (AP) - Attorney General Alberto Gonzales stayed away from the Capitol Tuesday night in case of a catastrophic attack or accident as President Bush delivered his sixth State of the Union address.

By long-standing tradition, a member of the president's Cabinet misses the speech to Congress as a precaution against the entire administration's being wiped out and to maintain the presidential line of succession. Last year, Veterans Affairs Secretary Jim Nicholson did not attend.

The State of the Union address typically draws most members of both congressional houses and other top government officials, including Vice President Dick Cheney, who is also the president of the Senate.

Editorial: Questionable Firings (LVS)

Las Vegas Sun, January 24, 2007

Using specious reasoning, Bush administration pushes out several veteran prosecutors

Daniel Bogden, the U.S. attorney for Nevada, resigned last week, a victim of a Bush administration housecleaning. At least seven U.S. attorneys, most from the West, have been forced to resign, but no one will say why - not Bogden, not the Justice Department, not Sen. John Ensign, R-Nev., who was briefed by the Justice Department.

Attorney General Alberto Gonzales told the Senate Judiciary Committee last week that it was simply good management, so he could get the "very best" people into office.

That strikes us as odd because those fired had done fairly well. Bogden, a well-respected career prosecutor confirmed by the Senate in October 2001, oversaw the successful prosecution of the G-sting political corruption case, as well as prosecutions that put more than 40 members of the violent Rolling 60s Crips gang in federal prison. Others fired include the U.S. attorney in San Francisco, who was leading the probe into steroid use among professional athletes, and the U.S. attorney in San Diego, who oversaw the successful political corruption prosecution of former Republican Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham.

Democrats wonder if the Bush administration is trying to use a provision in the Patriot Act that lets the president appoint an "interim" U.S. attorney without Senate approval. Gonzales denies the claim, but we note that one of the fired prosecutors was replaced with 38-year-old Tim Griffin, a former deputy to White House political guru Karl Rove, who would have little chance to survive confirmation in the Democratic-controlled Senate. A Justice Department press release said Griffin would serve "under an Attorney General appointment" as interim U.S. attorney.

While nominated by the president, U.S. attorneys have, once confirmed, traditionally been insulated from much political pressure. The sudden dismissal of these U.S. attorneys smacks of White House meddling. The justice system and the public deserve much better, starting with the truth.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Broadcom Restates $2.22 Billion, Blames Former Chief (Update3) (BLOOM)

By Peter J. Brennan

Bloomberg, January 24, 2007

Jan. 23 (Bloomberg) -- Broadcom Corp., a maker of chips for consumer devices, restated financial results to reflect $2.2 billion in costs for misdated stock-option grants, a problem the company blamed on former Chief Executive Officer Henry Nicholas.

Nicholas ``bears significant responsibility for the lack of adequate controls'' in granting options, Irvine, California-based Broadcom said in a regulatory filing with the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission. The filing also placed blame on former Chief Financial Officer William Ruehle and former Vice President of Human Resources Nancy Tullos.

Henry Samueli, who co-founded Broadcom with Nicholas and is still chairman and chief technical officer, ``reasonably relied'' on outside experts when granting options, the filing said. Broadcom is being investigated by both the SEC and the U.S. Justice Department.

``It makes sense because Henry Nicholas was very much in charge of the company during his tenure,'' Stifel Nicolaus & Co. analyst Cody Acree said about the blame being placed on Nicholas. ``He was iconic in the industry, and he was Broadcom. Henry Samueli has always been more on the engineering side.''

Broadcom restated its financial results for 1998 to 2005 and said the costs were noncash. ``Substantially all'' of the extra costs were recorded in the periods before 2004, the company said.

Shares of Broadcom fell 20 cents to $29.46 at 4:20 p.m. in Nasdaq Stock Market trading and have dropped 8.8 percent this year.

Lawyer's Response

The stock options ``in hindsight should have been accounted for differently,'' Nicholas's attorney, John Spiegel, said in an e-mail. He said Broadcom didn't find Nicholas had benefited from the backdated options and didn't ``knowingly'' engage in selecting grant dates after the fact.

Ruehle, who was CFO for almost 10 years before resigning in September, forfeited $32.8 million in stock options, the filing said. He personally benefited from the backdating, it said. The company spent $5.2 million buying back Ruehle's shares that were granted before it went public in 1998.

Ruehle ``was at the center of the flawed option-granting process,'' the filing said. ``There is substantial evidence he engaged in the selection of grant dates after the fact.''

Broadcom terminated more than $4 million of options of Tullos, who resigned in 2003, the filing said. Ruehle, Nicholas and Tullos didn't agree to be interviewed during the investigation, the filing said.

Former High Flier

Broadcom was a high-flying company with expensive Italian Lamborghini sports cars dotting the parking lot when the stock price rose to split-adjusted $183.17 in August 2000. The company used stock options as a way to attract talented engineers. Its stock price fell as low as $6.47 cents in October 2002.

Nicholas resigned in January 2003, citing marital problems. Broadcom hired Scott McGregor as CEO in January 2005. Both McGregor and acting CFO Bruce Kiddoo can certify the company's financial records, Broadcom said.

The company makes chips for consumer electronics such as television set-top boxes, Apple Computer Inc.'s video iPod and Nintendo Co.'s Wii game console.

Broadcom in July originally estimated the stock-option costs at $750 million. In September it said the expenses would be more than $1.5 billion. The costs don't affect the company's cash position or reported revenue in prior years.

``The bigger benefit is that there is some finality to this," Acree said. ``We've had management changes and now restatements. The management can now focus on the fundamentals."

Broadcom Co-Founder Nicholas Faces Much Of Backdating Onus (WSJ)

By Charles Forelle And James Bandler

The Wall Street Journal, January 24, 2007

Broadcom Corp. said Henry T. Nicholas III, its billionaire co-founder, bears responsibility for much of the stock-option backdating that occurred at the chip maker, which restated years of financial results and recorded $2.24 billion in extra expenses.

In restated securities filings made yesterday, Broadcom said it had slapdash options-granting procedures from its 1998 initial public offering through May 2003 that permitted the abuses, pointing to a "lack of adequate controls" thanks to the "tone and style of doing business" that Mr. Nicholas set.

The company noted 68 instances in which it couldn't find contemporaneous paperwork to document grant-approval meetings, and 18 cases when grant dates were selected after the fact. The restatement is the largest of any company of those forced to admit to errors or malfeasance in the options scandal. Broadcom's figure eclipses the up to $1.7 billion in charges insurer UnitedHealth Group Inc. has said it expects to take. Broadcom's disclosure may draw fresh attention to the role of Mr. Nicholas.

Broadcom said its evidence indicates Mr. Nicholas, who didn't receive any tainted options himself, was "at times involved with the selection of grant dates after the fact," noting he sought advice from William Ruehle, the longtime finance chief who left last year. Broadcom said there is "substantial evidence" Mr. Ruehle was involved in the backdating. Broadcom said the charges totaled $2.69 billion from 1998 through the first quarter of 2006; after adjusting for taxes and nearly $400 million of options forfeited because of employee terminations, the figure is $2.24 billion, the company said.

John W. Spiegel, attorney for Mr. Nicholas, said that the heady growth at Broadcom under Mr. Nichlolas' tenure and the high level of employee stock ownership resulted in "stock-option grants that in hindsight should have been accounted for differently." But Mr. Spiegel said the audit committee found that Mr. Nicholas "did not personally benefit, did not knowingly engage in selecting grant dates after the fact, and sought advice from appropriate persons regarding the process for option grants."

Mr. Ruehle's lawyer, Robert Feldman, said the Broadcom matter was less serious than that at the other companies under federal investigation. He said the board review "found no evidence of falsification or forgery -- conduct which is being found at many other companies." Mr. Feldman said the Broadcom case was distinguished "only by the size of the restatement, which relates not to the nature of the conduct, but to the volatility and number of shares."

A Nicholas family trust controls about 30% of Broadcom's voting power, according to the company's most recent proxy statement. The Irvine, Calif., company said 232.9 million options -- largely granted to nonexecutive employees -- bore faulty dates. Accounting rules in place at the time of the grants required companies to record charges for discount options -- those whose strike price was below the stock's market value at the time the grant was made. In Broadcom's case, some of the discounts were enormous -- due, in part, to the stock's volatility during the tech boom. That helped account for the size of the restatements. The company has said one grant, purportedly made on the day the stock hit its quarterly low in May 2000, was finalized later that year. By midsummer, Broadcom's shares had risen more than $100.

In addition to citing the roles of Messrs. Nicholas and Ruehle, Broadcom said a former human-resources executive, Nancy Tullos, "bears significant responsibility" for the options troubles. The company said it found evidence Ms. Tullos "was fully aware of what was occurring, and encouraged, assisted in and enabled it," though it didn't find she participated in choosing the dates.

Ms. Tullos' attorney, Ismail "Izzy" Ramsey, said, "Ms. Tullos is neither an accountant nor a lawyer. And, as the company acknowledged, she didn't select any of the favorable grant dates. As an HR executive, everything Nancy did to assist in processing option grants was directed and approved by her superiors and other professionals... And, in every instance, she did what everyone thought was in the best interests of Broadcom and its employees." Broadcom said Ms. Tullos, who left in 2003, still held options last month valued at more than $4 million. It terminated those options, along with $32 million of options held by Mr. Ruehle.

N.Y. Pension Fund To Lead Lawsuit Over Apple Options (WP/AP)

The Washington Post, January 24, 2007

SAN JOSE -- A New York pension system will be the lead plaintiff in a shareholders lawsuit accusing Apple of illegally backdating stock options.

The New York City Employees' Retirement System was named the primary plaintiff in the lawsuit Friday by U.S. District Judge Jeremy D. Fogel, according to Grant & Eisenhofer, the law firm representing the group.

The system, which manages about $89 billion in retirement assets for more than 200,000 municipal employees, owns about 1 million shares of Apple stock. The plaintiffs are seeking class-action status for their case and want damages in connection with what they allege were illegally backdated stock options.

Fogel is also hearing a separate but similar securities case that consolidates a number of civil complaints about Apple's stock-options accounting. Apple has not yet responded to either case.

Federal prosecutors are investigating Apple's past stock-options practices, including a specific stock option award to chief executive Steve Jobs. Federal investigators last week questioned Jobs about the company's backdating practices.

Apple said its internal investigation cleared Jobs and other current management of wrongdoing.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Defense Says Libby Was 'Sacrificed' (LAT)

By Richard B. Schmitt

The Los Angeles Times, January 24, 2007

WASHINGTON — I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby feared that White House officials were conspiring to make him the fall guy in the CIA leak scandal to protect political strategist Karl Rove, Libby's lawyer argued Tuesday.

In his opening remarks at Libby's perjury and obstruction trial, defense attorney Theodore Wells Jr. portrayed the former vice presidential aide as a sympathetic figure who was following his boss' orders to rebut an administration critic.

But Wells said Libby came to believe that he had lost the support of the administration he had sought to defend.

"Karl Rove was President Bush's right-hand person in terms of political strategy. Karl Rove was the person most responsible that the Republican Party stayed in office. His fate was important to the Republican Party. He had to be protected," Wells said.

"The person who was to be sacrificed, that's Scooter Libby," Wells said. "The person whose neck had been put in the meat grinder, you'll learn, was Scooter Libby."

Vice President Dick Cheney was concerned that his chief of staff might be unjustly tarred, Wells said, producing an excerpt from a note handwritten by Cheney: "Not going to protect one staffer + sacrifice the guy that was asked to stick his neck in the meat grinder because of the incompetence of others."

Special prosecutor Patrick J. Fitzgerald offered a sharply different portrait of the defendant, saying that Libby had obstructed the search for the truth to protect his boss. Fitzgerald said Libby assiduously gathered information about an outspoken critic of the administration's Iraq policy, former envoy Joseph C. Wilson IV, and his wife, Valerie Plame, from various officials and then discussed the findings with journalists in a series of conversations.

Libby is charged with five counts of perjury and obstruction of justice in connection with his descriptions of those conversations to FBI agents and a federal grand jury. The trial is expected to last up to six weeks and promises testimony from Cheney and such high-profile journalists as Judith Miller, then a reporter for the New York Times; "Meet the Press" moderator Tim Russert of NBC News; and Matthew Cooper, then of Time magazine.

The defense suggestion of a high-level conspiracy, made on the opening day of the trial, was the first indication of a breach within the normally secretive White House over the handling of a case that had cast a legal and political cloud over the Bush administration for three years.

Wells did not identify the officials who might have been involved. But he set the stage for a broad attack on some witnesses the government plans to call, saying they were not credible.

DOJ_NMG_0121009

One of them, former White House Press Secretary Ari Fleischer, had initially asserted his 5th Amendment right against self-incrimination in the case and had agreed to cooperate with federal investigators only after being granted immunity, Wells said. He also indicated that he plans to challenge the testimony of three journalists who are key to the government case.

The investigation that resulted in Libby's indictment grew out of the revelation by syndicated columnist Robert Novak on July 14, 2003, that Plame worked for the CIA. Eight days earlier, the New York Times had published an op-ed article by Wilson accusing Bush of misleading the public in his 2003 State of the Union address.

Bush had asserted that then-Iraqi President Saddam Hussein had sought nuclear material in Africa — a contention Wilson had investigated for the CIA in 2002 and rejected.

Novak's column disclosed that "Wilson's wife" worked for the CIA on weapons of mass destruction. It suggested that Wilson's 2002 trip to Africa was due to nepotism, calling into question the credibility of his findings.

In July, Novak revealed Rove was one of the "administration sources" who confirmed Plame worked at the CIA but added he did not initially learn about her from Rove. No charges have been filed against Bush's top political aide. Libby has denied giving information about Plame to the journalists, but the journalists say he did exactly that.

Disclosing the identity of a covert agent can be a felony under federal law. But Libby did not know, Wells said, that Plame had worked undercover, and he considered her a footnote in a broader dispute with her husband.

Wells foreshadowed his defense Tuesday with a sympathetic portrayal of Libby as an influential Cheney loyalist who, on the command of his boss, took on an effort to talk with reporters to rebut allegations by Wilson that the administration had twisted prewar intelligence.

He conceded the possibility that his client may have not told the truth to investigators but said it was not deliberate. Rather, he said, it was because Libby was preoccupied with such weighty matters as a daily stream of terrorism threats, rumors of presidential assassination plots, and nuclear proliferation in North Korea and Iran.

"There will be no witness who takes that stand during this trial who takes the oath [and] swears to God and says, 'I know Scooter Libby lied,' " Wells said, adding: "This is a weak, paper-thin circumstantial evidence case about 'he said, she said.' "

Fitzgerald recounted to the jury how Wilson's column in the New York Times reverberated in the White House the day it was published.

"It's Sunday, July 6, 2003, the last day of a three-day Fourth of July weekend," Fitzgerald began. "Sunday, the fireworks are over, but a different kind of fireworks are about to begin."

Wilson had "leveled a direct attack on the White House's credibility and an attack on the vice president in particular," Fitzgerald said. The White House was "stunned," he said. "But then the White House began to push back" with Libby in the lead. In the crossfire, Fitzgerald said, "Wilson's wife got dragged in."

Fitzgerald said that the defense Libby has offered — that he did not deliberately lie — was not credible.

He cited as proof the events of the week after Wilson's column was published.

Libby allegedly revealed the identity of Plame in hushed tones over lunch to press chief Fleischer on Monday and shared that fact in a conversation with the New York Times' Miller the next day. But he testified before a grand jury that on Thursday, he was surprised to hear in a conversation with Russert that Plame worked for the CIA.

"You can't learn something startling on Thursday that you are giving out on Monday and Tuesday," Fitzgerald said.

Wells replied that he intended to test the credibility of some of those journalists. He said that Cooper had no notes showing that Libby had shared information with him about Plame, and that Miller had an acknowledged memory problem.

"Tim Russert is a great reporter, but he is a human being," Wells said. Libby had told investigators that he learned the identity of Plame from Russert. But Russert denied giving Libby that information.

Wells said Russert may have been the one who did not remember the conversation with Libby correctly.

The lawyer said that another NBC newsman, White House correspondent David Gregory, learned that Plame worked at the CIA from Fleischer while the two were on a presidential trip to Africa.

Gregory learned about Plame just hours before Russert spoke with Libby and conceivably could have passed along the information to Russert, Wells said. That would mean Russert could have told Libby about Plame, as Libby contends.

"Tim Russert had a deal. He had a deal with the government whereby he would only be questioned about his conversation with Scooter Libby, and he could not be questioned about anything else," Wells said. "So Mr. Russert was not required to answer questions about David Gregory…. We will explore that deal when Mr. Russert comes to court."

Liar Or 'Scapegoat'? 2 Depictions Of Libby As Trial Opens (USAT)

By Richard Willing

USA Today, January 24, 2007

WASHINGTON — Vice presidential adviser Lewis "Scooter" Libby repeatedly lied to FBI agents and grand jurors to impede a politically embarrassing investigation into how and why a CIA officer's classified identity was leaked to reporters in 2003, a federal prosecutor charged Tuesday.

"This is not a case about bad memory; this is not a case about forgetfulness," prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald said in his opening statement in Libby's trial.

Libby's attorney, Theodore Wells, attacked that argument. He said the case against Libby is weak and circumstantial. Wells said Libby is being made a "scapegoat" for White House political adviser Karl Rove. It was Rove, not Libby, the lawyer said, who identified CIA covert officer Valerie Plame in a phone call with a reporter.

When the White House press secretary said Rove was not involved in the leak but later refused to clear Libby, Wells said, Libby sought Vice President Cheney's help. " 'They're trying to set me up. They want me to be the sacrificial lamb,' " Wells said, describing Libby's part of the conversation. " 'I will not be sacrificed so Karl Rove can be protected.' "

"Libby was an important staffer," Wells said. "But Karl Rove was the lifeblood of the Republican Party."

Libby has not been charged with leaking classified information, Wells noted. "He had no motive to lie because he had done nothing wrong," Wells said.

Libby, 56, Cheney's former chief of staff and national security adviser, is charged with one count of obstruction and four counts of lying to FBI agents and a federal grand jury investigating how Plame's identity was leaked to reporters.

During his opening statement, prosecutor Fitzgerald said Libby leaked Plame's identity as part of a Bush administration plan to discredit her husband, former diplomat Joseph Wilson. Eight days before Plame was identified in print as a CIA officer, Wilson alleged in a New York Times column that the Bush administration had twisted some intelligence reports "to exaggerate the Iraqi threat" in leading the country to war. A year earlier, Wilson had been sent to Africa to explore reports that Iraq had tried to buy uranium from Niger. He found the reports groundless.

No one was charged with disclosing Plame's identity. Identifying a covert CIA officer can be a crime, if it is done with knowledge that the officer's status is classified.

The story of Plame's "outing" and the investigation that led to Libby's indictment in 2005 riveted political circles for more than two years. That drama, Fitzgerald said Tuesday, was not part of his case. Instead, he said, he had a "narrow focus" on Libby's alleged lies.

Fitzgerald told jurors that Libby learned of Plame's CIA job from Cheney, then from two other CIA employees, from a State Department official and from a Cheney spokesman in June or early July 2003, before Libby passed the information to two news reporters. Matt Cooper, formerly of Time magazine, and Judith Miller, formerly of The New York Times, are to testify for the prosecution.

Fitzgerald said Libby played a key role in helping Cheney deflect criticism beginning in July 2003 that he was responsible for "twisting intelligence" to suggest that Iraq was in the process of acquiring uranium, possibly for a nuclear weapon.

Wells, by contrast, continually invoked the political atmosphere of summer and early fall 2003, the time that gave rise to the leaks and investigation. He said that Libby, distracted by al-Qaeda and other national security issues, only reluctantly agreed to talk to reporters to defend Cheney against allegations of manipulating intelligence.

Libby Portrayed As 'Sacrificial Lamb' At Trial (WT)

By Joseph Curl

The Washington Times, January 24, 2007

The defense in the CIA leak trial of I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby Jr. charged yesterday that senior White House officials sought to protect political strategist Karl Rove by making the former vice presidential chief of staff a "sacrificial lamb."

During opening arguments in Mr. Libby's perjury trial, the only criminal case to emerge from a three-year investigation into the 2003 leak of a CIA operative's identity, attorney Theodore Wells said the White House quickly cleared Mr. Rove of wrongdoing but did not seek to exonerate the vice presidential aide.

Left out in the cold, Mr. Libby went to his boss, Vice President Dick Cheney.

"They're trying to set me up. They want me to be the sacrificial lamb," Mr. Wells said, recalling a conversation between Mr. Libby and Mr. Cheney shortly after the story became public. "I will not be sacrificed so Karl Rove can be protected."

Mr. Wells also sought to portray Mr. Libby, who faces 30 years in prison if convicted on five counts of lying to FBI agents, as incredibly busy, so busy that he forgot when and how he learned the identity of CIA employee Valerie Plame, the wife of a former ambassador who had been critical of the administration's Iraq invasion.

"He spends his day trying to connect the dots to be sure we don't have another 9/11," Mr. Wells said.

But special prosecutor Patrick J. Fitzgerald said in the government's opening argument that Mr. Libby consciously lied.

DOJ_NMG_0121011

"When the FBI and grand jury asked about what the defendant did," Mr. Fitzgerald said, "he made up a story. ... This isn't a case about having a bad memory; having a bad memory is not a crime. He knowingly and intentionally lied."

The trial is the culmination of a saga that stretches back to July 2003, when former U.S. Ambassador Joseph C. Wilson IV accused the Bush administration of exaggerating the threat posed by Iraq to justify the invasion of Iraq. Mr. Wilson labeled as a lie Mr. Bush's claim that Iraq had sought uranium yellowcake from Africa.

The prosecutor said that in the days before syndicated columnist Robert Novak revealed that Mrs. Plame was married to Mr. Wilson, Mr. Libby learned her identity from at least five persons -- from his boss to members of the CIA and State Department.

Mr. Libby revealed her identity to at least three reporters, but later testified that he had actually learned her identity from them, Mr. Fitzgerald said.

Mr. Wells countered that Mr. Libby was too busy dealing with the world's most serious crises and simply couldn't recall "three phone calls, three reporters, three months later."

The defense attorney said Mr. Cheney shared Mr. Libby's concern that he was being set up to take the fall in an effort to protect Mr. Rove.

"Not going to protect one staffer and sacrifice the guy that was asked to stick his neck in the meat grinder," Mr. Cheney's notes from the meeting said, according to Mr. Wells. He added that it was clear the White House wanted to protect Mr. Rove, the architect of both Bush wins in 2000 and 2004 and the 2002 mid-term upset.

Mr. Cheney is expected to testify in the trial, making him the first sitting vice president to take the stand in a criminal case. The proceedings are expected to take four to six weeks.

Defense Portrays Libby As Scapegoat (WP)

By Amy Goldstein And Carol D. Leonnig

The Washington Post, January 24, 2007

I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby was "put through the meat grinder" by the White House shortly after the Iraq war began, scapegoated to conceal the fact that Karl Rove, the president's top political adviser, helped disclose an undercover CIA officer's identity, a defense attorney contended yesterday as Libby's perjury trial began.

The lawyer, Theodore V. Wells Jr., and Special Counsel Patrick J. Fitzgerald agreed that Vice President Cheney ordered Libby, then his chief of staff, to contact reporters early in the summer of 2003 in an effort to rebut criticism that the administration had selectively used intelligence to justify the invasion of Iraq.

According to Wells, the confidential conversations Libby had with several well-known journalists were not intended to spread the identity of Valerie Plame, the covert CIA officer. Instead, Libby's attorney said, he was acting at Cheney's instructions to respond to allegations that the vice president withheld information that would have raised doubts about whether Iraq was trying to develop weapons of mass destruction.

The dramatic opening statements in the first hours of the celebrated trial laid bare fissures deep inside the White House. They came as the prosecution and defense provided the jury crackling portrayals of their opposing theories of the case.

The two sides' accounts exposed jurors to handwritten notes by Cheney, the internal culture of major newsrooms, a tape recording of Libby speaking to grand jurors and a White House under fire as its justification for war was beginning to unravel.

Libby, 56, is accused of five felony charges stemming from a federal investigation into the leak of Plame's identity to the media. Libby is not charged with the leak itself, nor is anyone else. He faces two counts of making false statements to FBI agents, two counts of perjuring himself before a grand jury and one count of obstructing the investigation, and he has pleaded not guilty to all charges.

"How could we reach a point where the chief of staff for the vice president was repeatedly lying to federal investigators?" Fitzgerald asked jurors rhetorically. "That's what this case is all about."

During an hour-long opening statement that started the trial, the prosecutor painted for the jury what he called "a firestorm" inside the White House on the final day of the July 4, 2003, holiday weekend, when an op-ed article by Plame's husband, former ambassador Joseph C. Wilson IV, attacked the administration. Wilson, who had been sent to Niger by the CIA to determine whether Iraq was seeking uranium for its nuclear weapons program, said the president and his aides "may have twisted the intelligence" concerning whether Iraq was seeking weapons of mass destruction.

Libby told investigators that at one point he was surprised to learn from NBC's Tim Russert in July 2003 that Wilson was married to Plame. But Fitzgerald contended that Libby, at Cheney's direction, had been actively telling people about Wilson at the same time.

He said Libby's claim to a grand jury that he simply had forgotten what he knew was implausible, because he had passed on Plame's name to reporters and then-White House press secretary Ari Fleischer days before speaking with Russert.

DOJ_NMG_0121012

"You can't learn something startling on Thursday that you're giving out Monday and Tuesday of the same week," Fitzgerald said. "Day after day after day after day, he focused on this controversy."

Wells, the defense attorney, countered that "this is a weak, paper-thin, circumstantial evidence case about he-said, she-said."

Wells asserted that the vice president's former right-hand man gave investigators his "good-faith recollection" and that any mistakes in his memory were innocent. He also contended that the journalists and administration officials who are to testify during the trial also have imperfect memories. He said that Libby did not aggressively push the Wilson story, did not know that Plame worked in a covert role and had no motive to lie to investigators.

According to Wells, when the federal investigation of the leak began in the fall of 2003, Libby was not worried about his job, but was "concerned about . . . being scapegoated." Scott McClellan, the White House press secretary at the time, said publicly that Rove was not responsible for any leaks, Wells said, but did not say the same about Libby.

Libby, Wells said, told Cheney he feared "people in the White House are trying to set me up." Wells then showed the jury the text of a note Cheney had jotted that said: "Not going to protect one staffer + sacrifice the guy that was asked to stick his neck in the meat grinder because of the incompetence of others."

Wells said: "That one person was Karl Rove. He was viewed as a political genius. . . . He had to be protected. The person who was to be sacrificed was Scooter Libby." According to Wells, the vice president tried to persuade White House colleagues to publicly clear Libby's name as the source of the leak.

Plame's name first appeared in a July 14 column by Robert D. Novak. Rove and Richard L. Armitage, then the deputy secretary of state, have acknowledged being Novak's sources for the story.

Wells did not make it clear how the White House's handling of Libby's role influenced what he later told the FBI and grand jury. But the attorney said the "meat grinder" Libby was put through meant he took on the extra task of having brief conversations with reporters while carrying out his "day job" dealing with crucial national security matters.

Asked about the defense's portrayal, White House spokeswoman Dana M. Perino said yesterday: "We are not commenting on an ongoing criminal matter."

Both sides yesterday provided small pieces of new information about the events leading to Libby's indictment.

Fitzgerald disclosed, for instance, that Libby had underlined his own copy of Wilson's op-ed piece. Fitzgerald also identified a CIA employee Libby asked about Wilson as Craig Schmall.

Late in the afternoon, the prosecution's first witness, Marc Grossman, a former undersecretary of state, testified that Libby had asked him in late May 2003 to look into Wilson's CIA-sponsored trip to Niger to investigate the uranium claim. Grossman said he spoke to Wilson and learned that his wife worked at the CIA and had appeared to help arrange the trip.

"I thought the whole business was of less than zero importance," Grossman testified. "I thought the wife was an interesting tidbit, though."

Libby Defense Portrays Client As A Scapegoat (NYT)

By Neil A. Lewis

The New York Times, January 24, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 23 — I. Lewis Libby Jr., the vice president's former chief of staff, was made a scapegoat by White House officials to protect the president's longtime political adviser, Karl Rove, Mr. Libby's lawyer asserted in his opening statement on Tuesday.

The unexpected assertion may foreshadow an effort to put distance between Mr. Libby and the administration.

The statement by the lawyer, Theodore V. Wells Jr., was the first indication that Mr. Libby, who is facing five felony counts of lying to investigators, would seek to deflect some of the blame onto his former White House colleagues.

Mr. Wells did not, however, fully explain the connection between an effort to protect Mr. Rove and the actions that led to Mr. Libby's indictment. It was also the first sign that there had been fighting within the Bush administration over the C.I.A. leak investigation.

Until Tuesday, Mr. Libby's defense on perjury and obstruction of justice charges was that he might simply have remembered incorrectly events he had described to a grand jury and to F.B.I. agents. But Mr. Wells told the jury that White House officials, whom he did not name, wanted to protect Mr. Rove because they believed his survival as President Bush's chief political adviser was crucial to the health of the Republican Party.

Mr. Wells said that his client was innocent and that a decision was made that "Scooter Libby was to be sacrificed," referring to Mr. Libby by his nickname. It was important to keep Mr. Rove out of trouble, Mr. Wells said, because he was Mr. Bush's right-hand man and "was most responsible for seeing the Republican Party stayed in office."

"He had to be protected," Mr. Wells said.

DOJ_NMG_0121013

Mr. Rove, who has not been charged, has acknowledged having been a source for a July 14, 2003, column by Robert D. Novak that first disclosed the identity of Valerie Wilson, who was known by her maiden name, Valerie Plame, as a Central Intelligence Agency officer. The disclosure led to the investigation resulting in Mr. Libby's indictment.

Mr. Wells's remarks followed the opening statement of the chief prosecutor, Patrick J. Fitzgerald, who told the jury that the evidence was clear that Mr. Libby had knowingly lied under oath about his conversations with three reporters about Ms. Wilson. Mr. Fitzgerald provided his own dramatic moment of the day when he played audiotapes of Mr. Libby's grand jury testimony in March 2004.

Before doing so, Mr. Fitzgerald meticulously laid the groundwork for his case that Mr. Libby had lied during those appearances. He first presented charts showing that Mr. Libby learned about Ms. Wilson in conversations with several fellow administration officials in June and early July 2003, and that he talked to reporters and other administration officials about her identity in that period.

Jurors then listened as Mr. Libby's voice wafted through the courtroom while he sat silently at the defense table. Mr. Libby was heard to say that he believed he first learned about Ms. Wilson in a conversation with Tim Russert of NBC on Thursday, July 10. Mr. Libby also told the grand jury that he had been taken aback by Mr. Russert's information.

"You can't be startled about something on Thursday that you told other people about on Monday and Tuesday," Mr. Fitzgerald said, referring to conversations Mr. Libby had only days before.

Further, he said, Mr. Russert will testify that his July 10 telephone conversation with Mr. Libby did not include any mention of Ms. Wilson. Mr. Libby, he said, had telephoned instead to complain about a talk show on the network.

"The evidence will show the conversation he claims took place about Wilson's wife never happened," Mr. Fitzgerald said. "And even if it did happen, he couldn't have been surprised."

Mr. Libby is charged with five felony accounts of lying to the grand jury and to officials of the Federal Bureau of Investigation who were investigating the leak of Ms. Wilson's name to Mr. Novak.

Ms. Wilson's identity was disclosed just days after her husband, Joseph C. Wilson IV, a former ambassador, wrote an Op-Ed article in The New York Times asserting that the Bush administration, to build its case for war, had distorted intelligence about Iraqi efforts to obtain uranium in Africa.

Mr. Libby had testified that he did not discuss Ms. Wilson's identity with Judith Miller, a former reporter for The Times, or with Matthew Cooper of Time magazine. Ms. Miller and Mr. Cooper testified that Mr. Libby did, in fact, discuss Ms. Wilson with them.

In the trial's opening day, Mr. Fitzgerald's task was to keep the issue before the jury simple: were Mr. Libby's statements about his conversations with reporters true? To that end, he spoke for only about an hour in outlining his case.

The mission of Mr. Wells, in contrast, was to present the case as hopelessly complicated, thus leaving the jurors in doubt about the validity of the charges. Mr. Wells spoke for nearly two and a half hours, ranging over issues of the reliability of memory; Mr. Libby's duties, which during the relevant period included crises in Liberia and Turkey; and threats from Al Qaeda on the days that Mr. Libby spoke to reporters.

But his most startling comment was his assertion that Mr. Libby had become enmeshed in legal difficulty because of White House efforts to protect Mr. Rove.

If Mr. Libby and his lawyers press their strategy of blaming the White House, it could prove risky, possibly even jeopardizing chances of a presidential pardon for Mr. Libby if he is convicted.

Mr. Libby, Mr. Wells said, complained to Vice President Dick Cheney that he was being set up as a fall guy. Mr. Cheney supported that view, Mr. Wells said, and handwrote a note saying, "Not going to protect one staffer + sacrifice the guy who was asked to stick his neck in the meat grinder because of the incompetence of others."

This incident appears to have occurred in fall 2003, when Mr. Libby was troubled that Scott McClellan, then the White House press secretary, had publicly said that Mr. Rove had not been involved in the leak but had initially declined to do the same for Mr. Libby and others in the administration. At that time, Mr. Rove had a major role in guiding Mr. Bush's re-election campaign.

Interpreting the vice president's note, Mr. Wells said that "incompetence" was a reference to the fact that the C.I.A. had mistakenly allowed the White House to use inaccurate information in Mr. Bush's 2003 State of the Union speech about Iraq's efforts to obtain uranium in Africa. The staff official whom the vice president believed should not be protected, he said, was Mr. Rove. Mr. Libby had been assigned to speak to reporters to straighten out the confusion from Mr. Bush's speech, a chore Mr. Cheney likened to sticking his head in the meat grinder.

Mr. Wells did not, however, make it clear how the efforts to shield Mr. Rove had caused Mr. Libby to become embroiled in the issue, though he suggested that the attention paid to the disclosure of Ms. Wilson's name had obliged Mr. Libby to engage in the perilous task of talking to reporters.

DOJ_NMG_0121014

Mr. Wells noted that, in his grand jury appearances and in interviews with the F.B.I., Mr. Libby had also said that he first learned of Ms. Wilson's identity from Mr. Cheney.

The charges against Mr. Libby, Mr. Wells said, amounted to "a weak, paper-thin circumstantial case about 'he said-she said.' "

'Scapegoat:' Scooter's Stunning Defense (NSWK)

By Michael Isikoff, Newsweek

Newsweek, January 24, 2007

A bombshell detonates on day one of the Libby perjury trial, as Cheney's longtime aide points the finger at Karl Rove

It was the last thing the White House needed at a time when President Bush is already on the defensive over Iraq: a circular firing squad in a federal courtroom in which the president's men—and Vice President Dick Cheney's—are all shooting at each other.

But that's how the perjury trial of I. Lewis (Scooter) Libby, Cheney's former chief of staff, began. Libby's long-awaited defense was laid out for the first time Tuesday in opening statements and it turned out to be a stunner: a "scorched earth" strategy in which his main defense lawyer pointed accusatory fingers at White House deputy chief of staff Karl Rove as well as other top current and former Bush aides.

Almost no legal experts had expected this plan of attack in the trial, the outcome of a drawn-out investigation into who leaked the identity of Valerie Plame, a CIA operative, to the media. According to chief prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald, the leak occured amid an effort by Bush administration officials to discredit Plame's husband, former ambassador Joseph Wilson, who had publicly cast doubt on the administration's case for war against Iraq. The FBI began an investigation after newspaper columnist Robert Novak exposed Plame's identity in 2003. Libby is accused of obstructing the probe and lying to investigators. Neither of the two men later identified as the sources for Novak's column, Rove or former deputy secretary of State Richard Armitage, was charged in the case.

Libby, it was widely thought by legal experts, was going to be the good soldier. He would play it safe at his trial in order to preserve his options; mainly, if convicted, to seek a presidential pardon before Bush leaves office.

But no sooner did he start his opening statement Tuesday morning than defense lawyer Ted Wells shocked the courtroom and all but tossed the "pardon strategy" out the window. Seeking to rebut Fitzgerald's contention that Libby had lied about his knowledge of Plame's CIA employment in order to save his job with Cheney, Wells shot back: "Mr. Libby was not concerned about losing his job in the Bush administration. He was concerned about being set up, he was concerned about being made the scapegoat."

According to Wells, the chief culprit, or at least the beneficiary of the plot was Rove, described by the defense lawyer as "the president's right hand man," whose survival was essential for the president's re-election. As related by Wells, his client was so worried that Rove's fate was taking priority over his that Libby went to his boss, Cheney, in October 2003 and complained: "I think people in the White House are trying to set me up. People in the White House are trying to protect Karl Rove."

Well's argument was both brilliant and complex-and perhaps difficult for non-news hounds on the jury to follow. But it raised the prospect that the Libby trial will now turn into a horror show for the White House, forcing current and former top aides to testify against each other and revealing an administration that has been in turmoil over the Iraq war for more than three years.

Libby is on trial for relatively narrow charges of perjury and obstruction: that he lied about what and when he knew about Plame's identity, falsely telling the FBI and a federal grand jury that he was told about her work at the CIA from journalists Tim Russert, Judy Miller and Matt Cooper in July 2003.

But Fitzgerald, in his own riveting opening statement, placed Cheney at the center of the case, telling the jurors that when Plame's husband, former ambassador Joseph Wilson, began accusing the White House of twisting intelligence about Iraq, it was the vice president himself who first disclosed Plame's identity to his chief of staff in June 2003. Cheney later intervened with the White House to get then-press secretary Scott McClellan to issue a misleading public statement clearing Libby of any involvement in the leak of Plame's CIA employment to reporters, Fitzgerald asserted.

Wells shot back that it was others at the White House and the State Department—and not just Rove—who were the real leakers. Former White House press secretary Ari Fleischer, Wells asserted for the first time, had gotten immunity from prosecution and then confessed to the FBI that he had personally leaked Plame's status to NBC White House reporter David Gregory. Dan Bartlett, now senior presidential counselor, also learned of Plame's identify and spread the information as well, according to Wells. (And, of course, Wells emphasized, it was then-deputy Secretary of State Armitage who set the whole case in motion by first disclosing Plame's identity to columnist Robert Novak.)

But, Wells contended, it was Rove—the political strategist—who had to be protected at all costs. He was, Wells said, "the lifeblood of the Republican Party" and the man George W. Bush absolutely needed for the coming re-election campaign. Indeed, after McClellan issued a public statement exonerating Rove of any involvement in the leak (a statement that turned out three years later to be false), Cheney and Libby huddled about the matter. McClellan had cleared Rove but at that point had said nothing about Libby, leaving the implication that Libby had leaked but Rove hadn't. Cheney personally wrote a note, an excerpt of which Wells read to the jury and highlighted by displaying on an audio-visual machine during his opening statement: "Not going to protect one staffer and sacrifice the guy that was asked to stick his neck in the meat grinder because of the incompetence of others," Cheney's note read.

The translation, according to Wells: The vice president was not going to allow Karl Rove to be protected and Libby to be sacrificed. Libby had stuck his neck "in the meat grinder" because he had been authorized by President Bush himself to talk to reporters and rebut what the White House considered unfair criticism by Wilson that the intelligence about Iraq had been "twisted." And the "incompetence" Cheney was referring to was by the CIA which, he claimed, was responsible for whatever the White House had gotten wrong about Iraq's purported weapons of mass destruction.

The opening statements underscored what many had already suspected: that Cheney—who is slated to be called to testify by the defense—will be a crucial witness in the trial. But Wells' opening statement suggested that it will be more than just the vice president on the hot seat. Rove himself now appears likely to be called (he is on a list of possible witnesses) and forced to testify about how he had disclosed Plame's identity to then-Time magazine reporter Matt Cooper. Bartlett also appears likely to be called, as does Armitage, Fleischer and David Addington, Cheney's current chief of staff.

Libby Asserts He Was The Fall Guy (WSJ)

By Evan Perez

The Wall Street Journal, January 24, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Lawyers for Lewis "Scooter" Libby, the vice president's former chief of staff on trial for allegedly lying to federal investigators, moved to muddy the prosecution's case by alleging a White House effort to protect Karl Rove and make Mr. Libby the fall guy.

INITIAL SALVOS

· The Situation: Defense lawyers say White House officials trying to protect Karl Rove set up Lewis "Scooter" Libby to take the fall in the CIA-leak controversy.

· The Background: Mr. Libby, former chief of staff to Vice President Cheney, is on trial for allegedly lying to investigators and a grand jury during the leak investigation.

· What's Next: Mr. Libby's attorneys are expected to highlight conflicting witness statements as proof that "recollection problems" are common.

The defense strategy shows that Mr. Libby is willing to part ways with his former colleagues at the White House. In opening arguments in federal court yesterday, Mr. Libby's attorney alleged that White House officials singled out the former aide to Vice President Cheney to take the blame for leaking the identity of a Central Intelligence Agency operative in an attempt to take the heat off Mr. Rove, President Bush's top political adviser.

As both sides laid out their strategies yesterday in federal court, it became clear that Special Prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald's attempt to simplify a case that ended up far afield from its beginnings as a CIA leak investigation could be hampered by the defense's strategy to put the case in the context of the sharp-elbowed politics of the White House and the Iraq war. The trial is expected to provide a glimpse into the inner workings -- and infighting -- of a White House known for being cohesive and tightly managed. In addition, the strategizing behind the run-up to the Iraq war may get a public airing at the same time as a Democratic-controlled Congress is stepping up its scrutiny of the Bush administration's war policy. A White House spokeswoman declined to comment on the Libby case.

Addressing a jury of nine women and three men, Mr. Fitzgerald gave a one-hour summary of his case, which hinges on testimony and evidence he says show Mr. Libby knowingly deceived agents for the Federal Bureau of Investigation and the grand jury investigating the leak of the identity of former CIA agent Valerie Plame in 2003.

Mr. Fitzgerald told jurors that Mr. Libby was dispatched by Mr. Cheney to counter criticism of the administration from Ms. Plame's husband, former diplomat Joseph Wilson. Mr. Wilson had made a fact-finding trip, sponsored by the Central Intelligence Agency, in 2002 to Niger to investigate claims that Iraq, in a quest for nuclear weapons, had tried to buy yellowcake uranium from the country. Mr. Wilson subsequently contradicted the administration's claims about Iraq's efforts to build a nuclear-weapons program in a New York Times opinion piece and on television.

During Mr. Fitzgerald's investigation, both President Bush and a former White House spokesman said that any administration official found to have leaked the information would be asked to leave. Mr. Rove was among the officials who testified before the grand jury that Mr. Fitzgerald convened. Yesterday, Mr. Rove's attorney, Robert Luskin, declined to comment on opening arguments by Mr. Libby's attorney. Mr. Libby's defense team took jurors through a two-hour version of events that included the charge that Mr. Libby was the victim of a White House effort to make him the "sacrificial lamb" in order to protect Mr. Rove.

DOJ_NMG_0121016

Theodore V. Wells Jr., an attorney for Mr. Libby, told jurors that as the Plame controversy exploded, Mr. Libby spoke to Mr. Cheney and expressed concerns that "they want me to be the sacrificial lamb. I will not be sacrificed in order for Karl Rove to be protected." Yesterday, Mr. Wells said that officials set up Mr. Libby to take the fall in the investigation because while he was "an important staffer," Mr. Rove was "the lifeblood of the Republican party."

Mr. Fitzgerald displayed to the jury a detailed timeline listing dates when Mr. Libby talked to reporters and to others in the White House about Ms. Plame. He suggested that Mr. Libby's misstatements to investigators about when he discussed Ms. Plame's identity and with whom weren't about "bad memory" but an effort to mislead investigators because he was afraid he would lose his job. In court yesterday, Mr. Fitzgerald played excerpts of tape recordings of Mr. Libby's testimony before the grand jury. In one segment, Mr. Libby told investigators he was surprised to learn that Ms. Plame worked for the CIA during a conversation believed to have taken place around July 10, 2003, with Tim Russert, host of NBC's "Meet the Press." But, Mr. Fitzgerald said yesterday, Mr. Libby knew of Ms. Plame's status, as he had learned it from others in the administration, including the vice president, and had passed along the information on July 7 to then-White House spokesman Ari Fleischer and on July 8 to Judith Miller, then a New York Times reporter.

Mr. Wells called the government's case "a weak, paper-thin circumstantial-evidence case about 'he said, she said.'" He told jurors to expect testimony from reporters including Mr. Russert and Ms. Miller, but suggested that, like Mr. Libby, they and other witnesses "have recollection problems."

Mr. Wells showed jurors his own timeline, emphasizing how Mr. Libby was asked by investigators about conversations with reporters many months after they occurred. He quoted from a handwritten note by Mr. Cheney, made after a conversation with Mr. Libby about the leak investigation, that read in part: "not going to protect one staffer & sacrifice the guy that was asked to stick his neck in the meat grinder because of the incompetence of others."

The person being sacrificed was Mr. Libby and the incompetence was on the part of the CIA, Mr. Wells told jurors.

Libby: White House Wanted To Sacrifice Him For Rove (FINDLAW/AP)

By Matt Apuzzo, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 24, 2007

(AP) - WASHINGTON-Special Prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald described for jurors Tuesday a detailed Bush administration effort to beat back early criticism of the Iraq war and accused former White House aide "Scooter" Libby of covering up his role leaking the identity of a CIA operative.

I. Lewis Libby's attorney countered with a White House effort of his own, one in which Libby was blamed for the leak to protect Bush political adviser Karl Rove's own disclosures.

The investigation began after syndicated columnist Robert Novak revealed that a chief Bush administration critic of Iraq policy, Joseph Wilson, was married to CIA operative Valerie Plame. Rove was one of two sources for Novak's story.

As the trial opened with a preview of each side's position, it was clear that the jury will have to sort through conflicting statements in a high-profile case that has opened a very public window on the behind-the-scenes Washington practice of leaking sensitive information to the news media.

Nobody, including Rove, has been charged with the leak. Libby is accused of lying to investigators and obstructing the probe.

"They're trying to set me up. They want me to be the sacrificial lamb," attorney Theodore Wells said, recalling a conversation between Libby and his boss, Vice President Dick Cheney, as the leak investigation heated up in 2003. "I will not be sacrificed so Karl Rove can be protected."

By putting the focus on Rove, whom Wells referred to as "the lifeblood of the Republican party," Wells sought to cast Libby as someone who was drawn into discussions about Plame only to clear his own reputation. White House officials publicly cleared Rove of wrongdoing but originally stopped short of doing so for Libby.

Using a computerized calendar during opening statement, Fitzgerald cast Libby's actions much differently. Fitzgerald described a tumultuous week in 2003 when he said the White House was under "direct attack" from Wilson.

Fitzgerald said Libby learned from five people - from Cheney to members of the CIA and State Department - that Wilson's wife worked for the CIA. Libby discussed that fact to reporters and others in the White House, Fitzgerald said.

"But when the FBI and grand jury asked about what the defendant did," Fitzgerald said, "he made up a story."

Libby told investigators he learned about Plame from NBC News reporter Tim Russert. But Fitzgerald told jurors that was clearly a lie because Libby had already been discussing the matter inside and outside of the White House.

"You can't learn something on Thursday that you're giving out on Monday," Fitzgerald said.

Libby says he didn't lie but was simply bogged down by national security issues and couldn't remember his conversations with New York Times report Judith Miller, Time magazine reporter Matthew Cooper and Russert.

Opening statements were expected to continue into Tuesday afternoon. The trial is expected to last four to six weeks.

Prosecution Calls Libby A Liar During Opening Arguments (LAW)

By Emma Schwartz, Legal Times

Legal Times, January 24, 2007

During opening arguments Tuesday in the trial of ex-White House aide I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby Jr., the prosecution repeatedly fingered Libby as a liar who intentionally misled investigators about how he learned the identity of CIA employee Valerie Plame.

"This is not a case about bad memory," Special Prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald told jurors. "It's about shifting information to reporters away from where he really learned it."

But defense lawyers for Libby accused the White House of making the former chief of staff to Vice President Dick Cheney the administration's fall guy for Fitzgerald's leak investigation. Addressing the jury, lawyer Theodore Wells Jr. tried to raise doubts about the memory -- and credibility -- of the government officials and reporters whose testimony is expected to contradict Libby's recollections.

"It's a classic case of he said, she said, and what two people remember three months later," said Wells, telling the jury that the government's case is based entirely on circumstantial evidence and that no one will take the stand to say Libby lied.

Libby, 56, is charged with five felony counts of false statements, obstruction of justice, and perjury in connection with what he told the FBI and a grand jury about conversations he had with three reporters in 2003. He was the only person charged as a result of Fitzgerald's 2 1/2-year investigation into whether classified information about Plame's CIA employment was illegally leaked to the press.

The arguments came on the eve of President George W. Bush's State of the Union address. It was in that speech, four years ago, that the president suggested Iraq had tried to purchase uranium from Africa. The veracity of that claim later served as the basis for attacks by Plame's husband, former Ambassador Joseph Wilson, on the administration's decision to invade Iraq and allegedly led to a campaign within the White House to discredit Wilson.

Although the trial, expected to last about six weeks, will not answer the question of whether the Bush administration intentionally misled the public about the rationale for invading Iraq, the war hung heavy over Tuesday's arguments.

Over the course of an hour, Fitzgerald laid out the government's case to the jury. By Fitzgerald's account, the timeline of Libby's conversations simply does not add up: How, he asked, could Libby claim that he first learned about Valerie Plame's CIA employment on July 10, 2003, from Tim Russert of NBC's "Meet the Press" when Libby had already had conversations about Wilson's wife with at least six government officials?

According to Fitzgerald's calculation, Libby first learned about Wilson's wife from Cheney on June 11, 2003, and discussed it with multiple government officials in the following days and month. Those officials included Undersecretary of State Marc Grossman; CIA Associate Director Robert Grenier; Cathie Martin, a press secretary for the Office of the Vice President; David Addington, Cheney's chief counsel; CIA briefer Craig Schmall; and former White House press secretary Ari Fleischer.

On July 6, 2003, The New York Times published an opinion piece Wilson wrote questioning the accuracy of the 16 words in the State of the Union speech about Iraq's alleged acquisition of uranium in Niger. The next day, Fitzgerald said, he told Fleischer over lunch that he had "hush-hush" information that Wilson's wife was employed in the CIA's weapons of mass destruction section. On July 8, Libby met with then-New York Times reporter Judith Miller at the St. Regis Hotel about Wilson's wife. That same day, he asked Addington, a former CIA official, about someone at the CIA sending a spouse on an investigation.

"You can't learn something starting on Thursday [that] you're giving out on Monday and Tuesday," Fitzgerald said.

To back up his claim about Libby's conversation with reporters, Fitzgerald played excerpts of Libby's grand jury testimony with Russert and Time magazine's Matthew Cooper. Although Russert has said that he never spoke about Wilson's wife with Libby, on the tape Libby said he did: "And then he said, 'Did you know that Ambassador Wilson's wife works at the CIA?' I was a little taken aback by that. I said, 'No, I don't know that' ... I wanted to be very careful not to confirm it."

Similarly, during his testimony about Cooper, Libby said, "I was very careful; in my mind I still didn't know it as a fact." He added, "I didn't even know he had a wife."

Taking roughly two hours to outline Libby's defense, Wells declared that Libby was completely innocent. Instead, Wells painted a picture of deep bureaucratic infighting and pointed the finger squarely at the White House. He suggested that the White House -- specifically presidential adviser Karl Rove -- and the State Department may have pushed information to the press. "But Scooter Libby didn't push any reporter," Wells said.

DOJ_NMG_0121018

Libby was afraid that he was "being set up" as the scapegoat for Rove, whose "fate was important to the Republican Party," Wells said. So Libby went to Cheney for help, Wells said. "I will not be sacrificed so that Karl Rove can be saved," Wells said Libby told his boss.

Cheney made a note, intended for the president, that he was "not going to protect one staffer + sacrifice the guy that was asked to stick his neck in the meat grinder because of the incompetence of others," according to a note Wells displayed.

Indeed, Cheney specifically asked Libby to speak to reporters about Wilson's attacks -- but to do so on the merits. A note card Cheney approved that contained specific statements to rebut Wilson's argument included no mention of Wilson's wife, Wells said. But while defending the claims against Wilson may have been important, Wells said, Plame was not.

Wells also took aim at the credibility of many of the government's witnesses. For instance, Wells said, not all of the government witnesses remembered their conversations with Libby the first time around. And, some, like Fleischer, did not speak with federal investigators before receiving immunity. As for the reporters, he noted, they had very few or no notes to back up their conversations.

Wells raised the possibility that Russert might have known about Wilson's wife because two of his reporters were chasing the Wilson story. Wells said that on July 11, 2003, Fleischer told White House correspondent David Gregory about Wilson's wife. Wells also mentioned NBC reporter Andrea Mitchell, who said during an Oct. 3, 2003, television broadcast that it was widely known before July 14 by reporters covering intelligence that Wilson's wife worked at the CIA.

"If Andrea Mitchell knew, doggone it, Tim Russert knew," Wells said. (Mitchell later retracted this statement.)

Wells asked why Libby would concoct the story. "If you're going to cook up a story, why are you going to cook up a story about a phony conversation you had with one of the most respected reporters in the country?" Wells said, referring to Russert.

Instead, Wells suggested that Libby may simply have confused his conversations with Russert and with Robert Novak, whose column first disclosed the name of Wilson's wife. Around that same time, Libby spoke with Novak. Wells said Novak would take the stand and say, "It's possible when he had Libby on the phone that he said to Libby, 'Do you know his wife works at the CIA?' and that Libby did not confirm anything to him."

Libby Lawyers Attack Witness Credibility (NSDY/AP)

By Matt Apuzzo, Associated Press Writer

Long Island Newsday, January 24, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Attorneys for former White House aide I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby say the testimony of the government's first witness in the CIA leak trial may have been improperly influenced.

Marc Grossman, the former No. 3 official at the State Department, took the stand Tuesday and testified that in June 2003 he was the first person to tell Libby that one of the Bush administration's most vocal critics on Iraq was married to a CIA operative.

Libby is charged with lying and obstructing the investigation into who leaked CIA operative Valerie Plame's identity to syndicated columnist Robert Novak. The leak came shortly after her husband, ex-ambassador Joseph Wilson, emerged as a prominent war critic.

Libby, who was Vice President Dick Cheney's chief of staff, told a grand jury that he believed he learned Plame's identity from NBC newsman Tim Russert. Grossman is the first in a string of government witnesses who will say they told Libby about Plame well before his conversation with Russert.

Foreshadowing a tactic he'll use throughout the case, defense attorney Theodore Wells planned to attack Grossman's credibility. Grossman's memory is spotty and Wells believes his testimony may have been influenced by his former boss at the State Department, Richard Armitage. The night before Grossman spoke to the FBI, Armitage confessed that he was Novak's original source and was a subject of the investigation.

As Grossman continued to the cooperate in the probe, defense attorneys say, he went back to Armitage and told him what the FBI was asking and discussed his answers. Prosecutors sought to block Wells from inquiring about those conversations but U.S. District Judge Reggie B. Walton refused.

"It seems to me there might have been some inappropriate behavior taking place," Walton said.

Prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald is trying to make the case that it's implausible Libby would forget several conversations he had with officials about Plame.

Wells counters that Libby's memories are no more flawed than those of the government's key witnesses. The more doubt he can cast on their stories, the more likely Wells is to convince a jury that Libby made honest mistakes.

In opening arguments Monday, both sides described a tumultuous period in the White House in which the Bush administration was eager to rebut criticism from Plame's husband, Wilson, who charged in a New York Times opinion piece in July 2003 that the administration had distorted intelligence to justify its invasion of Iraq.

Fitzgerald believes that in such a high-stakes environment, Libby never would have forgotten details about in conversations with reporters. Wells countered that Libby was busy fielding intelligence on terrorist threats, possible assassination plots and Middle East tensions.

Wells also accused the White House with unfairly blaming Libby for the leaks to protect political strategist Karl Rove's own leaks.

"They're trying to set me up. They want me to be the sacrificial lamb," Wells said, recalling Libby's end of a conversation with Cheney. "I will not be sacrificed so Karl Rove can be protected."

The trial is expected to last up to six weeks.

* __

Associated Press Writer Michael J. Sniffen contributed to this report.

* __

Documents for the Libby trial may be found at:
http://wid.ap.org/documents/libbytrial/index.html

8 Arrested In 1971 Police Killing In San Francisco (AP)

By Marcus Wohlsen

AP, January 24, 2007

SAN FRANCISCO - A Florida man and seven others were arrested Tuesday in the 1971 slaying of a police officer that authorities say was part of a black power group's five-year campaign to kill law enforcement officers in San Francisco and New York.

Police said seven of the eight are believed to be former members of the Black Liberation Army, an offshoot of the Black Panther Party.

The Aug. 29, 1971, shooting death of Sgt. John V. Young, 51, at a San Francisco police station was one in a series of attacks by BLA members on law enforcement officials on both coasts, police said.

The attacks, carried out between 1968 and 1973, also included the bombing of a police funeral in San Francisco and the slayings of two New York City police officers, as well as three armed bank robberies that helped fund their operations, police said.

Murder and conspiracy charges were filed against Ray Michael Boudreaux, 64, of Altadena; Richard Brown, 65, of San Francisco; Herman Bell, 59, and Anthony Bottom, 55, both behind bars in New York state; Henry Watson Jones, 71, of Altadena; Francisco Torres, 58, of New York City; and Harold Taylor, 58, of Panama City, Fla.

The arrests were just the latest attempt in recent years to hold antiwar radicals and black-power militants responsible for crimes committed a generation ago.

The investigation of the Black Liberation Army killing spree was reopened in 1999 after "advances in forensic science led to the discovery of new evidence in one of the unsolved cases," the San Francisco Police Department said in a statement.

Morris Tabak, the department's deputy chief of investigations, would not elaborate on the evidence except to say: "It could be fibers. It could be DNA. It could be other biological evidence."

Bell's lawyer, San Francisco attorney Stuart Hanlon, called the arrests a "prosecution based on vengeance and hate from the '60s."

"There's a law enforcement attitude that they hate these people, the Panthers," Hanlon said. "Now they're going after old men."

Richard O'Neal, 57, of San Francisco, was also arrested on conspiracy charges.

A ninth suspect, Ronald Stanley Bridgeforth, 62, was still being sought. Police said he could be in France, Belize or Tanzania.

It's unclear whether Bridgeforth and O'Neal were members of the Black Liberation Army.

None of the suspects will face the death penalty, said Maggy Krell, deputy state attorney general. The death penalty law in effect at the time of the attack was declared unconstitutional in 1972.

The slain officer was killed when Bell and Torres, armed with guns and dynamite, raided a neighborhood police station, firing a shotgun through a hole in the lobby's bulletproof window, as accomplices were posted outside as lookouts, according to police officials in New York. A civilian clerk was wounded. Torres is accused of trying to ignite the dynamite as the pair fled the station, but the explosives failed.

The station was nearly empty that night as most officers responded to a diversionary bombing of a bank by other conspirators, according to the NYPD.

After his arrest Tuesday in New York, Torres called the case "a frame-up."

Three men, including Taylor, were charged in the attack in 1975. But the charges were thrown out by a San Francisco judge because of a ruling that evidence was obtained by torture after the suspects were arrested in New Orleans.

Bell and Bottom are serving life sentences for the killings of two New York police officers.

Another suspect in Young's slaying, John Bowman of Oklahoma, died in December, according to his lawyer, Ann Moorman of Ukiah.

Associated Press Writers Kim Curtis and Juliana Barbassa in San Francisco and Tom Hays in New York City contributed to this report.

Ex-militants Charged In S.F. Police Officer's '71 Slaying At Station (SFC)

By Jaxon Van Derbeken And Marisa Lagos, Chronicle Staff Writers

San Francisco Chronicle, January 24, 2007

The arrest and charging of a group of former black militants Tuesday for the 1971 slaying of a San Francisco police sergeant ends years of frustration for investigators who say the men were soldiers in a five-year war on law enforcement in the late 1960s and early 1970s.

The accused -- all reputed former members of the radical militant group known as the Black Liberation Army -- carried out a "terror and chaos" campaign aimed at "assassinating law enforcement officers" that began in 1968 and ended in 1973, Deputy Police Chief Morris Tabak said.

Tabak said one of the casualties was Sgt. John V. Young, slain on Aug. 29, 1971, whose killing was the focus of the arrests and the charges Tuesday. He was killed when at least three men burst into Ingleside police station and one fired a shotgun through an opening in a bulletproof glass window.

"After three decades, it's a real victory for law enforcement that these folks will finally have to answer for their actions," Tabak said in announcing charges against nine men, eight of whom are in custody.

Authorities arrested two San Francisco men, Richard Brown, 65, a community activist, and Richard O'Neal, 57, who worked as a custodian at San Francisco's City Hall.

Also arrested were Francisco "Cisco" Torres, 58, in Queens, New York, Ray Boudreaux, 64, an electrician for Los Angeles County from Altadena, Henry Watson Jones, 71, also of Altadena, and Harold Taylor, 58, of Panama City, Fla.

Two other men charged in the case already are incarcerated in New York. Herman Bell, 59, and Anthony Bottom, 55, were convicted of May 21, 1971, killings two police officers in New York.

One man who was still being sought is Ronald Stanley Bridgeforth, 62. Authorities believe he might have fled the country.

Eight of the men were charged with murder in the slaying of Young and conspiracy to commit murder for a string of attacks on other officers. O'Neal faces only a broader conspiracy to murder police officers charge for his role in a Feb. 6, 1971, non-fatal shotgun attack on a San Francisco police patrol special officer outside at a Grove Street convalescent hospital.

The actions Tuesday -- carried out in cooperation with local, state and federal officials -- follow by two years a grand jury investigation of the Young killing that resulted in no arrests or indictments.

Lawyers for defendants contended that investigators haven't found new evidence since then that justifies bringing charges at this time.

"I don't think they have anything new," said San Francisco attorney Stuart Hanlon, who represents Bell. "I don't think they have a case."

A spokesman for new state Attorney General Jerry Brown acknowledged Tuesday that no new scientific evidence had been unearthed in an investigation made difficult by the lack of solid eyewitness testimony tying the defendants to Young's shooting.

Only two other people were in the Ingleside police station at the time of the attack -- Ellen Lipney, a civilian clerk who also was shot but survived, and Officer Jim Nance. Nance did not see the shooting, and Lipney and he provided only a limited description of one of the assailants.

The station was largely empty because the rest of the officers were responding to a bombing at the Bank of America in Stonestown, which investigators later said was a diversion from the assault on the station.

"We don't have O.J.'s bloody gloves," attorney general's spokesman Nathan Barankin said Tuesday. "This is not going to be an easy prosecution, but we are committed to seeing it through."

The charges identify Torres, Bell and Jones as the men who entered the Ingleside police station.

Bell was armed with the shotgun and he opened fire, killing Young and wounding Lipney, according to the charges. Jones fired several rounds from a high-powered rifle, trying to get into the station's assembly room, according to the charges. Three other men, the late John Bowman, Brown and Taylor, acted as lookouts, according to the charges.

DOJ_NMG_0121021

Boudreaux and Bridgeforth acted as getaway drivers, the charges state. As he fled, Torres tried but failed to set off a bomb intended to blow up the building, according to the charges.

A letter signed by the Black Liberation Army was sent to The Chronicle on Aug. 31, 1971, claiming responsibility for the killing.

According to the allegations, the group made several other attacks on police.

The campaign began with the attack on two San Francisco Housing Authority officers on Oct. 21, 1968, according to the charges. Three men, including Brown, fired at the officers as many as seven times, the charges say. The officers fired back and fled. Brown was found lying on the sidewalk with a .45-caliber handgun in his hand at the time.

The following month, three members of the group -- Bridgeforth, Boudreaux and Jones -- allegedly attacked a group of South San Francisco police officers as they attempted to arrest them for trying to use a stolen credit card.

All three men were arrested at the time, and weapons and blasting cap explosives were found in their car.

On Oct. 22, 1970, Bottom and another man allegedly bombed a police officer's funeral at St. Brendan Church in San Francisco, according to the charges.

Just before the start of the funeral for the officer, Harold Hamilton, who had been slain in a gunbattle with a bank robbery suspect, a bomb exploded in the crowded church, but no one was seriously hurt.

Bottom, Torres and Bell also were named in the charges as being involved in a March 30, 1971, attempted bombing of SFPD's Mission Station. The bomb, set on the roof of the station, had the power of 30 pounds of dynamite. Bottom, according to the charges, admitted that, with the help of Torres, he put the bomb on the roof while two other members of the group drove off.

The same group orchestrated the murder of New York City police officers Waverly Jones and Joseph Piagentini, on May 21, 1971, according to the allegations. Bottom, now serving time in New York for the killings, was arrested after the slayings in San Francisco while in possession of Jones' service revolver. He was caught fleeing after getting into a shootout with San Francisco police Sgt. George Kowalksi on Aug. 28, 1971. Police found a cache of arms in his vehicle, including Jones' gun, which was used to shoot Piagentini.

According to authorities, the group robbed at least three banks to pay for its efforts, raising at least $25,000 to finance the war.

Authorities believe a separate radical group committed an earlier incident, the Feb. 16, 1970, attack in which a bomb was planted at SFPD's Park police station. Sgt. Brian McDonnell, 44, was killed in that attack, and eight other officers were injured.

One man arrested Tuesday has long been linked to the Young case, having been arrested after the slaying only to be released. The outcome of the early arrest highlights the troublesome history of the case.

Two years after the Young killing, Taylor was arrested in New Orleans, along with two other men, Bowman, who recently died, and Ruben Scott, who is not currently charged.

All three allegedly were tortured into making what they later claimed were false confessions.

In 1975, the three men were charged with murder in the Young attack. But a court found that when the two San Francisco police investigators who came to Louisiana to interview the three men were out of the room, New Orleans officers stripped the men, blindfolded them, beat them and covered them in blankets soaked in boiling water. They also used electric prods on their genitals, court records show. The men were freed after a court found their rights had been violated and they were not allowed to have counsel.

In 1999, the case was reopened after police say they obtained unspecified new physical evidence in one of the attacks on police. A state grand jury heard evidence in the Young slaying. Several members of the group who were subpoenaed refused to testify, some of them jailed until they were freed by court order. No one was indicted.

In 2005, after consulting with San Francisco District Attorney Kamala Harris, police took the case to the state attorney general's office. Harris's office said Tuesday that it was determined that the matter would be best handled by the state prosecutors, who were already familiar with the facts of he case.

One of those arrested in San Francisco, Brown, is a longtime activist in the Western Addition and had been a job counselor at the Ella Hill Hutch Community Center until he was recently laid off.

"He has been involved trying to make things better in this community," said the Rev. Amos Brown, who has known the accused for more than 30 years. "I don't know what to make of it, after all this time -- I don't know what evidence is there, I don't prejudge situations."

Richard Brown's attorney, Richard Mazer, said Tuesday that he had represented him when Brown was summoned to the grand jury in 2005. He was briefly jailed when he refused to testify, but no charges were filed.

"They have been pursuing Mr. Brown and others in this case for decades," Mazer said. "We don't know what new information, if any new information, they have."

DOJ_NMG_0121022

O'Neal, who was arrested at his home on McAllister Street, near City Hall, and charged with one count of conspiracy to murder police officers, worked as a custodian for the city. He had previously worked at the city's Hall of Justice, where the case for years frustrated law enforcement.

O'Neal's attorney, Jim Bustamante, said Tuesday that his client was just 18 or 19 at the time of the alleged conspiracy and has been a city employee for more than 25 years.

"I'm not aware of anything they've got that is new," said Bustamante, referring to the time that has transpired since the grand jury investigation in 2005.

Hanlon, the lawyer representing Bell, agreed and suggested justice would best be served by dropping the case against his client.

"If they have a case, we'll deal with it. But I'm afraid that this is just more vindictiveness against the Black Panthers and other groups who were active in the '60s and '70s," he said. "To my knowledge, they've got absolutely nothing new in this case. If they do, let's see it."

The Black Liberation Army, to which the men arrested and changed Tuesday belonged, was an offshoot of the Black Panthers and operated from about 1971 to 1981.

Boudreaux's attorney, Michael Burt, said Tuesday that his client spent 23 days in jail for refusing to speak to the grand jury in 2005.

Burt said Boudreaux's only involvement in the Black Panther movement was to work in a school lunch program in Oakland. He served in the military in the Air Force in Vietnam, Burt said.

"My guy is not a member of any conspiracy, he didn't murder anybody -- this is part of a long-standing vendetta by law enforcement," Burt said. "He is innocent of these charges."

The lawyer also said he knows of no new evidence in this case. "How they are going to work around that is a very interesting issue."

Page A - 1

8 Ex-radicals Arrested In '71 Police Slaying (LAT)

By John M. Glionna And Steve Chawkins, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, January 24, 2007

SAN FRANCISCO — The racial tensions of the civil rights era marched back into this city Tuesday when eight former radicals — some now husbands, grandfathers and community organizers — were arrested in connection with the 1971 shotgun slaying of a white police officer.

The men, including a real-estate appraiser and a Los Angeles County employee both living in Altadena, were mostly taken into custody during early-morning raids in California, New York and Florida. They are accused of being part of what investigators called a five-year conspiracy that started in 1968 to kill police officers in the United States.

A joint state and federal task force identified seven of the arrested men as former members of the Black Liberation Army, a violent outgrowth of the Black Panthers.

San Francisco Police Sgt. John V. Young was gunned down Aug. 29, 1971, at a neighborhood police station. At the time, the Bay Area was a nexus for radical groups of all stripes.

Eight days earlier, a bloody prison riot after a foiled escape by a Black Panther engulfed San Quentin State Prison. Two inmates and three guards were killed. Attacks on police officers nationwide were being blamed on black militants.

Over 36 years, authorities doggedly pursued the Young case. Some suspects married and started families. Others committed crimes and went to prison. Two years ago, three went on a nationwide speaking tour to decry the renewed investigation. One died last month.

In the last two years, about a dozen suspects, including some of those arrested Tuesday, were called to testify before a grand jury in San Francisco and in recent months investigators sought DNA samples.

On Tuesday, 35 years after Young's death, charges finally were filed.

Charged in Young's killing were: Ray Michael Boudreaux, 64, and Henry Watson Jones, 71, both of Altadena; Richard Brown, 65, of San Francisco; Francisco Torres, 58, of Queens, N.Y.; Herman Bell, 59, and Anthony Bottom, 55, both incarcerated in New York state; and Harold Taylor, 58, of Panama City, Fla.

Another man, Richard O'Neal, 57, of San Francisco, was arrested on suspicion of conspiracy to murder police officers. He was not charged "as an active participant" in the Young killing, authorities said.

A ninth suspect, Ronald Stanley Bridgeforth, 62, was charged with murder, conspiracy to commit murder and aggravated assault on a police officer in connection with Young's killing. He was still at large Tuesday.

Defense lawyers and justice advocates Tuesday questioned the charges, one calling the long-running case "a perversion of justice."

"I'm stunned that the government is still trying to pursue criminal cases against these men. It's beyond explanation," said Charles Ogletree, a Harvard Law School professor and founder of the Charles Hamilton Houston Institute for Race and Justice, who appeared on the speaking tour.

"In the meantime, they've become husbands and grandfathers and neighborhood organizers," he said. "It's a reflection that with all they've been through, they've still been able to raise their heads high."

John Philipsborn, a San Francisco attorney who is representing Jones, added that he was skeptical that any convictions would result.

"This is a case that's been brought before," he said. "It's an old case, and the evidence we know of is of dubious value, given the fact that a number of statements had been several times found to be coerced."

The investigation, which was named the Phoenix Task Force, involves local, state and federal agencies and has been collecting evidence related to attacks on police officers in the turbulent years between 1968 and 1973.

They include the bombing of a police officer's funeral and the attempted bombing of a police station, both in San Francisco.

This is not the first time arrests have been made in Young's killing.

In 1975, three defendants were charged with the shooting, but a judge dismissed the case, ruling that evidence had been gained through torture. An attorney who represented one man said police in New Orleans had used cattle prods and electrodes to extract a confession. The statement was later thrown out of court.

Two then-San Francisco police inspectors, Frank McCoy and Ed Erdelatz, were present at the New Orleans police station when the confession was obtained. Attorneys say both were called out of retirement recently to work on the case.

"The problem with people like Erdelatz and McCoy is that they got the answer they wanted through improper means, and they have been running with it for 30 years," said Stuart Hanlon, who represents Herman Bell.

In the last two years, authorities convened two special grand juries to look into the killing.

Ann Moorman, a Bay Area defense lawyer, said she represented Oklahoma City resident John Bowman, who was one of five suspects who refused to testify before the San Francisco grand jury hearing. They spent 20 days in jail.

"In my view this was another not-so-subtle effort to put pressure on them after decades, after they suffered extreme mental anguish," she said. "My client was tortured by the New Orleans police. He never forgot that."

Boudreaux, who also refused to testify, said he wasn't surprised when investigators showed up at his door in 2005.

"When I watched on TV the twin towers come down, deep in my heart I knew that someone will come by and visit me as soon as they can get it organized, and they did," Boudreaux told a Washington, D.C., news conference during the speaking tour. "Once upon a time, they called me a terrorist too. To expedite something in the system, they put the 'terror' tag on it, and it gets done."

Boudreaux was picked up on the way from his Altadena home to his job as an electrician for Los Angeles County, said his attorney, Michael Burt, of San Francisco.

At a news conference in San Francisco, task force members refused to discuss specifics of their investigation. They said in a news release that the probe into Young's death was reopened in 1999 "after advances in forensic science led to new evidence in one of the unsolved cases."

They would not confirm that DNA samples were part of the evidence. "It could be fibers. It could be DNA. It could be other biological evidence," said Morris Tabak, deputy chief of investigations for San Francisco police.

He said the Young murder was part of a tense era marked by racial strife nationwide.

"There was a strong anti-government sentiment in the late 1960s and early 1970s, when the BLA members were bent on creating terror and chaos by assassinating police officers," Tabak said. "We believe the motive for the crimes was the furtherance of these revolutionary views."

On the night of Young's killing, four black men strode into the Ingleside station about 9:40 p.m. As the officer stood behind bulletproof glass at the visitor's window, one of the men stuck a 12-gauge shotgun in the speaking hole and fired. The buckshot caught Young in the upper body. A female office clerk was hit in the left arm but was not seriously injured.

A second officer crawled to the wounded Young, who gasped, "Help me," according to a recent story in the SF Weekly.

"Recovered from his body were his most treasured possessions: his police star, rosary beads, religious medals and his wedding ring," according to a news release issued Tuesday.

Speaking at the news conference, San Francisco Police Chief Heather Fong described him as "someone who was doing community policing before the term was even coined."

Young worked with disadvantaged youths and was an avid fundraiser for groups such as the United Negro College Fund. After his death, a street near the station was renamed for him.

DOJ_NMG_0121024

One retired San Francisco police officer recalled the turbulent times. "Everything was so racial back then, so much more than today," said Ed Collins, 58. "On the job we had to be double sure of everything. You never took anything for granted."

*

steve.chawkins@latimes.com

john.glionna@latimes.com

Glionna reported from San Francisco. Chawkins reported from Ventura. Times staff writers Rone Tempest, Ashraf Khalil and Richard Winton also contributed to this report.

Held In '71 Cop Slay (NSDY/AP)

By Herbert Lowe, Staff Writer; Matthew Nestel Contributed To This Story, Which Was Supplemented With An Ap Report.

Long Island Newsday, January 24, 2007

Queens man, 2 convicted in NYPD killings, arrested with five others in death of S.F. police officer

A Queens man and two other men who are already serving time for killing two New York Police Department officers in 1971 were arrested yesterday in the death of a San Francisco police officer that same year, officials said.

They were among eight suspects - seven of whom officials believe to be former members of the Black Liberation Army - who were arrested in New York, California and Florida.

A violent offshoot of the Black Panther Party, the BLA carried out a series of attacks against law enforcement officials on both coasts, along with three armed bank robberies, between 1968 and 1973, authorities said.

"Today is a good day for police officers in New York and San Francisco and everywhere," New York Police Commissioner Ray Kelly said in a statement.

NYPD detectives coordinating with San Francisco police and the FBI arrested Francisco Torres, 58, at his home at 145th Street in Jamaica at 6 a.m. yesterday in connection with the death of San Francisco police Sgt. John V. Young. Officials described Torres as a former BLA member. New technology such as DNA testing allowed police to reopen the case.

Young, 51, was killed when two men raided a neighborhood police station, firing a shotgun through a hole in a bulletproof window on Aug. 29, 1971. A civilian clerk was wounded in the attack and authorities said other accomplices were outside as lookouts and get-away drivers.

Herman Bell, 59, and Anthony Bottom, 55, were arrested at an upstate prison for Young's killing. They are serving life sentences for killing NYPD Officers Waverly Jones, 33, and Joseph Piagentini, 28, in an ambush outside the Colonial Park Houses in Harlem on May 21, 1971.

A third man, Albert Washington, was also convicted in the New York case, but he died in prison in 2002.

"Today's developments only reinforce our opposition to their parole," Kelly, referring to Bell and Bottom, said in a statement.

"They shot two New York City police officers in the back, as part of a series of assassinations directed against police officers in those murderous days," Kelly said. "It may have been 35 years ago, but I certainly haven't forgotten. Neither has anyone who was a member of the police department back then. "

Authorities said charges of murder and conspiracy were filed against Torres, Bell, Bottom, Richard Brown, 65, of San Francisco; Ray Boudreaux, 64, and Henry Jones, 71, both of Altadena, Calif., and Harold Taylor, 58, of Panama City, Fla.

Richard O'Neal, 57, of San Francisco, was also arrested on conspiracy charges. He is not believed to have been a member of the Black Liberation Army.

No one answered the door at Torres' house last night.

Neighbors said Torres lived with a teenage son and a son in his 20s who has sickle cell anemia. They also said he often helped neighbors with snow shoveling and other tasks.

"I couldn't believe it," said Priscilla Levine, 53, a retired state clerical worker who lives two doors away.

Bell's attorney, Stuart Hanlon, of San Francisco, called the arrests a "prosecution based on vengeance and hate from the '60s. " Hanlon added: "There's a law enforcement attitude that they hate these people, the Panthers. Now they're going after old men. "

A ninth suspect in Young's killing is still being sought, police said.

Matthew Nestel contributed to this story, which was supplemented with an AP report.

8 Arrested In 1971 Killing Of San Francisco Police Officer (NYT)

By Jesse Mckinley

The New York Times, January 24, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0121025

SAN FRANCISCO, Jan. 23 — Eight men, including seven described as members of the radical Black Liberation Army, were arrested on Tuesday on charges of murdering a police officer here in 1971 and waging a violent five-year battle against the police and federal authorities.

The arrests, in morning raids in California, Florida and New York capped an investigation by San Francisco police into the murder of Sgt. John V. Young, who was killed by a shotgun at a desk in the Ingleside stationhouse on Aug. 29, 1971.

A civilian clerk was wounded.

New York police officials said two of the men arrested were the gunmen, Francisco Torres, 58, who was seized at his home in Queens, and Herman Bell, 59, who was rearrested at a New York prison where he is serving a murder sentence.

The rest of the aging men were said to have been lookouts, getaway drivers and participants in the assault on the police station and other attacks.

A statement by the San Francisco police characterized Sergeant Young's killing as a part of a "conspiracy to kill law enforcement officers" from 1968 to 1973, a plan that included the murders of two New York police officers, four attempted murders of law enforcement personnel, the bombing of a police officers' funeral at a San Francisco church and the attempted bombing of another San Francisco police station, as well as three bank robberies, two here and one in Georgia.

In New York, Police Commissioner Raymond W. Kelly said the arrests dealt a blow to the legacy of the protest group, a violent offshoot of the black nationalist Black Panthers, which operated from the late 1960s until the early 1980s. Mr. Kelly said the arrests testified to the long memory of the police, especially for the killing of one of their own.

"It is a good day for police officers in New York and San Francisco and everywhere else," Mr. Kelly said in a telephone interview from Washington. "It underscores the fact that the law enforcement community is never going to forget."

Soon after the arrests, current and former defense lawyers for several of the men said they were skeptical of the charges in the nearly 36-year-old case, saying the police had harassed their clients for years.

Three men were charged with Sergeant Young's killing in 1975, The Associated Press reported, including one of the men arrested on Tuesday, but that case was dismissed.

A lawyer who represents Mr. Bell, Stuart Hanlon, said he thought that the case against Mr. Bell was based on a 30-year-old confession by a suspected Black Panther member that a judge threw out in the mid-'70s because it had been physically coerced.

"I think the police are outraged, and rightfully so, that one of their own was gunned down," Mr. Hanlon said. "They believe they are right. But the belief does not make it so."

Mr. Torres was one of the first arrested, taken from his red-brick home in Jamaica, Queens, before dawn. Also arrested in New York State were Mr. Bell, 59, and Anthony Bottom, 55, who were in prison for the murders in May 1971 of two New York City police officers, Waverly Jones and Joseph Piagentini.

All three men were charged with murder and conspiracy.

In San Francisco, the police arrested Richard Brown, 65, and Richard O'Neal, 57. They were held in $3 million bail with Mr. Brown charged with murder and conspiracy, and Mr. O'Neal, who is not believed to be a member of the so-called army, was charged with conspiracy.

The Los Angeles County sheriff confirmed the arrests of Ray Michael Boudreaux, 64, and Henry Watson Jones, 71, both of Altadena.

The police in Panama City, Fla., confirmed that they had taken Harold Taylor, 58, into custody without incident. He was held on $3 million bond.

The authorities said they were also seeking Ronald Stanley Bridgeforth, 62, on charges of murder, conspiracy and assault. Mr. Bridgeforth is thought to be living abroad.

In their statement, the San Francisco police said that in 1999 they began investigating again several killings of their officers after advances in forensic science had led to the discovery of new evidence in one case.

In 2005, a grand jury was convened to look into Sergeant Young's killing. Four of the men arrested on Tuesday were called to testify. They refused, and were briefly jailed.

A spokesman for the San Francisco police, Sgt. Neville Gittens, said the investigation into Sergeant Young's case and the other attacks would continue. Sergeant Gittens said the police and state attorney general were confident that enough evidence had been gathered to bring charges.

Mr. Hanlon said he doubted that the police had any new evidence.

"The only thing I can think of is the evidence they have from 1971 has been analyzed using a more sophisticated forensic science," he said. "But that is not the same as having new evidence."

Mr. Hanlon suggested that the police had long focused on the Black Panthers and other black power groups.

"I think there is a hatred of the Panthers," he said. "Police who were around then hated them, and the animosity was clear."

Mr. Torres's lawyer, Michael W. Warren, said Mr. Torres was innocent.

“He’s been around in the community in New York for a number of years,” Mr. Warren said. “The F.B.I., as well as the San Francisco police, have known his whereabouts for all these years. He has been an integral part of this community.”

The police said Mr. Torres tried to ignite dynamite in the Ingleside stationhouse in 1971.

Outside police headquarters in Manhattan, Mr. Torres said as detectives escorted him, “It’s a frame up.”

Busted In Cop Slay (NYDN)

By Alison Gendar, Kerry Burke And Corky Siemaszko, Daily News Staff Writers

New York Daily News, January 24, 2007

The radical past of a Queens father caught up with him yesterday when he was charged with taking part in the notorious murder of a San Francisco cop 35 years ago.

Francisco Torres, 58, a former member of the Black Liberation Army, was nabbed by detectives armed with DNA technology that didn't exist when Sgt. John Young was slain Aug. 29, 1971.

Two other New Yorkers, who already are serving time for killing two NYPD officers, and six other graying radicals in California and Florida also were arrested in connection with the killing. A ninth man was still being sought.

All but one of the men were in the BLA, a violent offshoot of the Black Panthers that staged a cop-killing campaign from 1968 to 1973.

Two of the cops killed by the extremists were NYPD Officers Joseph Piagentini and Waverly Jones, who were murdered on May 21, 1971 - a slaying Torres and his brother, Gabriel, were accused of, but never convicted of planning.

"My heart is beating now," Piagentini's widow, Diane, said yesterday. "Torres walked free in my husband's case. Maybe this other charge will stick and justice will finally be done."

Portly, gray-haired and wearing a black bomber jacket, Torres was led out of Police Headquarters in lower Manhattan yesterday afternoon.

"This is a frameup," he muttered.

But police sources said Torres, of South Jamaica, was linked to the San Francisco killing by a cigarette butt found at the crime scene. He was charged with homicide, conspiracy to commit homicide and bank robbery.

Young was killed when Torres and another radical allegedly burst into a precinct stationhouse and fired a shotgun through an opening in a bulletproof glass window. Torres allegedly tried to blow up the building by lighting a stick of dynamite with the cigarette. But the dynamite was a dud, sources said.

After several failed prosecutions, a special FBI task force began looking into the Young killing again in 1999 after "advances in forensic science led to the discovery of new evidence," the San Francisco Police Department said in a statement.

Police Commissioner Raymond Kelly said Torres has been "off the radar" for three decades since serving time for a bank robbery.

In 1974, a judge ruled there wasn't enough evidence to charge him and his brother for the murders of Jones and Piagentini. Two other BLA members - Herman Bell, 59, and Anthony Bottom, 55 - were convicted of the killings. They also were charged yesterday in connection with the San Francisco murder.

Torres' lawyer, Michael Warren, said police were trying to settle old scores. "It's not as if he's been trying to hide or evade the police," he said. "This is nothing but a gross form of retaliation."

Torres' neighbors on 145th St., where he raised two sons and even coached Little League, were shocked. They said "Cisco" never talked politics or got into trouble. His wife, Carolynn Hunter-Torres, is a traffic agent for the city's Parking Violations Bureau, they said.

"He told everyone he was a disabled Vietnam veteran," said Priscilla Levine, who lives two doors down from Torres' tidy brick home. "He was as friendly as you could be in New York City."

New Arrests In A Decades-Old Slaying Of Police Officers (NYS)

By Elizabeth Solomont, Special to the Sun

New York Sun, January 24, 2007

Two men serving sentences for murdering two New York City police officers in 1971 were rearrested yesterday in connection with the killing of a San Francisco officer that same year, in what officials described as a series of attacks on police by the Black Liberation Army.

Along with five others, Herman Bell and Anthony Bottom were implicated in the murder of Sergeant John Young of the San Francisco Police Department, officials said. Young was killed on August 29, 1971, when officials said members of the radical group shot him through the bulletproof glass window of a police station in Ingleside, Calif.

DOJ_NMG_0121027

Officials also arrested five individuals they described as former members of the Black Liberation Army in connection with the murder, including Francisco Torres, 58, of Queens. Also arrested in connected with the murder were Ray Michael Boudreaux, 64, of Altadena, Calif., Richard Brown, 65, of San Francisco, Henry Watson Jones, 71, of Altadena, and Harold Taylor, 58, of Panama City, Fla. Police arrested Richard O'Neal, 57, of San Francisco, on charges of conspiracy, but did not link him to Young's death.

Officials said Young's death was the result of one of a series of attacks on police between 1968 and 1973, including the 1971 murder of two New York City police officers, Waverly Jones and Joseph Piagentini. Jones and Piagentini were shot from behind in Harlem on May 21, 1971. Bell and Bottom, the latter of whom is known as Jalil Muntaqim, as well as another accomplice, Albert Washington, were later convicted of murdering them. Although nearly 36 years have passed since the attacks, officials in 1999 reopened investigations into several murders of San Francisco police officers in the 1960s and 1970s after "advances in forensic science led to the discovery of new evidence in one of the unsolved cases," officials at the San Francisco Police Department said yesterday in a news release.

Although officials declined to elaborate on the forensic evidence in this case, Mr. Torres in July was forced to provide a court-ordered DNA sample to the authorities, the Daily News reported. He and his brother, Gabriel Torres, were suspected of planning the attack on Jones and Piagentini, but a judge ruled that there was insufficient evidence.

However, officials have now implicated Bell and Mr. Torres in Young's murder. They said the two allegedly entered the Ingleside police station while several accomplices acted as lookouts and getaway drivers. Bell allegedly fired a shotgun through bulletproof glass, killing Young. Torres tried to set off dynamite as they fled, although the device failed.

Police also said Bottom and Washington were supposed to have joined them, but were arrested after a traffic stop that night when they fired on — but did not injure — a San Francisco police sergeant. When police searched their car, they discovered the .45-caliber gun used to kill the two New York City officers.

36 Years Later, Suspect Caught (WMBB)

WMBB-TV, January 24, 2007

PANAMA CITY, Fla.--A three decade-old cold case came to an end this morning during a multi-state operation that netted eight suspects allegedly involved in the 1971 murder of San Francisco Police Sergeant John V. Young.

Today around 8 a.m., a task force comprised of the FBI, San Francisco Police Department, Bay County Sheriff's Office and Panama City Police Department, operated under an arrest warrant and booked Harold Taylor, 58, into the Bay County Jail on murder and conspiracy charges.

"Panama City Police Department was contacted by the FBI and San Francisco PD about four years ago and at that time we located Mr. Taylor," said Panama City Police Chief John Van Etten in a Tuesday's press conference.

Asked why it took the task force so long to make the Taylor's arrest, Etten answered that during that time forensic evidence was being gathered against him.

Van Etten said Taylor had been living in Panama City since 1981 and had an no remarkable criminal history.

Investigators say on August 29, 1971 Taylor acting along with seven members of the Black Liberation Army, a radical group with ties to the Black Panthers--Ray Michael Boudreaux, 64; Richard Brown, 65; Herman Bell, 59; Anthony Bottom, 55; Henry Watson Jones, 71 and Francisco Torres, 58--charged into the San Francisco Police Department's station and opened fire on the occupants through a bullet proof window, killing Young and injuring a clerk.

The group has also been linked to other officer slayings in the late 1960's and 1970's in New York and California, where more arrests were said to have been arrested today.

Taylor is being held on $3,000,000 bond in the Bay County Jail.

Tomorrow morning he will make his first appearance in front of a judge. Van Etten did not know exactly when Taylor would be extradited back to San Francisco.

Feds: Details Of ISP Snooping Haven't Been Decided (CNET)

By Anne Broache, Staff Writer, CNET News.com

CNET News, January 24, 2007

DOJ attorney says there has been no "official" decision on what data providers might be required to retain or for how long.

WASHINGTON--The Bush administration hasn't settled on what data it would like Internet service providers to retain about their subscribers or for how long, a U.S. Department of Justice attorney said Tuesday.

U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales made it clear last fall that he planned to seek national legislation requiring the controversial practice known as data retention, but "we don't have any position officially about how long records would have to be retained or what records would have to be retained," said Eric Wenger, a trial attorney with the Justice Department's computer crime unit.

DOJ_NMG_0121028

During an event here hosted by the Federal Communications Bar Association, Wenger also said police already have ready access to other legal tools, such as the power to send letters to ISPs requesting "preservation" of existing data for up to 90 days while law enforcement obtains the necessary court authority to obtain that data.

But he categorized the lack of consistent data retention by ISPs as a "roadblock" to some investigations. He described, for example, a situation in which an investigator may be able to secure an IP address for a suspected phisher from Microsoft's Hotmail service. By the time the investigator took that IP address to the Internet service provider for more information about the suspect's identity, he may be told by the ISP that such information has already been purged.

"We've been talking to some of the companies to explain the needs we have for the records," he said, although he did not expressly urge adoption of new laws. Another possibility is that a data retention requirement could be extended beyond ISPs to search engines, which was discussed in private Justice Department meetings in October.

As first reported by CNET News.com in June 2005, Justice Department officials began quietly discussing the idea of data retention requirements, akin to what the European Union has already enacted.

Last week, Gonzales told members of the Senate Judiciary Committee that he planned to resume discussions with Congress about data retention legislation this year. The attorney general did not elaborate on his plans, but last year, he repeatedly said the practice was necessary to help investigators nab elusive online criminals, particularly sexual predators.

Privacy advocates have long resisted such mandates, arguing that they allow police to obtain records of e-mail chatter, Web browsing or chat room activity that normally would have been discarded after a few months--or in some cases, never kept at all.

CNET News.com's Declan McCullagh contributed to this report.

Hearings Sought On FBI Predator Probes (MH)

By Lesley Clark

The Miami Herald, January 24, 2007

WASHINGTON - A watchdog group that blew the whistle on former Rep. Mark Foley, only to see the FBI decline to investigate, is asking the chairman of the House Judiciary Committee, Rep. John Conyers, to hold a hearing on the agency's practice of investigating potential child sex predators.

The request by Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington (CREW), comes a day after an inspector general's report chided the FBI for failing to do more to alert the House about Foley's transgressions.

The former Lake Worth Republican resigned in late September after sexually explicit instant messages he had exchanged with underage House pages surfaced. In July, CREW had supplied the FBI with less graphic, but troubling e-mail messages between Foley and a teenage page. But the agency declined to take up the case, saying it didn't rise to the level of criminal activity.

The inspector general's report scolded the agency for reaching that conclusion, saying it should have alerted House leadership to the e-mails or "at least" told CREW that it was not going to investigate.

In a press release today, CREW Executive Director Melanie Sloan said the report raises ``serious questions on how the FBI conducts its investigations into potential child predators."

CREW is asking Conyers to hold a hearing on the agency's practices ``as soon as possible, in order to help prevent other children from being victimized."

Kolbe May Use Campaign Funds For Legal Defense (AP)

AP, January 24, 2007

WASHINGTON - Retired U.S. Rep. Jim Kolbe, R-Ariz., may use campaign funds for legal expenses racked up while the House ethics committee and the Justice Department were investigating his connection to a scandal involving House pages, the Federal Election Commission wrote in a draft advisory opinion made public Tuesday.

Kolbe, who retired last year, told the FEC that he incurred legal expenses after he became involved in the unfolding scandal over former Republican Rep. Mark Foley's salacious communication with former House pages.

The Ethics panel last year examined what Kolbe knew about Foley's interaction with the pages after Kolbe revealed that a former page had once contacted him with concerns about Foley. Kolbe said he told the proper authorities about the incident.

Federal law enforcement officials also opened a preliminary inquiry into a 1996 Grand Canyon rafting trip Kolbe took with two former pages.

DOJ_NMG_0121029

FEC officials wrote that the legal fees count as "ordinary and necessary expenses" incurred in connection with holding federal office.

The commission will consider the case during a meeting Thursday.

Feds: Idaho Suspect Admitted 3 Slayings (FINDLAW/AP)

By John Miller, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 24, 2007

(AP) - BOISE, Idaho-A man accused of kidnapping two Idaho children, killing one of them, after slaying their family has confessed to the killings of three other children a decade ago in Washington state and California, federal prosecutors said Tuesday.

The prosecutors cited the confessions to the old killings in court papers saying that intended to seek the death penalty against Joseph Edward Duncan III, who was indicted last week on charges involving the two northern Idaho children.

"The defendant has engaged in a continuing pattern of violence, attempted violence, and threatened violence," prosecutors said. Duncan "is likely to commit criminal acts of violence in the future that would constitute a continuing and serious threat to the lives and safety of others."

Roger Peven, Duncan's attorney, said he had not yet seen the filing and could not immediately comment on it.

Duncan is accused of kidnapping Dylan Groene, 9, and his sister Shasta, then 8, in May 2005, and taking them to the mountains of Montana, where prosecutors say he sexually abused them for weeks before killing Dylan. Duncan was arrested July 2, 2005, when he and Shasta were spotted at a Coeur d'Alene restaurant. The boy's body was found days later at a remote campsite.

The U.S. attorney's office said Duncan confessed that he killed Carmen Cubias, 9, and Sammiejo White, 11, in Washington state in 1996 and Anthony Martinez, 10, in California in 1997. Officials did not specify to whom Duncan made the confession.

The two girls were kidnapped from the Crest Motel in Seattle in July 1996. Their skeletal remains were found 17 months later in Bothell, a Seattle suburb. Anthony was forced into a car in Beaumont, Calif., in April 1997 as his friends looked on. Sixteen days later a forest ranger found the boy's nude, bound body about 70 miles to the east.

Last October, Duncan pleaded guilty in Idaho state court to first-degree murder and kidnapping for the May 16, 2005, hammer slayings of Dylan and Shasta's mother, Brenda Groene; her fiance, Mark McKenzie; and Groene's 13-year-old son, Slade. Prosecutors say he killed them to get the younger children.

If federal prosecutors fail to win a death sentence in the case involving the two younger children, a jury will be chosen in Idaho state court to consider whether to impose the death penalty on the murder counts that Duncan pleaded guilty to in October.

Duncan was charged Thursday in a California state court in Anthony's death. Prosecutors there said they also intend to seek the death penalty.

Duncan is a Tacoma, Wash., native who spent most of his adult life in Washington state prisons for sexual crimes against children.

In 2004, he had been arrested for allegedly molesting a 6-year-old boy and attempting to molest another boy in Detroit Lakes, Minn. Authorities say he jumped bail on that charge.

Judge Reduces Bullock's Prison Sentence (WT)

By Jim Mcelhatton

The Washington Times, January 24, 2007

A federal judge yesterday reduced the prison sentence of former Washington Teachers Union chief Barbara A. Bullock by more than two years, in exchange for her help in convicting former colleagues in a massive embezzlement scam.

Bullock, 68, dressed in a prisoner's jumpsuit and walking with a cane, pleaded for leniency. She told U.S. District Court Judge Richard J. Leon, "I am sorry for what I did, and I can't do any more than that."

Bullock previously had been sentenced to nine years in prison after pleading guilty in 2003 to taking part in a scam that embezzled more than $5 million in teachers' dues. Money that was taken in the scam was spent on personal items such as $500,000 on custom-made clothing and $100,000 on Washington Redskins and Washington Wizards season tickets.

The reduction means Bullock is likely to be released in about three years.

Prosecutors sought to reduce Bullock's original sentence because they said Bullock provided investigators with good leads. They said her testimony also helped convict former union treasurer James O. Baxter II and office manager Gwendolyn M. Hemphill.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Anthony Alexis said that without Bullock's help, investigators wouldn't have known about the "vast number" of furs purchased with union dues. The furs, he said, "basically became a currency in the conspiracy."

"Her testimony was useful, and we believe it was powerful," he said.

Bullock's attorney had sought to cut her overall sentence from nine to five years. Michelle Peterson said Bullock didn't know the extent of the fraud being committed by Baxter, Hemphill and others.

She also said Bullock has turned her life around, helping other inmates at the federal prison in Alderson, W.Va.

"As a former teacher, I do know how to teach children to read," Bullock told Judge Leon.

Bullock also mentioned that the prisoners she helps affectionately call her or know her as "grandma."

The criminal case was unusual because the person at the top of the conspiracy, Bullock, cooperated early and helped convict officials under her authority. Judge Leon said that's rare in such cases.

Bullock also will be out of prison sooner than the other major targets in the investigation.

Hemphill was sentenced to 11 years and Baxter to 10 years after they were convicted of embezzlement, conspiracy and other felony charges. Hemphill had sought leniency before her sentencing last year, claiming that Bullock was the mastermind of the conspiracy.

Attorneys for Hemphill also said the former office manager suffered from a mental disease, saying at one time she had psychotic episodes in which she thought she was being stalked by a small person with a spear.

Calling Bullock "a person who has turned a corner," the judge said he would have sentenced the former union president to about 14 years in prison if she did not cooperate.

"The smartest decision she ever made was getting on the right path," he said of Bullock's decision to work with prosecutors.

However, Judge Leon rejected the defense request to cut Bullock's sentence by an additional two years, saying she reaped more of the rewards in the embezzlement scam compared with any other defendant.

Judge Leon also rejected a request by prosecutors to sentence Bullock to a halfway house after her release. He said doing so would waste taxpayer money and that halfway-house spots tend to go to drug convicts.

Instead, the judge sentenced Bullock to six months of home detention after her release. Bullock also must complete 1,000 hours of community service and pay more than $4 million in restitution to the union.

Tax To Fight Gangs Set For Ballot (LAT)

By Patrick Mcgreevy And Steve Hymon

The Los Angeles Times, January 24, 2007

Desperate to stem the rise of gang violence in Los Angeles, the City Council agreed Tuesday to draft a ballot measure that would impose a parcel tax to raise $50 million or more annually for intervention and prevention programs.

However, council members said it was unlikely the proposal would go onto the ballot until next year, skipping the municipal election in May.

Also Tuesday, City Atty. Rocky Delgadillo released his plan for reducing gangs, which includes a call for school uniforms to be required for all Los Angeles Unified School District students, legal action to shut down the headquarters of the 10 worst gangs, and expanding his assignment of prosecutors to every police station and to neighborhoods around gang-plagued schools.

Delgadillo also said he would seek to expand the city attorney office's truancy program to numerous of middle schools, obtain stay-away orders for those who do not live in the neighborhoods they terrorize and push for legislation to increase penalties for gang-related crime.

Councilwoman Janice Hahn, who wrote and championed the proposal for a parcel tax to fight gangs, said action was needed because of the 267 gang-related homicides last year and the 14% increase in gang crime citywide.

"We have a major crisis in the city of Los Angeles," Hahn said. "I think the time is right that we ask the voters of Los Angeles if they would be willing to partner with us for a sustainable comprehensive approach to gang violence."

After a sometimes emotional debate, the council voted 13 to 0 to direct the city attorney to draft language for a ballot measure. Another vote will be necessary to put it to voters.

Hahn reluctantly agreed to remove a commitment to the May election from the council resolution after some of her colleagues said it was likely to fail because it needs two-thirds support to pass and voter turnout is expected to be low.

Hahn represents parts of South Los Angeles, including the Harbor Gateway neighborhood that has seen two killings of African American residents by Latino gang members in as many months. One was the Dec. 15 slaying of 14-year-old Cheryl Green. A Mexican immigrant was fatally shot Dec. 5 by a youth who witnesses believe was black, although his identity was shielded by a hood and mask.

"I have felt overwhelmed by the gang violence in my council district. I have felt desperate," Hahn told her colleagues, her voice cracking with emotion. "There was a huge part of me that just did not want to wait."

Hahn said she believes voters would support a parcel tax, which she estimated would cost property owners a flat $5 per month.

The vote to draft the ballot measure was particularly striking given the council's leeriness of tax hikes following two recent failures. City voters refused, in November 2004, to go along with a countywide sales tax increase to pay for more police, and they rejected a $1-billion affordable-housing bond last fall.

Hahn would like to see the measure go to voters early next year and is hoping that the state Legislature will act to move the presidential primary election forward to February. Meanwhile, she hopes to secure additional funds for city gang prevention programs during council budget negotiations in May.

Councilman Herb Wesson raised the need for a compromise on the timing of the election, telling his colleagues that his considerable political experience told him a ballot measure wouldn't win in May.

"People in our community are depending on us to do this right," Wesson said. "Let's not just deliver a ballot measure, let's deliver a winning ballot measure."

Some council members objected that a May vote would not provide enough time to digest and act on a study released last week by the Advancement Project that recommended an overhaul of intervention and prevention efforts.

The study said the city has failed to reduce gang violence, in large part because it lacks coordination and focus for the 23 scattered anti-gang programs it currently funds to the tune of $82 million a year.

Councilman Tony Cardenas, who leads a council committee on gang programs, said the city has not determined how much money is needed to get the job done, and he worried that $50 million might not be enough.

Councilman Dennis Zine, although he voted to draft the tax measure, questioned whether voters would support it less than a year after the council increased trash fees to pay for 1,000 more police officers.

The concern about overburdening taxpayers was raised by Veronica Perez Becker, a vice president of the Central City Assn.

"Before imposing more taxes on your constituents, we urge you to take a careful look at the collective impact of recent tax increases," Becker told the council.

In a telephone interview, Jon Coupal, president of the Howard Jarvis Taxpayers Assn., predicted the council would face a tough time selling another tax hike to voters. "They have an uphill battle," he said.

In recent years, two other California cities — Santa Rosa and San Bernardino — have won voter approval for tax increases to combat gangs. In both instances, however, the added charges also helped pay for more police.

Family Found Safe After Amber Alert (CHIT)

By Gerry Doyle, Tribune Staff Reporter

Chicago Tribune, January 24, 2007

A mother and four children who police said were abducted from their Elkhart, Ind., home on Saturday were found safe in a motel in the same city Tuesday night, officials said.

The children's father, Jerry White, is accused of kidnapping them after shooting a man in their home Saturday morning. Police initially thought White might have fled to the Chicago area, where he once lived.

But on Tuesday night, Kimberly Walker, 31, and her children Jaylan, 9; Justin, 8; Kyara, 6; and Kayla, 16 months, were "doing well" in the Elkhart area, police said.

White, 30, is in custody, police said.

White, Walker and the children were found at the Sleepy Hollow motel on Elkhart's north side about 7 p.m., police said. Police declined to say how they found the family in the motel.

"She was sobbing hysterically and physically shaking like I've never seen anybody shake," Detective Sgt. Bill Wargo said. "I asked her if she was Kim. She very hesitantly shook her head yes. We grabbed her and pulled her out of the room and she was rushed away behind another building."

Wargo said he then began yelling for the children, but at first got no response.

"I continued to yell for the kids and the oldest boy Jaylan, I saw him poke his head out kind of as the big brother," he said. "I asked him to come out to me and as he came running out, they all came out in order like a row of ducks."

Officers caught White as he was trying escape through an air duct in the room, Wargo said.

An arrest warrant was issued charging White with attempted murder and several counts of confinement. White is the father of all four children, police said.

DOJ_NMG_0121032

White, according to court records, allegedly has a history of kidnapping Walker. He pleaded guilty in 2003 to felony domestic battery for attacking Walker while she was leaving work on the South Side, according to court records. The more serious aggravated kidnapping charges were dropped.

Chicago police, the Illinois State Police and the FBI all had assisted in the investigation over the weekend.

Police said that White had been harassing Walker for several days before the shooting on Saturday, and that her sister and her sister's boyfriend had been staying in their home.

Police think White broke into Walker's house about 2 a.m. Saturday and shot her sister's boyfriend, Lathie Turnage, 30, of Chicago in the face and chest. He remains in critical but stable condition.

White then held everyone captive until leaving with Walker and the children about 11:30 a.m., police said. An Amber Alert was issued soon afterward.

Officials initially had been concerned particularly with the well-being of Jaylan Walker, who has serious asthma and needs to use a ventilator every few hours.

The Associated Press contributed to this report.

Judge Hears Request For New Trial From Vigil's Attorneys (AP)

AP, January 24, 2007

ALBUQUERQUE - A federal judge made no immediate decision Tuesday afternoon on a request for a new trial for former State Treasurer Robert Vigil.

U.S. District Judge James Browning heard arguments on the defense's effort to get a new trial for the former state official.

The hearing will resume Wednesday morning, but the judge also told both sides they should be prepared to go forth with Vigil's scheduled sentencing. That sentencing hearing is scheduled to begin at 9 a.m.

Vigil was convicted in September on one count of attempted extortion. He was acquitted on 23 other charges.

Tuesday's hearing was called after defense attorney Sam Bregman raised concerns about a potential witness. That witness, former Deputy State Treasurer Ann Marie Gallegos, claimed she had been intimidated by the FBI.

But FBI agent Marcus McCaskill testified today it was never intimated that Gallegos would be prosecuted if she testified for the defense.

COKE SECRETS TRIAL: Defense Denied 'Core' Evidence (AJC)

By Duane D. Stanford, The Atlanta Journal-constitution

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, January 24, 2007

Defense attorneys in the Coca-Cola trade secrets trial suffered a pair of setbacks Tuesday during a second day of testimony full of fireworks.

The federal judge in the case began by admonishing the attorney for former Coke secretary Joya Williams, who is accused of conspiring to sell confidential company documents and product samples to PepsiCo.

The judge said attorney Janice Singer attempted to skirt the court's rules to "attack" a prosecution witness.

As a result, the judge wouldn't allow Singer to introduce evidence the attorney said was at the "core" of her case.

Then jurors learned that Williams contacted another prosecution witness just days before the start of her trial to suggest how he should testify.

The tension began during Singer's cross-examination of key prosecution witness Edmund Duhaney, who has pleaded guilty to one count of conspiring to steal trade secrets. He testified against Williams.

Singer tried to introduce as evidence a spiral notebook in which Duhaney copied something called "the 48 rules of power" taken from a book by the same name.

The statements he copied included one that stated "Conceal your intentions," and another that said, "Never put too much trust in friends, learn how to use enemies."

Singer argued that the statements would help show Duhaney's state of mind in dealing with Williams.

Judge J. Owen Forrester said the notebook could be used only if Singer asked questions that would reveal whether Duhaney believed the statements or simply copied them down. Forrester said the evidence could cast Duhaney in an unfair light.

After Singer twice forgot to follow the judge's order and was warned, the judge told her to move on. Singer apologized and pressed the judge to allow her to continue her questions, saying she had made a mistake.

The judge asked the jurors and Duhaney to leave the courtroom, and the debate continued with the judge telling the red-faced Singer she had tried on several occasions to unfairly attack witnesses' character.

After a lunch break, Singer again asked for leniency.

"It is the core of my case," she said of Duhaney's notebook, arguing she had a right to introduce it because it was being used to impeach Duhaney, not tarnish his character.

"I have already given you two chances," the judge fired back.

Earlier, before Singer's questioning was halted by the judge, Duhaney told her he didn't believe the statements from the book. He said he took them down from a copy of the book he borrowed because he thought, "Wow, these are something."

Singer hammered away at Duhaney's credibility most of the morning. But Duhaney refused to say he was testifying to get a lighter sentence for his part in the crime.

Prosecutors have agreed to recommend a lesser sentence for Duhaney if they are satisfied with his testimony. He faces a maximum 10 years in prison.

"I am here only to tell the truth," Duhaney said, adding that he believes his role in the crime has been exaggerated.

Singer, taking an aggressive tone throughout her questioning, also fired away at Duhaney for lying to federal agents about the case when he was arrested July 5.

Duhaney said he was confused and wanted to say as little as possible after his arrest because he didn't have a lawyer present.

Williams' case suffered yet another setback during the afternoon session, when prosecutors called a former boyfriend of Williams to the stand.

He testified that he helped Williams send a package via Federal Express to another co-defendant in the case, Ibrahim Dimson. Dimson also pleaded guilty in October to the conspiracy charge but has not agreed to testify.

The boyfriend, Sedrick Wilson, said he didn't know what was in the package and that Williams kept him in the dark about the alleged trade secrets plot. Prosecutors will try to show later that the nearly 5-pound package contained confidential Coke materials.

Wilson also testified that he got a text message from Williams on Jan. 7, just days before jury selection in her trial, begging him to call her. When they spoke, according to Wilson, Williams urged him to say the Federal Express package contained trucking company documents.

"I guess she wanted me to lie," Wilson told a prosecutor during questioning, prompting an objection from Williams' attorney and an order from the judge to strike the statement.

Wilson then clarified: "She said, 'Make sure you say it was for the trucking company.' "

Wilson also testified he was at Williams' apartment last spring when she met with Dimson and Duhaney to discuss stacks of Coke documents.

Testimony today will resume with Williams' former boss, Javier Sanchez Lamelas, a marketing vice president at Coke.

Former Boyfriend Tells Court Coke Theft Suspect Wanted Him To Lie About A Package (AP)

By Harry R. Weber, Associated Press

AP, January 24, 2007

ATLANTA – An ex-boyfriend of a former Coca-Cola secretary charged with conspiring to steal trade secrets from the beverage giant testified Tuesday that the defendant wanted him to lie for her about a package she had sent to another man accused in the case.

Sedrick Wilson said Joya Williams sent him a text message on Jan. 7, nine days before jury selection began in her trial, saying that it was “beyond important” that he call her.

The subject, Wilson said, was a package she sent via FedEx to Ibrahim Dimson, a co-defendant in the case, during the first half of 2006. Wilson said he was with Williams when the shipment was sent.

“She said, 'Make sure you say that it was for the trucking company,'” Wilson recalled of his recent conversation with Williams.

Wilson testified he didn't know what was in the package.

“I guess she wanted me to lie for her,” Wilson said. A defense lawyer objected, and U.S. District Judge J. Owen Forrester ruled the comment out of consideration by the jury.

Williams has been free on bond leading up to the trial and during it.

The government did not say during Wilson's testimony what it believed was in the package, but a prosecutor asserted during a conference outside the presence of the jury that the text message and subsequent conversation show consciousness of guilt on Williams' part. Defense lawyer Janice Singer objected to allowing the testimony, but Forrester let it in.

The government has alleged that Williams took confidential documents and samples of products that Coca-Cola was developing and gave them to Dimson and another co-defendant, Edmund Duhaney. Dimson and Duhaney have pleaded guilty to conspiracy and are awaiting sentencing.

Earlier Tuesday, Duhaney, a key witness against Williams, admitted he lied to FBI agents when he was first questioned on July 5.

"You also told them you weren't sure where Joya Williams worked. That was a lie, right?" Singer asked.

"Yeah," Duhaney responded.

Singer also questioned whether Duhaney was only testifying that Williams spearheaded the scheme in hopes of getting a lighter sentence.

"Is it your hope in this case the government will file a motion for a lower sentence and that you will receive a lower sentence?" Singer asked.

"My hope in this case is that the truth will be told and that Judge (J. Owen) Forrester will make the final decision," Duhaney responded.

"You think you were a small player, right?" Singer said.

"I wasn't a small player," Duhaney responded. "I was involved. I didn't force anybody to do anything. I didn't steal anything."

Also Tuesday, the government played a recording of a June 29, 2006, conversation between Duhaney and Dimson in which they discuss some of the products under development by Coca-Cola that they were seeking to sell information about to Pepsi.

They included Vitamin Mineral 506, Healthy Green Tea, Plus 4 Omega, Lemon Hydration and Plus 2 Green Tea Diet. Those names likely were not what the final names of the products Coca-Cola was developing would be but only how Coca-Cola referred to them internally during the development process.

Williams faces up to 10 years in prison if convicted of the single federal conspiracy charge against her. She has pleaded not guilty.

Williams, Duhaney and Dimson were indicted in July, accused of stealing new product samples and confidential documents from The Coca-Cola Co. and trying to sell them to Purchase, N.Y.-based PepsiCo Inc.

Coca-Cola had declined to say what product or products the samples relate to. But Duhaney's testimony shed some light on the products. On Monday, he testified that one product Williams had information about was Coca-Cola Blak, which Coca-Cola launched in January 2006.

The three suspects were hoping to get at least $1.5 million for the scheme, according to a taped phone call between Duhaney and Dimson that was played in court Monday. On the call, the two men discuss how to split the money.

Williams was expected to get a cut of up to $150,000, according to another recorded call between Dimson and Duhaney played in court Tuesday.

The alleged conspiracy was foiled after Pepsi warned Atlanta-based Coca-Cola and an undercover FBI investigation was launched.

Williams was fired from her job as an administrative assistant to Coca-Cola's global brand director after the allegations came to light. That executive, Javier Sanchez Lamelas, testified Tuesday that there was no reason for Williams to take confidential Coca-Cola information home with her.

During her opening statement in the trial on Monday, Singer referred to Dimson and Duhaney as "two seasoned liars, con men who took advantage of Joya Williams."

Singer said Duhaney's deal with the government is his "whole motive in this case" for testifying against Williams.

Dimson and Duhaney served prison terms at the same time at a federal penitentiary in Montgomery, Ala. Duhaney served nearly five years of a seven-year sentence on a cocaine charge before being released in 2005; Dimson served less than one year of a two-year sentence on a bank fraud charge before his release in 2004.

Williams does not have a criminal record, another attorney who previously represented her has said.

Coke Co-conspirator On The Stand (WXIA)

WXIA-TV, January 24, 2007

Secretly-recorded phone calls portray an Atlanta Coca-Cola employee as a willing participant last year in a conspiracy to try to sell Coke trade secrets to Pepsi.

But the now-former Coke employee, Joya Williams, insists that she knew nothing about any such conspiracy.

She is on trial in federal court in Atlanta, facing ten years in prison.

On Tuesday, the second day of testimony, the jury heard those taped phone calls, and saw an eyeful.

What they saw were bottles of two, secret drinks that Coca Cola was developing last year -- green tea drinks.

Coke did not want Pepsi to know about them.

Yet the government says Joya Williams, at her desk at Coke headquarters in Atlanta last year:

Slipped the two bottles into a small, red shopping bag

Put the bag into a cardboard box, along with a pile of secret Coke documents

Carried the box out of Coke's headquarters, in full view of security cameras and security personnel

And gave the box to a friend and accomplice, Edmund Duhaney, who brought it to his DeKalb County home and stuck it in his garage -- just part of a treasure chest of Coke trade secrets that Duhaney says Williams gave him to try to sell to Pepsi.

Williams insists Duhaney is the one who stole all those Coke trade secrets from her, and, on his own, offered them to Pepsi, without her knowledge.

But in court Tuesday, with Duhaney on the witness stand, Williams and the jury listened to phone calls the FBI recorded between Duhaney and his confessed partner in crime, Ibrahim Dimson, when agents secretly tapped Dimson's cell phone last year.

Both men, who were arrested along with Williams in July, ended up pleading guilty in October. Each faces up to ten years in prison..

In their taped phone calls, the men referto Williams with nicknames, "J" and "Shorty" and "Scram," and portray her as an associate, a willing and active participant, in the scheme.

They hoped to sell the Coke secrets to Pepsi for $1.5 million, never knowing until July 5th, the day they were to exchange the secrets for the cash, that the "Pepsi representative" who was going to meet them at Atlanta's airport to pay them was really an undercover FBI agent.

In their phone conversations in late June, they are laughing, excited about what they thought would be their big pay day. They discuss what they want to do with the cash.

They decide Joya Williams' share should be $150,000.

They want to give a total of $250,000 to two of Dimson's friends.

They want to spend $100,000 for a Muslim worship center and school, one of them saying, "That will be the most important thing we ever do in our life."

And they decide to keep for themselves the remaining $1 million.

In court Tuesday, Assistant U.S. Attorney B. J. Pak asked Duhaney, "Why pay Williams?"

Duhaney answered that he and Dimson credited Williams with coming up with the scheme, as opposed Williams' claim, since their arrests, that she was an unnwitting victim of their scheme. "She had put everything together," Duhaney said on the stand, "getting the (Coca Cola) documents (for us) to sell."

Under cross examination, Williams' attorney, Janice Singer, attacked Duhaney's credibility, accusing him of lying for the government to try to get a lighter prison sentence.

Duhaney's plea agreement specifies that he is subject to serving the maximum penalty, ten years, although the government prosecutors will recommend to the judge a lighter sentence. Duhaney also agreed to pay $40,000 in restitution to Coca Cola, and he is subject to paying a fine to the government of up to $250,000.

Williams' ex-boyfriend, Sedrick Wilson testified against her Tuesday, describing meetings she'd had with the two men last year.

And Wilson testified that Williams contacted him just before the trial began, on January 7th, 2007, to try get him to say on the stand what she wanted him to say about a package she had air-expressed to Dimson in New York in May.

"Make sure you say [on the stand] it was for the trucking company," the company that Dimson and Duhaney were setting up, Wilson quoted Williams as telling him to testify.

The prosecution never said what Williams actually sent to Dimson, whether it was a package of trucking company materials, or additional, confidential Coke documents for Dimson and Duhaney to try to sell.

But just prior to Wilson's testimony, and outside the presence of the jury, Williams' attorney asked Judge J. Owen Forrester to order the prosecution not to ask Wilson about Williams trying to influence Wilson's testimony.

Forrester concluded Wilson's testimony against Williams would be an inference of guilt, and "prejuducial, but not unfairly prejudicial," and he ruled the jurors could hear it and decide for theselves.

Testimony continues Wednesday.

The case is expected to go to the jury next week.

Former Indianapolis Patrolman Gets 57 Months For Fraud (AP)

AP, January 24, 2007

INDIANAPOLIS - A former patrolman who moonlighted as a home appraiser has been sentenced to 57 months in federal prison for his role in a mortgage-fraud scheme that illegally inflated home loans.

Michael C. Smith, 45, who had been an Indianapolis Police Department officer for 19 years, was also ordered Thursday to pay $1.1 million in restitution. Smith resigned from the force as the department was starting procedures to fire him after charges were filed, said police spokesman Lt. Douglas Scheffel.

Smith was convicted of money laundering and wire fraud in two separate deals in 2001 and 2003 designed to illegally inflate mortgage loans in Indianapolis, Marion and Fairmount.

Smith is the 58th person convicted of fraud since a federal task force convened to look into real estate fraud in central Indiana, U.S. Attorney Susan Brooks' office reported.

Those schemes have depressed property values for nearby homeowners, cost lenders more than $40 million and riddled neighborhoods with abandoned houses, aggravating problems in older, deteriorating neighborhoods.

Indianapolis alone spent $21.2 million in federal money between 2000 and 2005 to repair 2,300 houses, even as abandoned houses have nearly doubled since the late 1980s. A 2003 survey counted 8,136 vacant city houses.

"There are so many of these foreclosures. But they're in small quantities. No one is watching," said Indianapolis real estate agent Margaret Huddleson, a member of an industry group monitoring fraud cases.

Since October, a federal grand jury has looked into a failed mortgage deal connected to Fishers real estate salesman Robert Penn that involved 112 houses.

A pending fraud lawsuit, filed last summer by mortgage giant Countrywide Home Loans, contends Penn was at the center of a conspiracy to borrow more money than the houses were worth.

Sentenced Thursday along with Smith in the conspiracy were Mark Speckman, 48, McCordville, and Joseph Britton, 47, both of Fishers. They each received 33-month sentences in a conspiracy that involved American Savings Mortgage.

The company's president, Kenneth McKinney, last year was ordered to serve seven years in prison.

Despite a flurry of convictions that have included 15 local mortgage brokers, nine loan officers and six appraisers, fraudulent home loan deals continue to fuel Indianapolis' high foreclosure rate.

Last year, industry watcher RealtyTrac ranked Indianapolis first among U.S. metro areas with one of every 69 houses in foreclosure, or 1.45 percent of the houses in the nine-county region.

Most of the fraudulent deals involve an array of lenders, title agents, brokers and others who help doctor documents to arrange bigger mortgage loans that the property is worth and pocket the difference.

Bribery Case Alarms Governor (OREG)

By EDWARD WALSH And ASHBEL GREEN

The Oregonian, January 24, 2007

Prisons - Ted Kulongoski orders a policy review and pledges to fix any failings found from an inquiry into a corrections food official

SALEM -- Gov. Ted Kulongoski on Tuesday called for an internal review of state procurement policies in the wake of a federal probe into allegations that a food service administrator for the prison system took bribes from companies in return for buying their food.

"The governor takes the investigation and accusations very seriously," said Kulongoski spokeswoman Anna Richter Taylor. "Once the (federal) investigation is complete, we will be re-evaluating whether or not the procurement and management policies that we have in place are sufficient and identify what changes need to be made to strengthen oversight."

Farhad "Fred" Monem was placed on leave after IRS and FBI agents searched his Salem home and office earlier this month. A federal judge has unsealed court documents that describe a four-year kickback scheme that alleges Monem took hundreds of thousands of dollars from companies that sell food to the state for inmate meals.

According to state officials, the Corrections Department operates its own procurement system that is different from that of most other state agencies. Corrections Department Director Max Williams appeared before the Joint Ways and Means Public Safety Subcommittee for a review of the department's operations.

In a prepared statement before his regular testimony, Williams said that when the federal investigation is complete, he will attempt to determine whether the agency was financially harmed by the alleged kickback scheme.

"You have my commitment that if the facts determine the state was in fact harmed, we will vigorously seek recovery of those funds," Williams told the subcommittee.

In a brief interview, Williams said he learned of the investigation from federal authorities less than a month ago. He said that he does not know whether the alleged scheme cost his department money and that he has had no indication the case involves anyone else in the agency.

Federal investigators declined to discuss details of the case Tuesday. It was unclear whether the alleged bribery scam in Oregon could occur in other states.

Oregon has a centralized purchasing system. And instead of simply seeking bids, Monem would scour the commodities markets for deals, sometimes reselling items if prices later went up.

Washington contracts with companies to provide food for a fixed price. Although the state does some purchasing centrally, prisons also buy from local distributors. Levin & Lawrence, the California-based food distributor that investigators singled out in the alleged kickbacks scheme in Oregon, did not show up on a list of companies that sell food to Washington prisons, according to a spokeswoman.

Florida doesn't directly purchase food for inmates. Instead, it contracts with a private company, Aramark, to provide the meals, according to a corrections spokeswoman.

Neither Monem nor any executive in the food companies has been charged. Monem's attorney declined to comment.

Food Service Manager Investigated For Alleged Kickbacks (AP)

By WILLIAM McCALL

AP, January 24, 2007

Gov. Ted Kulongoski said Tuesday a federal investigation into alleged kickbacks to the state prison food service administrator totaling at least $650,000 may lead to tougher oversight of the purchasing program.

"Certainly the governor takes this investigation very seriously," said Anna Richter Taylor, the governor's spokeswoman.

Farhad "Fred" Monem has been placed on administrative leave from the Oregon Department of Corrections after federal agents accused him and his wife, Karen, of receiving kickbacks or bribes.

No charges have been filed against Monem or others accused of involvement.

David Angeli, the attorney for Fred Monem, declined comment.

A spokeswoman for U.S. Attorney Karin Immergut also declined comment on the joint FBI and Internal Revenue Service investigation.

The allegations are part of an affidavit filed in U.S. District Court in Eugene to support a search warrant for the Monems' home, Fred Monem's business office in Salem, and a safe deposit box the couple kept at a Salem bank.

The affidavit portrayed the couple living a lavish lifestyle from 2003 to 2006, including at least 15 trips to the Mandalay Bay Hotel and Casino in Las Vegas and the purchase of a $77,000 BMW — roughly what Fred Monem earns per year at his state job.

The search turned up more than $12,000 in cash in a briefcase in a closet at the couple's house, along with four packages of marijuana and a package of hashish, according to court documents.

"Without the bribery/kickback payments made to Fred and Karen Monem ... it is my opinion that the purchase and acquisition of assets and lifestyle expenditures made by the Monems ... would not have been possible," IRS Special Agent Robert Salisbury wrote in the affidavit.

Fred Monem, 48, had built a reputation as a "whiz kid" who had saved the state Department of Corrections millions of dollars in inmate food costs by purchasing food nearing its expiration date and also through buying in bulk.

The scheme allegedly involves food distributors and brokers in California, New York and Maryland but centered on a distributor in Santa Clarita, Calif., named Levin & Lawrence Inc.

Monem purchased bulk food from Levin & Lawrence that was labeled "distressed" because it is close to the expiration date and kicked back a profit to Fred Monem, according to the affidavit.

A man who answered the phone at Levin & Lawrence on Tuesday, but did not identify himself, declined comment on behalf of the company.

The Department of Corrections issued a statement Tuesday saying the investigation does not appear to involve any inmates or state prisons and no arrests have been made.

"We are of course disappointed that allegations have surfaced regarding a department employee," Max Williams, director of the Oregon Department of Corrections, said in the statement. "We hold ourselves and all employees to the highest ethical standards and we take very seriously any suggestion that those standards have been violated."

Contributor To Gossip Column Won't Be Charged (NYT)

By James Barron

The New York Times, January 24, 2007

Federal prosecutors have decided not to file charges against a former freelance contributor to The New York Post's Page Six gossip column after an investigation into whether he had demanded payments for favorable coverage, a lawyer for the contributor said yesterday.

The contributor, Jared Paul Stern, was suspended last April after The Post reported that the California supermarket billionaire Ronald W. Burkle had complained to the authorities.

At the time, people involved in the investigation said that Mr. Burkle had secretly videotaped Mr. Stern demanding a $100,000 payment and a $10,000 monthly stipend. Mr. Stern was heard saying that in return, he would keep unfavorable mentions of Mr. Burkle out of Page Six.

Yesterday, a person with knowledge of the decision confirmed that federal prosecutors in Manhattan had decided not to prosecute Mr. Stern. The decision was reported on The New York Observer's Web site yesterday afternoon.

"I'm relieved, obviously," Mr. Stern said. "I was not expecting to be charged, but it's always good to have them come out and say it."

A spokeswoman for the United States attorney's office in Manhattan declined to comment. But Mr. Stern's lawyer, Joseph Tacopina, said he had been told of the decision.

"We've always been confident that there was no evidence of any crime," Mr. Tacopina said. "What we've said from Day 1 is, this is a campaign to spread lies fueled by Burkle's personal vendetta against The New York Post. There was never any evidence of wrongdoing on Mr. Stern's part."

After the investigation became public, associates of Mr. Burkle said that he had been upset about items he considered inaccurate. He set up a meeting with Mr. Stern, who suggested that he become a source. Mr. Burkle said no, the associates said, but said he would buy five dozen shirts from Mr. Stern's clothing line.

Later, a Burkle associate said when the investigation became public, Mr. Stern sent an e-mail message saying that Mr. Burkle had "the means" to do something about the way Page Six covered him. Mr. Stern and Mr. Burkle met twice more, and Mr. Burkle's security detail videotaped the conversations.

A spokesman for Mr. Burkle issued a statement yesterday that repeated that Mr. Stern had sought money in return for "Mr. Stern's 'efforts' to stop the publication of false reports about Mr. Burkle."

"Mr. Burkle followed the government's instructions from the onset," the statement said.

"Mr. Burkle didn't question their decisions previously," the statement said, "and he isn't going to start doing so now."

A spokesman for The Post, Howard J. Rubenstein, said, "The Post is pleased that there is no crime involved."

The Post suspended Mr. Stern when it reported the allegations.

Mr. Stern said yesterday that if The Post offered to reinstate him, "I'd consider it." Mr. Rubenstein said The Post would not comment on "a personnel matter."

After the articles about Mr. Burkle's recordings appeared, several law enforcement officials suggested that the news accounts had precluded federal prosecutors and F.B.I. agents from making additional recordings and possibly collecting enough evidence to make a case.

Lawyers Question Lab's DNA Results (BOS)

By Jonathan Saltzman, Globe Staff

The Boston Globe, January 24, 2007

Might affect Entwistle, others

Showing the widening fallout from the mishandling of DNA test results at the State Police lab, the lawyers in three high-profile murder cases challenged the reliability of such test results and suggested the problems could help their clients.

A lawyer for Neil Entwistle, whose DNA was allegedly found on the gun used to kill his wife and infant daughter, said the suspension of Robert E. Pino, the civilian administrator of the DNA database at the State Police forensic laboratory, "calls into question the reliability, trustworthiness, and integrity" of the lab and should be investigated by an independent forensic scientist.

The FBI began an audit of the laboratory last week because Pino allegedly failed to report 11 matches in old unsolved rape cases until the statute of limitations had expired and reported four test results incorrectly.

But Entwistle's lawyer, Elliot M. Weinstein, said in an interview that the bureau has had its own deficiencies with DNA analysis in recent years and lacks credibility.

Weinstein, who unsuccessfully asked a judge last fall to toss out DNA evidence against Entwistle, declined to say whether he intends to submit a new motion on the basis of Pino's suspension. But his comments indicate that defense lawyers will probably cite the lab's problems as reasons that judges should block DNA results from being introduced as evidence, that juries should discount such evidence, or that convictions should be overturned.

Also yesterday, lawyer Robert A. George said he expects that Pino's actions will form the basis of challenges in two other high-profile murder cases: Christopher M. McCowen's conviction in November of the murder of Christa Worthington, and Edward S. O'Brien's 1997 conviction in the slaying of his best friend's mother. George represented both defendants.

McCowen, a Hyannis trash collector, was sentenced to life in prison for raping and killing Worthington, a fashion writer, after prosecutors presented evidence that his DNA was recovered at her Truro house. O'Brien is serving a life sentence for killing Janet Downing when he was 15; DNA tests indicated that blood found in her Somerville home matched O'Brien's. Pino testified in the O'Brien case.

"Every lawyer who cares about whether justice was done in their cases will pursue whether Pino's involvement has destroyed the conviction," George said in an interview. "To assume that we're being told the truth about the depth of Pino's involvement in compromised cases is the equivalent of having the wool pulled over our eyes. I don't believe it, and no one else should either."

Kelly A. Nantel -- spokeswoman for the Executive Office of Public Safety, which oversees the State Police lab -- said Pino's alleged lapses had nothing to do with the reliability of DNA test results.

"We're talking about administrative problems," she said. "We're not talking about problems with the science."

A spokesman for Middlesex District Attorney Gerard T. Leone Jr., whose office is prosecuting Entwistle in a trial scheduled to start Oct. 1, said prosecutors are confident that the DNA evidence will pass muster.

Beyond saying that he remains an employee and that the allegations are under investigation, Pino has declined comment.

Pino, who was suspended with pay Jan. 11, oversaw the state's Combined DNA Indexing System, a computerized databank that matches DNA profiles of convicted felons with samples collected at crime scenes and analyzed by civilian scientists at the Sudbury facility or at private labs.

Weinstein said Pino's alleged actions cast doubts on the credibility of all DNA evidence handled by the lab. "The public is entitled to know that its crime laboratory is generating scientifically reliable test results," he said.

He also said the FBI is not suited to review the lab's practices because it has had problems of its own. In 2003, for example, the Justice Department's inspector general investigated an FBI lab unit after a technician failed to follow required procedure in analyzing DNA evidence and went undetected for two years.

GOP Urges Berger Lie Test (WT)

By Jerry Seper, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, January 24, 2007

Eighteen House Republicans have urged the Justice Department to proceed with a polygraph test for Samuel R. Berger, the former national security adviser who agreed to take the test as part of a plea of guilty of stealing documents from the National Archives.

"This may be the only way for anyone to know whether Mr. Berger denied the 9/11 commission and the public the complete account of the Clinton administration's actions or inactions during the lead-up to the terrorist attacks on the United States," the congressmen said in their letter to Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales.

The congressmen -- led by Rep. Thomas M. Davis III of Virginia -- said a prompt lie-detector test is needed to determine the extent of Mr. Berger's thievery, especially because the former Clinton administration adviser reviewed original documents for which there were no copies or inventory.

Other signers of the letter are Reps. Duncan Hunter, Darrell Issa and Brian Bilbray of California, John L. Mica of Florida, F. James Sensenbrenner Jr. of Wisconsin, Dan Burton and Mark Souder of Indiana, Christopher Shays of Connecticut, John M. McHugh of New York, Chris Cannon of Utah, John J. "Jimmy" Duncan Jr. of Tennessee, Michael R. Turner of Ohio, Kenny Marchant of Texas, Lynn Westmoreland of Georgia, Patrick T. McHenry and Virginia Foxx of North Carolina and Bill Sali of Idaho.

Mr. Davis, former chairman and now ranking Republican on the House Government Reform Committee, released a report by his staff on Jan. 9, saying a Justice Department investigation of Mr. Berger's admitted document theft was "remarkably incurious."

The report said the theft compromised national security "much more than originally disclosed" and resulted in "incomplete and misleading" information to the September 11 commission. It said Mr. Berger was willing to go to "extraordinary lengths to compromise national security, apparently for his own convenience."

In October, Mr. Davis led an effort to hold hearings to determine whether any documents were "destroyed, removed or were missing" after visits by Mr. Berger to the Archives. He said the full extent of Mr. Berger's document removal "can never be known" and the Justice Department could not assure the September 11 commission that it received all the documents to which Mr. Berger had access.

Mr. Davis said that during sentencing, Mr. Berger agreed to a polygraph examination as part of a plea deal, but Justice never administered the test, according to two Justice officials closely connected to the case -- John Dion, chief of the counterespionage section, and Bruce Swartz, deputy assistant attorney general for the Criminal Division.

He said Mr. Berger assured the commission that it received all the documents it sought but that some of the papers Mr. Berger examined were originals for which there were no copies or inventory. He said there is no way to know whether Mr. Berger returned all of those documents.

Lanny Breuer, Mr. Berger's attorney, has said the matter was thoroughly investigated by the Justice Department for more than two years and effectively closed for more than a year. He said the report's conclusions were based on "pure conjecture."

"Sandy Berger made a mistake. But he has admitted that mistake, fully cooperated with the government's investigation, paid his debt to society, and moved on. It's time for the new congressional minority to do the same."

Justice Department spokes-man Bryan Sierra has said the department "has no evidence that Sandy Berger's actions deprived the 9/11 commission of documents, and we stand by our investigation of this matter."

Mr. Berger pleaded guilty in April 2005 to a misdemeanor charge of unauthorized removal and retention of classified material, including documents outlining the government's knowledge of terrorist threats to the United States. Fined $50,000 and barred from access to classified material for three years, he faced a year in prison and a $100,000 fine, but his plea deal reduced the fine and kept him out of prison.

Schools Act To Short-Circuit Spread Of 'Cyberbullying' (WSJ)

By Anne Marie Chaker

The Wall Street Journal, January 24, 2007

New Laws, Policies Attempt To Address Harassment That Originates Off Campus

Kylie Kenney heard a crescendo of whispers and jeers as she moved through an otherwise unremarkable eighth-grade school day. The reason: Word had spread of a Web site posted by some of her peers, titled "Kill Kylie Incorporated."

The site featured a list of crude insults, beneath the heading: "She's queer because... ." It seemed everyone in school had read it. Distressed, she reported the site to the school but says that the impact of the bullying was so severe that she eventually changed schools. "I still have emotional damage," says Kylie, now a 10th-grader.

Kylie's story underscores a growing problem for school administrators and local officials: how to handle so-called cyberbullying. As long as there have been kids, there have been bullies. Now, emboldened by the anonymity available online, a bully can be nastier -- and with the click of a mouse, have a far broader audience -- than in the past. What may once have been snickers in the hallway can now be an excruciatingly public humiliation spread via email, text messaging and online teen forums.

Schools and local officials have been hearing increasing calls from parents to step in. But educators are torn between the desire to stop bad behavior and the limits on their ability to intervene. Much of the badmouthing takes place on home computers and off school grounds, where schools have little or no authority. An official at Kylie's former school, Frederick H. Tuttle Middle School in South Burlington, Vt., declined to discuss specifics of her case, though an attorney says, "The school acted appropriately in all respects."

Now, school officials, states and even Web sites are taking action. Educators and state legislatures in Florida, South Carolina, Utah, Oregon and elsewhere are creating new policies that deal with cyberbullying, either incorporating electronic harassment into existing bullying policies, or spelling it out as an entirely new threat. In doing so, they are often crafting language that allows educators to intervene even in off-campus incidents if the activity affects the school environment.

MySpace.com, the popular networking site, last fall released a guide for school administrators, advising them to contact the site about false or offensive user profiles or to report threats or cyberbullying. It also created a hotline and email address for the exclusive use of school officials to contact MySpace.

The challenge is that students, like everyone else, have First Amendment rights that school officials can't cross. In 1969, the Supreme Court ruled that to suppress student speech on campus, a public school must show it aims to prevent "substantial disruption" in the classroom rather than "a mere desire to avoid the discomfort and unpleasantness that always accompany an unpopular viewpoint."

Later this year, the justices will consider whether public school officials can suppress student speech off campus, in a case where a Juneau, Alaska, high-school principal suspended a student for unfurling a banner reading "Bong Hits 4 Jesus" on a sidewalk where students had gathered. The case could have implications for other forms of off-campus speech, such as online postings.

Some schools aren't waiting. In Florida, the Pasco County school board added language about cyberbullying to its code of conduct for the current school year. Its language states that "the school board has no duty to regulate or review off-campus Internet messages, statements postings, or acts" but adds that when those acts "threaten violence against another student or otherwise disrupts the learning environment or orderly conduct of the school," the school can take action, from conferencing in parents and students, to expulsion.

DOJ_NMG_0121041

Linda Crosthwait, assistant principal at Leawood Middle School in Leawood, Kan., has her own rule of thumb for mean-spirited rumors online: "If it's carried into the classroom in some way -- a fight in school or something said in school -- then [the posting] becomes a piece of what we can deal with," she says.

These positions reflect the growing view of many school officials that electronic harassment that happens off campus can affect a student's education -- and therefore be a punishable offense. In Oregon last year, the state association of school boards consulted with the state Justice Department to draft policy language specific to cyberbullying. While state law already requires school districts to have a bullying policy in place, local districts wanted additional clarification.

The guidance provided from the state association says that "any form of harassment using electronic devices...is prohibited and will not be tolerated in the district." It leaves open the possibility that the school's reach could extend off campus.

"There's always the legal discussion of 'if it doesn't happen at school, can a district take action?'" says Joe Wehrli, policy-services director for the Oregon School Boards Association. "If a student is harassed for three hours at night on the Web and they come to school and have to sit in the same classroom with the student that's the bully, there is an effect on education, and in that way, there is a direct link to schools," he argues.

The decisions aren't easy. The National School Boards Association hosted an online discussion two months ago titled "Postings, Protection and Policies: What School Leaders Need to Know About Teen Hangouts" -- specifically online forums. Lawyer Kimberly Jessie Cunningham advised school leaders to warn parents that "the district is limited in its ability to discipline" bad behavior online. She characterized "substantial disruption" under the law as including such things as shutting down the school computer system for multiple days because too many students attempted to access bullying comments online.

"School administrators need to understand that their authority stops at the schoolhouse door," says Witold J. Walczak, legal director of the American Civil Liberties Union of Pennsylvania.

Jill Eckel, principal at Sussex County Charter School for Technology, a middle school in Sparta, N.J., recently got wind of a student's MySpace page laced with discussion of an upcoming fight involving students at her school. But the brawl was to take place away from campus.

"I sat for a long time, thinking, 'Is it my responsibility to call the parents?'" Ms. Eckel recalls. "I've had parents tell me it's not my business" to patrol online activity. In the end, she says, she alerted a parent she trusted, who in turn got in touch with the parents involved.

At Pope John XXIII High School in Sparta, N.J., principal Msgr. Kieran McHugh aims to keep it simple. He outright banned the use of MySpace last school year after hearing about students posting content he considered inappropriate. Now, "we monitor it," says Father McHugh, who has contacted parents when students have been found posting on the site. That, he says, has eliminated any further instances. As a private organization, a Catholic school has more leeway over student conduct than does a public school, since it isn't bound by the same First Amendment rules that limit government suppression of speech. (By the same token, a private religious school can mandate prayer or religious lessons, which public schools may not.)

Several states passed laws or other measures in 2006 that addressed bullying that can happen in cyberspace. Idaho's law that seeks to prohibit student bullying and harassment allows that such acts can be "committed through the use of a land line, car phone or wireless telephone or through the use of data or computer software that is accessed through a computer, computer system or computer network."

South Carolina's Safe School Climate Act to prevent school bullying includes "electronic communication" in its definition of harassment.

In a new rule that went into effect earlier this month, Utah's State Board of Education amended its existing discipline guidelines for districts to include policies specific to bullying. The changes also included a definition of cyberbullying, requiring districts to offer students and teachers training that would broadly address "electronic means for aggression inside or outside of school."

Write to Anne Marie Chaker at anne-marie.chaker@wsj.com1

CIVIL LAW:

'Bankruptcy Boot Camps' Gird Attorneys For Battle (WSJ)

By Kristina Doss

The Wall Street Journal, January 24, 2007

Creditors beware: O. Max Gardner III is planning to train an army of consumer bankruptcy attorneys at his Bankruptcy Boot Camps this year.

DOJ_NMG_0121042

His mission isn't to beef up attorneys' muscles with a regimen of sit-ups or push-ups. Rather, Mr. Gardner's goal is to teach them the fine art of overcoming the hurdles put in place by bankruptcy legislation that creditors helped to pass in 2005.

Mr. Gardner, who started the boot camps last August, believes the new law is punitive toward debtor attorneys and makes it harder for consumers to file for bankruptcy-court protection.

"I felt like if the creditors really wanted reform, I would give it to them, but my style," Mr. Gardner said, "I'm training an army of consumer advocates that will actively and aggressively look beyond just the bankruptcy in consumer bankruptcy cases, [at] all other remedies that may be available."

The Bankruptcy Abuse Prevention and Consumer Protection Act, which took effect in October 2005, ushered in sweeping changes to the federal bankruptcy code that affected both consumers and businesses in financial trouble.

Critics contend that the new law made it harder for consumers to file for bankruptcy protection and that it was essentially drafted by lobbyists for banks and credit-card companies.

Some judges have expressed that view, too. In a court opinion last year, Judge Frank R. Monroe of the U.S. Bankruptcy Court in Austin, Texas, said that "the parties pushing the passage of the Act" appeared to have "an agenda to make more money off the backs of the consumers in this country."

Mr. Gardner, who has been a consumer-bankruptcy attorney for nearly three decades, said he plans to help boot-camp attendees fight back by putting them through a four-day seminar to "de-program" and "re-engineer" their practices.

Consumer-bankruptcy attorneys tend to focus on filing a bankruptcy petition for their clients and getting their debts discharged, he said.

At Mr. Gardner's boot camps, which are held on his sprawling North Carolina farm, attorneys will learn that there is a whole lot more they can do for their clients. Boot-camp attendees will be trained to find bogus fees that creditors are charging their clients, violations of the automatic stay and laws meant to protect consumers' pocketbooks.

When those things are found, Mr. Gardner teaches boot-camp attendees how to go after the creditors by filing lawsuits.

One hot topic that campers are eager to learn about involves the mortgage industry, attendees said. For example, after a client buys a home, their mortgage is often sold to a mortgage servicer.

"Gardner has discovered and revealed that these mortgage servicers are engaged in a practice that costs additional expense to borrowers," said Bradford Botes, who will assist Mr. Gardner at the camp and is a principal of Bond & Botes P.C.

Mr. Gardner teaches attorneys to question why a mortgage servicer is, for example, charging a client a property-inspection fee of $9.17 a month or a broker-opinion fee of $200 a month, according to consumer bankruptcy attorney Andrew Miofsky, who has attended a boot camp.

"Is a mortgage servicer really sending people out to your client's home each month to inspect the property and do an appraisal?" Mr. Miofsky asked mockingly.

Besides learning how to identify and fight dubious fees and violations, boot-camp attendees will learn how to set up more efficient law practices by using electronic technology instead of paper and outsourcing most legal services.

Of course, the effort isn't purely altruistic. Consumer-bankruptcy attorneys also stand to make more money by knowing the ins and outs of the system. Suing creditors could lead to huge settlements or winning a lawsuit could lead to the creditors having to pay attorneys' fees.

"You don't need to handle thousands of cases a year in order to make a lot of money," said Kevin Chern, a former boot-camp attendee, and president of Total Bankruptcy Inc. and Start Fresh Today Inc. "You can make five times as much [by just knowing how to] look at these claims."

The four-day sessions involve classes led by Mr. Gardner that last for 12 hours each day, and the subject matter is complex.

It also isn't cheap: The price of attendance is $7,775, although many of those who have attended the boot camp said they considered the money well spent. Each camper gets a compact disk that he or she can take home, containing forms, letters, pleadings and articles to implement all of the lessons learned. Each graduate also is added to a Listserv, gains access to all current and future documents via a Web site and can contact fellow attendees or Mr. Gardner for advice.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Party Primary System Wins Federal Approval (BRADV)

By Marsha Shuler, Advocate Capitol News Bureau

Baton Rouge Advocate, January 24, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0121043

The U.S. Justice Department has cleared the way for Louisiana to return to a party primary system for congressional elections starting in 2008.

Justice Department Voting Rights Chief John Tanner's office advised state officials of the sign-off on legislation the Legislature approved in June.

The state Attorney General's Office released the letter Tuesday.

Sen. Cleo Fields, D-Baton Rouge, pushed the law to end the practice of Louisiana electing its congressmen after other states across the nation.

"The issue should be squarely behind us and we can elect members of Congress at the same time as everybody else does," Fields said Tuesday.

Under the plan, Democrats and Republicans would hold party primary elections with winners facing each other in a general election along with nonparty candidates who want to make the race.

The election schedule would allow winners of the party primaries and other party candidates to face each other on federal Election Day — the first Tuesday after the first Monday of November.

That's a move away from the open primary system, where all candidates regardless of party have vied against one another on the November ballot.

If nobody won outright, the two top vote-getters would face off in a December election.

U.S. District Judge Frank Polozola set the schedule in 1998 to prevent Louisiana from electing its U.S. senators and representatives before Election Day.

Polozola set the schedule as part of a 1995 lawsuit that sought to get the state to return to the party primary system for federal elections. Instead, Polozola allowed the open primary to continue and changed the dates.

Polozola's schedule led to Louisiana electing some of its members of congress after everyone else in the nation.

Fields and others complained that the December election put some freshmen congressmen at a disadvantage when it came to jockeying for committee assignments and office space.

The new law does not affect elections for state and local offices such as governor and town council members, which would remain "open primary."

No Court Consensus On Voter ID Laws (USAT)

By Joan Biskupic

USA Today, January 24, 2007

Voter identification laws, adopted by states in recent years amid concerns about fraud, are getting mixed reviews as courts weigh whether they unconstitutionally keep some people from the polls.

State courts in Georgia and Missouri last fall invalidated laws that required voters to show photo ID each time they cast ballots. Georgia and Missouri are among 11 states that have passed such laws since 2003, inspired partly by allegations of voter fraud raised in Florida and elsewhere during the 2000 elections.

The Georgia law, blocked by federal and state judges, required people to show one of six government-issued forms of photo identification, such as a driver's license or passport. In the most recent challenge to the law, brought by voters who said they couldn't cast ballots because they did not have photo IDs, a judge ruled in September that Georgia's requirement put an unconstitutional condition on voting. Previously, state polling places had long accepted utility bills, bank statements and other types of non-photo ID as proof of residency.

In October, Missouri's Supreme Court struck down the state's requirement that registered voters show a state or federal photo ID to cast a ballot. The judges said the law was an illegal hurdle for poor, elderly and disabled residents.

Elsewhere, however, federal appeals courts have not been as willing to reject voter ID laws.

On Jan. 4, a three-judge panel of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 7th Circuit upheld Indiana's law requiring voters show photo ID in each election. Voting 2-1, the panel rejected claims by the state Democratic Party and others that the law violates the voting rights of those without easy access to such IDs.

Even as they upheld Indiana's law, Judge Richard Posner, joined by Judge Diane Sykes, cited the politics surrounding voter ID laws. "Most people who don't have photo ID are low on the economic ladder and … are more likely to vote for Democratic than Republican candidates," Posner wrote. He noted, however, that it's difficult to maneuver today without a photo ID and that "the vast majority of adults" have one.

Dissenting Judge Terence Evans sharply criticized the law: "Let's not beat around the bush: The Indiana voter photo ID law is a not-too-thinly-veiled attempt to discourage Election Day turnout by certain folks believed to skew Democratic."

DOJ_NMG_0121044

Meanwhile, a three-judge panel of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 9th Circuit has expressed skepticism about arguments that Arizona's voter ID law should be thrown out. The Arizona law is widely viewed as the nation's strictest because it requires voters to prove they are not just state residents, but also U.S. citizens.

Thomas Hudson, attorney for a group of challengers, told the appeals panel Jan. 8 that the law is like a poll tax because of the cost to Native Americans and others who may have difficulty obtaining birth certificates, passports or other documents to prove citizenship. The judges, who have not issued an opinion in the case, asked for evidence of the law's impact — including whether there was any record of how many Native Americans did not have IDs that would prove citizenship.

Hudson said he believed "thousands" of Native Americans could be affected but acknowledged that specific evidence had not been gathered. The 9th Circuit judges suggested by their questions that they would return the case to a trial court to get such answers.

"Much of the future litigation will be about finding real people who are adversely affected" by ID policies, says Richard Hasen, a professor at Loyola Law School in Los Angeles who specializes in election law. He adds, however, "There is not yet very good empirical evidence" to support either side: that many voters are being disenfranchised by ID requirements or that voter fraud is rampant.

Media Outlets Battle It Out Over Free-speech Rights (USAT)

By Martin Kasindorf

USA Today, January 24, 2007

LOS ANGELES — In a dispute between the "new media" of the Internet and the "old media" of broadcasting, liberal bloggers and conservative talk-radio hosts are accusing each other of trampling the First Amendment's guarantees of free speech.

Hundreds of blogs are exhorting national advertisers not to buy commercial time on Disney-owned KSFO-AM in San Francisco because some on-air hosts have made comments that the bloggers allege are racist or encourage violence.

KSFO personalities say the bloggers are trying to muzzle their political views. The bloggers say they're rallying behind the free-speech rights of a colleague whose website was briefly shut down after Disney's ABC network threatened to sue over alleged copyright violations.

Some advertisers, including Bank of America and MasterCard, have deserted KSFO since an anonymous media critic identifying himself online as Spocko began posting recordings of the station's "Hot Talk" hosts. Spocko and some of his readers have been e-mailing the audio to KSFO advertisers since 2005, asking the companies whether they want to be associated with the controversial rhetoric.

The First Amendment flap was debated Sunday on CNN's Reliable Sources. Dan Riehl, a blogger critical of Spocko, said some of the radio hosts' comments "were blown out of proportion or misrepresented" in the complaints to sponsors. Mike Stark, another blogger and a Spocko ally, said: "The way to fight free speech that you disagree with is to engage in more free speech. And that's exactly what Spocko did."

Examples of commentary that riles the bloggers:

·In November, morning co-host Melanie Morgan said of then-incoming House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, a San Francisco Democrat: "We've got a bull's-eye painted on her big, wide, laughing eyes."

·Evening host Brian Sussman in December referred to Sen. Barack Obama, D-Ill., who has a Kenyan father and a white American mother, as a "halfrican." In October 2005, Sussman asked a caller to prove he wasn't a Muslim by saying "Allah is a whore."

·In October, host Lee Rodgers warned "enemy" Muslim nations: "You keep screwing around with stuff like this, we're going to kill a bunch of you — millions of you."

Spocko says on his blog that he won't identify himself because he fears retaliation from powerful conservative commentators.

KSFO parent ABC did retaliate. A network lawyer on Dec. 21 sent a "cease and desist" letter to Spocko's Internet service provider, saying the blogger was using copyrighted KSFO content "without authorization." The service provider, 1&1 Internet, shut down the blog on Jan. 2. Neil Simpkins, a 1&1 spokesman, says, "The decision was made to remove the copyrighted material from our servers until the matter is resolved." He says the notice posed a "credible risk" of being sued.

Spocko then e-mailed the KSFO audio to Stark, who posted it to the popular liberal blog Daily Kos. Stark urged other bloggers to install the sound bites in a "blogswarm" to defy ABC. At last count, more than 500 blogs posted the audio clips and asked viewers to forward them to advertisers, Stark says.

Spocko's website (spockosbrain.com) returned to cyberspace Jan. 6 through another Web host. The blog has free legal representation from the San Francisco-based Electronic Frontier Foundation (EFF), which advocates free speech on the Internet.

DOJ_NMG_0121045

Matt Zimmerman, an EFF lawyer, says the first Web host surrendered too quickly to ABC's "saber-rattling." Spocko's use of the KSFO content comes "squarely" under federal law that protects "fair use" of copyrighted material for criticism and commentary, Zimmerman says.

MasterCard and the state-run Michigan Economic Development Corp. say they advertised on KSFO talk shows last year but won't place new ads. "It's hard to listen to those clips and not be offended," says Mike Shore, spokesman for the Michigan agency.

Bank of America says it withdrew ads last spring. The California chapter of the American Automobile Association says it pulled an insurance ad from Sussman's show in September.

KSFO claimed on its website that it is the victim of "an anonymous Internet smear campaign." The station canceled three hours of regular programs Jan. 12 and put the talk hosts on the air to explain their remarks.

During that broadcast, Morgan said ABC had reissued guidelines about "violent" commentary. "We don't believe we have crossed a single line," she said. "If you're waiting for an apology, you'll be waiting a long time," Rodgers said. When Stark called in, Rodgers called him a creep.

Sussman repeated an apology for his Obama remark and said he sometimes went over the line in talking 20 hours a week. Rodgers and other hosts complained that liberals are ganging up to threaten their jobs. "I will not be silenced by the left," Rodgers said.

"Yes, this is a freedom of speech issue, and this individual is entitled to say what he wants to," Morgan told the San Francisco Chronicle. "But he's trying to take away my livelihood, and I'm not trying to take away his."

Zimmerman says Spocko's rights are in more peril than the station's. "ABC/Disney tried to use the legal process to silence a critic who was actually amplifying their speech," he says. "Spocko was doing exactly what the First Amendment is designed to do — promote this marketplace of ideas."

Zimmerman says he'll defend Spocko if ABC sues, "which we don't think they will, at this point."

ABC, Disney and KSFO declined to comment.

"I think Disney learned a lesson," Stark says. "Strong-arm tactics on the blogosphere just don't work."

ANTITRUST:

Antitrust Issues 'key Barrier' To Delta Merger (FT)

By Doug Cameron In Chicago

Financial Times, January 24, 2007

Antitrust concerns have re-emerged as the key barrier in US Airways' hostile pursuit of Delta Air Lines, according to aviation financiers surveyed by the Financial Times.

The airlines' chief executives will face off on Wednesday before a Senate hearing on airline consolidation, which both sides view as a key test of political sentiment for deals involving the largest US carriers.

Doug Parker, US Airways' chairman and chief executive, is adamant that a deal which would create the world's largest airline would be cleared by the Justice department.

He is expected to provide assurances to the Senate commerce, science and transportation committee that the merger with its larger rival would not lead to higher fares or reduced service to smaller communities.

Jerry Grinstein, his opposite number at Delta, argues the airlines' overlap on the US east coast would see it blocked on competition grounds, though has entertained discussions with Northwest about a potential combination when both emerge from bankruptcy protection.

Delta is reviewing final bids from banks to provide exit financing for its planned exit from bankruptcy as a standalone carrier, which could include private equity investment.

US Airways has already lined up more than $8bn in funding from Citigroup and Morgan Stanley to back its offer, and has set a February 1 deadline for Delta creditors to force airline management to the negotiating table and trigger an antitrust review.

While creditors, advised by former Continental Airlines chief executive Gordon Bethune, are reviewing the competing financial benefits of US Airways' raised bid and Delta's plan, financiers said the antitrust issue is assuming greater importance.

"Finance is not the issue," said one banker, noting there are funds available to back any of the potential combinations which could emerge if lawmakers and regulators signal a change in the industry climate. Six of the seven largest carriers have held talks on potential combinations.

DOJ_NMG_0121046

The justice department effectively scuppered deals between United and US Airways and American and Northwest at the start of the decade. However, Mr Parker and other executives said the expanding role of low-cost rivals such as Southwest has intensified competition.

Another financier bidding on the Delta funding believes that the chances of regulatory approval have dropped to 50/50.

Big Bank Stops Effort To Change Law Limiting Growth (NYT)

By Eric Dash

The New York Times, January 24, 2007

Bank of America's chairman and chief executive, Kenneth D. Lewis, said yesterday that the company was backing away from a quiet lobbying effort to change a federal law that could prevent it from making major acquisitions.

Just weeks after agreeing to initiate discussions with lawmakers to raise the possibility of lifting the 10 percent federal deposit cap, Kenneth D. Lewis said that he had told bank representatives to "back off" from those plans.

"I thought we had gotten out there a little too far in terms of our level of aggressiveness, and it sent the wrong signals," Mr. Lewis said in an interview yesterday. About two weeks ago, he made the decision to halt the political effort, he said.

Bank of America, which has about $693.5 billion, or just over 9 percent of the nation's deposits, had argued in a position paper that the law restricting a bank to no more than 10 percent of the nation's deposits is "antiquated, conceptually flawed" and anticompetitive.

While American banks are prevented from increasing their deposit base through acquisitions that might push them over the federal threshold, foreign banks face no similar restrictions. The bank also argues that the law is unnecessary because of antitrust laws, state regulations and market forces.

But as the only bank near the 10 percent limit, Bank of America has found itself with virtually no allies. JPMorgan Chase, the next largest deposit holder, could acquire all but the five biggest banks and still remain under the federal cap. Wachovia, Wells Fargo and Citigroup, the next banks in line, have potentially even more room and time.

Smaller community banks, meanwhile, have vowed to fight any move to lift the cap.

A Wells Fargo spokesman said the bank also opposed lifting the cap, preferring to stick to its internal growth strategy that does not come close to hitting the limit. JPMorgan declined to comment, while Wachovia and Citigroup said they had no position on the subject.

On Capitol Hill, the proposed change has met with a lukewarm reception. Representative Barney Frank, the Massachusetts Democrat who heads the House Financial Services Committee, has suggested that lifting the cap may be part of some sort of "grand compromise" between Wall Street and Main Street interests. There does not appear to be much enthusiasm, but other lawmakers have not dismissed the idea out of hand.

Bank of America's backpedaling is either the recognition of a rare misstep or a shrewd calculation for Mr. Lewis, who is known for his deliberate approach to corporate strategy.

On the one hand, reports of the plans were a reminder of the bank's bigger ambitions, leading to speculation that it was setting the stage to engage in a major deal. On the other, it may be a way of taking the temperature of a new Democratic-controlled Congress while planting the idea in people's minds. Typically, it takes years to pass legislation to repeal banking laws like those governing interstate banking.

"They are testing the waters and seeing what is out there," said Brian Gardner, a policy analyst with Keefe, Bruyette & Woods. With several Democratic lawmakers representing areas like New York that have strong banking ties, the perception that Democrats are less open to the idea of raising the cap may be wrong, he said. "It makes a lot of sense to probe and see how far the Democrats are willing to go."

Bank of America's plans may also underscore the challenge it faces in sustaining its robust growth.

Yesterday, Bank of America said fourth-quarter earnings rose 47 percent.

Much of that growth, however, was from the recognition of unusually large gains on its equity investments as well as new profits from the recently acquired MBNA.

Many of the biggest costs have been flushed out. And without the investment gains, internal growth appears to have stopped or slowed.

Over all, the bank earned $5.26 billion, or $1.16 a share, from a restated $3.57 billion, or 88 cents, in the quarter a year ago. Fourth-quarter profits for its global consumer and small- business operations rose 44 percent, to $2.53 billion, with the additional boost from MBNA. Its corporate and investment banking earnings rose 23 percent, to $1.57 billion, at a time when much bigger Wall Street investment bankers — with more commodities and international exposure — posted huge gains in the quarter. Profits at Bank of America's wealth management and investment businesses declined 1 percent.

The American economy, meanwhile, may be slowing. A downturn in the credit cycle is on the horizon if not already here.

DOJ_NMG_0121047

"You know the headwinds will mute earnings growth; you also know that our businesses will perform quite well," said Joe Price, Bank of America's chief financial officer, in his first conference call with analysts and investors since succeeding Alvaro de Molina at the start of this year. "The biggest question for us is the health of the American economy, and we think we are in pretty good shape."

Some Wall Street analysts suggest Bank of America is at a strategic crossroads, balancing internal growth with bigger ambitions. One path that is unlikely to be taken, at least for now, is a major acquisition.

The federal deposit cap severely limits Bank of America's ability to buy a big bank in the United States. And on the conference call, Mr. Lewis seemed to rule out making a major European deal.

"I think a European acquisition will cause us to pause; that's not what we are thinking about," Mr. Lewis said.

Stolt-Nielsen Sues To See Other Justice Antitrust Amnesty Agreements (LAW)

By Sue Reisinger, Corporate Counsel

Corporate Counsel, January 24, 2007

Company wants to know if it's being singled out

The Stolt-Nielsen Transportation Group wants to know why it's been singled out for special treatment by the government. The Norwegian shipping giant has sued the U.S. Department of Justice under the Freedom of Information Act, demanding that antitrust officials release scores of confidential deals that they've reached with other companies. Of the roughly 100 businesses that have signed amnesty agreements with Justice's antitrust division, Stolt-Nielsen is the only one to have subsequently been indicted.

Why does Stolt-Nielsen want to pore through these deals? For one thing, it wants to know whether any of these other agreements specified a date by which companies had to cease their alleged wrongdoing. Antitrust officials indicted Stolt-Nielsen's U.S. subsidiary in September, claiming that it continued to engage in price-fixing even after it said it had stopped. Stolt-Nielsen responds that the subsidiary halted the misconduct by the time that it signed its amnesty agreement in January 2003 and that the deal didn't set a deadline for when it had to clean up its act.

Stolt-Nielsen's attorneys declined to comment for this story, but lawyers close to the case say that the company hopes to compare the text of its deal with those that the antitrust division struck with other businesses, as well as with the division's model amnesty agreement. These attorneys say that Stolt-Nielsen wants to show that other agreements usually included a date by which illegal conduct had to be halted.

Justice spokeswoman Gina Talamona says that the antitrust division considers amnesty applicants to be "confidential sources," and will disclose their agreements "only if required to do so by a court in connection with litigation."

While about 20 of the amnesty deals that the antitrust division has reached since 1993 have become public through court cases or company regulatory filings, the other 80 remain shrouded in secrecy. The amnesty agreements are distinct from the 55 deferred and nonprosecution agreements that the Justice Department's criminal division has struck with corporate defendants since 1992. All but four of those DPAs and NPAs have been made public.

The case against Stolt-Nielsen began in 2002, when the antitrust division started looking into claims that the company's Greenwich, Conn.-based subsidiary engaged in a price-fixing scheme with its competitors. When it signed its deal with Justice in January 2003, Stolt-Nielsen was granted amnesty in exchange for its cooperation in prosecuting the other shippers. But six months later, antitrust officials announced that the agreement was invalid. They said that Stolt-Nielsen had lied during settlement negotiations, claiming that the price-fixing had ended sooner than it really had. So the government filed a criminal complaint against the company in federal district court in Philadelphia, alleging antitrust violations.

Stolt-Nielsen fought the complaint all the way to the U.S. Supreme Court, first trying to block and then kill its eventual indictment. But this past October the high court ruled that the district court handling the case should determine whether the company's amnesty agreement is still valid. If the district court decides that it is, it could dismiss the indictment.

Even as they were trying to head off the looming indictment, Stolt-Nielsen's attorneys filed a dozen FOIA requests, starting in June 2005. Among other things, the company asked for copies of all of the amnesty agreements that still remain confidential. While the antitrust division has handed over a dozen or so pages here and there in response to Stolt-Nielsen's requests, it has withheld hundreds more, according to court filings by both parties over the past year. Justice lawyers have cited exemptions in FOIA that allow the department to protect confidential sources and to avoid "interference with enforcement proceedings." (Corporate Counsel has also submitted an FOIA request for copies of the amnesty deals.)

In response to the denial of its FOIA applications, Stolt-Nielsen sued the Justice Department in federal district court in Washington, D.C., in November 2005. In its most recent request for summary judgment, filed this past October, Stolt-Nielsen accused Justice of stonewalling. "When the government itself embarks on a public campaign to tarnish a company's reputation, that company is entitled to each and every communication [relevant to] that campaign," the company argues. A ruling could come down on Stolt-Nielsen's request as early as February.

DOJ_NMG_0121048

One former Justice Department official thinks that Stolt-Nielsen has a strong argument. Alison Smith, now a partner with Haynes and Boone, was a deputy assistant attorney general in the antitrust division during the George H.W. Bush administration. Justice's own stated policy, she says, is to treat as confidential only the identity of amnesty applicants and the information obtained from that applicant. In Smith's view, the department should be able to release agreements that have been redacted to protect confidential sources. (Smith is not involved with Stolt-Nielsen's case.)

In its briefs, Stolt-Nielsen specifically says that it will accept the release of amnesty agreements in which the names of the companies have been edited out, but that Justice still refuses to release them. If a judge grants the company's request, however, antitrust lawyers across the country may have a field day with blind items, trying to figure out who did what.

Judge Dismisses Online Phone Suit (AP)

By Alex Veiga, The Associated Press

AP, January 24, 2007

LOS ANGELES (AP) — A federal judge has thrown out an antitrust lawsuit filed by the distributor of Morpheus file-sharing software against Internet phone service provider Skype Technologies SA, eBay Inc. and other defendants.

StreamCast Networks Inc. had sought more than $4.1 billion in unspecified damages and a court order blocking eBay from selling Skype services. StreamCast claimed the founders of Skype broke an agreement to give StreamCast the right of first refusal for the technology behind Skype's Voice over Internet Protocol, or VoIP, service.

In her ruling Thursday on a motion for dismissal, U.S. District Court Judge Florence-Marie Cooper concluded that StreamCast failed to make its case for relief under federal antitrust laws and dismissed all claims against Skype, eBay and more than a dozen other defendants.

Cooper declined to exercise discretionary jurisdiction to consider state law claims such as unfair competition and fraudulent transfer.

Matthew A. Neco, StreamCast's general counsel, said the company will either appeal the ruling or seek to pursue claims in state court.

"This case is far from over," Neco said.

A call to eBay was not immediately returned.

In the lawsuit, StreamCast alleged that Skype's founders — who also developed the Kazaa online file-swapping software — took the phone technology with them after they sold Kazaa to another company and went on to wrongfully profit from its use.

Luxembourg-based Skype was acquired in 2005 by San Jose-based eBay for $2.6 billion.

MAN Withdraws €10.3bn Bid For Scania (FT)

By Richard Milne In Frankfurt And David Ibison In Stockholm

Financial Times, January 24, 2007

German truckmaker MAN on Tuesday withdrew its €10.3bn hostile bid for Scania, handing Sweden's powerful Wallenberg family victory in one of Europe's bitterest recent takeover battles.

All parties to the bid saga said they now hoped to conduct friendly discussions to see if a tie-up would be possible between the two truckmakers, as well as the truck assets of carmaker Volkswagen, the biggest shareholder of both MAN and Scania.

The withdrawal of the offer just eight days before it was due to expire puts VW and particularly Investor in a position to stamp their mark over any future discussions.

Several people on the German side said they now expected a new company to be established into which all the groups would be merged.

Both VW and Investor would hold large stakes in such a group, according to people briefed on the plans. But advisers on all sides said first there would be a cooling off period and that any eventual tie-up would "take months, not days or weeks." One adviser said: "The grass needs to grow on the battlefield."

Withdrawal of the offer will raise questions about the strategy and future of Hakan Samuelsson, MAN's chief executive and a former Scania manager.

Few industry executives or investment bankers understood his decision in September to proceed with an unsolicited bid without the support of two shareholders which, together, controlled two-thirds of Scania's shares.

Going hostile against the Wallenbergs, Sweden's most powerful industrial dynasty, in their home territory was seen as particularly daring.

DOJ_NMG_0121049

But Mr Samuelsson was given the full support of his supervisory board as recently as Monday as speculation mounted that VW wanted to force him out.

The entanglement of shareholdings – MAN is Scania's third-largest shareholder while VW owns 34 per cent of Scania's voting rights and 20 per cent of MAN's – suggests the likelihood of a future deal.

Investor and Scania would be happy to see the Swedish truckmaker remain independent, but the chances of that happening are slim since both have agreed that an alliance with MAN has "industrial merit".

Investor can now ensure it retains a stake in any merged entity and that Scania participates meaningfully in the operations of any new company.

The chairmen of MAN, Investor and VW held talks last week aimed at creating a friendly atmosphere for discussions after Scania's two largest shareholders reiterated their lack of support for a bid.

Advisers say a new company could be based in such locations as the Netherlands or Switzerland, but that any such decision remained some way off. "One company buying the other is now off the table. It wasn't the terms of the offer that were wrong but the very concept of it," one MAN adviser said.

Ruling Blocks Bid For Dofasco (BSUN)

By Allison Connolly, Sun Reporter

The Baltimore Sun, January 24, 2007

Dutch court denies ThyssenKrupp effort

A Dutch court yesterday tossed out a bid by ThyssenKrupp AG to force Arcelor Mittal to honor a pledge to sell Canadian steelmaker Dofasco, but it's not clear whether Mittal will sell either its steel plant in Sparrows Point or Weirton, W.Va.

The Justice Department gave Mittal until Jan. 28 to sell Dofasco Inc. to ensure it would not have a monopoly on tin production in the United States after its $33 billion merger with Luxembourg-based Arcelor SA.

If Mittal is unable to sell Dofasco, a manufacturer of high-grade sheet metal for the North American auto industry, the Justice Department has said Mittal must sell either its Sparrows Point or Weirton facility.

Arcelor placed the profitable Dofasco in a Dutch trust early last year in an effort to fend off Mittal's hostile takeover bid. While Arcelor finally agreed to merge with Mittal, creating the world's largest steelmaker with annual production topping 110 million tons, it has no control over the trust.

The three trustees have already rejected a proposal by Mittal to sell Dofasco to Germany's ThyssenKrupp for $4.6 billion, less than the $4.86 billion that Arcelor paid for it.

Mittal said this month that it would not sue the trust to release Dofasco.

Rotterdam Court Judge F. van den Emster said yesterday that Mittal couldn't be "asked to do more than it has done so far" to complete the sale of Dofasco.

Shortly after yesterday's decision, ThyssenKrupp said in a statement that its chances of getting Dofasco were "very remote," and that it would "swiftly pursue" plans to build a steel mill in the United States. The company said previously that if it is unable to buy Dofasco, it would build a plant in Alabama, Arkansas or Louisiana at a cost of nearly $3 billion.

In response to yesterday's ruling, Mittal said that it "cannot be expected to do more than it has already done in order to seek dissolution of the [trust]."

It appears Mittal has given up trying to sell Dofasco. Last week, Mittal confirmed it was in negotiations with a Chicago-based steel distributor, Esmark Inc., to sell all or parts of Weirton, a large producer of tin plate. The two parties have signed a nonbinding memorandum of understanding, but any sale hinges on approval from the Justice Department. Late last year, Esmark gained control over nearby Wheeling-Pittsburgh Steel Corp. and promised cash for Weirton if Mittal put it up for sale.

However, Justice has the final say about which plant is sold and to whom.

Gina Talamona, a spokeswoman for the Justice Department, said yesterday in an e-mail response that "the matter is still pending."

Mittal stock closed up $1.48 yesterday at $43.59 a share.

allison.connolly@baltsun.com

Bloomberg News contributed to this article.

ENVIRONMENT:

Bush Seeks Vast, Mandatory Increase In Alternative Fuels And Greater Vehicle Efficiency (NYT)

By Edmund L. Andrews And Felicity Barringer

New York Times, January 24, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 23 — President Bush, vowing to reduce the nation's thirst for foreign oil, called on Tuesday for a huge government-mandated increase in renewable fuels — mainly ethanol — and tougher mileage standards for cars and light trucks.

It was the second year in a row that Mr. Bush made "energy independence" a focal point of his State of the Union address, but his proposals on Tuesday were more ambitious, and perhaps less achievable, than those he made a year ago when he said the nation was "addicted to oil."

The centerpiece of Mr. Bush's proposal, which he said would cut the projected use of gasoline by 20 percent over the next decade, was a nearly fivefold mandatory increase in the production of ethanol and other alternative fuels for cars and trucks. The most obvious beneficiaries would be makers of ethanol and other biofuels, but it could also promote the production of liquefied coal.

Mr. Bush called for a mandatory requirement that makers of fuel produce 35 billion gallons of alternative fuels a year by 2017, replacing about 15 percent of the projected gasoline use in that year.

A second major plank of Mr. Bush's energy proposal calls for increasing fuel-efficiency standards of cars and trucks by 4 percent a year — about one mile per gallon — starting in 2010 for cars and 2012 for trucks.

That was a significant change from Mr. Bush's approach last year, when he called for "reform" of the corporate average fuel economy, or CAFE, rules, but avoided suggesting specific mileage requirements.

In a third proposal, Mr. Bush called for doubling the amount of oil in the Strategic Petroleum Reserve to about 1.5 billion barrels of oil. The doubling would take place at a snail's pace over the next 20 years. Even so, advance word of the idea helped push up oil prices by $2.46 a barrel on Tuesday to $55.04.

"It's a big change that the president has endorsed these new fuel-efficiency standards," said Frederick W. Smith, the chief executive of the FedEx Corporation and a co-chairman of the Energy Security Leadership Council, a group of executive and retired military officers. These standards, he said, match their recommendations, "which are achievable."

But the proposals face a slew of obstacles, both practical and political. On a practical level, skeptics noted that Mr. Bush's goal for ethanol would require big advances in "cellulosic ethanol," a form of ethanol made from plants like switchgrass that has yet to be produced at anything close to competitive prices. It could also require up to 40 million additional acres devoted to growing the plant material involved as well as a sprawling new infrastructure for transforming the feedstock into fuel.

On a political level, Mr. Bush faces a Congress that is now controlled by Democrats, some of whom criticized him on Tuesday for proposing little to reduce the production of greenhouse gases implicated in global warming.

"I am disappointed," said Senator Jeff Bingaman, Democrat of New Mexico and chairman of the Senate Energy Committee. He said Mr. Bush was "completely silent" on energy efficiency and reduction of carbon dioxide from electric power plants, which contribute 40 percent of these emissions.

Cars and trucks account for about one-third of greenhouse gases that result from burning fossil fuels. Electric utilities and other "smokestack" sources were not addressed.

"If this was a real effort to solve the climate problem, it would include large stationary sources and utilities," said Eileen Claussen, president of the Pew Center on Global Climate Change, a nonpartisan policy research group.

Ms. Claussen and other environmental leaders also criticized the absence of any proposal for a mandatory cap on greenhouse gas emissions.

Many supporters of ethanol and other renewable fuels praised Mr. Bush proposals. The Union of Concerned Scientists estimated that the mileage requirement could save 550,000 barrels of oil per day in 2017, and reduce emissions equivalent to "taking 14 million of today's cars and trucks off the road."

But many cautioned that the goals would be difficult to attain, might do little to reduce greenhouse gases and could lead to higher food prices as farmers cater to energy demand rather than food production.

Philip Clapp, president of the National Environmental Trust, said, "The big numbers may sound impressive, but this is nothing more than stay-the-course on global warming." The proposal, he said, represents a 1.5 percent cut in carbon emissions a decade hence. "They will still go up by 14 percent over the next decade."

And if liquefied coal, which produces double the greenhouse gases of regular gasoline, is part of the alternative-fuel mix — as both coal-industry lobbyists and environmental groups say is the case — the emissions reductions would decrease significantly.

Mr. Bush called for increasing the requirement for annual production of alternative fuels to 35 billion gallons a year. That would almost quintuple the current mandate of producing 7.5 billion gallons of ethanol by 2012. Spurred by tax breaks and soaring oil prices, ethanol production has climbed rapidly and is expected to hit 6 billion gallons this year.

But energy analysts say that corn-based ethanol, which accounts for virtually all of today's production, will not be able to produce more than about half as much alternative fuel as Mr. Bush envisions by 2017.

"There is really no plan here except to take the ethanol industry through the roof," said Kenneth Cook, president of the Environmental Working Group.

But Mr. Bush also laced his proposals with numerous "safety valves" that could postpone the attainment of his goals.

Energy Plan Seeks Better Gas Mileage (USAT)

By James R. Healey

USA Today, January 24, 2007

The energy portion of President Bush's State of the Union speech Tuesday included some eye-popping numbers that would amount to a boon for the ethanol industry and could begin boosting the fuel economy of cars and trucks as soon as 2009.

The fuel economy increase isn't set at a specific number. It would result from a plan to cut U.S. gasoline use 20% in the next 10 years through better mileage and the increased use of gasoline substitutes such as ethanol.

The White House says that to meet the goal, mileage would have to improve 4% a year, beginning with 2010-model cars and 2012-model pickups, vans and SUVs.

The Union of Concerned Scientists says that translates to an average of 34 miles per gallon in 2017. "This could be the breakthrough we have been waiting for on fuel economy," says David Friedman, UCS research director.

UCS says that if Congress and the president can agree and thwart loopholes, the USA would use 550,000 fewer barrels of oil a day in 2017. That would cut the amount of carbon dioxide, a greenhouse gas blamed for global warming, as much as taking 14 million vehicles off the road, UCS says.

Combined with Bush's call for dramatically expanding the use of gasoline alternatives, the program "is a welcome, visionary proposal," says John DeCicco, auto expert at Environmental Defense — a group often opposed to Bush's policies.

DeCicco says a better way to protect the environment would be to limit the use of fuels with high carbon content, but the Bush plan would hit the same goal.

Joan Claybrook, president of Public Citizen, criticizes the Bush plan, saying it would set lower mileage targets for larger vehicles, encouraging automakers to build more of them.

The most stunning number in Bush's plan is 35 billion gallons — the amount of renewable and alternative fuels that the petroleum industry would have to blend with gasoline by 2017. That would displace one-fourth of the gasoline Americans use.

It's a huge jump from the current mandate of 7.5 billion gallons in 2012. Most renewable fuel is ethanol, grain alcohol usually made from corn.

"It's great to have the president of the United States out there saying we need this," says Bob Dinneen, president of the Renewable Fuels Association. RFA represents operators of 111 ethanol plants and another 78 under construction. The industry currently can produce 5.5 billion gallons of grain alcohol a year. The plants being built will double that — still far short of the 35 billion gallons that Bush wants.

To hit the mark will require development of a still-experimental process called cellulosic processing. It can convert an array of plants, not just corn, into ethanol and do it in greater quantities. But a plant costs several times as much as building a still to process corn kernels into ethanol.

The White House hopes the high mandate creates an assured market that draws money and attention.

"We're going to need to see some technological breakthroughs. And that's why the president is setting this goal, so that investors, venture capitalists, researchers, scientists are all focused on that goal and can expedite and accelerate that technology," Joel Kaplan, deputy chief of staff, told reporters Tuesday afternoon.

Bush also called for doubling the emergency fuel supply, the Strategic Petroleum Reserve, to 1.5 billion barrels of oil by 2027. That would require expanding at least two of the current SPR sites and opening a new one, the Energy Department says.

Bush: Expand Alternative Energy Use (CHIT)

By William Neikirk

Chicago Tribune, January 24, 2007

WASHINGTON -- President Bush sought Tuesday night to counter criticism that he has failed to do enough to tackle global warming and energy security as he unveiled a 10-year plan to slash U.S. gasoline consumption by 20 percent.

The president used his State of the Union address to propose a dramatic expansion in the use of alternative fuels like ethanol to offset the cut in gasoline use and he asked for wider power to toughen fuel-economy standards for cars.

If initial assessments of his new proposal are any guide, the president has more persuading to do. Critics said that while his plan had many good elements, it either does not go far enough or might not be practical in some cases.

DOJ_NMG_0121052

As a result, the global-warming issue in Congress and the country seems destined to grow even hotter as a Democratic-controlled Congress considers whether to slap an overall cap on carbon dioxide emissions said to contribute to warming of the planet. On Monday, several corporate executives from blue-chip companies backed such an idea.

Even so, Bush presented an ambitious proposal that goes far beyond anything else he has previously offered to address what he called America's addiction to oil. The White House said the plan would halt the projected growth of carbon dioxide emissions from cars, light trucks and sport utility vehicles within 10 years.

"America is on the verge of technological breakthroughs that will enable us to live our lives less dependent on foreign oil," Bush said. "These technologies will help us become better stewards of the environment—and they will help us to confront the serious challenge of global climate change."

His proposal signaled that climate change has joined energy security as a monster political issue, and that political leaders now may be prepared to take more extensive action.

"As the global warming issue heats up across America, the president's position on global warming is beginning to thaw," said Larry Schweiger, president and chief executive of the National Wildlife Federation.

But he and other supporters of a plan to cap greenhouse-gas emissions said Bush needs to go further. Richard Rosenzweig, chief operating officer of Natsource, a firm that manages buying and selling of clean-energy credits, said he expected to see such a mandatory program "in a couple of years."

Bush proposed that the amount of ethanol and other alternative fuels used in gasoline blends be set at 35 billion gallons in 2017, up from the 7.5 billion gallons required in 2012. This would be enough to displace 15 percent of projected annual gasoline consumption by 2017, the White House said.

Many members of Congress, including Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.), have offered similar plans to require that America put more emphasis on cleaner-burning alternative fuels such as ethanol.

But energy experts said that while the goal is laudable, it would require that automobile manufacturers build many more cars that are equipped to handle gasoline blends that have a higher alternative-fuel content. For example, only a small number of autos in the country can burn fuel containing 85 percent ethanol.

"The real questions are going to be whether we are going to have the infrastructure to move the fuels or have the vehicles to use the fuels," said KateriCallahan, president of the Alliance to Save Energy.

"Producing 35 billion gallons of ethanol a year would require putting an additional 129,000 square miles of farmland—an area the size of Kansas and Iowa—into corn production, which is not very likely," said Philip Clapp, president of the National Environmental Trust.

The secretaries of energy and agriculture and the director of the Environmental Protection Agency could waive the 35 billion gallon standard if there are disruptions in the alternative-fuel market.

In another energy initiative, the president asked Congress for authority to "reform" fuel-economy standards for cars, even though congressional critics said Bush now has all the power he needs.

The plan would enable the government to set fuel-efficiency standards for cars based on their size, in the same way that it can set such standards for light trucks, the White House said.

The administration said these tougher so-called CAFE (for corporate average fuel economy) standards would reduce gasoline consumption by 5 percent, or 8.5 million gallons annually, by 2017.

Gas-reduction Proposals Raise Questions (LAT)

By Richard Simon, Elizabeth Douglass And John O'Dell

Los Angeles Times, January 24, 2007

WASHINGTON -- President Bush's proposals to reduce U.S. gasoline consumption by 20 percent in 10 years include more specific and ambitious new goals than in previous White House statements, but they also appear to rely on assumptions about energy markets, politics and technology that some experts say are debatable, and include some apparent contradictions.

In general, Bush's proposal to boost alternative fuels such as ethanol was greeted with conditional enthusiasm by many scientists, environmentalists and members of Congress. His plan would require suppliers to include 35 billion gallons of alternative fuels in the nation's vehicle fuel supply by 2017, up from the current 5 billion gallons.

"It is in our vital interest to diversify America's energy supply -- and the way forward is through technology," Bush said. " ... We need to press on with battery research for plug-in and hybrid vehicles, and expand the use of clean diesel vehicles and bio-diesel fuel. We must continue investing in new methods of producing ethanol -- using everything from wood chips, to grasses, to agricultural wastes."

DOJ_NMG_0121053

Bush also called for Congress to give him new authority to set vehicle fuel-economy rules. His plan would overhaul the 31-year-old vehicle fuel-economy program established after the Arab oil embargo, contending that technology can be deployed to "significantly improve fuel economy" without compromising vehicle safety.

But he rejected bipartisan calls for Congress to set new fuel economy rules, preferring to have the Department of Transportation set the standard. Under current law, the DOT can only set mileage standards for trucks; raising the standard for passenger cars requires an act by Congress. Bush's plan asks Congress to allow DOT to set car standards using a vehicle size method rather than an overall fleet average.

Given the negative reaction Bush received from some Democrats on Capitol Hill Tuesday, that possibility appears remote.

Environmentalists were skeptical that Bush's proposal would lead to any significant increase in fuel economy rules.

Indeed, some aspects of the overall plan seemed to contradict each other. For one, Bush's proposal to save gasoline by increasing vehicle fuel economy standards could be undermined by his call for greater use of alternative fuels. Ethanol, for example, gets less mileage than gasoline and, without a major technological breakthrough, requiring more of it could make it harder to increase fuel efficiency.

Philip Clapp, president of the National Environmental Trust, said that the president's request for new legislation "letting him set standards basically model-by-model is something Detroit has pushed for years -- as a way to poke more loopholes in the current weak standards."

Currently, auto makers are required to have their fleets meet an average standard of 27.5 miles per gallon for passenger cars, unchanged since 1985, and 21.6 miles per gallon for light trucks, which is due to increase to 24 mpg by 2011. Bush said mileage standards should be increased enough to reduce gasoline consumption by 5 percent, or 8.5 billion gallons, by 2017. Achieving that would require an average fuel economy improvement of 4 percent a year starting in the 2010 model year for cars, he said.

Bill Prindle, acting executive director of the American Council for an Energy Efficient Economy, a Washington think tank, called Bush's fuel-economy proposal "pretty weak, plus it is totally noncommittal on substance and timing. It says, Congress, don't send us a standard, give us the power and we'll issue a rule.

"The 4 percent per year improvement is a nice hypothetical, but the last rule this administration issued, for light trucks in March 2006, achieved barely a 2 percent annual improvement. So I am not optimistic that DOT will come out with a stronger rule for cars, and especially not within two years."

On Capitol Hill, Democrats and their environmental allies assailed Bush for failing to endorse mandatory limits on emissions blamed for global warming, commit to stricter vehicle miles-per-gallon rules or reconsider his past opposition to requiring a percentage of the nation's electricity to be generated from alternative energy sources such as solar and wind power.

Rep. Henry A. Waxman, D-Calif., called the energy proposals "the latest in a string of disappointments from this administration."

Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif., who is among a bipartisan group of lawmakers who has pushed for stricter miles per gallon rules, said the president's proposal "doesn't go nearly far enough."

"The president has had the ability to make real changes to fuel efficiency with regard to light trucks for six years -- and he hasn't made substantial increases. Why should we trust him now?" she said, contending the only secure substantial increases in fuel economy is through legislation.

But any effort to go beyond what Bush is proposing could be politically difficult. Previous efforts to pass much stricter fuel-economy standards have run into resistance not only from Bush and Republicans wary of government regulation but also Democrats from auto-producing states who have warned that congressional mandated rules could lead to lighter, less-safe vehicles, cost the U.S. auto industry jobs and harm the economy.

Bush's call for ramping up production of ethanol and other alternative fuels generated more enthusiasm, especially on Capitol Hill among farm-state Democrats and Republicans.

Bush's plan does not single out ethanol, even though it is in the best position to deliver the desired results. The goal can also be met with the use of biodiesel, butanol, methanol, hydrogen and other forms of alternative fuels.

Corn-based ethanol is not without its drawbacks, and would be a short-term solution at best. Corn-based ethanol consumes a valuable U.S. food crop and has driven the price up. What's more, the process of growing corn and transforming it into ethanol consumes large amounts of fossil fuels such as oil, coal and natural gas. And with current technology, U.S. farms could provide only enough corn to yield 15 billion gallons of fuel ethanol a year -- well below the president's new goal of 35 billion, according to some estimates.

While today's ethanol production involves trade-offs, its advocates believe new technology will soon erase many of the downsides. The most important breakthrough would be a switch to making ethanol from agricultural waste, switch grass, wood chips and other kinds of biomass that get broken down by enzymes or bacteria to yield what's known as cellulosic ethanol.

DOJ_NMG_0121054

To get to Bush's new target, "it will take cellulosic-based ethanol, and it will take improvements in the efficiency of grain-ethanol production, and those things are improving on a daily basis," said Matt Hartwig, spokesman for the Renewable Fuels Assn., a Washington-based trade group. "It's the technology advancements today and down the road that will allow us to achieve the 35 billion gallons of fuel and beyond."

Hartwig and others said the president's new fuels plan, even if it comes without additional government research funding, would encourage investors to put money into ethanol and other biofuel projects. Cellulosic ethanol, for example, is already a proven technology, but more funding is needed to find ways to cut the cost of making it, according to Hartwig and others.

Mark Emalfarb, chief executive of the biotechnology firm Dyadic International Inc., is one of a handful of companies trying to make fiber-based ethanol commercially feasible. Bush's pronouncement Tuesday night, he said, would help companies like his to speed up advancements in ethanol production.

"For 14 years, we were working on this behind-the-scenes, and nobody cared," Emalfarb said. "But from the minute the president got on the air (last year) and said `America is addicted to oil' and mentioned cellulosic ethanol, the phone's been ringing off the hook. ... Now he's tripled the size of the market."

Volatile Markets May Crimp Energy Plan (WSJ)

By Jeffrey Ball And Lauren Etter

Wall Street Journal, January 24, 2007

President Bush's call for the U.S. to reduce projected gasoline demand by 20% over the next decade faces a hurdle: a volatile energy market.

Mr. Bush called for in his State of the Union Address last night a massive increase in U.S. ethanol use by 2017 and a toughening of federal auto-fuel-economy standards -- actions that, together, will curb U.S. gasoline consumption 20% below projected levels in 2017, the administration said. But the economics both of alternative fuels and of more-efficient vehicles depend largely on the price of oil as well as other commodities, leaving them vulnerable to market shifts.

The volatility ethanol producers have encountered underscores the uncertainty faced by companies and investors trying to develop alternate sources of energy. Lower prices can hurt the economic argument underpinning their development, and added supplies can bring prices down. Increased supplies of ethanol world-wide are cited as one reason for the recent drop in oil prices, for example.

To be sure, Mr. Bush's policy does mandate increased renewable-fuel use. But the policy contains "safety valves" under which federal officials could waive or weaken the mandate if the economics of alternative fuels eroded. That is because "a bold policy move such as this could have an adverse effect on commodity prices, whether it be in corn, or cellulose, or oil," said Craig Stevens, a Department of Energy spokesman. Ethanol in the U.S. today is made from corn. But hopes are pinned on making the fuel from "cellulosic" material, such as switch grass and wood chips, which are more plentiful than corn.

After hitting $77 a barrel last summer, oil fell steadily in recent months, dipping briefly below $50 a barrel last week in intraday trading. It jumped yesterday 4.7% to settle at $55.04 in New York Mercantile Exchange trading. But oil remains below the levels that, for much of past year, sent the stocks of ethanol producers soaring and consumers flocking to more-efficient cars and trucks.

The economic disincentive of falling oil prices marks only the latest squeeze for ethanol producers. Production has surged over the past year. That has pushed up the price of corn, ethanol's main ingredient. In response, the profitability of ethanol plants is down.

The net profit of a 50-million-gallon ethanol plant today is about 7.2 cents a gallon of ethanol produced, down from 50 cents a gallon on Jan. 1, said Rick Kment, an ethanol analyst at DTN, an agricultural-commodities research firm.

That partly explains why shares of many ethanol producers have swooned. Shares of VeraSun Energy Corp., an ethanol producer that went public at the height of market interest last year, have fallen steadily since last November. Yesterday they finished at $17.96 in New York Stock Exchange composite trading, down almost 42% from its 52-week high of $30.75 in June.

Meanwhile, one of ethanol's big selling points, that it would significantly curb global-warming emissions, has come under debate amid concern over the amount of energy needed to process the ethanol itself.

Wally Tyner, an agricultural-energy analyst at Purdue University, worries Americans'" boom mentality" regarding ethanol will sputter out. "I don't think this growth rate can be sustained," he says. "If we have enough plants built, they will bid up corn prices to where it's no longer profitable" to produce ethanol.

Ethanol producers are somewhat insulated from the volatility of the market, since some of the corn used in current production was purchased earlier at lower prices. Dan Basse, president of Chicago research firm AgResource Co., says that corn would have to reach $4.80 a bushel while ethanol prices would have to drop to $1.60 a gallon for it to be unprofitable. Ethanol now is at about $2.16 a gallon. The average cash price of corn nationwide yesterday was $3.76 a bushel.

DOJ_NMG_0121055

The U.S. uses about 5.2 billion gallons of ethanol a year. According to the Energy Department, the U.S. uses about 140 billion gallons of gasoline a year. It takes more than one gallon of ethanol to equal the energy in a gallon of gasoline.

Ethanol giant Archer-Daniels-Midland Co. is experimenting with ways to turn corn hulls into ethanol. By doing this ADM says it will be able to increase the production of ethanol by 15% without using any additional kernels of corn.

The American Petroleum Institute, the oil industry's Washington-based trade group, said ethanol and other alternative fuels "have an important role in our nation's present and future energy mix," but it said: "Attaining the full volumes included in the administration's proposal will require additional technological breakthroughs."

The Big Three auto companies have announced plans to significantly increase their production of versions of their conventional vehicles that have been modified so they can run on either gasoline or ethanol. Gloria Bergquist, a spokeswoman for the Alliance of Automobile Manufacturers, an industry group, said her group supports the president's efforts to increase alternative-fuel usage. But she said the government needs to boost research into technologies such as batteries for the next generation of hybrid vehicles, and oil companies need to do more to roll out alternative fuels.

Bush Vows To Cut US Petrol Demand (FT)

By Doug Cameron

Financial Times, January 24, 2007

The US has called for a 20 per cent cut in domestic gasoline consumption over the next 10 years and a five-fold increase in alternative and renewable fuel production as part of the much-vaunted push by the White House for “energy independence”.

The targets outlined ahead of Tuesday’s State of the Union address are expected to inflame the food-versus-fuel debate over the competing use of corn-based ethanol, while environmentalists have also expressed concern over plans to increase domestic oil production.

The president will also call on Congress to introduce tougher fuel-consumption standards for passenger cars, and for the size of the Strategic Petroleum Reserve to be doubled.

The White House plans to build on the push into ethanol from the current energy bill by mandating the use of 35bn gallons of renewable and alternative fuel by 2017 in the form of ethanol produced from corn and other biomass, as well as soybean-derived biodiesel.

This compares with the 7.5bn gallons which the energy bill currently requires by 2012, though the industry expects to surpass this as early as next year, with dozens of ethanol plants being developed across the country. About 5bn gallons was produced in 2006.

Industry experts said corn-based ethanol would have to account for about two-thirds of the 2017 target, at the top end of current estimates for potential production. The expansion will require the planting of more corn acres and advancement in crop science to improve yields.

The president is expected to commit more funds to renewable fuel research – a call matched by the Democratic leaders – in a bid to meet the targets and make other feedstocks such as sawgrass more commercially viable. However, the target could also renew calls for the existing tariff on ethanol imports to be lifted – notably from low-cost, sugar-based producers in Brazil.

The White House claimed the new targets would displace 15 per cent of current natural gas consumption.

Corn, ethanol and soybean futures all ended higher at the Chicago Board of Trade. Shares in Archer Daniel Midland, the largest US ethanol producer, climbed 2.7 per cent.

Critics See Little Meaningful Change (WP)

By Steven Mufson

Washington Post, January 24, 2007

Practicality, Effectiveness Questioned

The energy proposals President Bush outlined last night break new ground for his administration.

He combined a call to lower gasoline consumption with new mandates for oil companies and new standards for automakers. And he couched these in the context of enhancing U.S. energy security and addressing climate change.

Each proposal, though, immediately prompted questions about its ultimate effectiveness.

Â· Twenty in 10: Bush said he has a "goal of reducing U.S. gasoline usage by 20 percent in the next 10 years."

The fine print: Administration officials said that the goal is 20 percent below projected annual gasoline usage, not off today's levels.

That's very significant for oil markets, where analysts look at the balance of rising supplies and rising demand.

"If you made this type of reduction . . . U.S. petroleum consumption wouldn't be flat, but it would not grow meaningfully," said Frederick W. Smith, chairman of FedEx Corp., who said he applauds Bush's "balanced" approach.

DOJ_NMG_0121056

But people worried about climate change were disappointed. Using projections means that carbon dioxide emissions from transportation fuels will drop only slightly from today's levels; other parts of the economy produce the other two-thirds of greenhouse gases.

"This is not nearly enough to really put us on the path of reducing emissions down to 60 percent or 80 percent of current levels, which is what we really need," said Eileen Claussen, president of the Pew Center on Global Climate Change.

Â· Raising fuel-economy standards: Bush said that he would raise fuel-efficiency standards by about 4 percent a year, starting in model year 2010 for cars and model year 2012 for trucks. He also wants to change the way the standards are applied.

Currently the fuel standards apply to the average of all the cars each carmaker sells in a year. Bush would make new standards for cars "attribute-based" -- creating many different standards based on, for example, size. And he would give carmakers some flexibility in how they meet targets. (These standards are scheduled to go into effect for light trucks starting in 2008.)

The fine print: The new system promotes efficiency advances for every kind of vehicle, not just for one model. The president did not want Congress to set a new miles-per-gallon standard, but the Union of Concerned Scientists estimated that Bush's proposal could raise the fleet average to 34 miles a gallon by 2017.

UCS warned, though, that if attribute-based standards are not combined with fleet averages, they "could actually encourage automakers to sell heavier or larger vehicles that guzzle more gas." That would mean more efficient gas-guzzlers, but still more gas-guzzlers.

Â· New renewable-fuel target: Bush said he would ask Congress to require oil companies to use 35 billion gallons of renewable and alternative fuels by 2017. The administration said this would replace 15 percent of projected annual gasoline consumption.

The questions: How will that target be met? The ethanol industry will produce more than 7.5 billion gallons this year, almost all of it corn-based. But it would take more than last year's entire U.S. corn harvest to make enough ethanol to meet the target. Most industry experts say that there is not enough evidence that producing biofuels from other sources can be done on anything close to that scale.

The fine print: Bush changed the language on the mandate to say that "alternative," not just "renewable," fuels could be part of that volume. The only difference that makes by federal definitions is to add so-called coal-to-liquids fuels. One company has a proposal before the Energy Department for a $2 billion plant.

"You get the same amount of mileage and twice the pollution," said Anna Aurilio, legislative director of Public Interest Research Group. "That would be a huge step backwards." But an administration official said that the coal-to-liquids project could be used by the military.

Â· Doubling the Strategic Petroleum Reserve by 2027: The president's proposal calls for resuming the purchase of 100,000 barrels a day for the reserve, a practice suspended after Hurricane Katrina. The reserve has 691 million barrels; it has room for 727 million barrels.

The fine print: The plan calls for spending $10 billion to add additional storage facilities, including the expansion of sites in Louisiana and Texas, and addition of a new site at a salt cavern in Mississippi. Another $55 billion would be spent buying the fuel over 20 years -- a price of just under $69 a barrel, a hefty premium over the current price of $54.77 a barrel.

Bush Oil Reserve Plan Sparks Price Surge (FT)

By Caroline Daniel

Financial Times, January 24, 2007

President George W. Bush triggered the biggest one-day jump in oil prices in 16 months on Tuesday when he set out plans in his State of the Union address to double US strategic oil reserves.

Oil prices rose 4.7 per cent to $55 a barrel after Mr Bush pledged to double the size of the reserves by 1.5bn barrels by 2027. Sam Bodman, energy secretary, said his department would start “purchasing crude oil in the spring at a rate of about 100,000 barrels per day”.

The speech marked Mr Bush’s strongest effort yet to slow the growth of greenhouse gases with a plan to cut US demand for petrol by 20 per cent over the next 10 years by raising fuel-economy standards and setting targets for a shift to alternative fuels.

“The plan will confront climate change by stopping the projected growth of carbon dioxide emissions from cars, light trucks and SUVs within 10 years,” a White House document said.

In an echo of last year’s speech, when the president memorably warned that America was “addicted to oil”, Mr Bush said: “For too long, our nation has been dependent on foreign oil. And this dependence leaves us more vulnerable to hostile regimes, and to terrorists – who could cause huge disruptions of oil shipments.”

DOJ_NMG_0121057

The policy shift – coming on the day that Al Gore, former vice-president, received two Oscar nominations for An Inconvenient Truth, his documentary film about the dangers of global warming – was outlined to a newly assertive Congress and a sceptical public.

Mr Bush's approval ratings this week were the lowest for any president ahead of a State of the Union address since Richard Nixon in 1974.

Dan Bartlett, White House counsellor, said that the speech reflected the fact that officials were "under no illusions about the atmosphere we are operating in."

However, the White House energy policy fell short of hopes that it would engage in international discussions about a post-Kyoto accord after 2012 to control greenhouse gases or support tougher economy wide mandatory caps on carbon dioxide.

Faced with opposition from Democrats and rising Republican dissent about his plans for a surge of 21,500 troops in Iraq, Mr Bush defended his strategy. "Many in this chamber understand that America must not fail in Iraq – because you understand that the consequences of failure would be grievous and far-reaching."

Officials said he would also "explain why it is time for the Iraqi government to act" and would not intensify the administration's anti-Iran rhetoric.

The goal to cut gasoline consumption by up to 20 per cent by 2017 marks a significant shift for the White House, recognising both pressure from international leaders for the US to act on climate change, and the new influence of the Democrats, who have shifted the focus of energy policy towards efficiency.

Mr Bush's first five State of the Union speeches did not directly address climate change, and in 2001 he summed up his energy policy as: "We can't conserve our way to energy independence".

The higher oil prices – crude oil yesterday made its biggest one-day jump since September 19 2005 – pushed energy stocks up sharply.

The S&P's energy sector rose 2.4 per cent with shares in Exxon Mobil up 2.2 per cent at $74.49, ConocoPhillips up 2.5 per cent to $64.97, and Chevron up 1.9 per cent to $72.56.

Blindness On Biofuels (WP)

By Robert J. Samuelson

Washington Post, January 24, 2007

President Bush joined the biofuels enthusiasm in his State of the Union address, and no one can doubt the powerful allure. Farmers, scientists and venture capitalists will liberate us from insecure foreign oil by converting corn, prairie grass and much more into gasoline substitutes. Biofuels will even curb greenhouse gases. Already, production of ethanol from corn has surged from 1.6 billion gallons in 2000 to 5 billion in 2006. Bush set an interim target of 35 billion gallons in 2017 on the way to the administration's ultimate goal of 60 billion in 2030. Sounds great, but be wary. It may be a mirage.

The great danger of the biofuels craze is that it will divert us from stronger steps to limit dependence on foreign oil: higher fuel taxes to prod Americans to buy more gasoline-efficient vehicles and tougher federal fuel economy standards to force auto companies to produce them. True, Bush supports tougher -- but unspecified -- fuel economy standards. But the implied increase above today's 27.5 miles per gallon for cars is modest, because the administration expects gasoline savings from biofuels to be triple those from higher fuel economy standards.

The politics are simple enough. Americans dislike high fuel prices; auto companies dislike tougher fuel economy standards. By contrast, everyone seems to win with biofuels: farmers, consumers, capitalists. American technology triumphs. Biofuels create rural jobs and drain money from foreign oil producers. What's not to like? Unfortunately, this enticing vision is dramatically overdrawn.

Let's do some basic math. In 2006, Americans used about 7.5 billion barrels of oil. By 2030, that could increase about 30 percent to 9.8 billion barrels, projects the Energy Information Administration. Much of that rise would reflect higher gasoline demand. In 2030, there will be more people (an estimated 365 million vs. 300 million in 2006) and more vehicles (316 million vs. 225 million). At most, biofuels would address part of the increase in oil demand; it wouldn't reduce our oil use or import dependence from current levels.

Suppose we reach the administration's ultimate target of 60 billion gallons in 2030. That would offset less than half of the projected increase in annual oil use. Here's why. First, it's necessary to convert the 60 billion gallons into barrels. Because there are 42 gallons in a barrel, that means dividing by 42. Further: Ethanol has only about two-thirds of the energy value of an equal volume of gasoline. When you do all the arithmetic, 60 billion gallons of ethanol displace just under 1 billion barrels of gasoline. If that merely offsets increases in oil use, it won't cut existing import dependence or greenhouse gases.

The 60 billion-gallon goal -- and the 35 billion-gallon interim target -- are also probably unrealistic. When we rhapsodize about biofuels, we're talking mainly about old-fashioned alcohol (aka ethanol). Until now, most ethanol has been made from corn.

DOJ_NMG_0121058

If small amounts of toxic gasoline were not added, it could become corn whiskey. Ethanol receives heavy federal subsidies. Oil refiners that blend it with gasoline get a 51-cents-a-gallon tax credit. The subsidy causes them to buy more ethanol, increasing corn demand.

Naturally, corn farmers love this. They've been the program's main beneficiaries. Although ethanol displaces only tiny amounts of oil (slightly more than 1 percent), it's had a big effect on corn prices. They're about $3 a bushel, up from $2 last year and the highest in a decade. They could go higher. In 2000, ethanol used 6 percent of the U.S. corn crop. In 2006, that was 20 percent, and the ethanol plants under construction would double capacity by 2010. Higher prices for corn (which is fed to poultry, hogs and cattle) raise retail meat prices. Ironically, fuel subsidies may boost food costs.

But corn harvests won't be large enough to meet either the 35 billion- or 60 billion-gallon targets. Large amounts of "cellulosic" ethanol would also be needed -- the term referring to the cellulose in other plants to be converted to ethanol. Prime candidates are farm wastes, including wheat straw and cornstalks. Unfortunately, the chemistry for doing this is far more costly than it is for corn kernels. Without technological advances, cellulosic ethanol won't be economically viable. It could be supported only with massive federal subsidies or direct requirements forcing refiners to use the fuel, regardless of cost. Then the high costs would be passed on to consumers. Congress started down that path in 2005 by enacting a modest mandate for biofuel use.

Biofuels are certainly worth pursuing. Up to some point, they're even worth subsidizing. Government can nurture new technologies, and breakthroughs for cellulosic ethanol -- hardly inconceivable -- would make a meaningful difference in the U.S. fuel balance. But there's also a real threat that the infatuation with biofuels is a political expediency that will turn into a classic government boondoggle, benefiting selected constituencies and providing few genuine public benefits. That has already happened with corn.

Our primary need is to curb reliance on foreign oil. If imports were dependable, they would not be dangerous, but they come from unstable or hostile suppliers. Although our dependence can't be eliminated, it can be reduced. The most obvious way is to improve the efficiency of vehicles by 30 to 50 percent over the next few decades. Americans need more hybrids and more small vehicles. Biofuels might be a complement, but if they blind us to this larger reality, they will be a step backward.

Decoding Climate Politics (WSJ)

By HOLMAN W. JENKINS, JR.

The Wall Street Journal, January 24, 2007

Holman W. Jenkins Jr. is a member of the editorial board of The Wall Street Journal and writes editorials and the weekly Business World column.

Mr. Jenkins joined the Journal in May 1992 as a writer for the editorial page in New York. In February 1994, he moved to Hong Kong as editor of The Asian Wall Street Journal's editorial page. He returned to the domestic Journal in December 1995 as a member of the paper's editorial board and was based in San Francisco. In April 1997, he returned to the Journal's New York office. Mr. Jenkins won a 1997 Gerald Loeb Award for distinguished business and financial coverage.

Born in Philadelphia, Mr. Jenkins received a bachelor's degree from Hobart and William Smith Colleges in Geneva, N.Y. He received a master's degree in journalism from Northwestern University in Evanston, Ill., and studied at the University of Michigan on a journalism fellowship.

Mr. Jenkins invites comments to holman.jenkins@wsj.com1.

Decoding Climate Politics

January 24, 2007; Page A12

Pundits tell us the mood shift, with Democrats now in control, favors action on climate change. Don't bet on it.

It's still going to be hard for the legislative process to get past the fact that nothing on the table or capable of commanding majority support would make the slightest difference to climate change. Even a complete ban on burning fossil fuels in the U.S. wouldn't halt progress to the next milestone, a doubling of atmospheric carbon dioxide since the advent of industrial civilization. No joke to say the only live question for congresspersons and their voters back home is: How much are we going to spend to have no impact on global warming, and why?

Politics is a business of symbolism, but not without its pull toward the rational. The game in Washington today is how to turn global warming policy toward some other purpose that serves somebody's idea of self-interest or the national good. Let's rank these in order of the narrowness of the interests involved.

General Electric, DuPont, Alcoa, Caterpillar and other industrial pigpens this week endorsed cap-and-trade limits on carbon dioxide, which would turn their established habit of using the atmosphere as a free waste disposal into a property right, worth billions. Talk about a low-hanging fruit. They are accustomed to treating carbon dumping as a gimme. Now they'd at least be in a position to get paid for dumping less.

DOJ_NMG_0121059

Their hero is retiring BP chief John Browne, who turned his little oil company into a big oil company, engaged in cost cutting (which he called "emissions cuts") and set about using public policy to get his shareholders compensated twice for these cuts (net, of course, of any deductions for oil spills, plant explosions, etc.).

Next up on the enlightenment scale, with straightened vertebrae and the first inkling of a "larger good," are Nancy Pelosi, George Bush and others who want to use climate change to advance a goal of "energy independence."

They may be praying to a false god, but their devotion is possibly sincere. And some public good might come from policies designed to encourage a "cellulosic" ethanol industry, which has the potential to be carbon-neutral as well as to improve the nation's "energy security" (a non-false god) by spurring a global market in biofuels to compete with OPEC.

However, to the extent that global warming becomes an excuse to shovel more subsidies and protectionist favors at the corn ethanol industry, neither energy security nor carbon reduction would be served.

Finally, walking upright, with knuckles no longer in proximity to the ground, are advocates -- mostly economists -- of a carbon tax.

A carbon tax would be the efficient way of encouraging businesses and consumers to make less carbon-intensive energy choices. Government would not have to exercise an improbable clairvoyance about which technologies will pay off in the future. There'd be less scope for Congress to favor some industries over others purely on the basis of lobbying clout.

The most enlightened of the enlightened (love note to Kevin Hassett) are those who see how a carbon tax might be used to overhaul the tax system and make it more pro-growth in its treatment of savings and investment.

There's your scorecard. Unfortunately, because a carbon tax would lead to a direct (rather than surreptitious) increase in the cost of gasoline, the path of enlightenment will not be the path of politics. Of one other thing you can also be sure -- the impact on climate change of any policy issuing from Washington will be nil.

By common (if fudgy) estimate, the biosphere can take up less than three billion tons of atmospheric carbon a year. Human industry produces 7.5 billion tons, a volume that continues to grow rapidly as China, India, Brazil and Indonesia (not covered by Kyoto) develop their economies, and as European countries and Japan (covered by Kyoto) blow past their limits. Consider too that carbon is hardly the sole, and perhaps not even the dominant, force behind the ostensible warming of the past century.

The only thing that will save us now is the likelihood (very high) that the most dire forecasts of climate change are wrong; the chance (not improbable) that the biosphere will evolve to make use of a slightly more carbon-rich atmosphere; and the prospect (nearly certain) that mankind will seek to adapt to whatever climate it finds itself confronted with.

Our private bet, of no relevance for the politics, is that real knowledge being so skimpy, today's "consensus" on climate change will turn out to be a perishable fruit. And those like Rep. John Dingell who are still willing to profess public doubts about whether any of us know what we're talking about when we talk about climate change will end up looking pretty good in retrospect.

Polls say the public has heard Al Gore and believes a climate disaster is just around the corner, with rising sea levels and killer hurricanes. Yet Manhattan real-estate values increased 17% last year and the stock market is at all-time high. The same cognitive dissonance is guaranteed to be reflected in policy, which will consist of symbolism on global warming but nothing so costly and radical as to require true climate worrywarts to brighten up.

Rest assured, the great planetary chemistry experiment will continue. If you're curious about how the Earth might react to a myriad of human activities whose net effects are still far from reliably assessed, you only need to stick around. At least until science figures out how to harvest the gazillions of watts of free energy the sun sheds on the planet everyday, which will fix old problems but surely introduce new ones.

Push To Replace New US Mercury Plan (CSM)

By Peter N. Spotts

The Christian Science Monitor, January 24, 2007

The nation's new program to regulate mercury may be short-lived.

Several draft bills in Congress – as well as a suit in federal court – are challenging the Bush administration's mercury pollution program, which took effect last year. A key reason, they charge, is that the plan's emissions-trading scheme – which has worked to curb other pollutants that spread far and wide – doesn't work for mercury, which accumulates locally as well as spreading over long distances.

That's why lawmakers on Capitol Hill are preparing bills that would tackle the toxic pollutant in a more direct manner. They aim to reduce mercury emissions from coal-fired power plants by 90 percent, rather than the Environmental Protection Agency's (EPA's) target of 70 percent. The bills also would set up a nationwide monitoring network to track airborne mercury and its effects on the environment.

DOJ_NMG_0121060

Democrats and Republicans have offered similar bills before. But three major scientific studies published during the past several months have added urgency to their efforts, they say. The upshot of the research: Unlike pollutants such as sulfur dioxide, airborne mercury is far more likely to drop back to earth close to its source, generating "hot spots" of contamination and accumulating in the food chain.

The research also is cited in a lawsuit 16 states and a handful of environmental groups have filed with the US Court of Appeals in Washington. The suit, initiated two years ago, challenges the EPA's regulatory tack on mercury pollution. Within the past two weeks, the plaintiffs filed opening briefs charging that the EPA is misusing the emissions-trading approach. They also argue that to set up the program, the agency illegally dropped power plants from a list of pollution sources that must face the most stringent controls under the Clean Air Act.

Emissions trading has helped the country dramatically reduce sulfur-dioxide pollution from power plants by establishing a market-based approach. Companies can balance out their big polluting plants either by running much cleaner plants elsewhere or buying pollution credits from other, cleaner utilities. As emission limits tighten, the cost of such credits goes up, encouraging companies to close or retrofit their biggest polluters.

But the recent studies provide new data that show why such a scheme should not be allowed for mercury, argues Rep. Tom Allen (D) of Maine, author of a bill to establish a national mercury monitoring network.

The first study, published last September in Environmental Science and Technology, found that over a two-year period, 70 percent of the mercury that rain or snow washed out of the skies over Steubenville, Ohio, came from local or regional sources. This is far higher than previous EPA studies indicated. The team picked Steubenville because 17 coal-fired power-plant boilers operate within 62 miles of the city, and another study had documented adverse health effects to people in the area from air pollution.

Two studies published this month in the journal BioScience discovered five biological hot spots in the northeastern US and southeastern Canada, and uncovered another nine that may be hot spots as well. The intensity of these hot spots varies with the type of coal burned in a boiler at the source and with other factors such as the landscape's chemistry or water levels in reservoirs. As with Steubenville, the researchers also established that at least two hot spots that cover southeastern New Hampshire and northeastern Massachusetts could be traced to local and regional sources and that the mercury was showing up in fish and birds.

One of the two studies carried some good news, notes Charles Driscoll, a Syracuse University scientist who took part in both studies. Between 1997 and 2002, mercury emissions fell by 45 percent in southern New Hampshire, thanks to emissions controls on incinerators. Concentrations found in wild loons in one of the hot spots fell by an average of 30 percent over that period. Mercury levels in yellow perch and in plankton also fell.

The results have led both groups to call for a more effective national system for monitoring the sources and effects of airborne mercury. The sulfur-dioxide program worked, Dr. Driscoll says, because the EPA had comprehensive monitoring network. "Those measurements are not in place for mercury."

Cruise Line Fined For Striking, Killing Whale (ADN)

By Don Hunter, Anchorage Daily News

Anchorage (AK) Daily News, January 24, 2007

Princess Cruise Lines has agreed to pay $755,000 in fines and restitution to resolve accusations that one of its ships struck and killed a humpback whale near Glacier Bay more than five years ago.

A court date to finalize a plea agreement is set for Monday in U.S. District Court in Anchorage. According to documents filed last week, Princess is expected to plead guilty to a single misdemeanor of “failing to operate at a slow, safe speed while near humpback whales.” Under a plea agreement yet to be filed, the company would pay a $200,000 fine to the government and $550,000 in “community service restitution” to the National Park Service Foundation, court papers say. That money would go to an account for Glacier Bay National Park.

A Princess spokeswoman, Julie Benson, confirmed that the company plans to enter the plea agreement, but said she could add little now. “There are things we would like to address later when we have more time and information,” Benson said.

John Quinley, an Alaska spokesman for the National Park Service, said Justice department attorneys have told Park Service officials not to discuss the case at least until next week. The body of a 45-foot humpback was found floating near the mouth of Glacier Bay in mid-July 2001. A necropsy conducted at the time showed the animal died of massive skull fractures. A Princess vessel, the Dawn Princess, had been operating near two humpback whales a few days before, according to the court papers and news reports at the time.

DOJ_NMG_0121061

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Mexican Attorney General Cites 'alarming' Increase In Drug Consumption (AP)

AP, January 24, 2007

MEXICO CITY: Mexico's Attorney General said an alarming increase in drug use in Mexico is leading cartels to fight primarily for markets and territory rather than shipping routes, as cocaine finds an easier market here than in the United States.

Attorney General Eduardo Medina Mora also said Tuesday that a group of alleged drug traffickers extradited to the U.S. over the weekend could be returned to Mexican prisons once they are tried abroad, noting "that possibility has not been discarded."

His comments to congressional members that some of the 15 extradited late Friday might wind up back in Mexico to serve unfinished sentences or face new trials seemed at odds with the expectations of U.S. officials, who apparently plan to keep them for life.

On Monday, Karen Tandy, chief of the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration, said that "on behalf of the DEA, I have one last thing to say to these 15 criminals: Welcome to the first day of the rest of your lives." Those extradited to the U.S. include alleged drug lords like Osiel Cardenas and Hector Palma Salazar.

A so-called "temporary extradition" arrangement between the two countries allows suspects serving prison sentences in Mexico to be sent north for trial, but they must then return to Mexico to finish out their sentences here.

However, a top Mexican law enforcement official who wasn't authorized to give his name said Calderon had decided that Friday's extraditions didn't fall under that accord.

Despite Mexico's massive anti-drug raids, Medina Mora said that drug cartels still threaten "government sovereignty and control" in some regions, in part because they do more business locally now, rather than just shipping most drugs north as in the past.

"The consumption of hard drugs is increasing at truly alarming rates ... at rates of as much as 20 percent annually," Medina Mora said during testimony before lawmakers.

"Changing international (drug) market conditions have not only caused an increase in violence as they fight for markets, but have also focused organized criminal groups more toward the domestic market."

That has forced Mexico to shift its anti-drug efforts toward "a new paradigm," Medina Mora said.

In the past, authorities focused on arresting top drug lords, a move that often served to temporarily disrupt the chain of command on shipment routes they controlled.

But now that money and drugs follow a somewhat more diffuse network of local and international sales, the government has decided to use an approach oriented toward the drug economy.

The new campaign, which includes sending thousands of federal police and soldiers into several key strongholds, is aimed at "breaking up the areas of power, moneymaking and privilege."

Medina Mora said that in Mexico, lawyers for drug traffickers carry messages from their clients to their henchmen on the outside. Breaking up such contacts, he said, was part of a "new trend" in international law enforcement, and one of the reasons for the extraditions.

4 Extradited Drug Cartel Leaders Appear In Houston Court (SDUT)

By Onell R. Soto, Union-tribune Staff Writer

The San Diego Union-Tribune, January 24, 2007

Four drug cartel leaders extradited this weekend from Mexico and facing charges in San Diego federal court appeared in a Houston courtroom yesterday under high security.

They were among 15 people turned over by Mexican officials late Friday and early Saturday in a move that authorities said signals unprecedented cooperation in the fight against drug traffickers.

“Now, did we get all of Mexico's major drug traffickers? No, not yet. But this past weekend, the U.S. and Mexico have taken a tremendous leap forward,” said Karen Tandy, head of the Drug Enforcement Administration.

The four are expected to appear in San Diego federal court within weeks. Officials refused to give details about their transfer here for security reasons.

Two are brothers accused of leading day-to-day operations for the Arellano Félix cartel. Authorities said the other two are an “enforcer” for the criminal organization who was a link to Southern California street gangs and a former member who then led a rival cartel.

DOJ_NMG_0121062

Tandy said the greatest coup was the extradition of Osiel Cárdenas, a former police officer accused of running the Gulf Cartel, and of having corrupted specially trained Mexican federal officers.

"For the past eight years, Osiel Cárdenas Guillen commanded one of the most brutal and powerful drug cartels in the world," she said. "For the last four of those years, he did it from within a Mexican prison outside of Mexico City."

She lauded the extradition of Ismael and Gilberto Higuera Guerrero, indicted in 2003 in San Diego federal court. "Ismael was the Arellano Félix organization, or the Tijuana cartel's, chief of operations. Gilberto supervised operations in neighboring Mexicali."

As important, drug trafficking experts said, is Hector Palma Salazar, indicted in San Diego in 1995 and accused of conspiring to distribute more than a ton of cocaine.

A former member of the Arellano organization, he joined with Joaquín Guzmán Loera and ran the rival Sinaloa cartel.

Eduardo Medina Mora, Mexico's attorney general, has said the cartel leaders – Cárdenas, Palma and the Higuera brothers – were extradited to stop their communications from behind bars and to reduce risks of violence and escape, not because of U.S. pressure. The aim was to break "physical and geographical" contact with their gangs while they were in Mexican prisons.

Deputy U.S. Attorney General Paul McNulty said he was confident the U.S. prison system would be able to better control such communication.

"We have a long record of not having those kinds of problems occur within the Federal Bureau of Prisons," he said, including monitoring telephone calls, letters and visits.

One of those extradited, José Albert Márquez, is accused of being a leader in the Mexican Mafia prison gang, acting as a link to the Arellano Félix cartel.

The prison gang is accused of masterminding killings from inside prison and controlling drug distribution through threats and extortion using street gangs.

Also yesterday, the federal judge overseeing the possible death-penalty trial of accused kingpin Francisco Javier Arellano Félix sharply disagreed with prosecutors and defense lawyers over when a jury would hear the case. Arellano is accused of racketeering and conspiracy.

The lawyers told U.S. District Judge Larry Alan Burns they could be ready to take the case to trial in June 2008. Burns insists it can begin this year.

Although Arellano may face the death penalty since he was captured by U.S. officials, the group's top lieutenants won't because of terms of their extraditions from Mexico, where there is no death penalty.

Mexican President Felipe Calderón pledged yesterday to wage a permanent war on organized crime.

In addition to stepped-up extraditions, Calderón sent federal troops to patrol cities where police corruption is suspected, including Tijuana, where municipal officers were stripped of their weapons Jan. 4.

Man On Lam Flown Back To U.S. (MON)

Monitor, January 23, 2007

McALLEN — One of the 15 fugitives Mexico extradited to the United States Friday was a former officer in the Donna and Weslaco police departments whose confession nine years ago helped bring down a powerful Mexican cartel.

Gilberto Salinas-Doria's arrival at Ellington Field Friday outside Houston capped 16 years on the run from a federal indictment in Brownsville. But his most serious drug charges, the ones that prompted extradition, come from an indictment in New York, and stem from his time as a fugitive in Quintana Roo, the Mexican seaside state that is home to Cancun.

The extraditions Friday included the head of the Matamoros-based Gulf cartel and were done with only hours' notice to U.S. authorities. The extradition was aimed at removing top-level cartel leaders from Mexico, where they wield power even inside prison.

Salinas-Doria rose from lowly street dealer to making as much as $22 million a year, The Associated Press reported in 1999. He guaranteed cocaine and marijuana made it from Quintana Roo to Reynosa and then into the United States, according to the Mexican Attorney General's Office.

It is unclear whether prosecutors will reopen the 1990 Brownsville case that prompted Salinas-Doria to go on the lam.

Salinas-Doria entered the Donna police force in 1979, and took a job with Weslaco police the following year, according to The Monitor's archives. He was fired in 1982 after being investigated for selling drugs out of his police cruiser and other offenses, the AP has reported. He was never prosecuted.

His earliest convictions happened in 1983 when he pleaded guilty to possession of marijuana and in 1988 when he was convicted of conspiracy to sell marijuana and received 10 years' probation.

Salinas-Doria skipped bail on a 1990 charge in Brownsville that he tried to buy thousands of pounds of marijuana. Drug cases were later opened against him in Georgia and Houston.

Salinas-Doria's name also has been tied to the investigation into the murder of Francisco Jusino, a McAllen obstetrician who was killed in 1996. Salinas-Doria was living in Reynosa when his wife lost a baby Jusino delivered at a McAllen hospital. Police sought to question Salinas-Doria but never identified him as a suspect, according to Monitor archives

He was finally arrested in 1998 in Mexico. His confession led to the opening of 40 cases against members of Amado Carillo Fuente's cartel in Southeast Mexico and implicated the governor of Quintana Roo in drug trafficking, according to the Drug Enforcement Administration.

Salinas-Doria escaped from Mexican police later that year and was recaptured months later trying to enter Venezuela.

Mexico Praised Over Extraditions (SAE)

San Antonio Express, January 23, 2007

LAREDO — Alleged Mexican drug kingpin Osiel Cárdenas Guillén was arrested in 2003, but his reputed control over the Matamoros-based Gulf Cartel likely didn't end until this weekend, when Mexico took the surprising step of extraditing him to the United States for prosecution.

Before Friday night, when Cárdenas was taken to the United States with other accused drug traffickers, he was suspected of running the cartel's operations — and its bloody border feud with other traffickers — from his jail cell in Mexico City.

Cárdenas and 14 other extradited Mexican prisoners wanted by the United States went before a federal judge in Houston on Monday. Top U.S. officials praised the Mexican action as unprecedented.

Since taking office in December, Mexican President Felipe Calderón has taken several steps to combat the drug cartel violence that has spread across the country — including sending troops to trafficking hot spots and now the high-profile extraditions.

"We cannot overstate the significance of these steps," Deputy U.S. Attorney General Paul McNulty told reporters during a teleconference Monday. "The Calderón administration has staked out its position in favor of law-abiding citizens everywhere by choosing to stand up to these vicious criminals."

Mexico didn't give U.S. officials much time to prepare to accept the prisoners, McNulty said. They were taken to Ellington Field in Houston on three flights that landed beginning at 7 p.m. Friday. The last flight, carrying 10 prisoners, landed just past midnight, McNulty said.

Among the prisoners were Ismael Higuera Guerrero and his brother Gilberto Higuera Guerrero, both reputed top lieutenants for the Tijuana Cartel.

Also now in U.S. custody is Hector Palma Salazar, who with fugitive Joaquin "El Chapo" Guzman allegedly headed the Sinaloa Cartel.

But the prize catch was Cárdenas, who during his reign as reputed head of the Gulf Cartel founded the Zetas, an enforcement arm made up of military defectors who have grown into a feared group behind much of the violence along the border with Texas.

"This is the first time in the history of Mexico that they have extradited to the United States what amounts to a clean sweep geographically of the cartel leadership," Drug Enforcement Administration head Karen Tandy said during the news conference.

The removal of Cárdenas from communication with his organization raised questions about whether a power vacuum would usher in a wave of violence in Gulf Cartel territory, which reaches from Matamoros, across from Brownsville, to west of Nuevo Laredo.

"This is going to add to the ongoing war between these groups," said Bruce Bagley, an expert on drug trafficking at the University of Miami. "It happens every time you behead one of these organizations."

Violence in the short term is almost assured as the Gulf Cartel restructures itself and as the rival Sinaloa Cartel may perceive the group as vulnerable, Bagley said.

The Monitor's View (CSM)

The Christian Science Monitor, January 24, 2007

A new Mexican president, Felipe Calderón, has taken extraordinary steps to give fresh hope to a country that needs it. He's extradited drug kingpins to the US and sent troops into violent drug zones. This just may be a Mexican leader the US can get behind.

In 2005, Mexico surpassed Colombia as Latin America's main producer and distributor of narcotics. And like "Plan Colombia," the multi-billion-dollar aid and law- enforcement effort supported by the US since the 1990s to suppress drug growing in that country, Mexico could now use a "Plan Mexico" to curb its own drug-gang scourge.

DOJ_NMG_0121064

Mr. Calderón realizes he must first tackle the drug lords if he wants to improve the rule of law, human rights, and governance. Only then can he draw enough foreign investment to create jobs for the 40 percent of Mexicans who live in poverty and see El Norte as the promised land. (See a three-part Monitor series on Mexico that ends today.)

His boldest move since taking office Dec. 1 has been to deploy federal troops into places like Tijuana and Michoacán to confront both drug chieftains and corrupt local officials. (Tijuana police were disarmed during the operation.) Last year, Mexico saw more than 2,000 drug-related killings.

In recent days, Calderón has also sent more than a dozen captured drug bosses to the US for prosecution – a clear acknowledgment that Mexico's prisons and courts are too graft-ridden to safely contain them.

A US-educated technocrat who has shown the backbone of a live action figure, Calderón also launched a program to help Mexico's 100 poorest communities and another one to give cash incentives for companies to hire young workers. And he's proposed health insurance for infants.

Those compassionate moves indicate this leader of the conservative PAN party knows he barely won July's election against the leftist populist, Andrés Manuel López Obrador.

But they may also signal that the country's entrenched political establishment knows it must fix the country's fundamental problems or else it will see the election of a Hugo Chávez-style firebrand in 2012 by the "other Mexico."

Calderón is up against a deep culture of corruption and a concentration of wealth and power that only began to erode with the ouster of the long-ruling PRI party in 2000. His next steps, after cracking down on organized crime, must be to clean up the police and courts, while curbing public unions and breaking up monopolies. Last week's surge in the price of tortillas – a staple dominated by one company – shows the task he faces.

He has begun to open government actions to scrutiny and set up a uniform system for public spending. His severest test, however, may be in forming coalitions in the legislature, something his predecessor, Vicente Fox, failed to do. The PRI, which lost badly in the last election, may be open to assisting him.

The US should back Calderón's bold moves. For starters, it can reduce its consumption of illegal drugs and make it more difficult for Mexicans to cross the border and abandon their country. But now may be the time for the US to ask what more it can do to finally help fix its neighbor's seemingly intractable social and economic problems.

Gang Task Force Nabs 11 In Sweep (RMA)

By Stephanie Barry, Sbarry@repub.com

The Republican (MA), January 24, 2007

SPRINGFIELD - A local gang task force arrested 11 suspected gang associates early yesterday morning, billing the effort as a coordinated attempt to beat back rising street crime.

FBI supervisor Michael G. O'Reilly said 175 federal, state and city law enforcement officials joined in an orchestrated sweep at dawn. Eleven suspects were arrested on warrants and were in custody before noon, Springfield police records showed.

The police log did not specify the charges, but O'Reilly said the suspects were targeted for alleged narcotics dealing around the city's Mason Square neighborhood.

"We've been trying to get these guys off the street. The timing in the city was right," O'Reilly said yesterday, referring to an unsettling spike in violent crime including a shoot-out at a Main Street restaurant on New Year's Day.

In addition to the FBI and Springfield police, agents with the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration and Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives joined in the sweep, plus U.S. Marshals, Massachusetts State Police and members of the Hampden County Sheriff's Department.

Members of each agency contribute to the Hampden County Joint Gang Task Force. The task force last rounded up dozens of local Latin King affiliates in 2005.

Yesterday, O'Reilly said law enforcement officials recovered a half-dozen handguns and small amounts of cash and drugs. Of the guns, he said ballistics tests will be performed to determine whether they can be linked to any local crimes.

"You never know what these guns are tied to," he said.

Springfield police spokeswoman Jennifer Flagg said joint law enforcement efforts are a key strategy in fighting local street crime.

"Partnerships with multiple law enforcement agencies allows us to pool our resources, share information on criminals and work towards putting them away for long prison terms," she said.

O'Reilly said the sweep was ongoing yesterday evening, and he expects to announce more arrests today.

Prosecutors: Car Dealers Were In Drug Business (CHIST)

Chicago Sun-Times, January 23, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0121065

Two West Side auto dealer owners lined their pockets by selling luxury SUVs for cash to drug dealers, who used them to smuggle cocaine or heroin, prosecutors alleged Monday.

In one case, hundreds of thousands of dollars in cocaine was later found welded into the frame of an SUV seized by agents, prosecutors contend.

Luxury cars seized The accusations came as the trial for Amir Hosseini and Hossein Obaei began in federal court. The men's dealerships -- Amer Leasing Sales, American Car Exchange and SHO Auto Credit -- were shuttered by authorities in 2005 and more than 100 vehicles, including Jaguars, BMWs, Cadillacs and tricked-out SUVs, were seized.

Hosseini, of Winnetka, and Obaei, of Northbrook, are accused of using their businesses as a haven for drug runners and gang-bangers, laundering millions of dollars. They allegedly helped drug dealers conceal their large cash payments for vehicles and also put liens on paid-off cars.

The liens meant that if the feds seized the vehicles, they would have to turn them back over to the car dealers. The dealers then allowed the gang-bangers to recover the vehicle -- or any drugs still stashed inside, the government alleges.

But defense lawyers say their clients were legitimate businessmen who weren't about to question how their clientele were able to pay in cash.

"Mr. Obaei is a used car dealer. He is not a drug dealer," said his lawyer, Andrew Staes.

Staes said if some of Obaei's clients were drug dealers, there's no evidence he knew about it.

But Assistant U.S. Attorney Daniel Rubinstein said the two "took street money and drug money and converted it back into luxury cars."

Drugs welded into frame In opening statements, Hosseini's lawyer, Pat Tuite, said many of the witnesses expected to testify were doing so to save their own skin. He suggested sales people who worked for the men were tied to drugs and gangs -- not the owners.

While seizing SUVs at the U.S.-Mexico border, the Drug Enforcement Administration and FBI discovered many were purchased at the West Side dealerships.

In one case, a drug-sniffing canine hit on an SUV but authorities couldn't find the "trap," a hidden compartment used by drug dealers to stash drugs. They soon learned from witnesses that the cocaine was packaged and actually welded into the car's frame, Rubinstein said.

Taxpayers Footing Bill For Illegal Immigrant's Defense (KNOXNS)

By Jamie Satterfield

Knoxville News Sentinel (TN), January 24, 2007

Taxpayers, check those wallets.

If they seem a little light, consider the legal bills for a Mexican citizen's fight to get out of jail pending a Knoxville drug charge to which he pleaded guilty Tuesday.

Juan Lino-Gomez, 28, pleaded guilty before U.S. District Judge Tom Varlan to charges that he conspired with three other men to sell marijuana in East Tennessee over a two-year period.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Mike Winck said Lino-Gomez in a single transaction last July sold 100 pounds of marijuana. Unlucky for him, though, his customer turned out to be an undercover agent, and he and his alleged cohorts were arrested, Winck said.

But Lino-Gomez's case offers up more than a garden-variety pot-pushing conspiracy. It is a primer on the price tag that prosecutions involving illegal immigrants can carry.

Start with the salaries of lead investigators, U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration Agent Todd Lee and Knoxville Police Department Investigator Bruce Conkey.

Next, add in cash taxpayers fork out to cover Winck's salary. As a veteran federal prosecutor, he doesn't come cheap.

Then, figure in the cost of defense attorney Stephen Ross Johnson, who was appointed to the case because Lino-Gomez said he could not afford to hire counsel.

Appointed attorneys earn $92 per hour up to a maximum of $7,000. A court-appointed attorney can earn another $5,000 to handle an appeal.

Because Lino-Gomez has not yet been sentenced, the cost of his defense has not yet been calculated. But Johnson certainly has racked up dozens of hours of work in the case, if not more. After all, the zealous defense attorney pitched an appeal for Lino-Gomez's freedom to two local judges and an appellate court panel.

According to court records, Lino-Gomez first entered the United States on a student visa. He returned on a work visa, but it had long run out when he was nabbed last July peddling marijuana in Knoxville.

Winck asked U.S. District Magistrate Judge Bruce Guyton to keep Lino-Gomez behind bars. He argued it was a no-brainer.

"Defendant is a citizen of and has ties to Mexico," Winck wrote. "(He) is facing a lengthy sentence if convicted. (He) has no ties to this district."

Not so fast, Johnson countered.

"A determination may be made that he is not deportable on the basis of his direct familial relationship with United States citizens, such as his two biological children," Johnson wrote in rebuttal.

Guyton sided with Winck. Johnson appealed to Varlan, who also sided with Winck. Johnson then took his argument to the 6th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals. A three-judge panel shot him down in an order filed last month.

"The defendant is not a United States citizen," the court order stated.

Jamie Satterfield may be reached at 865-342-6308.

Bloomberg, Other Big-city Mayors Hold Gun Summit In D.C. (AP)

By Devlin Barrett, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 24, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Dozens of mayors from around the country gathered Tuesday to urge the new Democratic Congress to fight crime by allowing wider tracking of illegal guns.

New York Mayor Michael Bloomberg and Boston Mayor Thomas Menino were joined by 50 other mayors, who argue more access to gun sales data would reduce crime in the streets of their cities.

Minneapolis, Miami, Newark, N.J., and Omaha, Neb., were among the cities represented.

Bloomberg, a moderate Republican, said it was time to "begin showing Congress that it is possible to find common ground on common sense issues."

"We refuse to fall into the same old trap that it is an either-or: either respect the rights of gun owners or keep illegal guns out of the hands of criminals," Bloomberg said. "That's ideological nonsense, and we've just got to move past it."

To buttress their case, several of the mayors cited the recent rises in violent crime across the country.

FBI data show that violent crime rose 3.7 percent nationwide in the first six months of 2006 compared to the previous year.

In New York, the murder rate rose almost 10 percent in 2006, though the overall crime rate continued to decline.

New York's police commissioner, Ray Kelly, said: "After a significant downturn across the nation, violent crime is once again on the rise. Many cities are experiencing a substantial increase in shootings and homicides."

The mayors, most of whom were in town for separate meetings later this week of the U.S. Conference of Mayors, faulted the federal government for not doing more to crack down on the illegal movement of guns across city and state lines.

The White House has said violent crime has been reduced significantly in recent years, especially in many large cities, and a lot of the credit for that goes to mayors and law enforcement personnel and cooperation at the local, state and federal levels. It has said President Bush and Attorney General Alberto Gonzales are committed to making sure that existing laws are enforced.

For years, Bloomberg and others have complained about the National Rifle Association's powerful opposition to allowing the government to release gun sales records, also known as trace data, to show which tiny percentage of gun dealers are providing the bulk of guns used in crimes.

The NRA and other groups have derided the mayor's agenda as an elitist attempt to fix local crime problems by curtailing the national right to bear arms under the Second Amendment of the Bill of Rights.

Wayne LaPierre, the CEO of the NRA, called Bloomberg's argument "a wolf in sheep's clothing for the average gun owner in the United States."

LaPierre argued past gun trace data was misused in a way that weakened criminal prosecutions of criminals.

"The rest of the country doesn't really want New York City-style gun laws imposed on them ... where (gun) permits are given out to the elite and the famous while the average guy is flat out of luck," LaPierre said.

The mayors contend lax enforcement of national laws has brought more guns and armed criminals to their doorsteps.

"Illegal guns are a national problem that require a national response," Menino said.

Menino and Bloomberg formed Mayors Against Illegal Guns last year to press the government to share federal trace data with local law enforcement.

That trace data could also be used in lawsuits against dealers and gun manufacturers.

The mayors argue that if the trace data were shared, dealers would not be able to skirt or break the law when selling to so-called straw purchasers _ those who technically buy the weapons but quickly give them to someone else.

During the gathering, Bloomberg also offered another declaration of confidence in his police commissioner.

"I guarantee you he will be our commissioner for the next three (years). After that, Ray, you're on your own," Bloomberg joked.

DOJ_NMG_0121067

Mayors Unite On Gun-tracking Effort (WT)

By Brian Debose

The Washington Times, January 24, 2007

More than 120 of the nation's mayors urged Congress yesterday to allow federal and local law enforcement to share gun database tracking information in an effort to curtail the illegal sale of firearms.

City executives said they have run out of options to keep guns off their streets. Gun-buyback programs and stings on vendors who violate laws haven't solved the problem, they said.

Mayors Michael R. Bloomberg of New York and Thomas M. Merino of Boston, who in April formed a coalition called Mayors Against Illegal Guns, have crafted a policy agenda for Congress.

They are attempting to avoid serious conflicts with pro-gun groups, sportsmen and advocates of the Second Amendment, which protects Americans' right to bear arms.

"Gun owners support common-sense policies to keep illegal guns off our streets. This is not a Second Amendment issue; this is a crime issue," Mr. Bloomberg said yesterday during a coalition meeting in Washington. "The fact is, respecting the rights of gun owners while cracking down on illegal guns are completely compatible goals."

The mayors are asking lawmakers to allow the federal Bureau of Alcohol Tobacco Firearms and Explosives (ATF) to share gun registry information with city and state police forces. Conservative Republicans who oppose additional laws restricting gun purchases and ownership call the idea an undue intrusion on privacy rights.

An appropriations bill that passed in 2003 included an earmark amendment submitted by Rep. Todd Tiahrt, Kansas Republican, that limited the type of gun-tracing information that the ATF could share with police.

Some Republicans now are joining Democrats to support removal of that policy.

The mayors yesterday also announced the creation of a congressional task force that will study gun violence and recommend solutions to curb illegal gun sales.

The committee will include Reps. Charles B. Rangel, New York Democrat; John Conyers Jr., Michigan Democrat; Peter T. King, New York Republican; and Mark Steven Kirk, Illinois Republican.

"Death by illegal guns doesn't show any racial, partisan, political or religious grounds. It is a national problem that has to be addressed," Mr. King said.

Former Federal Agents Suing City, Charge Police Corruption (BVND)

By Mike Robinson

AP, January 24, 2007

CHICAGO - Chicago police retaliated with harsh reprisals against two government agents who blew the whistle on one of the city's most corrupt police officers ever, a federal court jury was told Tuesday.

Diane V. Klipfel and Michael V. Casali, a married couple who were agents with the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms, found their lives in ruins after they leveled corruption charges in 1992 at decorated narcotics investigator Joseph Miedzianowski, attorney Sally H. Saltzberg said.

"They went to enormous lengths to retaliate against Diane and Mike for their allegations," Saltzberg said during opening statements in the couple's civil lawsuit against the city.

Klipfel and Casali are seeking almost $10 million apiece in damages from the city, saying they were not only the targets of retaliation but the victims of a "blue wall of silence" designed to cover up corruption.

City of Chicago attorney Stephen Baker scoffed at the notion that the city had any responsibility for the problems that beset the couple.

He told jurors that police officials all but begged ATF for information about wrongdoing on the part of Miedzianowski. But it was the Chicago police who were met with silence, Baker said.

He noted that Klipfel had not only become involved in a controversy over Miedzianowski but allegations against superiors in her office.

Eventually, the "60 Minutes" television show produced a documentary about problems in the Chicago ATF office and an investigation was launched by the inspector general's office.

Klipfel and Casali have not been ATF agents since the late 1990s.

Saltzberg promised to shine a light on corruption and indifference at the police department. Among planned witnesses for the couple is Chicago Police Superintendent Phil Cline, who once supervised Miedzianowski.

Miedzianowski, who is also a defendant in the suit, was convicted in April 2001 of racketeering, narcotics conspiracy and firearms violations. He is serving a life sentence at a federal prison in California.

DOJ_NMG_0121068

Witnesses at his trial testified that Miedzianowski supplied street gang members with drugs, guns and ammunition when he was supposed to be investigating them.

Attorneys for Klipfel and Casali plan to show jurors a televised deposition given by the wayward former officer from his federal prison.

Saltzberg said that "Phil Cline knew Miedzianowski was a crook - it was hard to miss." She said that Cline filed several reports suggesting that Miedzianowski might have been involved in corruption.

But she said that he didn't follow up on them.

Meanwhile, police hit Klipfel with 129 allegations of corruption on her part and additional allegations against her husband, Saltzberg said.

Miedzianowski also threatened the couple with violence, bringing a gunman into their home and telling him to "kill them all," she said.

The gunman didn't follow Miedzianowski's order. But the fear of what might happen prompted the couple to send their children away repeatedly. They also made the children sleep in a closet in the center of the home and kept them away from the walls and windows at other times, Saltzberg said.

IMMIGRATION:

President Renews Push For Bill On Immigration (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, January 24, 2007

President Bush last night said his administration has made huge strides clamping down on illegal border crossings, and called on Congress to finish the job this year by passing a guest-worker bill and extending citizenship rights to illegal aliens.

In a State of the Union address designed to highlight areas where he could work with the new majority Democrats, Mr. Bush put immigration front and center, along with education, health care and energy policy -- all domestic issues where he thinks he can find common ground.

"Convictions run deep in this Capitol when it comes to immigration. Let us have a serious, civil and conclusive debate -- so that you can pass and I can sign comprehensive immigration reform," Mr. Bush said.

But the president's push will isolate many conservative Republicans who oppose his immigration and education plans, and shows the precarious balancing act Mr. Bush will have to do with his own party as he works with Democrats to try to achieve legacy accomplishments.

"These last two years will be the years that the president's trying to establish a legacy. Oh, how I wish there was a magnificent legacy already in place," said Rep. Steve King, Iowa Republican, who said the president is tearing their party apart over his immigration policy, which Mr. King called amnesty.

"You can hear the hammer drive the wedge right into the Republican Party," said Mr. King, a supporter of Mr. Bush's war on terror.

House Republicans last year blocked Mr. Bush from winning a guest-worker bill, instead sending him an enforcement bill that he signed.

Mr. Bush did not tread new ground on policy last night, instead repeating his demand for an immigration bill that tackles five issues: border security, interior enforcement, a new program for future foreign workers, a path to citizenship for current illegal aliens and a push to assimilate immigrants into society.

But his emphasis on border security was new, compared with his past three State of the Union addresses.

Mr. Bush promised to fulfill his pledge of doubling the size of the U.S. Border Patrol, and said, "We will enforce our immigration laws at the work site and give employers the tools to verify the legal status of their workers so there is no excuse left for violating the law."

Rep. Jeff Flake, Arizona Republican and a supporter of Mr. Bush's immigration stance, said it helps to have Mr. Bush continue to push the issue.

Tamar Jacoby, a senior fellow at the Manhattan Institute who acts as an informal adviser to the White House on the issue, said Mr. Bush knows he must convince Republicans who say they cannot work on a broad bill without first tackling border security.

"How does he do that? He speaks to the issue that's holding them up. That's the right thing to do," she said. "He has the belief that if he pushes too far, they're just going to push back. The main thing he can do is address some of their concerns and motivate them."

DOJ_NMG_0121069

Some of Mr. Bush's supporters then want the president to get into policy details, calling lawmakers to the White House and hammering out a compromise himself. Others say he should stay above the fray and instead focus on pressuring his own party.

"If he would do either, I would be thrilled," said Angela Kelley, deputy director of the National Immigration Forum. "So far he has made some terrific speeches about this issue, but yet, calling meetings, having press conferences, making phone calls, dispatching deputies to the Hill -- any of those steps are absolutely critical."

She said Mr. Bush has made a solid start, "but we're far from it being into the end zone."

For now, Mr. Bush's focus appears to be on convincing his own party he is serious about enforcement.

Southwest border apprehensions were down 26 percent from October through December 2006, compared with the same period in 2005. U.S. Border Patrol officials said that was a result of the president's decision last year to boost Border Patrol resources and deploy National Guard troops to help. Apprehensions of non-Mexican illegal aliens fell 58 percent.

Immigration authorities say fewer apprehensions means fewer individuals are trying to cross, though critics say it could mean illegal aliens are shifting to cross in less-well-patrolled places.

Mr. Bush also pointed to stepped-up work-site enforcement, saying the number of arrests last year was seven times the level in 2002.

But Mr. King said 1,000 illegal aliens still cross the border each day and more needs to be done. He said Mr. Bush should start by following through on building 700 miles of border fence and producing the report on operational control of the border that he agreed to in signing the fence bill.

Immigration Proposals Reverse Party Loyalties (WSJ)

By June Kronholz And Sarah Lueck

The Wall Street Journal, January 24, 2007

WASHINGTON -- President Bush's call for an overhaul of immigration law is largely a reprise of earlier plans, but with a twist: With his party out of power on Capitol Hill, it could pass.

Mr. Bush elevated immigration to one of four domestic-policy priorities in his State of the Union address, even while offering an agenda similar to last year's plan. He proposed a temporary-worker plan, a path to legalization for some of the estimated 12 million illegal immigrants, tougher border enforcement and measures to ensure employers hire only legal workers.

TERMS OF ENTRY

· The Issue: President Bush again is making immigration reform a top priority in his domestic agenda.

· Behind the Debate: Whether to provide temporary immigrant workers a path to citizenship is a key difference between Mr. Bush and congressional Democrats.

· What's Next: Democrats are likely to press for their own "comprehensive" legislation and rely on Mr. Bush to help round up enough Republican votes.

Democratic control of Congress clears one big obstacle: a Republican House leadership focused on a crackdown, in part by building a fence along 700 miles of the U.S.-Mexico border. Both houses are expected to take up bills that resemble Mr. Bush's plan.

Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D., Nev.) said his chamber could pass a bill by August. The House, which hasn't held hearings on the most contentious issues, will take longer, although Rep, Zoe Lofgren (D., Calif.), who heads the House immigration subcommittee, said "we can get somewhere."

Even so, immigration is such a volatile issue that passing a bill "is going to be a mountain to climb," said Frank Sharry of the National Immigration Forum, a coalition of pro-immigration business, labor and advocacy groups.

Mr. Bush and congressional Democrats agree on the outlines of a bill, but they are far apart on details. Both agree on helping employers fill jobs with temporary workers. Without that, they say, the U.S. economy will remain a magnet for illegals. But the president insists those workers must eventually leave, a key demand of conservatives who fear the growing Hispanic population is undermining American culture. Generally, Democrats want to let them stay and eventually become citizens.

The issue cuts across party lines, which will make compromise difficult. Business groups, which generally are friendlier to Republicans, say making workers go home would be disruptive to employers and create a permanent underclass with no loyalty to the U.S. Mr. Bush's insistence that workers go home "would be the death knell for bipartisan agreement," Mr. Sharry said.

Labor unions, which are generally supportive of Democrats and wield more clout after Democratic wins in the November elections, fear that temporary workers will drive down wages for U.S. workers.

Mr. Bush and congressional Democrats favor legalizing many of the illegals now in the U.S. A Senate bill last year proposed treating them differently depending on how long they have been in the U.S. That's seen as unworkable, even by House Democrats.

DOJ_NMG_0121070

Coming up with an alternative will be contentious. The president and pro-immigration Democrats fear that a plan that allows too many illegal immigrants to stay will be branded an amnesty by wary voters, while a plan that allows too few to stay won't work.

The White House wants illegal immigrants to pay a fine and back taxes, learn English and hold jobs for a number of years (as yet unspecified) before they could legalize. The approach is popular with Democrats.

Passage of a bill in either house will depend on the support of Republicans, however, many of whom complain those measures are a slap on the wrist.

The November elections have given a boost to supporters of immigration overhaul, which could help ease passage. Hispanic voters peeled away from Republicans, largely because of the party's hard-line stand on immigration, and both parties are eager to claim that growing voter bloc.

Employers want a bill that sets worker-verification guidelines and protects them from immigration raids. The administration stepped up enforcement last year, making thousands of arrests. That created a furor among employers who say they have no way to know if a worker is legal.

The issue cuts both ways. Democrats fear handing Mr. Bush a big legislative victory, but they hope he can deliver Republican votes. Still, lawmakers are hopeful. "This is one issue where there's a lot of overlap between the president's position and our position," said Rep. Howard Berman (D., Calif.). "What the president hasn't ever been willing to do is spend credits on it. I hope he has some left."

Southern California Immigration Raid Nets 761 Arrests (FINDLAW/AP)

By Gillian Flaccus, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 24, 2007

(AP) - SANTA ANA, California-Federal immigration officials said Tuesday they arrested more than 750 illegal immigrant fugitives from 14 countries in what they described as one of the biggest such sweeps in U.S. history.

The weeklong series of raids in the five-county Los Angeles region targeted illegal immigrants who had previously been deported for crimes or had ignored final deportation orders.

The raids netted 338 illegal immigrants who were arrested at their homes and apartments and 423 who were identified in area jails since Jan. 17. Those already jailed will be transferred to federal custody when they finish serving their state sentences, said Virginia Kice, spokeswoman for U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement.

The sweep netted illegal immigrants from Mexico, Honduras, Ukraine, India, Japan, Poland and Trinidad, among others. Of the 761 people arrested, more than 450 have already been deported, Kice said.

The raids were a major push within "Operation Return to Sender," a crackdown that has resulted in 13,192 arrests nationwide since late May. Immigration officials have also identified 3,000 inmates in state and local jails who will be deported.

The operation targets those illegal immigrants who hide after skipping their voluntary deportation proceedings and criminals who have re-entered the United States after being previously deported for crimes in the U.S.

Despite ongoing efforts, officials estimate that about 600,000 illegal immigrants who have ignored deportation orders are still at large, Kice said.

The Associated Press rode along for the first day of sweeps in Orange County last week.

Immigration officers gathered at 4 a.m. (1200 GMT) in a chilly parking lot for a pep talk, then fanned out to houses in Anaheim and Santa Ana.

At the first stop, an apartment complex, a half-dozen agents arrested a 29-year-old illegal immigrant wanted for a DUI conviction. Kice said that man is now helping them find his brother, who is a registered sex offender and immigration fugitive.

At the second stop, the agents were looking for a convicted rapist and immigration fugitive. Instead, they arrested six men who could not provide legal papers - and later learned that all six were illegal and four had criminal records.

The rapist they sought had moved out the week before, Kice said. Officials are still searching for him.

TAX:

Back Taxes Sought From Closed Center (BUFFNEWS)

Buffalo News, January 24, 2007

In an attempt to recoup back taxes from the closed St. Augustine Center, the Tax Division of the U.S. Justice Department has filed a federal suit seeking to block state court action in the case.

DOJ_NMG_0121071

The Tax Division served papers Friday on State Supreme Court Justice John A. Michalek, who shut down the center last February, and Adam W. Perry, the attorney he assigned to close the books on the center and pay off unpaid workers.

U.S. District Judge John T. Elfvin has scheduled a hearing on the suit for Wednesday.

Perry noted this is the third time in recent months that the Justice Department has sought to intervene in the state court action, in which he is seeking to partially compensate 85 employees, each now entitled to about $1,500, for their work during the final months.

The Justice Department lawsuit describes the court action as an effort to block Perry from distributing any funds collected for St. Augustine employees and "enjoin the New York State Supreme Court, Erie County, from proceeding further in the receivership action."

The federal government hopes to secure at least partial funding of the $699,553 in unpaid federal employment taxes, federal income tax liabilities and interest that continue to accumulate against the center.

Three weeks ago, Elfvin quashed an Internal Revenue Service effort to have the entire tax dispute handled in federal court. And last week, Michalek refused to permit the IRS to intervene in the state case.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush Unveils Health Plan Tied To Tax Deduction (USAT)

By Julie Appleby

USA Today, January 24, 2007

President's Bush's State of the Union health care proposal couples an old idea, capping tax-free benefits for health care, with a new one: a standard deduction for all who buy health insurance.

If approved, and the plan faces a chilly reception in the Democrat-controlled Congress, the administration says it would give people who buy their own health insurance equal tax breaks with those who get coverage through their jobs. The tax savings could help 3 million to 5 million of the nearly 47 million now-uninsured people buy coverage, the administration says.

For the rest, the president proposes moving some money that currently goes to hospitals and nursing homes into subsidies to help lower-income people buy health insurance through state-sponsored insurance programs.

Opponents, such as liberal advocacy group Families USA, says the proposal mainly benefits wealthier Americans. Others say it could lead some employers to drop insurance, forcing workers onto the individual market, where some may not be able to afford coverage.

A similar plan to cap tax-free health benefits offered by employers was proposed by President Reagan in 1986 but failed to pass Congress.

Rep. Pete Stark, D-Calif., chairman of a key health subcommittee in the House, said he would not even consider hearings on the proposal. He says it would give wealthier Americans with health insurance a far larger tax break than the lower-income uninsured that the plan purportedly aims to help.

The White House outlined some elements of the plan:

·Health insurance offered through jobs would become taxable income. But insured workers' taxable income would be reduced by a deduction of $15,000 for a family plan or $7,500 for an individual. Currently, the average family health plan offered by employers costs $11,500 for families and $4,300 for singles, a Kaiser Family Foundation survey says. Only people with insurance worth more than the deduction would pay more tax.

·People who buy their own insurance would get the same deductions: $15,000 for families, $7,500 for singles, lowering their taxable income by that amount — even if their health plans did not cost that much. Currently, only the self-employed who buy their own insurance get a tax deduction.

·The administration says more than 100 million workers — out of about 175 million — who now get their insurance through their jobs would see their tax bills go down.

"For a lot of people, it would be a bonanza," says Joe Antos of American Enterprise Institute. He and other supporters of the plan say it would encourage employers to offer less-generous insurance plans. They say generous plans drive up the cost of health care.

Paul Fronstin of the Employee Benefit Research Institute says the proposal might lead more employers to drop coverage. Some employers might also find that younger, healthier workers would opt out of company plans to buy their own insurance, leaving sicker, more expensive workers behind, he says.

Bush's Insurance Plan Looks DOA (RC)

By John Stanton

Roll Call, January 24, 2007

President Bush's call for a major overhaul of the employer-based health insurance system is unlikely to see much, if any, action in the Senate this year in the face of near-universal opposition from Democrats and a GOP base still stinging from the Social Security debacle in the 109th Congress.

Bush was expected to make the proposal a central aspect of the domestic policy section of his State of the Union address. The plan would create a new tax on individuals who have insurance through their work if the value of their coverage exceeded $15,000 a year. Those taxes would be used to help subsidize coverage for low-income citizens.

Senate Democrats have largely dismissed the proposal, charging it will cause a significant tax burden on middle-class families.

Senate Health, Education, Labor and Pensions Chairman Edward Kennedy (D-Mass.) said that while he is pleased the Bush administration is considering some sort of insurance overhaul, the president's plan is inadequate.

"The President's proposals are an opportunity missed. They will not improve access to good coverage, and won't help working families afford the spiraling cost of health care," Kennedy said in a statement.

Sen. Ron Wyden (D-Ore.), a longtime proponent of reforming the tax code's health insurance provisions, said he opposes Bush's plan. "I'm especially troubled by the example of a couple who makes $50-$55,000 a year, with a youngster who has big medical bills," Wyden said. "They'll pay hundreds of dollars in new taxes."

Presidential hopeful Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.) said he would not support the plan. "It's not going to be adequate," Obama said, arguing it does not do enough to cover a number of problems with the current insurance system.

A Democratic leadership aide argued that with Democrats strongly opposed to the proposal it is unlikely GOP leaders will have the muscle necessary to force Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) to take up the issue.

Republicans could attempt to attach it to stem-cell research — the only major health care bill scheduled for consideration in the near future — but the Democratic aide said Republicans would have difficulty drumming up the 60 votes needed to do so.

"They don't have the votes. It's not going to come up," the aide said.

A senior GOP leadership aide acknowledged that the insurance reforms would likely not get a serious look in the Senate.

However, the aide said Minority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) could take a page from last year's Democratic playbook and use the issue to try to paint Democrats as protecting upper-middle-class citizens at the expense of the poor. "It gives us something to talk about," the aide said.

Democrats warned that should the GOP make a political push over the issue, they have begun laying the groundwork to use arguments similar to those Reid employed in 2005 to block Bush's Social Security plan.

For instance, one leadership aide pointed out that since word of the proposal began to leak late last week, Democrats have been successful in portraying the plan as a tax increase on the middle class and that by framing the debate in such a way, Republicans would be forced into the position of having to defend the proposal.

Similarly, a second Democratic aide said the plan's roots in the world of conservative think tanks and the seemingly arbitrary use of the $15,000 threshold will make it easy to paint as "this year's Social Security privatization. Drop it in the dumb file."

Bush Revives Some Past Proposals And Offers A New Initiative On Health Insurance (NYT)

By Robin Toner And Robert Pear

New York Times, January 24, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 23 — President Bush delivered a domestic agenda to Congressional Democrats on Tuesday that was, in large part, modest and a reiteration of past proposals. Where he did break ground — on health care — his initiative was quickly dismissed by leading Democrats and seemed unlikely to form the basis of bipartisan action.

There were some notable omissions in Mr. Bush's speech. He did not offer a new proposal for dealing with the long-term financial problems in Medicare and Social Security, although he again identified those entitlement programs as a challenge that must be confronted. Nor did he make the grand gesture that might have spurred Congressional Democrats into the bipartisan talks on entitlements that administration officials insist they want.

Mr. Bush renewed his call for an overhaul of immigration laws, considered one of his best chances to accomplish something big in the current Congress. But in general, his domestic agenda reflected the political constraints of a conservative second-term president facing a newly empowered Democratic-led Congress.

Aside from energy, the major focus of Mr. Bush's domestic proposals was an effort to expand access to affordable health insurance, by creating a new tax benefit for those buying insurance on their own rather than through their employer. The new benefit would be part of a sweeping change in the tax code under which employer-provided health insurance, which is how more than half of Americans get their coverage, would be treated as taxable income. For decades, those benefits have been exempt from income and payroll taxes.

DOJ_NMG_0121073

In effect, the president is proposing a new standard deduction for health insurance — $15,000 for families and $7,500 for individuals. That would mean lower taxes for more than 100 million Americans with employer-provided coverage worth less than the standard deduction, Mr. Bush said. But it would raise taxes for about 30 million people with more expensive plans, unless they switched to less costly alternatives, White House officials said.

Mr. Bush said the tax proposal was an effort to "level the playing field" between Americans buying insurance on their own and those who get it through their employers. "For the millions of other Americans who have no health insurance at all, this deduction would help put a basic private health insurance plan within their reach," he said. "Changing the tax code is a vital and necessary step to making health care affordable for more Americans."

Democrats, labor unions and some consumer advocates said the proposal would shake the foundations of the nation's health insurance system, still largely built around the workplace.

Congressional Democrats described the plan as a middle-class tax increase that would penalize people with good health benefits. They praised the new focus on health care, but said the Bush proposal was more likely to yield partisan debate than a search for consensus.

"It's difficult to imagine a proposal like this making it through the House or the Senate," said a spokesman for Senator Harry Reid of Nevada, the Democratic leader.

Representative Charles B. Rangel, Democrat of New York and chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, said, "I cannot conceive of this as an olive branch, as an attempt to get something done."

Representative Pete Stark, Democrat of California and chairman of the Ways and Means Subcommittee on Health, said his panel would not consider Mr. Bush's proposal.

Prospects were less grim for immigration legislation. Mr. Bush renewed his push for a law that would toughen border security, grant legal status to the nation's illegal immigrants and create a temporary worker program to ensure a steady flow of foreign workers to businesses.

The proposal, which would also toughen criminal and financial penalties for employers who hire illegal immigrants, has a much stronger chance of passage in a Democratic-led Congress this year than it did when Republicans were in control, lawmakers of both parties say.

Leading Democrats in the Senate, who have consulted with Mr. Bush in recent weeks, expect to introduce legislation next month. House Democrats expect to follow.

But passage is far from assured. The A.F.L-C.I.O, which is expected to have more leverage in this Congress, is determined to scuttle the temporary worker program, saying it threatens to replace American workers with foreigners. Administration officials emphasized on Tuesday that the program would have to be "truly temporary," which left some advocates for immigrants concerned that Mr. Bush might oppose a path to permanent residency or citizenship for temporary workers.

And some moderate Democrats, along with conservative Republicans, strongly oppose proposals that would legalize illegal immigrants, saying they amount to an amnesty for lawbreakers.

Still, critics and proponents of the legislation alike agree that this year offers Mr. Bush his best opportunity to build a bipartisan consensus on the issue. His focus on the need for immigrants to assimilate — by learning English and integrating more deeply into American society — may be intended to help ease concerns among some of his Republican supporters and some moderate Democrats.

Mr. Bush also returned to the signature bipartisan accomplishment of his first term, the No Child Left Behind legislation that requires schools to demonstrate yearly progress in students' achievements. He urged Congress to renew the law.

'We Must Not Fail In Iraq' (WT)

By Joseph Curl,

The Washington Times, January 24, 2007

President Bush pleaded with Congress last night to give his new strategy for victory in the struggle in Iraq a chance because "America must not fail in Iraq."

Defeat in Iraq, he said, would be "grievous and far-reaching" because the fighting in Iraq is part of a broader struggle against Islamic extremists across the Middle East and stretching to the farther reaches of the globe.

He proposed wide-ranging domestic goals in his 50-minute State of the Union address, proposing to balance the budget with no new taxes over the next five years, slash gasoline consumption by 20 percent over the next 10 years, double the Strategic Petroleum Reserve to 1.5 billion barrels of oil over the next 20 years, offer tax benefits for Americans who buy their own health insurance, create a "temporary worker program" as the first step in comprehensive immigration reform and "remain a clear voice for freedom" in Cuba, Belarus and Burma.

DOJ_NMG_0121074

The domestic goals were relatively modest, but the president was at his most impassioned in arguing that the war in Iraq must not be abandoned.

America faces "a generational struggle that will continue long after you and I have turned our duties over to others," he said. "That is why it is important to work together so our nation can see this great effort through.

"For all of us in this room, there is no higher responsibility than to protect the people of this country from danger. ... To win the war on terror, we must take the fight to the enemy. Both parties and both branches should work in close consultation."

Democrats, who now control both the House and the Senate, sat quietly as Republicans stood in a raucous ovation when the president declared "nothing is more important at this moment in our history than for America ... to succeed in Iraq." Vice President Dick Cheney often stood to applaud as House Speaker Nancy Pelosi remained seated, unsmiling.

Mr. Bush avoided a focus on major initiatives on contentious matters that divide the two parties, as he did in 2005, for example, when he made major Social Security reform a central theme of his speech, only to see it fail.

He focused instead on Democrat-friendly issues, calling on Congress to enact immigration reform this year, set up new health care tax breaks by 2009, increase the military by nearly 100,000 members in the next five years, double the Strategic Petroleum Reserve by 2027 and cut congressional earmarks in half in the next fiscal year.

As he did two weeks ago, the president said the only way to secure the war-torn country is to send in thousands of additional troops.

"Our military commanders and I have carefully weighed the options. We discussed every possible approach. In the end, I chose this course of action because it provides the best chance of success. Many in this chamber understand that America must not fail in Iraq -- because you understand that the consequences of failure would be grievous and far-reaching," he said.

Democrats, many of whom support resolutions of opposition to the president's plan, quickly repeated their opposition in the wake of the speech.

"The president took us into this war recklessly," said Sen. James H. Webb of Virginia, who has been in office less than a month, who delivered the Democratic response. "The majority of the nation no longer supports the way this war is being fought; nor does the majority of our military. We need a new direction," including "strong regionally based diplomacy" and "a formula that will in short order allow our combat forces to leave Iraq."

The president urged Congress to unite in the struggle against international terrorism as Americans did in the days after the September 11 terrorist attacks.

"We went into this largely united -- in our assumptions and in our convictions. And whatever you voted for, you did not vote for failure. Our country is pursuing a new strategy in Iraq, and I ask you to give it a chance to work," Mr. Bush said. "And I ask you to support our troops in the field, and those on their way."

Mr. Bush acknowledged that terrorists have made inroads across the Middle East and said sectarian violence and insurgents have outstripped American forces in Iraq.

"This is not the fight we entered in Iraq, but it is the fight we are in. Every one of us wishes this war were over and won, yet it would not be like us to leave our promises unkept, our friends abandoned, and our own security at risk."

He said the United States cannot withdraw.

"If American forces step back before Baghdad is secure, the Iraqi government would be overrun by extremists on all sides. ... For America, this is a nightmare scenario. On this day, at this hour, it is still within our power to shape the outcome of this battle. So let us find our resolve, and turn events toward victory."

Mr. Bush sought at several points to soothe harsh partisan feelings, opening his address by noting the ascendancy of House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, the first woman to head either chamber of Congress.

It was "high privilege and distinct honor," he said, echoing Mrs. Pelosi's words introducing him, to be the first president ever to start the address by thanking "Madame Speaker." As the gathered lawmakers and officials gave a standing ovation, Mr. Bush turned from his lectern and shook Mrs. Pelosi's hand.

At that moment, Rep. Stephanie Tubbs Jones, Ohio Democrat, flexed her arms in the boxer's stance, as Mrs. Pelosi did at her swearing-in week.

After a rare round of bipartisan applause, Mr. Bush reached out to Democrats, challenging the new majority to work with Republicans to get things done.

"Congress has changed, but our responsibilities have not," the president said. "We are not the first to come here with government divided and uncertainty in the air. Like many before us, we can work through our differences and achieve big things for the American people."

DOJ_NMG_0121075

Despite growing rancor between the two parties -- Mrs. Pelosi last week accused the president of swiftly enacting his "surge" plan to prevent opponents on Capitol Hill from blocking the strategy, words the White House labeled "poisonous" -- Mr. Bush said that "both parties and both branches should work in close consultation."

"Our citizens don't much care which side of the aisle we sit on -- as long as we are willing to cross that aisle when there is work to be done," he said.

Mr. Bush urged the congressmen to increase funding for his signature No Child Left Behind Act and reconsider school vouchers, urging Congress to give "families with children stuck in failing schools the right to choose some place better."

He repeated his rejection of new taxes, touted the booming economy -- in its 41st straight month of job growth, he noted -- and vowed to erase the federal deficit within five years.

Mr. Bush won far more applause from Democrats than from Republicans when he called for a "comprehensive" immigration bill and when he called for action to combat global warming. The entire Democratic side of the room stood for both, while many Republicans remained sitting and some of them shook their heads in seeming dismay.

Cameras in the chamber cut away to Rep. Tom Tancredo, the Colorado Republican who leads the House immigration caucus. Mr. Tancredo shook his head "no."

The biggest applause line of the night for Mr. Bush among Republicans was his call for an up-or-down vote in the Senate on his judicial nominees. But on the Democratic side just two stood -- Sens. Ben Nelson of Nebraska and Joe Lieberman of Connecticut, an independent who caucuses with the Democrats.

Mr. Bush made only a brief undetailed call for reform of Social Security, Medicare and Medicaid. "Somehow we have not found it in ourselves to act," he said. "So let us work together and do it now."

One Republican-friendly feature of previous State of the Union addresses was notably absent. Mr. Bush made no mention of efforts to amend the Constitution against homosexual "marriage" by defining the union as joining a man and a woman.

In keeping the tradition, one Cabinet member -- last night it was Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales -- did not attend the speech in case of a major attack on the Capitol.

The White House sought to highlight the president's energy initiative, holding an afternoon briefing for reporters featuring senior administration officials and lifting the usual embargo on specific proposals in the address. "It is in our vital interest to diversify America's energy supply, and the way forward is through technology," he said.

According to the president's proposal, Americans could cut gasoline consumption by 20 percent within 10 years by sharply increasing the amount of ethanol and other alternative fuels that the government mandates must be blended into the fuel supply.

Under current law, fuel blenders must use 7.5 billion gallons of renewable fuel annually by 2012; Mr. Bush wants to increase that to 35 billion gallons by 2017, which would achieve a 15 percent cut. The president's plan also calls for raising the fuel economy standards for passenger cars, a plan that Mr. Bush has proposed in the past but failed to win from Congress. Doing so would reduce annual gasoline consumption by 8.5 billion gallons, a further 5 percent reduction.

"Achieving these ambitious goals will dramatically reduce our dependence on foreign oil, but not eliminate it," he said.

Mr. Bush, who last year declared in his State of the Union that Americans are "addicted to oil," again urged lawmakers to move forward to reduce U.S. reliance on foreign petroleum.

Another major initiative in Mr. Bush's speech called for tax breaks for employer-financed health care benefits, analogous to the current child allowance. Instead of paying for health insurance with wages that already had been taxed, persons could pay for a significant part of their health insurance -- $15,000 per family and $7,500 for individuals -- with pre-tax dollars.

The White House said 80 percent of workers with health insurance through their jobs would see a tax cut as a result of the change. Still, analysts say some 20 percent could see a tax increase, including those workers whose health insurance cost more than the standard deduction.

As evidence of the partisanship in the House, Rep. Pete Stark, California Democrat and chairman of the Ways and Means health subcommittee, said he would not even consider holding hearings on the plan.

Other proposals in Mr. Bush's speech included a call for "new resources" to expand the No Child Left Behind education act, which requires testing in elementary and middle schools to make sure students are learning. The president wants to expand the program and is seeking to give poor students the right to private-school vouchers.

The administration's proposal calls for giving vouchers to students in schools that repeatedly fail to meet standards set by the federal law, but Democrats blocked that idea when the bill was drafted five years ago.

Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, Massachusetts Democrat and new chairman of the Senate committee overseeing education, said again yesterday that he would work to keep vouchers out of the education law.

·Stephen Dinan contributed to this report.

Bush's Focus On Health Care Draws Criticism, New Hope (WSJ)

By Laura Meckler

The Wall Street Journal, January 24, 2007

President Bush's new focus on shrinking the ranks of the uninsured is appealing to Democrats and others who have long hoped for a renewed debate over how to extend health insurance – but Mr. Bush's specific plans still face criticism.

"While the administration's current proposal is deeply flawed, the attention that the president is devoting to the issue could signal real progress in addressing the health-care crisis," said Sen. Edward Kennedy (D., Mass), who has worked many years on health issues.

STATE OF THE UNION

See excerpts1 from the speech, and a transcript2 of a White House briefing on the president's proposals.

Fact sheets, provided by the White House ahead of the address. (Full text PDF3) · Overview Fact Sheet: The 2007 State Of The Union Address4

· ENERGY: Twenty In Ten: Strengthening America's Energy Security5
· HEALTH CARE: Affordable, Accessible, And Flexible Health Coverage6
· NO CHILD LEFT BEHIND: Building On Results: A Blueprint For Strengthening NCLB 7
· IMMIGRATION: Bush's Plan For Comprehensive Immigration Reform8
· HIV/AIDS: Leading The Worldwide Fight Against HIV/AIDS9
· MALARIA: The President's Malaria Initiative Is Saving Lives10
· STRENGTHENING OUR MILITARY: Strengthening Our Military11
· SPENDING REFORMS: Reforms To Spend Tax Dollars Wisely12

Mr. Bush's proposal would change how the tax break for health insurance is calculated. Critics said that approach would do little to reduce the ranks of the uninsured and could undermine the employer-based insurance system by shifting many Americans from stable employer-based insurance, where the risk is spread over an entire work force, into the unstable individual insurance market, where people are evaluated and charged based on their individual health and projected expenses.

If workers can get the same tax break for buying insurance on their own as they would get if they got insurance through work, employers may be tempted to drop insurance plans altogether. That could spell trouble for less-healthy workers who would likely pay higher premiums than they would if they were part of a group plan, critics say. "In the individual insurance market, people will be denied coverage because of family history, existing illnesses, or genetic makeup," predicted Rep. Pete Stark (D., Calif.), chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee's health subcommittee.

Critics also argue it would also do little to help those without insurance now. Most of the uninsured have relatively low incomes, meaning the new tax deduction for purchasing insurance on the open market is less valuable for them than for those who earn more. "Since most uninsured Americans pay low or no taxes, they would receive little help from this plan," said the Center for American Progress Action Fund.

Mr. Bush's second proposal would divert dollars that now support hospitals that care for the poor into state-created programs that subsidized basic insurance plans. That, too, came in for criticism and will surely be fought by the hospitals who rely on the existing programs. "The president's proposal pulls the rug out from under safety net hospitals that care for some of our nation's most vulnerable people," the American Hospital Association said.

Bush Wants Tax Code Changes To Spread Health Care (CHIT)

By Judith Graham

Chicago Tribune, January 24, 2007

On Tuesday, President Bush used his bully pulpit to argue that the nation should be doing much more to cover the uninsured.

"A future of hope and opportunity requires that all our citizens have affordable and available health care," he told Congress, which responded with hearty applause. It's a new message from the White House. And it's likely to have resonance as a reinvigorated debate on health reform gathers steam in Washington and the states.

"I think the president is jump-starting a national discussion over expanding health-care coverage," said Karen Ignagni, president of America's Health Insurance Plans.

The president's most important contribution is his focus on changing what health economists call "perverse incentives" in the tax code.

Currently, payroll and income taxes are waived for health insurance, unlike other forms of compensation. But only workers insured through their employers get these tax breaks.

Also, companies that spend more on health insurance get bigger tax breaks. As a result, "overly generous" policies that encourage "over-use of medical services" are common, said Michael Cannon, health policy director at the Cato Institute.

DOJ_NMG_0121077

The president would change the incentives built into the tax code in three ways.

First, he'd eliminate the tax breaks for health insurance and treat it like any other form of compensation. That would make consumers more sensitive to costs, his advisers said.

Second, the president would create a tax deduction for health insurance, similar to the existing deduction for having a child. Families would get a deduction of $15,000 beginning in 2009; individuals would could deduct $7,500. Annual increases would be tied to inflation.

Consumers would get the full value of the deduction, no matter how much they actually spent. Spending in excess of the deduction's amount would be taxed as ordinary compensation. Over a 10-year period, the extra taxes would pay for the broader deductions.

About 30 million people who currently get health insurance through employers would end up paying these new taxes if they keep current coverage arrangements, according to the administration. Another 120 million workers with employer-based policies would not be affected; most would enjoy some extra tax advantages.

Third, Bush would make the deduction available to everyone, wherever they purchase health insurance.

Paul Fronstin, director of health research at the Employee Benefit Research Institute, envisions a series of serious consequences. More employers would stop offering health insurance and younger and healthier workers would opt out of company plans if they could get better deals elsewhere.

"This would be the end of employer-based health insurance as we know it," Fronstin said.

Robert Reischauer, president of the Urban Institute, worries that the president's plan would push more people into the individual insurance market, which is notorious for being expensive and excluding people with pre-existing medical conditions. "It's a jungle, and that's on a good day," he said.

Sherry Glied, chair of the health policy department at Columbia University's Mailman School of Public Health, predicts that the president's proposal would have a "minimal" impact on the number of people without insurance. The vast majority of the uninsured pay minimal or no taxes, making a deduction of little value to them, she said.

The administration estimates 3 million of 47 million people with no insurance would gain coverage under its plans. States would also get more funds, redirected from other programs, to pay for new coverage for the uninsured.

Bipartisan Cooperation On Health Care Is Dead On Arrival (WP)

By Steven Pearlstein

Washington Post, January 24, 2007

When it comes to domestic economic policy, Bush the Wounded President is much to be preferred over Bush the Decider.

After six years of stubborn inflexibility, President Bush signaled last night in his State of the Union address that he is ready to come to the negotiating table on a range of domestic issues, holding some new and credible ideas that are consistent with his conservative philosophy but open to ideas that aren't.

Yes, it is possible it could be a bluff, a desperate and hollow attempt by an unpopular president to demonstrate that he's still relevant to the policy process. But whether it is or not, the right response for Democrats is to call that bluff, treating it as the jumping-off point for a much-delayed dialogue on domestic policy and seeing how his proposals can be transformed into something better.

Think about it. Here's an oil-man president who, having denied the existence of global warming for almost a decade and embraced increased drilling as the favored energy policy, is now willing to lead the charge for alternative fuels, raise automobile mileage standards and begin a conversation on what to do about global warming.

No, he's not yet come around to a modest carbon tax and cap-and-trade system for CO2 emissions, but now that corporate types have begun to accept the idea, is there any doubt where this all is headed?

This is also an administration that started out arguing that federal budget deficits don't matter and that even the teensiest, tiniest tax increase will destroy the economy. Now he's eager to be seen as a budget-balancer who is open to higher taxes as part of a financial rescue for Social Security and knows he'll have to sacrifice some of his tax cuts to save others.

And here is a president willing to take on members of his own party to celebrate the accomplishment of hard-working Hispanic immigrants, normally the kind of people Democrats like to champion, and give them a path to citizenship.

But the most surprising and encouraging development is that a president who for six years has only nibbled around the edges of health-care issues has weighed in with some bold ideas to expand coverage, rein in costs and bring some fairness to the tax code. And get this: It actually involves raising taxes on the rich and lavishly insured and giving the money to the working poor and the uninsured.

Given that, you'd think Democrats would have welcomed a politically courageous proposal to put a cap on one of the biggest and most regressive features of the individual income-tax code. But instead, they've shifted reflexively into partisan attack mode, mischaracterizing the impacts of the proposal and shamelessly parroting the propaganda from the labor dinosaurs at the AFL-CIO.

DOJ_NMG_0121078

"Dead on arrival," declared Rep. Pete Stark (D-Calif.), chairman of a key health subcommittee in the House, hinting at a dark conspiracy to kill off employer-sponsored health insurance.

"A dangerous policy that ultimately shifts cost and risk from employers to employees," said Charlie Rangel, chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee.

Sen. Harry Reid, the majority leader, called it nothing less than an "attack" on American workers.

Worst of all was the five-page memo distributed by Sen. Edward Kennedy to Democratic colleagues that ought to embarrass a man who considers himself the Senate's leading health-care expert -- a compendium of half-truths, unsupported assumptions and outright lies. Kennedy reverted to the hackneyed rhetoric of class warfare, asserting that the president's proposals will do nothing for working families, give new tax breaks to the rich, increase the number of uninsured and encourage everyone to buy less insurance coverage than they should have.

In fact, all of these are almost precisely the opposite of the truth.

The president's health plan would, in fact, put a cap on a $200 billion-a-year tax break that now goes disproportionately to those with the most generous and costly employer-provided health insurance plans. It would redirect a small portion of that break to those who have less generous coverage or those who have to buy their own insurance because their employer does not offer it. For a few million of the roughly 47 million Americans with no insurance, it may also make the difference between being able to afford basic insurance or not.

The fact that some of those who have these rich policies happen to be members of auto or postal unions doesn't change that the president's proposal would make the tax code more progressive, not less. They are the aristocrats of the working class who, like lawyers, investment bankers and journalists, earn more in tax-free benefits each year than uninsured janitors earn in taxable wages. And whatever modest tax increase they might face from the cap on tax-free health benefits, it is certainly less than the tax cuts they got from Bush that Democrats are so eager to rescind.

Almost every health economist agrees that the tax subsidy for employer-paid health insurance is not only unfair but that it also encourages people to buy too much insurance, consume too much health care and pay too much for both. Bush deserves praise for having the political courage to confront the issue.

Now is this the magic bullet that will solve the health-care crisis? Of course not.

Would any real solution also require finding billions of dollars more to subsidize the purchase of health insurance by low-income workers and getting states to reform dysfunctional markets for individual and small group insurance? No doubt about it.

But anyone seriously interested in health reform would welcome the president's proposal as a basis for negotiations, raising public expectations and increasing pressure on the president to embrace more comprehensive reform. Unfortunately, that is not the approach of Messrs. Stark, Rangel, Reid and Kennedy, who apparently prefer demonizing the president and grandstanding on the issue until the next election.

Haven't we had enough of this?

The Knee-Jerk Opposition (WP)

By Ruth Marcus

The Washington Post, January 24, 2007

If George W. Bush proposes something, it must be bad. Such is the knee-jerk state of partisan suspiciousness that when the president actually endorses a tax increase -- a tax increase that would primarily hit the well-off, no less -- Democrats still howl.

Such is the level of distrust that when the president finally disavows the free lunch and comes up with a program not financed with deficit spending -- indeed, one that would actually bring in extra revenue as the years go on -- Democrats still howl.

Listening to Democratic reaction to Bush's new health insurance proposal, you get the sense that if Bush picked a plank right out of the Democratic platform -- if he introduced Hillarycare itself -- and stuck it in his State of the Union address, Democrats would churn out press releases denouncing it.

This sad situation is largely of Bush's own making. He is reaping the poisonous state of affairs that he helped sow for six years. So many of the president's policies have been dishonest and wrongheaded, so much of his politics has been slashingly partisan, Democrats would be crazy if their instinctive reaction to a Bush plan for fill-in-the-blank wasn't intense distrust.

It's too bad, because the president's proposal to cap the deductibility of employer-sponsored health insurance deserves more of a chance than Democrats, from their initial reactions, seem inclined to give.

DOJ_NMG_0121079

Instead of the irrational current system, in which all employer-sponsored health-care costs are deductible, Bush would create a standard deduction that would replace existing deductions for health insurance, both employer-sponsored and privately purchased, and other medical costs.

The deduction would be $15,000 for a family policy, leaving 80 percent of those with employer-sponsored coverage unaffected.

Yes, the plan should be more progressive, structured with refundable tax credits rather than a deduction, so that all can share equally in the benefit.

Yes, there are big risks involved, primarily that the already-teetering employer-based system will collapse as healthy individuals use their tax deduction to buy cheaper, private insurance, leaving employers with the older and the sicker.

And, yes, it's fair to argue that a more comprehensive approach -- Sen. Ron Wyden (D-Ore.) has proposed one -- is needed.

But Democrats -- if they care more about addressing health-care needs than scoring political points -- ought to be finding ways to improve and build on the Bush proposal, not condemning and mischaracterizing it. Given that nothing's going to pass without Democratic approval, what's the risk in engaging in the discussion?

The Bush plan starts with an assessment that has long been clear to sensible people across the political spectrum: The way the tax code now treats health insurance is unfair, regressive and counterproductive.

The fact that employers can deduct the full cost of health insurance premiums means that the richer you are, the bigger tax benefit you reap. That built-in advantage is exacerbated by the fact that the better-paid tend to have pricier insurance.

This unlimited subsidy increases wasteful spending, encouraging employers to purchase gold-plated plans and employees to use them. This drives up the cost of health care and, ultimately, insurance in a vicious cycle that ends up increasing the ranks of the uninsured.

Meanwhile, those who don't have employer-sponsored coverage get no tax break; the Bush plan would not only help those who already buy insurance on the private market, it would also encourage those currently uninsured to purchase coverage.

As Jason Furman, a leading Democratic economist, wrote last summer in Democracy: A Journal of Ideas, "[R]educing subsidies for pricey plans would likely lead to a health insurance system that includes more cost sharing, promotes more consumer consciousness, and plays a modest, but potentially meaningful, role in restraining health spending."

And so what do Democrats say when a Republican president suggests doing something along these lines? "It's a bad policy," House Ways and Means Committee Chairman Charles Rangel (N.Y.) told the New York Times. "We are trying to bring tax relief to the middle class. The president is trying to increase their tax liability." Likewise, the Senate Democrats complained: "President Bush's Health Insurance Proposal Amounts to a Tax Hike for the Middle Class."

This is flat wrong: According to the administration's analysis, on average, the top fifth of taxpayers would face a tax increase; the rest would save money.

If you doubt that some variation on Bush's plan is at least worth considering, try this thought experiment: What if the current system had the standard deduction that Bush wants and he was proposing, instead, to remove the cap and allow unlimited tax breaks, a benefit for the better-off and those with the priciest insurance?

Wouldn't Democrats be denouncing that, and demanding my imaginary status quo?

Health And Taxes (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, January 24, 2007

Now we're getting somewhere. The U.S. has long needed a debate over health care and tax subsidies, and President Bush got ready to rumble last night with his proposal to make insurance more affordable for most Americans.

For all the griping about our system, Americans have the most advanced health care in the world in part because we still have something resembling a private market for insurance. But it is not a truly efficient market because current tax policy lets businesses -- but not individuals -- deduct the cost of health expenditures. Thus most Americans with private insurance get it from their employers, which leads to inequities and insulates individuals from the real cost of their treatment decisions.

Mr. Bush's "standard deduction" for health care would move in the direction of solving both problems. Instead of giving employers an unlimited deduction and individuals none, Mr. Bush would give every family a $15,000 deduction ($7,500 for individuals) regardless of their insurance source.

That might mean a slight tax increase for those who currently have the most expensive insurance plans. But the average employer-sponsored family plan runs about $11,500 annually, and about 80% of the 160 million employer-insured Americans would benefit. All Americans with employer-sponsored insurance would have to report the value of their health benefit as income, but they could deduct the full $15,000 no matter how much their insurance cost.

DOJ_NMG_0121080

The 17 million Americans who buy their own coverage would be big winners. And because the tax deduction would apply to payroll as well as income taxes, the benefits would be large even for low-income earners. So a family making $60,000 would wind up with a tax savings of $4,500, which would offset the cost of acquiring coverage in many states. Meanwhile, a young person making $40,000 could buy a high-deductible plan for, say, $1,000 and actually get a tax break of $2,250 for doing so. The Treasury estimates the new deduction would add at least five million Americans to the ranks of the insured, but our guess is that would be higher given the incentives all of this would provide for new private insurance products.

Individuals who buy their own health insurance now struggle because there are so few of them and they can buy only in a single state market. That means insurers have little incentive to develop and market innovative products. But this will change if the equalized tax treatment convinces enough people that it makes more sense to have their own, portable policies than take whatever their boss offers. Imagine the same kind of capitalist energy devoted to selling health insurance as you now see selling where to roll over your 401(k).

These new products are also likely to be policies that put individuals directly in charge of more routine spending. That's because removing the tax advantage would mean it will make less financial sense to "insure" for predictable expenses like several annual office visits. That in turn could put pressure on health care providers to post -- and actually compete on -- prices. Such new price awareness might even generate pressure for states that overregulate their insurance markets (New York, Massachusetts) to ease their costly mandates.

It's true that additional subsidies might be needed for some people with chronic illnesses who might have a harder time finding private insurance in this kind of world. And we'd also like to see a more national insurance market, with companies able to sell policies over the Internet free of the worst state mandates.

But the biggest problem with Mr. Bush's plan is that it wasn't offered two years ago, when it had a better chance to pass. The White House wasted its first term health energies on a failed attempt to buy votes with the Medicare drug benefit. Now the GOP is a minority in Congress, and Democrats aren't likely to favor Mr. Bush's ideas because they think health care is a winner for them in 2008.

Ways and Means Chairman Charlie Rangel was quick out of the box to call the President's idea "a dangerous policy that ultimately shifts cost and risk from employers to employees." But the numbers show that most Americans would have lower costs, and in any case the current tax treatment of health care benefits tends to benefit the well-to-do over the poor. Figures from the Lewin Group show that the average tax subsidy under the current system was $2,780 for families earning over $100,000 in 2004, while those with incomes below $30,000 got less than $725 in aid. Democrats ought to favor this idea on equity grounds alone.

But no matter if they don't. We're fated to debate health care in 2008 anyway, and Mr. Bush is finally offering a GOP reform based on market principles that these pages have encouraged for years. Most Americans can see for themselves that the current employer-based system is breaking down, as more companies pass along the rising cost of their insurance to employees (in higher co-pays and deductibles). Yet the system remains opaque and frustrating because of the underlying tax bias for businesses instead of individuals.

This status quo won't hold, and the political race is going to be between those who want to move to a more genuine market and consumer-based health care, and those who want to move toward Canada, Europe and more government control. The Bush plan ought to jump start that debate.

Bush's Better Health-care Policy (WT)

The Washington Times, January 24, 2007

If a liberal president proposed reforming the tax code to give working families a bigger tax break for health care than corporations and giving poor families direct assistance to buy health care to boot, the New York Times and rest of the mainstream media would be choking back tears as it praised an initiative that was so bold in its compassion and desire for fairness.

But this proposal to make the tax code fair and health care affordable comes from President Bush with a Congress under Democratic control in the run to a presidential election year. So it will be attacked for failing to be everything that everyone else's proposal is not.

The fact is, the Bush plan slices through the thicket of policy proposals -- all of which boil down to dumping more people into state Medicaid programs -- and gives the self employed and uninsured, from the single mom who cuts hair to the electrician starting his own business, a tax break of about $3,800 to buy health care. Under the president's plan, millions of working-class and middle-class families could buy health care with pretax dollars. It only comes at the expense of the richest health plans of top CEOs. Even then, those wanting to avoid a tax bite at that level can set up a health-savings account.

DOJ_NMG_0121081

According to a study by the Urban Institute, 44 percent of people without health care don't have it because they don't want to spend the money or because they don't sign up for government-run health plans even when eligible. Add the Bush tax-break money to recent increases in contributions people can now make to health-savings accounts and another Bush proposal to allow the people to buy private health plans at group rates and the affordability issue is largely solved.

It's not the entire answer, of course. Using existing monies to fund health care for children as tax credits for insurance would help, too. But you won't find the president's critics supporting his fair and compassionate plan. Their solution, as the employer-based health-care system falters, is to expand Medicaid. That's like forcing people into the medical equivalent of public housing.

Many opponents of the president's proposal support expansion of government-run health plans because they don't believe Americans, when given the money and freedom to choose their own health care, will wind up better off. Rather, they believe we, the people, will mess it up because we're too stupid or poor or old to make decisions that are in our best interests.

We heard the same wailings and warnings when the president reformed Medicare. Sen. Barack Obama and others may believe hope is audacious, but it's President Bush who believes and has demonstrated that it creates better health care for every American.

State Of The Union: Bush's Health Plan (PTR)

Pittsburgh Tribune-Review, January 24, 2007

Democrats oppose President Bush's health care plan to increase the number of insured Americans; it's too private and encourages the exercise of freedom.

They want to soak the rich to pay for the Big Brother of all entitlements: universal health care. That must be resisted; refer to out-of-control Medicare and Medicaid costs.

Yet the president brings forth the germ of a good idea: extension of tax deductions now provided for employer plans to anyone who buys his own insurance in the private sector.

But there's more.The plan institutes tax-code disincentives for buying Cadillac policies. Any premiums above $15,000 a year for a family or $7,500 for an individual would not be federal tax free. And folks who buy insurance on their own can take the full deduction even though their policy may cost less.

These are incentives to buy less insurance, which may force consumers to deal with the real costs when bills arrive for what insurance does not cover.

Because many today have health insurance that covers even ordinary medical expenses, they have insufficient cause to restrain their use of services and demand efficiency and cost accountability from providers.

As long as well-insured patients are cash cows, health care costs will not be brought into reason.

The Bush plan would institute some free-market-oriented elements. And that's why it's worth exploring further.

EDITORIAL: State Of The Union Faces Stiff Challenges (FREEP)

Detroit Free Press, January 24, 2007

EDITORIAL: State of the Union faces stiff challenges

President's health care, energy plans skip most effective reforms

January 23, 2007

Facing more Democrats in Congress, including several who seek to replace him in two years, President George W. Bush issued a confident State of the Union address Tuesday, every bit the commander in chief.

Although he revisited some of the same tired cliches about taking the battle to the enemy, his call not to fail Iraq was stirring: “Every one of us wishes that this war were over and won. Yet it would not be like us to leave our promises unkept, our friends abandoned, and our own security at risk.”

But rhetoric does not win wars and Bush will have to put the bipartisanship he stressed to the test to devise a strategy that both countries can live with.

And the details of the domestic agenda — on which Bush’s advisers set up the speech to be judged — fell short of inspiration.

Health care

Just as momentum is building for health care reform, Bush offered a plan that would leave in the lurch those who need it most, punish those who have good coverage and discourage employers from offering top-notch benefits.

The scheme he laid out would subject health coverage to taxes for the first time, then award deductions for basic health coverage and tax hikes on the good stuff.

DOJ_NMG_0121082

The plan's goals are sound: To eliminate the inequity between people who get coverage as a perk of work (with no taxes) and those who have to buy their own expensive health care after taxes; and to help those who need coverage, many who are between jobs or work for small firms that don't provide it. But most of them don't make enough to pay enough taxes to be helped by the breaks ($7,500 for a single or $15,000 for a family) or to afford coverage.

The plan's goals are sound: To eliminate the inequity between people who get coverage as a perk of work (with no taxes) and those who have to buy their own expensive health care after taxes; and to help those who need coverage, many who are between jobs or work for small firms that don't provide it. But most of them don't make enough to pay enough taxes to be helped by the breaks ($7,500 for a single or $15,000 for a family) or to afford coverage.

The president did pledge to help states such as Michigan that are devising creative solutions to getting more people covered. But "support" and "incentives" are pretty nonspecific, so it's hard to tell whether they'll be effective, especially if Bush dumps more hard-to-insure clients on the states.

The need for substantial health care reform is acute, as the automakers and the 47 million people without coverage can detail. The president's plan doesn't advance that reform, and cannot be allowed to distract from it.

Energy

For Detroit, Bush's speech was a signal that offering to build more flex-fuel cars isn't enough. Automakers will have to pitch in on mileage efficiency, too — and Congress may see the president's goal as only a starting point.

The president's laudable plan to reduce gasoline use by 20% within 10 years may seem a bit tame to everyone but the automakers, and his strategy may not get the country even that far. Three-quarters of the cutback would come by replacing gasoline with ethanol or other alternatives, the rest from better car mileage.

But this combination of agricultural carrots and a single-industry stick will take America only so far. The country needs innovative breakthroughs across the energy spectrum, and not just to reduce dependence on foreign oil. It may make more sense for the auto industry to come to the table on global warming discussions, as an increasing number of big firms have. That could give automakers more flexible options to drive efficiency rather than dickering over specific mileage standards — and lead to innovations that have yet to be conceived.

Rx For Our Corporate Culture (USAT)

By Alan M. Webber

USA Today, January 24, 2007

Could it be that the stars are finally coming into alignment to address two enormous and curiously intertwined items on the American domestic agenda — health care costs and the future competitiveness of big American business, starting with the auto industry?

Maybe it's just a coincidence, but the headlines over the past several weeks, when clipped from the nation's daily newspapers and placed side by side, seem to suggest some cosmic intersection.

Start with the news from the recent big Detroit auto show. Here the latest developments have less to do with the specifics of new models, new hybrid technology or new marketing campaigns, and more to do with the macro-picture of the global competition.

In a nutshell, after decades of dogged pursuit, determined improvement and developing innovation, Toyota is poised to overtake General Motors as the world's largest automaker. The hard truth is that the U.S. auto industry, starting with GM, extending to the badly depleted Ford and on to Chrysler, is starting to run out of gas.

For longtime observers of the U.S. auto industry, and big American companies in general, the diminishment of the Big Three has been a long time coming. It is possible to trace the decline of these once-great companies back to the oil crises of the 1970s that opened the floodgates to Japanese-made cars, in particular, which boasted better fuel-efficiency, fewer defects and lower manufacturing costs.

But the cars themselves have only been part of the problem for U.S. automakers — and here the story gets more interesting, and the stars start to form a new, possibly intriguing constellation.

GM has sought to make a national issue out of the role that health care costs play in its competitive problems. Every year, according to GM North America President Troy Clarke, the company spends more than $5 billion on employee health care costs, and that number rises annually. Spread those dollars over the company's entire manufacturing operation, and, says GM, health care adds something like $1,500 to each car that GM produces. No wonder Toyota, Nissan and other foreign manufacturers can overtake U.S. companies, the logic goes.

But wait! All of sudden, help may be on the way. First, the new Congress, under Democratic control for the first time in 12 years, has already begun to articulate a renewed interest in health care.

True, the Democrats are more outraged that nearly 47 million Americans — 16% of the population — lack any health care coverage. With the start of the new Congress, Massachusetts Sen. Ted Kennedy, for one, has wasted no time in calling for the federal government to join his home state in creating comprehensive health care coverage for every American. At almost the same moment, a temporarily hobbled California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger, himself a recent recipient of emergency health care measures in the wake of a painful skiing accident, proposed a sweeping $12 billon health care plan that would extend coverage to every Californian.

And as of last night, President Bush seems eager to join the far-flung Kennedy clan that stretches from Massachusetts to California, with his own health care reform initiative. Or, perhaps, finally something will happen to restructure the costs and coverage of health care, and to offer a financial Rx to America's ailing industrial giants.

But if that were to happen, the remedy might include some unexpected — and maybe even more restorative — side effects.

What if the real diagnosis of the competitive problems of GM, Ford and Chrysler, as well as many other deeply entrenched industrial companies, isn't really about health care costs? What if their problems aren't even about their products? What if, as is the case with so many large, old and ailing companies, the real problem is in their culture — in the structure, the habits, the deeply entrenched ways of doing business that, in many cases, date back at least 50 years? Too many of these dinosaurs have created workplaces and work styles that are simply inappropriate to today's global, knowledge-based economy.

So how would reforming health care coverage change corporate culture? Imagine a shift in health care coverage that de-couples it from your job. It's only a historical accident of President Franklin Roosevelt and the New Deal that coverage ever was linked to employment. Now, what if a Kennedy-Schwarzenegger reform movement — backed by a Democratic Congress that in the past has been willing to think of "portable insurance" that travels with each individual — can offer health care security to all Americans, even those stuck in dead-end jobs? Imagine the chance to leave a lousy corporate culture without losing your precious health care coverage.

Imagine a chance to join a more entrepreneurial company, maybe even a start-up, without having to worry about health care costs. Imagine being the CEO of one of the old, ailing companies and suddenly realizing that, while your prayer for relief from your health-care-cost headache has been answered, all of a sudden, you've got a bigger malady: Your best employees no longer feel the need to put up with your stagnant organization just for the security of a lavish health care plan.

If that were to happen, it would offer America more than a new world of better, fairer and more humane health care coverage. It could put the stars in a new alignment for our large industrial companies finally to become places where people want to work. In other words, they'd either have to heal themselves of their deeply rooted cultural disease — or die.

Alan M. Webber is co-founding editor of Fast Company magazine and former editorial director of the Harvard Business Review.

Bolten: Divided Leaders Have Shared Interest In Success (pol)

By Mike Allen

The Politico, January 24, 2007

White House Chief of Staff Joshua B. Bolten spoke to Mike Allen, The Politico's chief political correspondent, about the challenges a Republican president faces in dealing with a Democratic Congress following a brutal election. Bolten has been part of George W. Bush's operation since the Austin-based campaign of 2000, later serving as White House budget director. Here are excerpts of the conversation:

Q. What is your realistic assessment of what the president and Congress can accomplish this year?

A. I'm optimistic that the president's instinct to take on large issues will continue to be rewarded, even in the last two years of his term. The president's State of the Union is going to put on the table important reforms in health care, in energy, in the reauthorization of No Child Left Behind and in immigration. I think we have a good shot at substantial legislation in all of those.

Q. What will it take to make that happen with a Democratic majority on both sides?

A. It'll obviously take more cross-aisle cooperation than there has been in the past. But one of the silver linings of the change in control is that the Democrats now have a stronger interest in harvesting actual accomplishments. In the closely divided houses that we've had for most of this president's time in office, it's been difficult for Republicans to sustain a governing majority, especially in the Senate where you typically need 60 votes. It's always been difficult, without a larger majority than we've ever had, to advance a substantial legislative agenda. What the change in control means is that Democrats now will be under more pressure than they have been in the minority to deliver actual accomplishments. I hope what that means is that we will see more bipartisan accommodation, at least in some of the areas like energy, immigration, health care and education. In all four of those areas, there are large areas of common ground, and now we're no longer in a situation where one party may be seen as advantaged because it alone put across accomplishments. Rather, both parties have advantages in putting accomplishments across the goal line.

DOJ_NMG_0121084

Q. Why should the Democrats give the president and his party anything to brag about?

A. Because they're in a position where (a) they can brag about it as well, and (b) they bear a much larger burden of responsibility, being in the majority, for not allowing good ideas to proceed forward. When you're in the minority, it's a much more comfortable political situation just to be blocking. In the majority, you have a responsibility to share in advancing an agenda. It seems to me, while we'd of course much rather have Republican majorities in both houses, this does create an opportunity for the White House.

Q. Does history bolster this theory of divided government?

A. I think so. You can look back into some of the accomplishments in the Clinton administration like welfare reform or some fiscal restraint during the Clinton administration. During the first Bush administration, there were accomplishments in the international trade area. The president succeeded in getting negotiating authority and pursuing a trade agenda with some bipartisan support that I hope we can regenerate this time around, despite trade having become much more polarized and politicized.

Q. How do you view the current relations between the White House and Congress?

A. There have been good signs, from my perspective. I hope things break for the good. There's a lot of division on the Iraq war. No discredit to those who take a different view; there's a legitimate debate to be had there. Our hope is the debate can be held in a civil, principled way that's in the best interests of the country, not in a partisan way designed to divide the country. But it remains to be seen how all of that will play. We go into this season cautiously optimistic, and I would say it's too early to tell.

Q. What are the good signs?

A. Good signs have been some of the personal relationships. The new leaders have been here to the White House and I think have established a pretty good dialogue directly with the president. There's been reasonably good tone in that dialogue. But, like I said, a lot will be seen over the course of the next couple of months. I'm hopeful that we will end up putting the relationship on a good footing because the country is facing a lot of challenges right now and does not need partisan bickering getting in the way.

Q. Have the '06 election results caused you to change your tone or approach?

A. There's obviously a significant change involved in a change in party leadership. So the president needs to be aware that while the entire Congress should be a partner, on some issues those who are controlling the agenda will be political adversaries. We need to take that into account. To the White House, I think it means primarily that we need to work harder than ever at our congressional relations. On the one hand, it's harder to work with political adversaries than it is with political friends. On the other hand, especially when your own party is in the minority, you need to be extra careful not to neglect Republicans in the way we approach the Congress. They remain a very important and powerful element because the two houses are so closely divided.

Q. Do you think the president will sign an immigration bill this year?

A. I do.

Republicans In Retreat To Work On Resurgence (POL)

By Patrick O'Connor

The Politico, January 24, 2007

As House Republicans depart today for a caucus retreat on Maryland's Eastern Shore, GOP ranks are increasingly divided over the best strategy for taking on the new Democratic majority.

The dispute is the first major test for new House Minority Leader John A. Boehner of Ohio, who is under pressure from some colleagues who believe he is too docile in challenging Democrats and laying the political foundation for a GOP comeback in 2008.

Some Republicans are advocating a wait-in-the-weeds strategy -- projecting an air of civility and selective cooperation with Speaker Nancy Pelosi and fellow Democrats, while waiting for the right moment to pounce for partisan gains.

But many backbench Republicans, joined by some members of the leadership team, believe it makes more sense to pounce early and often.

Rep. Dennis Hastert, R-Ill., the former speaker, received a rousing ovation at a closed-door meeting in the Cannon Caucus Room last week when he urged colleagues to stand up and fight. Some members interpreted that as a veiled shot at Boehner.

But Boehner said the party can afford to be patient. "It's their honeymoon," he said of the Democrats. "We're not in a sprint here. We're in a marathon Chill out."

DOJ_NMG_0121085

There is some irony in that stance. Early in his 16-year House career, the Ohioan was part of a team of self-styled Republican Revolutionaries who waged daily partisan attacks in a successful campaign to wrest control from the Democratic majority in 1994.

Now, at age 57, his early strategy is more an echo of former representative Bob Michel, R-Ill., than former representative Newt Gingrich, R-Ga. Michel was the moderate minority leader in the 1980s and early 1990s; Gingrich displayed a more partisan style during his climb to the speakership, a model that many Republicans believe can work again.

Republicans on Capitol Hill, though, don't have much time before the race for the White House drowns them out. A collection of prominent Republican pollsters told GOP House leaders recently that they have only three to eight months to establish their identity before the presidential race clogs the news cycles.

So, a small bloc of Republicans led by Conference Chairman Adam Putnam of Florida, Chief Deputy Whip Eric Cantor of Virginia; and Patrick McHenry of North Carolina and Tom Price of Georgia have been researching parliamentary procedure to wage floor fights against Democratic initiatives as the GOP staffs scour legislation for political fodder.

The group also has reached out to some of Boehner's contemporaries from the early 1990s who used guerrilla tactics to help Republicans secure their last majority after 40 years in the wilderness -- partisan firebrands such as Gingrich and former representative Bob Walker of Pennsylvania.

At a recent whip meeting, Cantor distributed copies of a Washington Post article from 1986 asking "Is Bob Walker the Most Obnoxious Man In Congress?"

Walker said his guerrilla tactics were necessary in a House where even Republican leaders had grown accustomed to Democratic dominance. But now, he suggested, the current minority faces a much different environment, in part because of the reforms approved during the early years of their majority to give the minority party more input in the legislative process.

"The circumstances are much different," Walker said.

The problem for Republicans occurs when their own leaders become too compliant with Democratic leaders and chairmen, Walker said. "There is a tendency for the institution to discipline you."

Cantor and his colleagues were well aware that they must stand up and fight without turning voters off.

"It is a balance," he explained. "We don't want to be dilatory, but we don't want to let up for a minute."

The peril for Boehner comes if his GOP colleagues come to view him as upstart Republicans once viewed Michel. As minority leader, Michel bartered with majority Democrats, which angered some of the agitators in his own party, including Boehner.

The well-pressed son of a bar owner, Boehner was a key figure in the later phase of the Republican rise to power. He led the Gang of Seven in their drive to expose abuse in the House Bank after 1990 and helped craft the "Contract With America." He was also part of the small group that included Walker, Gingrich, and Texans Dick Armey and Tom DeLay, who met regularly in the basement dining room of a Capitol Hill restaurant to plot the GOP's resurgence.

Boehner is often cast as a Dean Martin figure, a jocular, plainspoken lawmaker whose public image is that of a dapper, tanned chain-smoker who plays golf, teases members and reporters and spends his evenings drinking with a small cadre of lobbyists and fellow lawmakers.

On the other hand, though, he heads to bed early in order to get up for his regular early-morning stroll. And he has a strong sentimental streak that has prompted him to well up regularly, most notably during DeLay's resignation speech, even though Boehner was a major rival during their shared time on the Hill.

With Hastert's decision to step aside, Boehner is now the top Republican in the House. And it appears he'll continue the inclusive traditions he began when his party was in the minority.

The question for Republicans, though, is whether this inclusive style will work in the minority when the party is so divided on Iraq.

President Bush is scheduled to address the retreat on Friday, and some Republicans expect the three-day conference to be a contentious discussion about the direction of the party.

Republicans carry a skilled, experienced group of senior staffers into the minority, but leadership offices have taken time to organize.

Boehner is aware of the delicate challenge before him, allies say, but so far he has taken a decidedly passive approach to the Democrats.

On the first day of the new Congress, Boehner followed a string of heated remarks by other Republicans to acknowledge the Democrats' honeymoon and be respectful of Pelosi's historic elevation as the first female speaker.

Later that day, he took an indirect shot at his own party while encouraging the two parties to be more cordial. "This is the people's Congress," Boehner told a packed chamber during his opening-day speech. "And most people don't care which party controls it; what they want is a government that is limited, honest, accountable and responsive to their needs. The moment a majority forgets this lesson, it begins writing itself a ticket to minority status."

DOJ_NMG_0121086

He has since endorsed some of the opposition tactics of outspoken legislators.

Putnam showed members a video during their regular closed-door meeting of McHenry squaring off against Financial Services Chairman Barney Frank, D-Mass., on the House floor earlier this month.

The youngest member of Congress, McHenry enraged the irascible Frank by raising parliamentary questions to highlight an exemption in the minimum-wage bill for American Samoa. And Frank furiously banged his gavel from the speaker's chair as he shouted down McHenry in an exchange that quickly found its way to YouTube.

"That is one way you can be respectful and get your point across," Boehner told his assembled colleagues afterward.

House GOP Reflects (RC)

By Nicole Duran And David M. Drucker

Roll Call, January 24, 2007

As House Republicans convene their annual retreat today to talk message and strategy, a debate persists among GOP operatives over how to best return the party to power on Capitol Hill.

Some strategists say the party must woo independent voters and concentrate on issues important to them, such as economic matters, while others prefer the base-driven political tactics honed by Karl Rove and recently departed Republican National Committee Chairman Ken Mehlman in the past three elections.

Those Republicans espousing a more inclusive message say the results of the 2006 midterm elections repudiated the base-only strategy and signaled that if the GOP does not focus on rebuilding a governing coalition that elevates policy accomplishments above politics, they should get comfortable as the House and Senate's minority party.

Republicans "over-catered to their base and as they over-played that, they looked less attractive to Independent voters," former House Majority Leader Dick Armey (R-Texas) said Tuesday. "The independent voter is not interested in politics, he's interested in policy. So when speaking to him, you need to speak with a policy voice, not a politics voice."

The GOP retreat — which will run from tonight through Friday at the Hyatt Regency Chesapeake Bay in Cambridge, Md. — is set to feature a panel discussion led by three pollsters titled "Message: you lost the moderates and independents, not the conservatives." It is part of what is likely to be an ongoing internal debate over what cost Republicans their majority as the party looks toward 2008 and what it can do to reclaim many of the House seats it lost to Democrats on Nov. 7.

Former Speaker Newt Gingrich (R-Ga.), who has advocated turning away from a base-only strategy and is an architect of the GOP's 1994 takeover, is scheduled to address the assembled Members as a keynote speaker.

A look back at much of the data from November 2006 appears to bolster the arguments of those, like Gingrich, who believe Republicans paid attention to their base voters at the expense of independents and conservative Democrats.

In the Nov. 7 contests, Democratic turnout increased slightly from 2004 relative to the GOP turnout, giving them about a 2-point edge over Republicans, but party breakdown remained essentially static, according to the Pew Research Center.

Democrats were able to pick up 30 House seats and six Senate seats because independents overwhelmingly supported them last fall — 57 percent to 39 percent — after splitting evenly between President Bush and Sen. John Kerry (D-Mass.) during the 2004 presidential election, the center found.

Additionally, contrary to popular belief, voter participation by independents actually increases during midterm elections, whereas participation by registered Democrats and registered Republicans historically dips, according to exit polling data.

"Independents decide all elections," Pew President Andrew Kohut said. "Given the fact that we've had partisan parity for a very long time, and I expect that we will continue to have it for a very long time, therefore, the winning party is the party that wins a plurality of independents."

Dave Gilliard, a Republican strategist based in Sacramento, Calif., who steered now-Rep. Brian Bilbray (R-Calif.) to victory in last year's hotly contested 50th district special election to replace disgraced ex-Rep. Duke Cunningham (R), said independent voters as a share of the electorate has been increasing since 2004 — a phenomenon that he said is still under way.

Gilliard described today's independent voters as all over the map ideologically, and united only by their distrust of the two major political parties. He said lower-turnout, midterm elections used to consist of far more partisan voters than independents, making it more politically and cost effective to employ a base-driven strategy.

But he said that tact is now outdated.

"Now that independent voters have become higher-propensity voters, things have changed," Gilliard said. "They are more important, especially in lower-turnout elections. That's just a fact."

DOJ_NMG_0121087

Armey explained that paying more attention to independents does not mean Republicans should abandon their core principles — and he said they don't have to. He urged them to shed the image of "earmarking pork-barreler" that they engendered in the 109th Congress and focus on bold ideas, such as addressing retirement security.

In doing so, Republicans will be in a position to prove to voters that they are tackling the nation's important issues, while simultaneously satisfying party activists' political desire for reform of a key government program.

"We lost our sense of boldness," Armey said, discussing what went wrong for Republicans last year.

While no Republican operative is publicly telling Members to ignore independents, some say rushing to implement a new strategy aimed squarely at unaffiliated voters is not necessarily a recipe for success either.

Carl Forti, who recently departed the National Republican Congressional Committee after a long tenure as its chief spokesman and one of its top strategists, said the key to electoral success in House races remains tailoring individual campaigns to each district.

"Treat each district as unique," said Forti, who is now a top operative for the presidential campaign of former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney (R). "You can't think doing one thing on the national level, whether aimed at independents or Republicans, will do the same thing in Connecticut vs. Alabama."

Many Republican Members and party strategists believe they primarily lost last year because of the corruption and misconduct of a few Members, like Cunningham and former Rep. Mark Foley (R-Fla.) — and because of voter angst over the Iraq War.

Once Republicans get back "on message" and talk about cutting taxes, shrinking government and eliminating wasteful spending, the electorate will respond positively, they contend.

Mike Slanker, political director of the National Republican Senatorial Committee, said Republicans can rebuild their governing majority, and win back independents and conservative Democrats, by returning to their core principles.

"I think we have to reassure them that we remember why we were here as Republicans," said Slanker, who guided Rep. Jon Porter (R-Nev.) to a close re-election victory last November. "We came here for smaller government, lower taxes and less regulation ... whether or not we have lost touch with that is not for me to say.

"I do not believe that our coalition is fractured," he added. "It was a bad year. People were cranky; they weren't happy and we were in power."

Forti said a look back at individual Congressional campaigns in 2006 proves that all races are, in fact, local.

"The people that ran aggressive campaigns, even those in bad districts, won," he said, ticking off the names of several Republicans from swing districts who had close calls.

Those who lost "didn't go out and define their opponents early," Forti said.

Hill Pensions For The Convicted May End (WP)

By Lyndsey Layton

The Washington Post, January 24, 2007

With the rhetoric of reformers bent on sweeping corruption from the Capitol, the House voted unanimously yesterday to deny federal pensions to lawmakers convicted of bribery, perjury and other related felonies.

"Corrupt politicians deserve prison sentences, not taxpayer-funded pensions," said freshman Rep. Nancy Boyda (D-Kan.), chief sponsor of the bill.

But the punishment of those who betray the public trust will not be far-reaching.

The measure is similar to one approved by the Senate last week and comes in the wake of major congressional scandals last year that led to the conviction of former Republican congressmen Randy "Duke" Cunningham (Calif.) and Robert W. Ney (Ohio). The House passed the bill 431 to 0, with four members not voting.

The bills passed by the House and the Senate are not retroactive, which means that Cunningham and Ney will collect substantial pensions for the rest of their lives, courtesy of taxpayers.

And a current House member under federal investigation for corruption, Democratic Rep. William J. Jefferson (La.), still might be entitled to a pension if he is indicted and convicted for past crimes. The Senate version would not take effect until January 2009, while the House-passed version would take effect immediately upon enactment.

What's more, both the House and Senate bills would allow the Office of Personnel Management, which calculates the pensions of members of Congress, to award the pensions of convicted lawmakers to their families, in cases of demonstrated financial need.

"They're trying to claim to fix the problem without backing it up with legislation," said Peter J. Sepp of the National Taxpayers Union. "It's a shame, really. This may not be the most ethical Congress ever after all."

DOJ_NMG_0121088

The House bill would withhold pensions from lawmakers convicted of any one of five categories of felonies, including bribery and perjury, but would protect those who have already been convicted. Stacey F. Bernards, spokeswoman for House Majority Leader Steny H. Hoyer (D-Md.), said the House had no choice because criminalizing past behavior would have violated constitutional protections.

House leaders had also wanted to postpone the effective date of the measure to Jan. 2, 2009, to make it consistent with the language of the Senate-passed bill and reduce negotiations between the two chambers. They noted that, under the Constitution, a change in the compensation of members of Congress can only be carried out after the next general election.

But House Republicans objected to the 2009 date, saying that it was too distant, and privately told Democrats that they would not support it, a senior Democratic aide said. "We wanted this to have bipartisan support, so we changed it," the aide said.

For at least a decade, Congress has been kicking around bills to block pensions for convicted lawmakers. But the issue resonated following last year's influence-peddling scandal involving convicted lobbyist Jack Abramoff and the midterm elections, when the Democrats grabbed corruption as a campaign theme and used it to win control of Congress.

Currently, members of Congress can be denied pensions only if they commit treason or other espionage offenses.

The bill approved yesterday was a watered-down version of legislation proposed by Republican Rep. Mark Steven Kirk (Ill.), who wants pensions to be withheld from lawmakers convicted of a wider range of public integrity crimes. Kirk's plan lists 21 crimes, including wire fraud and tax evasion, compared with the five in the bill passed yesterday.

"The American people understand income-tax evasion -- you want to make sure a congressman who doesn't pay his taxes isn't rewarded with a taxpayer-funded pension," he said. "This falls far short."

But Kirk could not offer his bill yesterday -- the vote was taken under a suspension of the rules, which limited debate and blocked amendments. A parade of Republicans protested the way the bill was handled, objected to last-minute changes in language and said they were being locked out of meaningful participation.

The National Taxpayers Union estimates that at least 20 lawmakers convicted of felonies since 1980 are receiving federal pensions totaling about $1 million a year.

Ney, sentenced last week to 30 months in prison after pleading guilty to making false statements and to conspiracy to commit fraud in connection with the Abramoff influence-peddling scandal, can start collecting a full annual pension worth about $29,000 in 2016 or take a reduced annual pension of about $19,000 starting in 2010, according to the taxpayer group. Cunningham, who was convicted of accepting bribes from defense contractors, can receive as much as $64,000 annually if his military service is counted in computing his pension, the group said.

House Passes Bill Denying Pensions To Convicted Lawmakers (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, January 24, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Lawmakers convicted of crimes such as bribery, fraud and perjury will be stripped of their congressional pensions under legislation the House passed yesterday.

The 431-0 House vote comes four days after former Rep. Bob Ney (R., Ohio) received a 30-month prison term for taking political favors from Jack Abramoff, whose influence-peddling tactics helped make corruption a major issue in the November elections. Mr. Ney, as past chairman of the House Administration, backed similar legislation last year.

The House bill, like its Senate counterpart, isn't retroactive and wouldn't affect the benefits of Mr. Ney, who is eligible for a pension of about $29,000 a year if he waits until 2016, when he turns 62.

Minor differences with the Senate bill, approved last week as part of larger ethics and lobbying overhaul, must be reconciled before the measure can be signed into law.

The House bill applies to conduct that occurs after the bill becomes law, while the Senate bill doesn't take effect until 2009.

Pelosi Cements Grip On Caucus (RC)

By Jennifer Yachnin

Roll Call, January 24, 2007

Just weeks into her tenure, Democratic Members and aides see Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) taking subtle steps to consolidate her power within the new House majority, provoking some grumbling, but largely avoiding any serious internal revolts as Democrats settle into their new roles.

Pelosi has made herself the Democratic Caucus' clear leader in formulating an agenda and message strategy, also while installing key staff at the party's campaign committee. At the same time, she is working to rein in the chamber's chairmen, an effort that aims to prevent the resurgence of largely autonomous chairmen that dominated the House chamber during the previous Democratic majority.

DOJ_NMG_0121089

In the initial weeks of the 110th Congress, however, those efforts are drawing largely muted reactions from the party's 21 newly installed chairmen — many of whom held gavels in the party's last majority 12 years ago. That initial response may not prevent troubles ahead, but for now, many are chalking up any discord to their new roles.

"From my vantage point, the Democratic chairmen are happy to be in charge, and it takes some getting used too," said one Democratic chairman who asked not to be named, to allow him to speak more freely on sensitive issues. "I don't think there's real disagreement."

The chairman acknowledged a push for coordination between the Speaker and committee leaders, noting that he has met with Pelosi several times in recent weeks. "To some degree, the Speaker is the leader of the party and an effective Speaker would work with the chairmen," the Democrat said.

Despite the push for consolidation, however, one Democratic aide suggested that reaction is subdued because there is little concern that Democratic chairmen will become "irrelevant," as some Democrats viewed their Republican counterparts under the rule of then-Majority Leader Tom DeLay (R-Texas).

Nevertheless, Pelosi hasn't managed to avoid every dispute within her party.

In the most public spat in the first weeks of the 110th Congress, the Speaker drew the ire of Energy and Commerce Chairman John Dingell (D-Mich.) when she announced last week that she would seek a new select committee to examine the issue of global warming.

The Michigan lawmaker, loathe to forfeit any his committee's jurisdiction, publicly dismissed the panel. In a meeting of the Energy and Commerce panel's Democrats, Dingell later argued the Speaker's proposal would be better served as a task force or special committee within the Democratic Caucus.

But while the proposal drew criticism from others, including Rep. Henry Waxman (D-Calif.) — who said last week, "I can see the reason for this Speaker wanting to give this extra focus and attention," but stopped short of supporting the select committee — large numbers of Democrats are not expected to oppose the proposal when it reaches the House floor. Most Republicans are expected to object to the proposal.

House Majority Leader Steny Hoyer (D-Md.), who said he spoke with Dingell Tuesday during a weekly chairmen's meeting, could not confirm when that measure will come to the House floor.

"I want to talk to more people on our side to see if we're going to have a problem on our side," Hoyer said, before later adding: "Jurisdictional issues are real issues ... but I think we'll work it out."

The new committee, which draws on the jurisdiction of eight committees, would not have legislative authority under the proposal unveiled by Pelosi last week.

Responding to criticisms of the proposed panel at a Tuesday press conference, which focused on last night's State of the Union address, Pelosi stated: "One percent of the people in the Caucus are opposed to it, and 99 percent want to be on the Select Committee."

One senior Democratic aide acknowledged that while Pelosi may be flexing her political muscle in this case — "She doesn't think he will move legislation as quickly as she wants," the aide said — it remains to be seen whether her action is unique, or intended as a warning for future challengers.

Another Democratic chairman, who spoke on the condition of anonymity, suggested that the spat largely remains between Dingell and the Speaker, rather than all the chairmen.

"I'm jealous of my jurisdiction, I'd be less than honest if I didn't say that," the chairman said. "But I believe if we are to govern effectively, there has to be better coordination, regardless of personal fiefdoms."

The Democratic chairman, who acknowledged that the Speaker had discussed the select committee with him at an earlier date, dismissed the idea that such a panel would take power away from any panels.

"It's not precedent setting," he asserted, adding that he "would not be surprised" to see additional select committees during the new Congress.

A Democratic aide, who asked not to be named, defended the Speaker's decision to call for the committee's creation, stating: "I think it's evident she's been leading by consensus."

Still, some Democratic chairmen questioned that commitment at the start of the Congress three weeks ago, when lawmakers discovered that Republican-authored term limits would be continued in the new session.

The rules, which limit lawmakers to six-year terms at the helm of a committee, were initially adopted by the Republican majority following the 1994 elections, as part of the "Contract with America."

When House lawmakers adopted rules governing the 110th Congress, the Democratic leadership authored a series of changes focused primarily on ethics and lobbying reforms, while maintaining the majority of the rules from the last session, including those term limits.

DOJ_NMG_0121090

Although Democratic leaders stated that the House will revisit those rules, no definitive date has been set for that discussion.

The Speaker "has made it clear that she doesn't care for the term limits either," the Democratic aide said. "It's just a matter of when to approach changing that. We've got six years to look at it."

There also are indications that Pelosi intends to keep a strong hand in the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee this cycle, notably the installment of Brian Wolff — a close political confidant to Pelosi and deputy executive director in charge of finance in the last cycle — as the new executive director.

DCCC Chairman Chris Van Hollen (Md.), tapped by Pelosi to head the campaign committee, also has opted to bring on another top Pelosi aide, Jennifer Crider, to run the communications shop.

'08 Race Looms Over Agenda (RC)

By Erin P. Billings

Roll Call, January 24, 2007

Less than a month into their newly elected leadership roles, Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) and Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) already are confronting a vocal and prominent cast of Congressional Democratic presidential hopefuls who quickly are capturing the national spotlight.

And while many Congressional Democrats say publicly they have grown used to Members and Senators using Capitol Hill as a platform for White House runs, they privately acknowledge the early 2008 campaign could become a distraction, and the window will be narrow for Reid and Pelosi to drive the party agenda and set the tone in the early days of the 110th Congress.

"With the New Hampshire primary about a year away, we could be looking at only a few months before presidential interests completely over take party priorities," said a senior Senate Democratic aide.

Reid and Pelosi assumed their majority slots on Jan. 4 after a sweeping November election gave Democrats control of Congress. After a dozen years in the minority — interrupted only by a short period of Senate control — Democrats are relishing the chance to steer Congressional priorities over the next two years.

But in recent days, the field of Congressional Democratic presidential hopefuls has swelled with the entries of high-profile candidates, Sens. Barack Obama (Ill.) and Hillary Rodham Clinton (N.Y.).

Obama and Clinton joined a string of Democratic hopefuls including Sens. Joseph Biden (Del.), Chris Dodd (Conn.) and possibly John Kerry (D-Mass.).

Sen. Ben Nelson (D-Neb.) said the early primary season has "got to be a distraction" for the Senate leadership and "at times can be an annoyance," but also said it can serve to help drive the debate and encourage discussions among political players.

The challenge for Reid and others, he said, is that presidential candidates can often redirect the tone and force leaders to respond to candidates' ideas.

"Now they have to consider what others are saying," Nelson said.

Even so, Democratic Senators said presidential politics is part of the Senate, and early primaries or not, the chamber always is a launching pad for White House candidates.

Sen. Mark Pryor (D-Ark.) acknowledged the presidential primary seems to come "earlier and earlier" each cycle, but added: "The Senate adjusts to that.

"It probably will affect the operation of the Senate from time to time on both sides of the aisle," he said.

Reid appears content to let the nomination process play out with little or no interference.

A former Democratic leadership aide explained that Reid's primary focus will be on maintaining the cohesion of his 51-seat majority rather than simply focusing on the presidential hopefuls.

"The truth is, it's much harder to control the 51 than the few '08ers," this source said.

The source added, "The principal doesn't have to worry about what the kids do on the street, he just has to make sure there is order in the school."

Reid clearly has a heavier logistical burden than Pelosi, who heads the chamber where interest in the White House is slim.

So far, only Democratic Rep. Dennis Kucinich (Ohio) has hinted at launching another candidacy. Besides, with 435 Members serving in the House, the absence of a Member who is on the campaign trail is less of a problem.

But both leaders will have to work through the challenges of trying to move key pieces of legislation over the next two years, finding unity among Democrats and maintaining their roles as the party's top voices.

What's more, both Reid and Pelosi will undoubtedly be put in the sometimes-uncomfortable position of having to respond to Democratic presidential candidates' platforms and positions.

DOJ_NMG_0121091

Jim Manley, Reid's spokesman, said his boss recognizes "there are always presidential candidates in the Senate. There were in the past and there will be in the future. The fact is, under the rules of the Senate — presidential candidate or not — [Senators] can have a pretty significant influence on how the Senate operates."

And Democratic leaders in both chambers said that neither Reid nor Pelosi is concerned that the candidates will steal their spotlight.

"As the first woman Speaker, there's no question that she's going to continue to receive a great deal of attention," said Pelosi's spokesman Brendan Daly. "We've had a very good first three weeks in office and that's going to continue as we move forward.

"There are plenty of people who continue to serve as the face of the Democratic Party," Manley added. "There's plenty of limelighting to go around."

Biden said 2008 isn't all that different from previous presidential cycles, which typically draw a pool of prominent Democratic Senators to the field.

"We've been down there before," Biden said. "I think we agree on 85 percent of the issues. The idea that it's a distraction from the Senate" isn't reality.

Biden has used the early days of the 110th Congress to stake out a prominent role on Bush's call to increase troops in Iraq by 21,500. He is leading a bipartisan group of Senators introducing a resolution in opposition to the move, and in doing so, highlighting his foreign policy-oriented platform.

But Biden isn't the only Senator eyeing the White House who is using the Iraq War as a key aspect of a White House run. Dodd, Clinton and Obama all have come out with individual proposals on how best to deal with the war and the proposal for a troop surge.

The positions on Iraq by Clinton and Obama in particular have led to rumblings that the two candidates are embroiled in a bitter rivalry for frontrunner status.

Most Democrats dispute suggestions that the two are personal adversaries, but they acknowledge that the under-the-Dome campaign is sending a signal that their campaigns could present a headache for leadership down the road.

"The danger and difficulty for Democratic leaders is that the press makes it seem like what Democrats are and think is what those two are saying or not saying," said a senior Democratic House aide. "What we actually do gets lost in the shuffle."

Democratic leadership sources say that while much of the attention of late is on the presidential candidates, they expect the spotlight will dim following the president's State of the Union address and after Congress votes on various resolutions opposing his Iraq plan.

That gives Democrats a chance to push through additional legislative items before next January, the official kickoff of the 2008 presidential primary.

"It will die down," said a senior Democratic aide.

John Stanton contributed to this report.

FEDERAL DIARY: GAO Questions Administration's Decision To Decline Drug Subsidy (WP)

By Stephen Barr

Washington Post, January 24, 2007

Federal employee groups favored the subsidy. The U.S. Postal Service wanted the subsidy. But the Bush administration said no.

The pull-and-tug is over a 2003 law that allows employers to receive subsidies for prescription drug coverage on the condition that they provide a benefit for their Medicare-eligible retirees that is at least as good as the Medicare drug plan. The government, of course, is an employer, operating a medical-insurance program, but Bush officials decided it made little sense for the government, in effect, to pay a subsidy to itself.

That decision has been questioned in a report from the Government Accountability Office, the congressional auditing agency. GAO analysts think that allowing Uncle Sam to move money from one pocket to another would probably lower premiums in the Federal Employees Health Benefits Program, which provides medical coverage to about 8 million people.

Taking the subsidy from the Medicare program would have lowered the average 2006 premium in the federal health benefits program by 2.6 percentage points, the GAO calculated. Those premiums rose by 6.4 percent last year, meaning the increase would have been nearly 4 percent with the subsidy.

The GAO said that insurance companies in the federal program differed over how much the Medicare subsidy would have mitigated premium increases. Officials from two large federal health insurance plans with higher-than-average numbers of retirees told the GAO the subsidy would have helped lower premiums, with officials at one company claiming the subsidy would have led to a reduction of up to 4 percentage points for their plan.

The Office of Personnel Management, which runs the federal employee health program, has ruled out applying for the Medicare subsidy. OPM officials say the law was written to encourage employers to continue offering prescription drug coverage to their retirees, which the employees health benefits program does. The OPM says it has no intention of dropping retiree drug coverage.

The National Active and Retired Federal Employees Association has criticized the OPM for refusing to seek the Medicare subsidy, contending that the OPM is missing out on $1 billion annually. The retired employees group helped lead the effort on Capitol Hill to make the federal government eligible for the subsidy along with other employers, including state and local governments.

Margaret L. Baptiste, president of retired employees group, said yesterday that the White House budget office and the OPM "should explain to federal workers, retirees and survivor annuitants, who often struggle to pay their steadily increasing premiums, why the federal government failed to do what a multitude of other employers have done to reduce this burden."

One agency, the U.S. Postal Service, petitioned Medicare in 2005 to provide the subsidy but was rejected on the grounds that postal workers are covered by the health benefits program. Postal officials sought the subsidy because it would save the agency about $250 million annually. Agency officials said the subsidy would have helped rein in operating expenses, which are financed through postage rates.

Sen. Daniel K. Akaka (D-Hawaii), new chairman for the Senate's federal workforce subcommittee, said he plans to hold a hearing on the GAO report in the spring.

"I will take a closer look at how OPM decisions affect health care premiums," Akaka said in a statement. "Although OPM did a good job in keeping premium increases down in 2006, the GAO report clearly shows that if OPM had applied for and used the subsidy, premium growth would be reduced by 2.6 percent."

As Akaka noted, the GAO report shows that the OPM has been slowing the growth in the average federal health insurance premium since 2002, when premiums jumped by 12.9 percent. Federal Employees Health Benefit premiums, on average, are going up only 1.8 percent this year.

The rise in average premiums has slowed, the GAO said, because the costs of medical services and prescription drugs have risen at a slower pace in recent years. The GAO pointed out that the OPM has used the program's financial reserves to curb premium growth last year and this year, by 2 percent and 5 percent respectively.

The GAO also noted that the Federal Employees Health Benefits Program has done a better job of controlling premiums than many private-sector employers and the California Public Employees' Retirement System, known as Calpers and second in size to the federal program.

Over the past five years, the GAO said, the average annual growth in the federal health benefits premiums was 7.3 percent, compared with 14.2 percent for Calpers and 10.5 percent for companies surveyed by the GAO.

State Of The Union: Another Take (NYT)

By Randy Newman

The New York Times, January 24, 2007

Randy Newman, the singer, songwriter and composer, performed this song at Carnegie Hall in 2006. It will be released soon online. This is an abridged version.

A Few Words in Defense of Our Country

By Randy Newman

I'd like to say a few words
In defense of our country
Whose people aren't bad nor are they mean
Now the leaders we have
While they're the worst that we've had
Are hardly the worst this poor world has seen
Let's turn history's pages, shall we?
Take the Caesars for example
Why within the first few of them
They had split Gaul into three parts
Fed the Christians to the lions
And burned down the City
And one of 'em
Appointed his own horse Consul of the Empire

DOJ_NMG_0121093

That's like vice president or something
That's not a very good example, is it?
But wait, here's one, the Spanish Inquisition
They put people in a terrible position
I don't even like to think about it
Well, sometimes I like to think about it
Just a few words in defense of our country
Whose time at the top
Could be coming to an end
Now we don't want their love
And respect at this point is pretty much out of the question
But in times like these
We sure could use a friend
Hitler. Stalin.
Men who need no introduction
King Leopold of Belgium. That's right.
Everyone thinks he's so great
Well he owned The Congo
He tore it up too
He took the diamonds, he took the gold
He took the silver
Know what he left them with?
Malaria
A president once said,
"The only thing we have to fear is fear itself"
Now it seems like we're supposed to be afraid
It's patriotic in fact and color coded
And what are we supposed to be afraid of?
Why, of being afraid
That's what terror means, doesn't it?
That's what it used to mean
The end of an empire is messy at best
And this empire is ending
Like all the rest
Like the Spanish Armada adrift on the sea
We're adrift in the land of the brave
And the home of the free
Goodbye. Goodbye. Goodbye.

Spending Sincerity Test (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, January 24, 2007

Members of Congress applauded President Bush's lines about spending restraint last night, but we are about to get a test of their sincerity when the Senate votes today on the line-item veto.

The official description of New Hampshire Senator Judd Gregg's legislation is "rescission" authority, and it is notably less powerful than the genuine "veto" power Congress granted Bill Clinton in 1996 before it was struck down by the Supreme Court. But the impulse behind it is the same: Give Mr. Bush and his successors the power to single out and send back to Congress the thousands of wasteful "earmark" projects that bloat today's spending bills. Congress would then be required to vote, up or down and within 10 days, on the spending cuts.

It's no accident that Mr. Gregg's bill is nearly identical to a rescission amendment offered by former Democratic Senator (and one-time Majority Leader) Tom Daschle in 1995. In fact, Mr. Daschle's version gave the President more power, allowing him to submit as many as 13 rescissions a year, compared with only four in the Gregg proposal. No fewer than 37 Democrats voted for the Daschle amendment in 1995, and 20 of them are still in the Senate.

DOJ_NMG_0121094

Yet how times, and partisanship, have changed. West Virginia's Robert Byrd took to the Senate floor this week to denounce Mr. Gregg's amendment as "garbage" -- his eloquence is legendary -- and to complain that it gave too much power to the President. That's an old Byrd song when Republicans are in the White House. But back in 1995, with Mr. Clinton in office, the earl of earmarks noted that the Daschle proposal "does not result in any shift of power from the legislative branch to the executive. It is clear cut. It gives the President the opportunity to get a vote . . . So I am 100 percent behind the substitute by Mr. Daschle."

California's Dianne Feinstein also hailed rescission authority in 1995 as a "deterrence" to "the pork barrel." Wisconsin's Russ Feingold extolled it as "a useful tool." Washington's Patty Murray said the President should have the power to veto "pork items" that "contribute to our deficit." North Dakota's Byron Dorgan in 1996 said it would be "helpful in imposing budget discipline." Senators Chris Dodd, Carl Levin and Joe Biden also had nice things to say.

If this crowd meant what they said, Mr. Gregg will easily get the 60 votes he needs to overcome a filibuster. Yet so far not a single Democrat has publicly supported the measure, and Republicans had to threaten to hold up the ethics reform bill last week even to get an item-veto vote on the Senate floor. This is all the more remarkable given that the Senate Democratic caucus is teeming with wannabe Presidents who would love the power that Bill Clinton once had if they ever make it to the White House. Perhaps they lack confidence in their candidacies.

Or perhaps they simply don't want to hand Mr. Bush anything he could call a victory. Democrats ran hard against GOP overspending last year, so voters will be watching what they do in the run-up to 2008. A vote against the line-item veto is a vote for earmarks and spending as usual.

DELETEAFTERMEURL for this article:

http://online.wsj.com/article/SB116960384530585735.html

Copyright 2007 Dow Jones & Company, Inc. All Rights Reserved

This copy is for your personal, non-commercial use only. Distribution and use of this material are governed by our Subscriber Agreement and by copyright law. For non-personal use or to order multiple copies, please contact Dow Jones Reprints at 1-800-843-0008 or visit www.djreprints.com.

As The Democrats Dither (WP)

The Washington Post, January 24, 2007

AN EARLY TEST of the courage and leadership of the new Democratic-controlled Congress will come on the question of extending full voting rights in the House of Representatives to the District of Columbia. Legislation to do just that fizzled in the final days of the past Congress as Republican leaders, seized by apathy and deaf to logic, left town without calling a vote. Now it is for Democrats to explain why citizens of the capital of the free world are disenfranchised in the halls of Congress.

They have scheduled a vote today on a half-measure that grants a partial voice to the District's delegate, as well as to delegates from U.S. territories. The resolution would allow the delegates to vote on some important House business, including amendments to legislation, but would withhold the right to vote on a bill's final passage. If adopted, it would restore the status quo in effect before the Republicans altered it 12 years ago but leave the District consigned to inferior status. It is, in other words, better than nothing, but it is decidedly not good enough. And it muddies the waters by lumping the District, whose residents pay federal income taxes, together with Guam, American Samoa and the Northern Mariana Islands, whose (vastly fewer) residents do not.

The best and most comprehensive solution in sight is the one the Republicans spurned so heedlessly in the past Congress. Embodied in a bipartisan measure co-sponsored by Rep. Thomas M. Davis III (R-Va.) and D.C. Del. Eleanor Holmes Norton (D), it would add two full-voting seats to Congress -- one for the mostly Democratic District and one for mostly Republican Utah, which just missed getting an extra seat after the last census. That's about as nonpartisan as you could wish for (although only Utah would gain an electoral vote).

Mr. Davis believes that several dozen Republicans would support his approach should it ever see the light of day in a floor vote. And Democrats, who have every reason to grant the District a fully empowered representative in the House, should also be on board. So why is the Democratic leadership dithering?

Return Of The Drug Company Payoffs (NYT)

The New York Times, January 24, 2007

Two excessively lenient court decisions have allowed the manufacturers of brand-name drugs to resume the underhanded practice of paying generic competitors to keep their drugs off the market. It is a costly legal loophole that needs to be plugged by Congressional legislation.

The problem arises when a generic manufacturer tries to take its drug to market before the patent on a brand-name drug has expired by arguing that its product does not infringe upon the patent or that the patent is invalid. Huge sums of money are at stake, especially with blockbuster drugs whose annual sales can exceed a billion dollars.

Rather than risk it all, a brand-name manufacturer may choose to pay its generic competitor substantial compensation to drop its challenge and delay marketing its drug. Both companies make out handsomely. The big losers are consumers and the public and private insurers that must continue to pay monopoly prices for the brand-name drugs.

The Federal Trade Commission, which has been waging a valiant fight, succeeded for several years in eliminating such settlements. But two appeals court decisions in 2005 held that they are a legitimate way to resolve patent disputes. And sure enough, the F.T.C. reported last week that — after a five-year hiatus — brand-name companies made 3 such do-not-compete settlements in fiscal year 2005 and 14 more last year.

The pharmaceutical industry contends that the settlements are a reasonable way to resolve disputes and that they often result in bringing generic drugs to market before a patent has expired, albeit not as soon as the generic company wanted. The industry argues that regulators and the courts should judge such settlements on a case-by-case basis.

Our own hunch is that the better approach for Congress to take as it moves toward corrective legislation would be a “bright line” prohibition against making any payments to delay introduction of a generic drug. That would set a clear standard and enhance the likelihood that consumers would get a chance to benefit from real competition in the pharmaceutical market.

OTHER NEWS:

Court Rules Against Foster Parents (WP)

By Tamara Jones

The Washington Post, January 24, 2007

The Tennessee Supreme Court ruled yesterday that a 7-year-old girl raised by an American couple since infancy must be returned to her Chinese parents, who say they never intended to give her up for adoption.

Shaoqiang He, a 42-year-old restaurant manager in Memphis, said he will probably return to China with his family after a transition period for Anna Mae He. She turns 8 on Sunday and has spent all but the first three weeks of her life with foster parents Jerry and Louise Baker.

"We have a big bedroom for her in our apartment, and we're going to buy clothing and furniture for her," He said in the telephone interview. "She knows by her face that she is Chinese, and she must be asking the Bakers, 'Where is my mom? Where is my dad?' "

Neither the Bakers nor their attorneys could be reached for comment. The Bakers have the option of appealing on the federal-court level. Tuesday's ruling set no timetable or conditions for Anna's return, leaving that for a lower court to iron out.

He and his wife, Qin Luo, 37, met the Bakers through the church both families attended. Financial and legal hardships prompted the Hes to place their newborn in the Bakers' care, He said, adding that another church member who ran an adoption agency had vouched for the couple and described them as experienced, loving foster parents. The Hes visited Anna, her father said, but relations turned ugly when they asked for her return at the age of 2.

"We did not give up custody," He said.

The Bakers won a court order barring the Hes from any contact with Anna, but He said his wife used to hide inside a neighborhood gas station to catch glimpses of Anna being taken for a walk or out for a ride. The Hes also have a 4-year-old daughter and 6-year-old son.

The custody dispute has wended through the U.S. court system for most of Anna's life, stirring public debate over the emotional, cultural and financial issues involved.

A Memphis judge stripped the Hes of their parental rights in February 2004, citing "parental misconduct" and abandonment, suggesting that the Hes had pursued the custody case merely to delay their own deportation. Shaoqiang He said his family's immigration status remains in legal limbo.

During the acrimonious battle, Qin Luo He had picketed outside the Bakers' home, shouting that she wanted her daughter back. The lower court concluded that her behavior amounted to "emotional instability" that would be "detrimental" to Anna.

But the state's high court found no evidence that the Hes willfully abandoned Anna. The justices concluded that the couple misunderstood the possible implications of transferring custody and guardianship to the Bakers, believing it merely enabled the Bakers to get Anna health insurance.

DOJ_NMG_0121096

Emotional upheaval to Anna was dismissed as grounds for the Bakers to keep her. Being taken away from the only family she has really known "does not constitute the substantial harm required to prevent the parents from regaining custody," the Supreme Court ruling said.

6-year Custody Fight Ends In Tenn. Court (USAT)

By Robert Davis

USA Today, January 24, 2007

After six years of highly publicized court cases, a Chinese immigrant couple may soon be reunited with the daughter they have fought to get back.

The Tennessee Supreme Court ruled Tuesday that 7-year-old Anna Mae He, who has lived with a Memphis family since infancy, must be returned to birth parents Shaoqiang and Qin Luo He, who go by American names Jack and Casey.

The court ruled that lower courts had wrongly stripped the Hes of their parental rights.

The court ordered the Juvenile Court of Shelby County to reunite the child with her parents, who have been aided by pro bono lawyers. Psychologists will help her make the transition, lawyers say.

The custody fight, which made headlines around the world, pitted the Hes against Jerry and Louise Baker of Cordova, Tenn. The Bakers took Anna Mae in soon after she was born at the Hes' request as they struggled with legal, financial and health problems.

The Hes have insisted they never intended to permanently relinquish custody. But the Bakers have long wanted to legally adopt Anna Mae and originally accused the Hes of abandoning the child. They have maintained that she would have a better life with them.

"We never gave up hope," Jack He says. "This has been six years of nightmare." He hopes to be able to see his daughter again as early as her eighth birthday on Sunday.

The Hes had visited Anna Mae for a time, but things came to a head on her second birthday, on Jan. 28, 2001, when Casey refused to leave without her daughter. The Bakers called the police and five months later petitioned a court to revoke the Hes' parental rights.

In its ruling Tuesday, the court said that "the evidence overwhelmingly shows that the parents' voluntary relinquishment of custody was entered as a temporary measure to provide health insurance."

Jerry Baker said he does not know what will happen next from a legal standpoint, but he hopes to have a child psychologist help determine the best way to "broach all of this" with the girl, who was in school when news of the ruling swept across Memphis.

Supporters from China and across the nation watched news reports and used the Internet to offer support for the Hes. One of the Hes' attorneys, Richard Gordon, says the lesson is: "This is America. Persistence pays off. Don't give up."

Jack He says that he looks forward to the day when his oldest daughter wakes up at home surrounded by the family she has never known: her parents, her brother, Andy, 6, and her sister, Avita, 4.

"She knows that she is Chinese," he says. "We want for her to wake up each morning and see all of the same faces surrounding her."

Baker pledged to put the girl and his daughter Aimee, who considers Anna Mae her sister, first with help from God. "Our God today is the same God that we thanked for all of the past decisions," he said. "He knows best. He will protect us all."

Candidate Who Thinks She Won Gets Gallery Seat (MH)

By Lesley Clark

The Miami Herald, January 24, 2007

WASHINGTON - Christine Jennings wasn't able to line up and shake President Bush's hand when he walked down the House aisle Tuesday night to deliver his State of the Union address, but she did get a chance to make her point.

Clad in a cherry red pantsuit, the banker from Sarasota County who is contesting her narrow loss to succeed Rep. Katherine Harris, sat in the House gallery to the president's right -- a symbol of the fact Democrats are not relinquishing dibs on the seat -- despite the presence of Rep. Vern Buchanan, R-Sarasota, who, as a member of Congress, got a seat on the floor.

"I hope it's a reminder that we need election reform and standards for the country," Jennings said of her presence in gallery 5, row B, seat 17. ``The message has never changed, we've got to know that we have fair and accurate elections."

Buchanan, who was sworn into office by the Democratic-controlled Congress on Jan. 4 -- but not without notice that his election was being contested -- pointedly called Jennings his "favorite constituent" and said he aimed a wave in her direction.

He said he was awed to see his first State of the Union address from the House floor -- noting he's attended before, ``but just in the gallery.

DOJ_NMG_0121097

"To be a blue-collar kid from Detroit, you'd never think it's possible," Buchanan said. ``But it is in America."

Before the speech, Jennings said, perhaps only partly in jest, that she hoped Bush would use the annual address to take up the mantle for election reform. The president, she noted, won the White House in 2000 with a 527-vote margin -- but only after a contested election in Florida that raised similar questions about voter intent.

"I'm hopeful that the president will include in his message that he'll champion election reform," Jennings said, a broad smile on her face. ``I think it's very appropriate. He's obviously familiar with the voting problems in Florida."

Bush, not surprisingly, did not issue a call for election reform, though one of the prime players of the 2000 Florida recount made a guest appearance: Harris, a Sarasota Republican, appeared on the House floor, hugging former colleagues and chatting with several members.

Jennings was the guest of Rep. Ellen Tauscher, D-Calif., who gave the Florida Democrat her sole audience ticket to the event to "highlight the gross injustice of election problems" in the Florida congressional district.

Many Florida members of Congress gave their tickets to family or friends. Buchanan invited his wife. Democratic Rep. Tim Mahoney of Palm Beach Gardens invited Army Spc. Joshua Shirley of LaBelle, who was stationed in Iraq last month when his brother, Sgt. Luke Shirley, was seriously injured by a land mine.

A Coast Guardsman from Broward County who has patrolled the Persian Gulf near Iraq may have received the best invitation, however. Petty Officer 2nd Class Nathan Thomas of Hollywood was the invited guest of first lady Laura Bush, and he was seated in her box Tuesday night for the speech.

Thomas joined the Coast Guard in August 2001, according to the White House, and has been twice deployed to the region -- for a total of seven consecutive months in 2006.

He was part of the U.S. Coast Guard Patrol Forces in Southwest Asia, Bahrain and Kuwait, where his job was to work as a boarding officer, on assignment to protect two major Iraqi offshore oil terminals from potential terrorist attacks.

As part of his work there, the White House said, Thomas designed a training video and lesson plan on law enforcement tactics on boarding missions.

He used those resources to train more than 500 foreign military servicemen, including marines and navy personnel from Iraq and Kuwait, the White House said.

In addition, "he trained 80 U.S. Coast Guard and 60 U.S. Navy members deployed to the Persian Gulf in high-risk, noncompliant boarding procedures, thereby improving the capabilities and readiness of coalition forces," the White House said.

Jennings lost the election by fewer than 400 votes, but is challenging the results because the voting machines failed to register votes in the congressional race for more than 18,000 voters in Sarasota County.

Some observers chalked it up to particularly nasty primary and general election campaigns, others to a bad ballot design. But Jennings contends the machines malfunctioned and cost her the election. She's suing to examine the computer source code used in the county's voting machines.

A state circuit judge last month refused to give Jennings access to the software; she's appealing the decision.

But Congress has the last say in who sits in the chamber and Democrats have signaled intense interest in the outcome of the contest. The chair of the House Administration Committee, which would investigate the matter, sent a letter to the Florida appeals court, urging it to give Jennings full access to the computer code. The court has rejected the letter.

Jennings, though, remains a favorite on Capitol Hill. She attended a breakfast Tuesday for new Democratic members of Congress and spent some of the day working the phones at the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, which helped her set up a fundraising account for the election challenge.

She said she was warmly greeted at the breakfast and encouraged to keep waging the battle. One member, she noted, has received more than 100 letters from constituents alarmed about the lack of paper ballots for voting machines.

"It's no small matter," she said. ``People are concerned about the situation."

No Money, No Problem (RC)

By Kate Ackley

Roll Call, January 24, 2007

Any penny-pinching lobbyists looking to save a few thousand dollars in the sure-to-break-records 2008 presidential race have the perfect candidate to throw their theoretical support behind: Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.).

Not only has Obama's presidential exploratory committee said it will refuse all donations from political action committees, but it also is barring cash from registered federal lobbyists. Word has just started to spread among K Street's Democrats that when it comes to the candidate's coffers, they're off the hook.

"Thank, God," quipped one prominent Democratic lobbyist who does not publicly support any candidate. "Now I'm for him."

DOJ_NMG_0121098

Another well-known K Street Democrat, one who publicly supports another candidate in the party's primary field, echoed those sentiments, saying lobbyists are high-fiving the move.

"Most people are happy about it," this lobbyist said. "Some people are going to get hit up by multiple candidates, but not by Barack."

This lobbyist said Obama can likely succeed in raising the $50 million he'll need to be competitive in early primaries through online donations and grass-roots support from beyond the Beltway, other Democratic contenders such as Sens. Chris Dodd (Conn.) and Joseph Biden (Del.) would find that banning lobbyists' contributions "could potentially affect their ability to remain competitive" since both have large donor networks in the advocacy world.

The party's frontrunner, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) will cash lobbyists' campaign donations, too. But former Sen. John Edwards (D-N.C.) won't. An aide with the Edwards campaign confirmed that Edwards wants nothing to do with the money of PACs or federally-registered lobbyists.

Among the qualifications for acceptable donations listed on Obama's Web site are that the funds are not from a PAC. A donor also must certify that, "This contribution is not made from the funds of an individual registered as a federal lobbyist or a foreign agent, or an entity that is a federally registered lobbying firm or foreign agent."

Dan Pfeiffer, a spokesman for Obama's exploratory committee, said the prohibition is not limited to Web donations. "The same criteria applies to all donations," he said, including old fashioned handwritten checks. Pfeiffer said he was not certain whether Obama's campaign also would turn away funds that lobbyists helped raise from their family members, friends and non-lobbyist clients and colleagues or whether it applies to lobbyists who are registered at the state or local level.

While most lobbyists privately cheered Obama's move as a money-saver for their own bank accounts, one lobbyist who supports Obama's candidacy said he was disappointed not to be able to put his money behind the presidential contender. "He just saved me $2,000, but I wish I could write the check," the lobbyist said.

Obama, who has been a leading proponent of tightening lobbying ethics laws, has not always shied away from lobbyist and PAC money. In the 2005-2006 cycle, according to the Federal Election Commission, Obama reported collecting about $100,000 from PACs alone, including those connected with BellSouth, Coca-Cola, Johnson & Johnson and the National Association of Realtors.

"If you're a lobbyist you just have to accept that elected officials, especially in the Democratic party, have decided we're a target and they're going to score political points on us," said one Democratic lobbyist.

New Congress, New Clients. Longtime lobbyist Alan Roth, a partner with Lent Scrivner & Roth and, more importantly, a one-time aide to Energy and Commerce Committee Chairman John Dingell (D-Mich.) has been tapped by pharmaceutical company Amgen, which has been locked in a long-running legislative feud with rival firm Roche.

Roth, who served as Democratic staff director and chief counsel on the tony committee in the 1990s, also added AT&T and Qualcomm to his firm's client roster and is close to inking a deal with the United States Telecom Association.

"After 10 years as a Democratic lobbyist, it's nice to get your phone calls returned," said Roth, who added that the firm is looking to pick up another Democrat. The firm's Louis Finkel left late last year for a corporate lobbying job with oil giant Exxon Mobil Corp., but Finkel has returned to Capitol Hill to work for the Science Committee.

As for the Amgen-Roche fight, the two companies have been warring over patent laws that could allow a Roche product that treats anemia into the U.S. market to compete with one of Amgen's most profitable therapies, Epogen.

K Street Moves. Sonnenschein Nath & Rosenthal has added John Russell IV and Gilberto Ocañas to its national public law and policy strategies group. Russell, who spent a decade on Capitol Hill including a stint as deputy to the chief of staff for former Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.), is signing on as managing director. Ocañas, who in 2000 led the National Latino Presidential Campaign for the Democratic National Committee, will be a senior adviser. "John and Gilberto both will be tremendous assets to Sonnenschein's public policy practice," said Mike McNamara, chair of Sonnenschein's lobbying group.

· Kerry Feehery, communications director to Sen. Mel Martinez (R-Fla.), has left Capitol Hill to lobby on behalf of the new Florida Gov. Charlie Crist (R). Her title will be director of the executive office of the Governor.

· Janene Jackson, formerly a staff member for the D.C. City Council, is joining the D.C. Chamber of Commerce as senior vice president of external affairs, a position that amounts to the group's top lobbyist.

Watergate Figure E. Howard Hunt Dies (AP)

By Tim Reynolds

AP, January 24, 2007

E. Howard Hunt, who helped organize the Watergate break-in, leading to the greatest scandal in American political history and the downfall of Richard Nixon's presidency, died Tuesday. He was 88.

Hunt died at a Miami hospital after a lengthy bout with pneumonia, according to his son Austin Hunt.

DOJ_NMG_0121099

The elder Hunt was many things: World War II soldier, CIA officer, organizer of both a Guatemalan coup and the botched Bay of Pigs invasion, and author of more than 80 books, many from the spy-tale genre.

Yet the bulk of his notoriety came from the one thing he always insisted he wasn't — a Watergate burglar. He often said he preferred the term "Watergate conspirator."

"I will always be called a Watergate burglar, even though I was never in the damn place," Hunt told The Miami Herald in 1997. "But it happened. Now I have to make the best of it."

While working for the CIA, Hunt recruited four of the five actual burglars — Bernard Barker, Virgilio Gonzalez, Rolando Eugenio Martinez and Frank Sturgis, all who had worked for Hunt a decade earlier in the Bay of Pigs invasion.

All four also had ties to Miami, where part of the Watergate plan was hatched. He said the burglary's aim was to see whether Fidel Castro's Cuban regime had given money to the campaign of Nixon's Democratic opponent, George McGovern.

"According to street gossip both in Washington and Miami, Mr. Castro had been making substantial contributions to the McGovern campaign," Hunt told CNN in February 1992. "And the idea was ... that somewhere in the books of the Democratic National Committee those illicit funds would be found."

The idea was wrong, and the fallout escalated into huge political scandal.

Nixon resigned on Aug. 9, 1974. Twenty-five men were sent to prison for their involvement in the botched plan, and a new era of skepticism toward government began.

"I had always assumed, working for the CIA for so many years, that anything the White House wanted done was the law of the land," Hunt told People magazine for its May 20, 1974, issue. "I viewed this like any other mission. It just happened to take place inside this country."

The Hunt recruits and James W. McCord Jr., security director for the Committee for the Re-election of the President, were arrested June 17, 1972, at the Watergate office building. One of the burglars was found to have Hunt's White House phone number.

Hunt and fellow operative G. Gordon Liddy, along with the five arrested at Watergate, were indicted on federal charges three months later. Hunt and his recruits pleaded guilty in January 1973, and McCord and Liddy were found guilty.

In March 1973, McCord wrote a letter to the federal judge in his case, John J. Sirica, claiming perjury occurred and that there was political pressure applied to the defendants to plead guilty and remain silent.

In a secretly recorded conversation that same month that became one of the key pieces of evidence of the White House cover-up, White House Counsel John Dean told Nixon that "we're being blackmailed ... Hunt now is demanding another $72,000 for his own personal expenses; another $50,000 to pay his attorneys' fees."

After some further discussion, Nixon said: "If you need the money, I mean you could get the money. ... I mean it's not easy, but it could be done."

Hunt eventually spent 33 months in prison on a conspiracy charge, and said he was bitter that he was sent to jail while Nixon was allowed to resign.

"I felt that in true politician's fashion, he'd assumed a degree of responsibility but not the blame," he told The Associated Press in 1992. "It wasn't my idea to go into the Watergate."

Hunt also was involved in organizing an event that foreshadowed Watergate: the burglary of the the office of the Beverly Hills psychiatrist treating Daniel Ellsberg, the defense analyst who leaked the Pentagon Papers, published in 1971.

Hunt and Liddy — the so-called White House "plumbers" — broke into Ellsberg's office to gain information about him. The break-in was revealed during the 1973 espionage trial against Ellsberg and co-defendant Anthony Russo, and was one of several incidents that led to dismissal of the case because of government misconduct.

Watergate was one of many wild tales — some true, some not — that followed Hunt through the final decades of his colorful life.

His alleged involvement in the purported conspiracy to kill President John F. Kennedy was among the most popular spy-esque stories Hunt was linked with. One theory, which still exists in the minds of some, was that Hunt was in Dallas on the day Kennedy was shot, that his image was captured in photographs from the scene.

"I was in Washington, D.C., on Nov. 22, 1963," Hunt wrote in a December 1975 letter to Time magazine, a note penned while he was incarcerated at Eglin Air Force Base's prison camp. "It is a physical law that an object can occupy only one space at one time."

Everette Howard Hunt was born Oct. 9, 1918, in Hamburg, N.Y., graduated from Brown University in 1940 and was commissioned as a Naval Reserve officer in Annapolis, Md. the following year. He served as a destroyer gunnery officer, was injured at sea and honorably discharged from the Navy.

From 1949 through 1970 he worked for the CIA, and was involved in the operation that overthrew Jacobo Arbenz as Guatemala's president in 1954, plus the failed Bay of Pigs invasion in 1961.

DOJ_NMG_0121100

Hunt declared bankruptcy in 1997, largely blaming his Watergate fines and legal fees. A court overturned a $650,000 libel settlement he was awarded in 1981 stemming from an article alleging his involvement in the assassination of Kennedy, and he never received any of that money.

"I think I've paid my debt to society," Hunt said in 1997. "I think I've paid it amply."

Hunt spent his final years in a modest home in Miami's Biscayne Park neighborhood with his second wife, Laura Martin Hunt, and declined many interview requests from The Associated Press.

He has a memoir coming out next month titled "American Spy: My Secret History in the CIA, Watergate and Beyond."

Hunt's first wife, the former Dorothy Wetzel Day Goutiere, died in a plane crash in 1972. Besides his wife, Hunt was survived by six children.

A memorial service was scheduled for Monday in Miami.

Ex-Spy Crafted Watergate, Other Schemes (WP)

By Patricia Sullivan

The Washington Post, January 24, 2007

E. Howard Hunt, 88, the shadowy former CIA man who organized the Watergate break-in and other "dirty tricks" that ultimately brought down the presidency of Richard M. Nixon, died of complications from pneumonia yesterday at a hospital in Miami.

The Watergate episode was the most notorious caper in a colorful career that included the overthrow of a Guatemalan president, oversight of a group of Cuban exiles in the Bay of Pigs fiasco and such over-the-top ideas as firebombing the Brookings Institution to distract guards while his crew burglarized the think tank.

Melodramatic and devious in character, resembling the actor Gene Hackman in appearance, Hunt donned a cheap red wig and wore a device that altered his gait while casing another burglary site -- the office of a psychiatrist to Daniel Ellsberg, who had released the classified Pentagon Papers on the Vietnam War.

Hunt recruited four of the five Cuban exiles who broke into the Democratic national headquarters at the Watergate Hotel on June 17, 1972. He was watching the burglary from an adjacent building when the group was discovered and arrested, and it was his phone number in their address books that let investigators and reporters connect the break-in to the president and his reelection campaign.

Hunt's covert background included some 20 years in the CIA, where he helped overthrow the president of Guatemala, Jacobo Arbenz Guzman, in 1954. As the CIA station chief in Mexico City, he planted false newspaper stories about politicians who were out of favor. In 1961, he was the planning director for a group of Cuban exiles who unsuccessfully attempted to overthrow Fidel Castro by invading the island at the Bay of Pigs. That's where he met Bernard Barker, Virgilio Gonzalez, Eugenio Martinez and Frank Sturgis, whom he would recruit for a covert group of "plumbers" whose job it was to fix the "leaks" that threatened the Nixon administration.

Their first job was in Los Angeles, where they broke into Ellsberg's psychiatrist's office. Back in Washington, Hunt and G. Gordon Liddy hatched the Watergate plan.

"What we were looking for is the same thing every congressional committee is looking for today, which was evidence of illegal foreign contributions," he told the Miami Herald in 1997. "That was the rationale for going in there. We'd heard rumors that both the Vietnamese and Fidel Castro were inserting funds illegally into the Democratic National Committee. And the idea was to look at the books, photograph them, in and out, and that's it. It didn't seem like such a deal to me. You know, I'd been doing that stuff for years, a 'black-bag job' into other embassies. But you know, I didn't have skilled people."

Hunt didn't let his loyalty to Nixon prevent him from pressuring his bosses for money. In a secretly recorded conversation in March 1973 that became one of the key pieces of evidence of the White House cover-up, White House Counsel John Dean told Nixon that "we're being blackmailed. . . . Hunt now is demanding another $72,000 for his own personal expenses; another $50,000 to pay his attorneys' fees."

After some further discussion, Nixon said: "If you need the money, I mean you could get the money. . . . I mean it's not easy, but it could be done."

Nixon, facing impeachment, resigned Aug. 9, 1974.

Hunt spent 33 months in prison for his role in the Watergate burglary. He was bitter that Nixon did not stand up for him. President Ronald Reagan rejected a pardon request for Hunt in 1983.

He was born Everette Howard Hunt in Hamburg, N.Y., on Oct. 9, 1918. He graduated from Brown University in 1940 and was commissioned as a Naval Reserve officer the following year. A talented writer, he worked as a correspondent for Life magazine until he was called to active duty during World War II. He served as a gunnery officer on a destroyer.

DOJ_NMG_0121101

After the war, he received a Guggenheim fellowship and worked as a screenwriter before joining the Office of Strategic Services, the precursor to the CIA. He retired from the CIA in 1970 because "I found out the CIA was just infested with Democrats," he told Slate magazine in 2004.

Throughout his life, he wrote more than 80 spy novels and thrillers, usually under such pseudonyms as John Baxter, Robert Dietrich, David St. John, P.S. Donoghue, Gordon Davis or David St. John. He described one of his leading characters, Peter Ward, who shares some of his background as a Washington-dwelling Brown graduate, as "the secret agent with the taste and the talent for fine living."

Tad Szulc, a former New York Times reporter, wrote in the 1974 book "Compulsive Spy: The Strange Career of E. Howard Hunt" that Hunt was a relatively low-level CIA officer not well thought of by most of his colleagues and superiors. Hunt's autobiography, "American Spy: My Secret History in the CIA, Watergate & Beyond," has a March publication date.

Hunt declared bankruptcy in 1997, largely blaming his Watergate fines and legal fees. A $650,000 libel settlement he was awarded in 1981 stemming from an article alleging his involvement in the assassination of President John F. Kennedy was overturned, and he received none of that money.

In the past few years, Hunt lost a leg to complications from atherosclerosis, battled lymphoma in his jaw and used an electric wheelchair to get around.

Hunt's first wife, Dorothy Wetzel Day Goutiere, was killed in the Dec. 8, 1972, plane crash of United Airlines Flight 533 in Chicago. Congress, the FBI, and the National Transportation Safety Board investigated the crash, but they did not find any basis for determining that the crash was not purely accidental. The more than $10,000 in cash found in Dorothy Hunt's handbag was generally regarded as part of the "hush money" paid to Watergate defendants in an attempt to procure their silence regarding White House involvement.

Survivors include his wife of 30 years, Laura Martin Hunt of Miami; and six children.

Who Cares About The Poor? (WSJ)

By Arthur C. Brooks

The Wall Street Journal, January 24, 2007

When control of the U.S. Congress changed hands earlier this month, it was clear that a raised minimum wage would be high on the legislative agenda. And indeed, an increase to $7.25 from $5.15 per hour raced through the House and is unlikely to face much substantive opposition in the Senate.

The Democrats have two reasons for focusing on the minimum wage. The first is poverty: $5.15 an hour is insufficient to support a family -- according to the Congressional Budget Office, about 18% of workers in 2005 making between $5.15 and the new minimum wage lived below the poverty line. Democrats believe raising the legal minimum will help solve this problem.

The Democrats' second reason for a minimum wage hike is relative (not absolute) deprivation: They hope that raising the minimum will lower income inequality, which has been a concern of the political left for generations. The Democratic National Committee defended the hike by charging, "The federal minimum wage is so disgracefully low that now, during a period of extraordinary prosperity for the nation's corporations and wealthiest families, the average CEO earns as much in just a few hours on the first workday of the year as a full-time minimum wage worker earns the entire year." The economic chasm between the CEO and the minimum wage worker, in this view, is evidence of an unjust society.

While just about everybody -- left and right -- agrees that poverty is unacceptable (although policy makers disagree as to whether a minimum wage hike would help or hurt the working poor), conservatives do not share liberals' concern about income inequality. According to the 2005 Maxwell Poll on Civic Engagement and Inequality, self-described liberals are more than twice as likely as conservatives to say income inequality in America is a "serious problem." And while 84% of liberals think the government should do more to reduce inequality, only 25% of conservatives agree.

This is empirical substantiation for the old cliché that conservatives just don't care about the poor, right? Wrong. In fact, the data do not tell us that conservatives are uncaring; they actually tell us that conservatives are optimists. Conservatives are relatively untroubled by inequality, and unsupportive of government income redistribution, because they believe the American economy provides private opportunities to succeed. Liberals are far more pessimistic than conservatives about the possibility of a better future for Americans of modest means.

Consider the evidence. While 92% of conservatives believe that hard work and perseverance can help a person overcome disadvantage, only 65% of liberals think so. This difference of opinion, contrary to the convention, is not because conservatives earn more money. In fact, lower-income conservatives are about twice as likely as upper-income liberals to say they think there's "a lot" of upward mobility in America. If a liberal and a conservative are exactly identical in income, education, sex, family situation, and race, the conservative will be 20 percentage points more likely than the liberal to say that hard work leads to success among the disadvantaged.

DOJ_NMG_0121102

Naturally, well-to-do liberals must be amazed at the gullibility of the millions of poorer conservatives who still cling to the idea of America's promise of a better future through hard work and perseverance. Sunny conservatives of all economic classes may very well prefer to see things their way about America. Are conservatives naïve, or are liberals unjustifiably dour? Reasonable people disagree on this question. One thing that is clear, however, is that conservatives' lack of anxiety about income inequality -- and perhaps even their opposition to redistributive government policies -- is evidence of a light heart, not a hard one.

Mr. Brooks, a professor of public administration at Syracuse University's Maxwell School of Public Affairs, is the author of "Who Really Cares: The Surprising Truth About Compassionate Conservatism" (Basic Books, 2006).

A Healthy, Well-Regulated Wall Street (NYT)

The New York Times, January 24, 2007

A healthy financial sector is crucial to the economic well-being of this country and to New York City in particular. And it is true that Wall Street is facing ever stiffer competition from financial markets like London's and Hong Kong's. But beware of the doomsayers who argue that American markets are in free fall and — not incidentally — contend that looser regulations are the only way to save them.

Senator Charles Schumer and Mayor Michael Bloomberg joined that chorus this week. In a new report, they warn that without changes to what they call America's "stringent regulations and high litigation risks," this country's share of the lucrative finance business will decline further, at a cost of billions of dollars and thousands of jobs.

We certainly don't want American regulations to drive away good business. But it is first important to remember that when investors lose their shirts in huge frauds like Enron, plenty of damage is done to markets as well. And any discussion about the health of our financial industry must be as honest and open as possible. This report at times seems to cull facts to prove predetermined conclusions.

For example, to support its argument that the United States markets are losing ground, the report notes that over the first 10 months of 2006, American exchanges managed barely a third of the overall share of initial public offerings that they did in 2001. It strikes us as odd that a report released in late January could not include data from the previous November. In that month, the Securities and Exchange Commission registered 32 initial public offerings worth a total of $8 billion — the highest monthly total in five years.

The report goes on to say that the number and cost of securities class-action settlements in this nation set an all-time high in 2005. That's hardly surprising, considering the many settlements in that year stemming from the enormous fraud at WorldCom. But what about last year? The number of securities fraud class-action suits fell 38 percent in 2006, to the lowest level in 10 years. And in May, prosecutors indicted the nation's leading class-action securities law firm, Milberg Weiss Bershad & Schulman, for allegedly making secret payments to plaintiffs.

The report raises some valuable questions, and we agree with some of its conclusions. Loosening restrictions on work visas for talented foreigners and visitor visas for dealmakers strikes us as essential. And efforts under way to reduce the costs associated with complying with Sarbanes-Oxley regulations — for example, by focusing audits on the riskiest parts of balance sheets — are a valuable recalibration of the law's most onerous provisions.

While some common-sense changes are needed, the rights of shareholders and the stability of our markets cannot be trampled in the headlong rush for competitive advantages. United States financial markets are still the largest in the world, and Wall Street just enjoyed a year of record profits. And while we're talking about reforms, financial firms might take a look in the mirror and ask whether lower underwriting fees and smaller bonuses could also contribute to their long-term health and the health of America's financial markets.

Petraeus Supports Troop Increase In Iraq (AP)

By Robert Burns

AP, January 24, 2007

The general who will carry out President Bush's plan for Iraq cautioned on Tuesday against expecting quick results and used bleak terms to describe a country engulfed in war for nearly four years. Yet, he said the strategy can work as long as the Iraqis do their part.

Facing a skeptical Congress and an American public that has turned starkly against the war, Army Lt. Gen. David Petraeus promised lawmakers that as top U.S. commander in Iraq, he would speak up if he determines the new approach is failing. Bush is adding 21,500 U.S. troops to secure Baghdad and Anbar Province, home to many insurgents.

DOJ_NMG_0121103

"The situation in Iraq is dire," he told the Senate Armed Services Committee, which is expected to easily approve his nomination for the Iraq command. "The stakes are high. There are no easy choices. The way ahead will be very hard. ... But hard is not hopeless."

Though Petraeus was warmly received by members of the panel, the war he will help lead — and Bush's plan to prevail in it — faced a rougher reception.

White House hopeful Sen. Hillary Clinton, D-N.Y., launched a sharp attack on the administration's Iraq record and called Bush's new strategy "a dead end."

"I wonder whether the clock has already run out," said Sen. Susan Collins, R-Maine, a sponsor of a GOP-led resolution saying the Senate disagrees with the build up. She said she was worried that U.S. troops in Iraq are already perceived "not as liberators, but as occupiers."

One of Congress' few vocal supporters of the war, Sen. Lindsey Graham, R-S.C., warned that upcoming votes criticizing the president's strategy would be harmful.

"No matter how well-intentioned, a resolution being opposed to this new strategy is a vote of no confidence in you," he told Petraeus. "No matter how well-intentioned, the enemy will see it as a weakened resolve."

Petraeus made his appearance as the Bush administration struggled to limit Republican defections when a Senate committee votes Wednesday on a measure declaring the president's new Iraq policy is not in the national interest.

All 11 Democrats on the Foreign Relations Committee panel are expected to support the proposal, and so far, Nebraska's Sen. Chuck Hagel is alone among 10 Republicans in favor of it.

The measure is expected to advance to the Senate floor next week, and several Republicans opposed to Bush's policy said they prefer a more mildly worded alternative. Advanced by GOP Sen. John Warner of Virginia and others, it expresses disagreement with the president's plans without criticizing them as contrary to the national interest, and also leaves open the possibility of adding troops to Anbar Province in western Iraq.

Sen. Gordon Smith, R-Ore., seeking re-election in 2008, said he was swinging behind Warner's proposal. "This war has devolved far beyond what we authorized," placing U.S. troops in the middle of a sectarian war between Shiites and Sunnis, he told The Associated Press.

Warner and Senate Democrats are eventually expected to try and reach a compromise on the issue. If they are successful, the result would likely be a dramatic bipartisan rejection of a commander in chief in wartime.

If confirmed, Petraeus will implement Bush's plan to send an extra 21,500 U.S. troops to Iraq — most of them to Baghdad where the general said they will operate from smaller, dispersed bases in the city to help the Iraqi security forces clear specific neighborhoods of insurgents, illegal militias and death squads.

At Tuesday's hearing, Petraeus told the lawmakers that no amount of U.S. effort will succeed unless Iraqis learn to compromise.

"Ultimately, the outcome will be determined by the Iraqis," Petraeus said.

Petraeus would replace Gen. George Casey, who has led U.S. forces in Iraq since July 2004 and has been nominated to be the next Army chief of staff.

That move was part of a broad overhaul of the Iraq war effort. In addition to replacing Donald H. Rumsfeld with Robert Gates as defense secretary, Bush announced two weeks ago that he was increasing U.S. troop levels and ordering a more robust economic development program.

Levin, a leading war policy critic, pressed Petraeus on whether the flow of additional U.S. troops could be halted in midstream if the Iraqi government failed to meet its commitment to provide thousands more Iraqi troops.

"It could," Petraeus replied. Earlier, he said there were no "specific conditions" the Iraqis must meet in order to keep the flow of U.S. forces moving.

The last of five additional U.S. brigades are scheduled to arrive in the Iraqi capital in May; the first, from the 82nd Airborne Division, got there just days ago.

Asked by Sen. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., how long the extra troops would remain in Iraq, Petraeus said he did not know. Casey said last week they might begin leaving as soon as late summer.

Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., a leading proponent of Bush's plan, asked Petraeus how long he thought the U.S. buildup could be sustained.

"I am keenly aware of the strain" on the Army and Marine Corps, Petraeus said, adding that he welcomes Bush's proposal to increase the size of the land forces over the coming five years.

The concern about strains from the Iraq war also arose at a House hearing featuring the top Army and Marine Corps generals.

DOJ_NMG_0121104

"We have examined other war plans and our capability to respond to those plans, and we see that we are lacking in some areas in our ability to do so," said Gen. James Conway, commandant of the Marine Corps.

"We feel we would be able to respond with those forces that are not committed to Iraq or Afghanistan — that the response would be slower than we might like," he said.

Rep. Ike Skelton, D-Mo., chairman of the House Armed Services Committee, issued a written statement expressing similar worries. And he called Bush's troop buildup in Iraq "too little, far too late."

Asked by McCain how soon he thought he would know whether the new strategy was working, Petraeus said, "We would have indicators at the least during the late summer." As currently planned, he said, the last of the five additional U.S. Army brigades would be ready to fight in Baghdad by the end of May.

Petraeus said the U.S. military needs new, "greatly increased" contributions from other federal agencies to stabilize a country torn by political divisions and hobbled by a weak economy, a battered infrastructure and corrupt police.

General Says New Strategy In Iraq Can Work Over Time (NYT)

By Michael R. Gordon

The New York Times, January 24, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 23 — Lt. Gen. David H. Petraeus, President Bush's new choice as the top commander in Iraq, told senators on Tuesday that the new military strategy to secure Baghdad can work, and that he had asked that the additional troops the administration promised be deployed as quickly as possible.

In his first public comments about Mr. Bush's plan to send some 21,500 troops, the general described the situation in Iraq as "dire" but not hopeless. He asserted that the "persistent presence" of American and Iraqi forces in strife-ridden Baghdad neighborhoods was a necessary step, but also cautioned that the mission would not succeed if the Iraqi government did not carry out its program of political reconciliation.

"The way ahead will be neither quick nor easy, and undoubtedly there will be tough days," he told the Senate Armed Services Committee. "We face a determined, adaptable, barbaric enemy. He will try to wait us out. In fact any such endeavor is a test of wills, and there are no guarantees."

But much of the hearing focused not on details of the strategy about to unfold in Iraq, but rather on the political debate within the Senate over resolutions that would signal disapproval of the new strategy.

When Senator John McCain, Republican of Arizona, who has long favored sending more troops to Iraq, asked if approval of a Senate resolution assailing Mr. Bush's new strategy could hurt the morale of American troops, the general replied, "It would not be a beneficial effect, sir."

Asked by Senator Joseph I. Lieberman of Connecticut, who also backs the plan, if a resolution would also "give the enemy some encouragement" by suggesting that the American people are divided, General Petraeus replied, "That's correct, sir."

That answer sparked admonishments by critics of Mr. Bush's strategy, who insisted that the point of the Senate resolutions is to put pressure on the government of Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki of Iraq to follow through on its political program and take more responsibility for its own security.

"We know this policy is going forward," said Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton, Democrat of New York. "We know the troops are moving. We know that we're not likely to stop this escalation. But we are going to do everything we can to send a message to our government and the Iraqi government that they had better change, because the enemy we are confronting is adaptable."

Senator John W. Warner, the Virginia Republican who is promoting a resolution opposing Mr. Bush's troop reinforcement plan, cautioned General Petraeus to be sure that "this colloquy has not entrapped you into some responses that you might later regret."

By the end of the hearing, General Petraeus sought to extricate himself from the political tussle by insisting that as a military man he did not want to take a position on the Senate debate. "There are a number of resolutions out there," he said. "Learning that minefields are best avoided and gone around rather than walked through on some occasions, I'd like to leave that one there."

Senator Carl Levin of Michigan, the Democratic chairman of the panel, said later that he was satisfied that the general had not intended to involve himself in the debate. The exchanges at the hearing did not appear to have any ill effect on the prospects for the confirmation of General Petraeus, and Mr. McCain said he hoped the commander would "catch the next flight" to Iraq after winning Senate confirmation.

When their questions focused on the military plan, senators elicited several new details. General Petraeus said Lt. Gen. Raymond T. Odierno, the day-to-day commander of American troops in Iraq, advised that in order to carry out the new strategy, five additional brigades were needed in Baghdad and two additional battalions were needed in Anbar Province in western Iraq.

Under the current deployment schedule, it will be May before all five of the brigades are in Iraq, but General Petraeus hinted that he would like them sooner, saying that he had asked the Pentagon to dispatch them “as rapidly as possible.”

General Petraeus acknowledged that the guidelines in the military’s counterinsurgency manual implied that 120,000 troops would be needed to secure Baghdad. But he reasoned that the roughly 32,000 American troops that would be deployed in the capital under the plan would be enough, because the total number of American and Iraqi security personnel would be about 85,000, while the use of civilian contractors to guard government buildings would reduce troop requirements.

If the troops are sent according to the current schedule, General Petraeus said the United States would know by late summer if the plan to clear contested neighborhoods of insurgents and militias, hold them with American and Iraqi security forces and win public support through reconstruction was working.

He said he would raise the issue of suspending troop reinforcements with his military superiors if the Iraqi government appeared to have not lived up to its commitments. But he suggested that withholding assistance from specific Iraqi institutions that fall short would have a greater influence. The general also said that a decision to withdraw American troops within six months would lead to more sectarian attacks and increased “ethnic cleansing.”

General Petraeus acknowledged that he had concerns about the absence of a unified command structure. Under the new plan, the Iraqi Army and police units will be under direct Iraqi command. The American Army units that work with them will be under a parallel American command. To ensure proper coordination, American officers are trying to establish joint command posts.

Senator Levin said his committee had repeatedly asked the administration to make available a list of the security and political “benchmarks” the Iraqi had agreed to meet. He warned that the committee would use its subpoena power or hold up military nominations if benchmarks were not provided.

By insisting on that the benchmarks be provided, Mr. Levin seemed to be trying to position himself to argue that the “surge” of reinforcements be suspended if the Iraqis fell short of meeting commitments.

Petraeus Expresses Confidence In Buildup (WP)

By Ann Scott Tyson

The Washington Post, January 24, 2007

Lt. Gen. David H. Petraeus, the expected new top commander in Iraq, yesterday gave Congress a stark preview of the challenge ahead, saying sectarian violence has reduced Baghdad's population to a daily struggle for survival, undermined the U.S. strategy of handing responsibility to Iraqi forces and created the prospect of a "failed state."

Petraeus voiced confidence, however, in a new approach that would shift the focus to protecting the population by pushing tens of thousands of additional U.S. and Iraqi troops deep into Baghdad neighborhoods, one aimed at allowing Iraq's government to "come to grips with" what he called an "exceedingly difficult situation."

"The way ahead will be neither quick nor easy, and undoubtedly there will be tough days. We face a determined, adaptable, barbaric enemy. He will try to wait us out," Petraeus told the Senate Armed Services Committee at a confirmation hearing. "Any such endeavor is a test of wills, and there are no guarantees."

Indeed, Petraeus promised simply to provide "the best leadership and direction I can muster" and "forthright" military advice, even if he concludes the mission is lost. "Should I determine that the new strategy cannot succeed, I will provide such an assessment," he said, reassuring senator after senator that he would speak up if he believed U.S. civilian leaders were making false statements about Iraq.

Twice a commander in Iraq, Petraeus won strong endorsement from both Democratic and Republican senators as one of the U.S. military's most talented officers -- but many also wished him "Godspeed" in leading what they described as the "last chance" for the U.S. military to bring stability to Iraq.

Petraeus said he had asked Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates and Marine Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, to execute the push of 21,500 U.S. troops into Iraq "as quickly as possible," saying the five additional brigades should be in place in Baghdad by May, providing a new "critical mass" to clear and hold districts of the city of 6 million people.

Asked by Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) whether he could carry out his mission without the additional troops, Petraeus said no. He said the Pentagon is planning options for continuing the buildup, and said Gates told him it was his job to request additional forces if needed. He applauded Gates's recent decision to increase the permanent size of the Army and Marine Corps by 92,000, acknowledging the stress that has depleted the readiness of U.S. ground forces.

Senior Army officers said yesterday that all the Army's combat brigades in the United States -- except for the handful on alert or ready to go overseas within a month -- are currently rated as unready to deploy. If there is another "combat scenario" involving the demand for heavy conventional forces, "that's where America is taking risk," Lt. Gen. Stephen Speakes, the Army's deputy chief of staff, told reporters.

DOJ_NMG_0121106

Under questioning from senators opposed to the Iraq buildup, Petraeus allowed for the possibility that the troop flow could be aborted if the Iraqi government fails to provide three more Iraqi army brigades for Baghdad or fulfill other pledges. He said Iraqi commanders told him yesterday that three or four additional Iraqi battalions had already arrived in Baghdad, and that some of them, with predominantly Kurdish troops, were being welcomed by citizens.

He rejected the concern raised by Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) that the addition of more U.S. troops would inflame the insurgency. "I think that at this point in Baghdad, the population just wants to be secure, and truthfully, they don't care who does it," he said.

Petraeus acknowledged that the strategy shift to "controlling" terrain and protecting the population would lead to heightened risks for U.S. troops, who have suffered a spike in casualties in recent days. He assured senators that U.S. troops in Baghdad would remain under an American military chain of command, though he acknowledged the complications of having a dual command chain with partnering Iraqi forces.

Despite such risks, Petraeus warned of incalculable dangers of any rapid U.S. military withdrawal from Iraq, as favored by many congressional Democrats, saying it would lead to intensified terrorist inroads, "ethnic cleansing" and a bloodbath in Baghdad.

In a move that is unusual for an active-duty officer, Petraeus also spoke against pending Senate resolutions disapproving of the new Bush administration strategy. Asked by Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman (I-Conn.) whether those resolutions would give encouragement to the enemy by exposing divisions among the American people, he replied: "That's correct."

His statement drew a sharp rebuke from Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.), who said, "I very sincerely but wholeheartedly disagree," saying the point was to send a message to Iraqis.

Pressed later by other senators -- including committee Chairman Carl M. Levin (D-Mich.) and John W. Warner (R-Va.) -- Petraeus said he did not intend his statements to be taken as opposing or supporting any resolutions.

Levin, a leading critic of the administration's Iraq policy, also repeatedly urged Petraeus to hold the Iraqi government accountable on benchmarks it agreed to with President Bush. "We certainly will to the very best of our ability," Petraeus answered.

Levin then asked what leverage the United States had over the Iraqi government if it failed to perform to expectations, as it has in the past. "Providing assistance or withholding assistance in various forms," Petraeus replied, agreeing with Levin that the consequences should be "clear, real and significant."

Sen. Bill Nelson (D-Fla.) asked if Petraeus had a "high degree of confidence" that the new plan would work.

"I believe this plan can succeed if in fact all of those enablers and all the rest of the assistance is provided," Petraeus said, adding that interagency help for the war effort "needs to be substantially more robust than it is."

On a personal note, Petraeus said he fully understood the daunting job he faces.

"Many of the e-mails I've received in recent weeks have had as their subject line 'Congratulations -- I think,' " he said. "I know how heavy a rucksack I will have to shoulder in Iraq if confirmed," he said. But he said he would accept the call to "soldier again with those who are part of the brotherhood of the close fight" and out of an obligation to help the Iraqi people.

America's New Round In Iraq (CSM)

By Peter Grier

The Christian Science Monitor, January 24, 2007

Only days after President Bush announced a new US strategy for Iraq, a potentially pivotal battle for Baghdad already may have begun.

Sectarian violence in Iraq's capital has spiked in recent days, even as the first US and Iraqi government military reinforcements have deployed into the embattled city.

The car bombs that racked Baghdad Monday may not have been a response to the presence of new troops, strictly speaking. But if nothing else, they emphasize the chaos into which the city has sunk, and the prospect that the new US and Iraqi troops may be at just the beginning of what promises to be a difficult and protracted counterinsurgency campaign.

"The way ahead will be neither quick nor easy," said the incoming US commander for Iraq, Army Lt. Gen. David Petraeus, at his Senate confirmation hearing Tuesday.

Two bombs struck separate Shiite targets Tuesday, killing five – a day after a double car bomb killed 88 in the most deadly such attack in Baghdad in two months.

For US troops, recent days similarly have been difficult. Twenty-eight died over the weekend, including 12 in a helicopter apparently shot down northeast of Baghdad, raising the war's US military toll to 3,064, according to an Associated Press count.

A few deadly events can distort the casualty trend lines in Iraq, notes Stephen Biddle, a senior fellow in defense policy at the Council on Foreign Relations. Thus it is easy to read too much into a difficult few days.

DOJ_NMG_0121107

If anything, sectarian fighters in Baghdad soon may melt into the population, in an effort to wait out the coming surge in US and Iraqi government troops.

"My hunch is we are likely to see an artificial decrease in casualties soon," said Mr. Biddle.

That said, the White House and US military leadership are walking a number of difficult tightropes in regard to Iraq, Biddle adds. They are insisting they will stay the course, while hinting to the US public that the course will not be too long. They are warning the Iraqi government that if it does not move against Shiite death squads, the US may pull out – while at the same time insisting that US units will stay until the military job is done.

"The administration believes that a few months of calm [in Baghdad] will create momentum for reconciliation," says Biddle. "I'm concerned that nothing fundamental will have changed."

At his confirmation hearing Tuesday, General Petraeus was bluntly critical about the current situation in Iraq –perhaps more so than any Bush administration or military witness, ever.

He admitted that the current situation is dire. "Many Iraqis in Baghdad today confront life-or-death, stay-or-leave decisions on a daily basis, just to feed their children," he said.

Three of four promised battalions of Iraqi troops have already deployed into Baghdad, said Petraeus. All have more than 80 percent of their troops present.

On the US side, the 82nd Airborne Division's 2nd Brigade Combat team has also moved into Baghdad as part of the first of wave of US reinforcements. The paratroopers had been based in Kuwait as an Army ready reserve for the region.

The Iraqi and US forces will now provide a "persistent presence" in violence-racked Baghdad neighborhoods, said Petraeus, by living in 20 to 30 police stations or other fortified forward posts.

Setting this up won't be a quick operation. "It will take time for the additional forces to flow into Baghdad, and time for them to gain an understanding of the areas in which they will operate," said the new Iraq commander.

And the US command is fully aware that time may not be on their side, in this case. "My concern is that [the] timeline that we see needed is not the same timeline that the country is prepared to provide us," said Marine Commandant Gen. James Conway Tuesday at a hearing of the House Armed Services Committee.

Petraeus is not beloved by everyone in the US military. Some grumble that he is fond of press attention, among other things. At one point in his hearing, he did offhandedly remark about a conversation he had had with former NBC news anchor Tom Brokaw.

For the short term, however, the prospect of Petraeus as the new Iraq commander appeared to hearten the Senate Armed Services Committee, at the least. Sen. Edward Kennedy (D) of Massachusetts, for instance, quickly announced that he intended to vote for Petraeus's confirmation despite reservations about President Bush's policies.

Unsurprisingly, the questions of each key lawmaker said as much about them as they did about the general before them. Thus the panel chairman, Sen. Carl Levin (D) of Michigan, pressed Petraeus as to whether he believed the Iraqis would live up to their commitments. Sen. John McCain (R) of Arizona, a longtime proponent of a surge in US forces, asked whether the planned increase would be enough, and whether US forces now could withstand the strain of added deployments.

"I am keenly aware of the strain" on US troops, said Petraeus.

Blunt Commander Nominee Says 'Hard Is Not Hopeless' (LAT)

By Julian E. Barnes

The Los Angeles Times, January 24, 2007

WASHINGTON — President Bush's nominee to be the next commander in Iraq, Army Lt. Gen. David H. Petraeus, told Congress on Tuesday that the situation there is dire and poses "tough days" ahead, but he pleaded for time to begin executing a new strategy.

Petraeus, a Princeton University Ph.D. who developed the Army's counterinsurgency warfare manual, is expected to win Senate approval later this week. But as Petraeus fielded questions from senators of both parties about the deepening dilemma facing U.S. forces, he was forthcoming and occasionally blunt in his assessment of American odds in the war-torn country.

"The situation in Iraq is dire. The stakes are high. There are no easy choices. The way ahead will be very hard," he said. "But hard is not hopeless."

If confirmed as a replacement for Army Gen. George W. Casey, Petraeus would represent the first step in a military restructuring ordered by Bush as part of his new strategy to send in 21,500 additional U.S. troops. Navy Adm. William J. Fallon faces a hearing Jan. 30 to succeed retiring Gen. John P. Abizaid as commander of U.S. forces throughout the Middle East.

Throughout his hearing, Petraeus appeared assured and confident, answering questions crisply and directly. Asked by Sen. Joe Lieberman, I-Conn. if passage of a resolution denouncing the new Bush strategy would show the enemy that the American people are divided, Petraeus answered yes, it would.

After other senators -- both Republicans and Democrats -- objected, Petraeus backed away. When Sen. John Thune, R-S.D., tried to get him to take another swipe at the resolution, Petraeus became more diplomatic.

"Learning that mine fields are best avoided and gone around rather than walked through on some occasions, I'd like to leave that one there, senator," Petraeus said.

Petraeus has served two tours of duty in Iraq, first as commander of the 101st Airborne Division and then as the general overseeing the training of Iraqi forces. For the past 15 months, he has been the commanding general at Ft. Leavenworth, supervising much of the Army's education system and developing the military's war fighting doctrine, including the new counterinsurgency manual.

At Fort Leavenworth and in the pages of the Army's academic journal, Petraeus has argued the most important goal in a counterinsurgency fight is making the population feel safe. And on Capitol Hill on Tuesday, Petraeus said that would be the cornerstone of the new strategy.

He said the sectarian violence in Baghdad amounted to "soft ethnic cleansing" and described the risks taken by ordinary Iraqi citizens every day as "incalculable." The erosion of security, he argued, had become the primary challenge for the U.S.

So rather than focusing on training the Iraqis, the new priority would be improving security in Baghdad. The new strategy, he argued, was as important as the additional forces.

"The objective will be to achieve sufficient security to provide the space and time for the Iraqi government to come to grips with the tough decisions its members must make to enable Iraq to move forward," Petraeus said.

Skeptics of the surge latched on to the counterinsurgency manual arguing that for every 50 people, one police officer or soldier is needed. Under that formula, securing Baghdad, a city of 6 million, would require at least 120,000 Iraqi and U.S. troops. By Petraeus' count, once the additional U.S. forces arrive, there will be 85,000 U.S. and Iraqi troops in Baghdad.

"You wrote the book, general, but the policy is not by the book," said Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, D-N.Y., a member of the committee and a presidential contender in 2008. "And you are being asked to square the circle, to find a military solution to a political crisis."

Petraeus argued that the additional brigades flowing into Baghdad would double the number of U.S. forces in the city.

Despite Clinton's attack on the Bush administration plan, she said she would support Petraeus' nomination.

"The president is going forward with the policy, the debate is academic," Clinton said outside the hearing room. "I want the very best leadership for the young men and women who will be implementing this strategy, and I have no doubt Gen. Petraeus is the person to try and pull this off."

It will be late May before the full complement of five additional U.S. brigades arrives in Baghdad, Petraeus said. Petraeus said he would not need all the new units to begin executing the new strategy but would like to have many of the extra forces to begin the shift in earnest.

"I think you have to wait until you have a certain critical mass of forces on the ground to take action," Petraeus said.

Petraeus promised senators skeptical of the administration's plan that he would provide them regular updates. But he cautioned it would not be until all the additional forces are in place before he would get a real sense of whether the plan was working.

"I would think that we would have indicators at the least during the late summer of the ability to clear and hold and then build in the Baghdad area and to secure that population," he said.

Before troops move into an area, Petraeus suggested, U.S. units would need to assess their partner Iraqi units, meet the local leaders and learn about the localized sectarian tensions. Only then could U.S. forces successfully "hold and build" an area.

Petraeus said the new strategy has been tried with success in Fallouja and Tall Afar, where the U.S. moved to create "gated communities" to monitor and control the flow of people in and out of an area.

But the strategy, Petraeus emphasized throughout the hearing, would require time to work and patience from the Congress and public.

"None of this will be rapid," he said. "In fact, the way ahead will be neither quick nor easy, and there undoubtedly will be tough days."

Anti-surge Efforts Called Enemy Hope (WT)

By Rowan Scarborough

The Washington Times, January 24, 2007

The next U.S. commander for Iraq told Congress yesterday that pending Senate resolutions against a surge of more than 21,000 troops give the enemy hope by depicting America as divided on winning the war.

DOJ_NMG_0121109

Army Lt. Gen. David Petraeus, President Bush's choice to take over command in Iraq and change the tide of a deteriorating battle, revealed his assessment in questioning from the Senate's two leading war hawks: Sens. John McCain, Arizona Republican, and Joe Lieberman, Connecticut independent.

Mr. McCain, who supports a larger troop increase, asked what the results would be if senators "tell those troops that we support you, but we are convinced that you cannot accomplish your mission. ... What effect does that have on the morale?"

"Well, it would not be a beneficial effect, sir," Gen. Petraeus replied during a confirmation hearing to four-star rank before the Senate Armed Services Committee. "Obviously, a commander would like to go forward with as much flexibility as he can achieve."

Mr. Lieberman tried to pull Gen. Petraeus further into the upcoming Senate debate. He asked what effect an anti-surge Senate resolution would have on the enemy. After praising the U.S. system of open political debate, the general added, "having said that, a commander in such an endeavor would obviously like the enemy to feel that there's no hope."

"A Senate-passed resolution of disapproval for this new strategy in Iraq would give the enemy some encouragement," Mr. Lieberman said, to which Gen. Petraeus answered, "That's correct, sir."

The Senate Foreign Relations Committee is set to vote today on a nonbinding resolution from Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr., Delaware Democrat, that condemns Mr. Bush's plan. Sen. John W. Warner, Virginia Republican, has garnered bipartisan support for another resolution critical of the surge.

Gen. Petraeus spent much of the hearing explaining his views on counterinsurgency, assessing the "dire"situation in Iraq and predicting the troop surge can succeed. He testified that the government of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki has taken steps to change policy by bulking up Iraqi forces in Baghdad.

"The situation in Iraq is dire," he said. "The stakes are high. There are no easy choices. The way ahead will be very hard."

Gen. Petraeus, whose confirmation is expected by the full Senate, is to replace Army Gen. George Casey, whom Mr. Bush has selected as Army chief of staff. His hearing was the first of two confirmation proceedings that will change the nearly four-year war's military leadership. Next up is Adm. William J. Fallon, who is to replace Army Gen. John Abizaid as head of U.S. Central Command, which includes Iraq.

Sen. Carl Levin, Michigan Democrat and the committee chairman, expressed doubts that Mr. al-Maliki would keep his promise. Mr. al-Maliki had refused to order his military to crush the death squad forces of radical cleric Muqtada al-Sadr, who controls Shi'ite members in parliament who support Mr. al-Maliki.

"They have not complied with previous commitments that they've made," said Mr. Levin, who advocates a predetermined phased withdrawal of all U.S. forces. "I'm very doubtful, as one senator, that it's likely they're going to carry out the other commitments that they have made. I just think history should make us very dubious about the likelihood that they are going to carry out these critically important commitments."

Mr. Bush announced a surge to about 155,000 troops in what may be the last major bid to put down Sunni-Shi'ite sectarian violence and defeat al Qaeda in Iraq.

In Gen. Petraeus, Mr. Bush tapped a commander who led part of the force that invaded Iraq in 2003 and who then returned to the country to train its emerging security force. The general is commander of the U.S. Army Combined Arms Center at Fort Leavenworth, Kan., and oversaw the writing of the military's new counterinsurgency manual, which states that too many troops can alienate civilians and push them to supporting the insurgents.

Gen. Petraeus said, "I think that at this point in Baghdad, the population just wants to be secure. And truthfully, they don't care who does it."

Petraeus Criticizes Anti-surge Resolutions During Hearing (HILL)

By Roxana Tiron

The Hill, January 24, 2007

In a rare move for a uniformed officer, Lt. Gen. David Petraeus, considered a shoo-in to become America's next top commander in Iraq, jumped into the political fray of his nomination hearing.

Prompted by presidential hopeful and Armed Services Committee ranking member Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), Petraeus spoke out against congressional attempts to pass resolutions of disapproval on the new White House strategy in Iraq, which includes a troop increase of 21,500.

In response to a question from McCain regarding the effect of such congressional resolutions on troops, Petraeus said, "It would not be a beneficial effect, sir."

McCain supports sending additional U.S. troops to Iraq, and is at odds with Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.), another presidential hopeful and member of the Armed Services panel.

DOJ_NMG_0121110

When Sen. Joe Lieberman (I-Conn.), a strong supporter of the Bush administration's strategy for Iraq, later asked Petraeus whether the resolutions of disapproval would encourage the enemies in Iraq, the officer said: "That's correct."

"This is a test of will," he said, adding that as commander he would like "the enemy to feel that there is no hope." He stressed, however, that he respects freedom of speech and the discussions taking place in Congress.

Lieberman used the nomination hearing to ask his colleagues to defer the resolutions of disapproval and give both the "surge" plan and Petraeus a chance at success, "perhaps a last chance."

"If, God forbid, you are unable to succeed there will be plenty of time for resolutions of disapproval," Lieberman said.

Clinton, however, rebuked criticism of congressional attempts to condemn the president's Iraq plan. Clinton is authoring legislation that would require Bush to secure congressional consent for any troop increases above this month's level and set several other conditions for political and security progress before Iraqi troops receive further funding.

"I very sincerely but wholeheartedly disagree with those who are trying to up the rhetoric about our position in Iraq," Clinton said, adding that the resolutions' goal is to send a message to the Iraqis.

"It has nothing to do with the loyalty, the warrior skills and the leadership of our men and women," she said. "It has to do with years of lost opportunity and the failures of the Iraqis to step up and take responsibility."

She told reporters that the U.S. troops, by virtue of their access to the Internet, recognize "that there is a debate in this country." "This debate is academic," she added.

Clinton acknowledged that there is little Congress can do to stop an "escalation" already in progress, saying, "We know that this policy is going forward." She urged Petraeus to ask Congress for all resources necessary to provide the troops with the adequate equipment.

Clinton, who is giving her support to Petraeus, called the nominee "a very good soldier."

Petraeus's stance against the resolutions of disapproval, combined with Lieberman's rhetoric, sent Sen. Susan Collins (R-Maine), a co-sponsor of such a resolution, on the defensive. "The American people are not divided in their support for our troops. The American people are not divided in wishing you all the success in the world, despite our disagreement with the strategy," Collins said.

"And I must say that the resolution that I've been working on with Sen. Ben Nelson (D-Neb.) and Sen. [John] Warner (R-Va.) is very clear in expressing support for our troops," she added.

Warner also came to the defense of the congressional debate surrounding the surge plan. "We're trying to exercise the fundamental responsibilities of our democracy and how this nation has two co-equal branches of the government, each bearing its own responsibilities," he said.

"I hope that this colloquy has not entrapped you into some responses that you might later regret."

Petraeus predicted "tough days" ahead in Iraq. "None of this will be rapid," he told the Senate Armed Services Committee. "The way ahead will be neither quick nor easy." However, he voiced confidence in the administration's plan to send thousands of additional troops into Baghdad. He said he would not be able to carry out his assignment as top U.S. commander successfully without the additional troops.

But Petraeus encountered criticism from members of the panel for his planned implementation of a policy contrary to views he expressed in a manual he wrote on counterinsurgency. He wrote there that any counterinsurgency force should have at least 20 soldiers for every 1,000 members of the local population. That would require a force of at least 120,000 for Baghdad, a much higher number than the 85,000 combined U.S.-Iraqi force there

Clinton said she feared that Petraeus is being sent to administer a policy that "does not reflect your experience."

"You wrote the book, general, but the policy is not by the book," Clinton said.

Petraeus commanded the Army's 101st Airborne Division during the 2003 invasion of Iraq. He was later assigned to stabilize Iraq's third-largest city, Mosul.

He served for 15 months in 2004–05 as head of the U.S. effort to train Iraqi security forces. After that he was assigned to Fort Leavenworth, Kan., where he was in charge of revising the counterinsurgency manual.

Leave Politics To Us, Warner Tells General (WP)

By Thomas E. Ricks

The Washington Post, January 24, 2007

Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman (I-Conn.) asked Army Lt. Gen. David H . Petraeus during his confirmation hearing yesterday if Senate resolutions condemning White House Iraq policy "would give the enemy some comfort."

Petraeus agreed they would, saying, "That's correct, sir."

Sen. John W. Warner (R-Va.), until recently chairman of the Armed Services Committee and a co-sponsor of one of those resolutions, later explained to the general that he needed to be more careful about appearing to wade into a political debate and warned Petraeus to not let himself be trapped into portraying members of Congress as unpatriotic for disagreeing with President Bush:

DOJ_NMG_0121111

We're not a division here today of patriots who support the troops and those who are making statements and working on resolutions that could be translated as aiding and abetting the enemy. We're trying to exercise the fundamental responsibilities of our democracy and how this nation has two co-equal branches of the government, each bearing its own responsibilities.

I hope that this colloquy has not entrapped you into some responses that you might later regret. I wonder if you would just give me the assurance that you'll go back and examine the transcript as to what you replied with respect to certain of these questions and review it, because we want you to succeed.

. . . I'm very proud of this committee and I don't want an impression, certainly among the armed forces, that we're not all steadfast behind them.

General: Iraq Situation 'Dire' But Not Hopeless (USAT)

By Tom Vanden Brook

USA Today, January 24, 2007

WASHINGTON — The commander chosen to implement President Bush's new strategy in Iraq warned a Senate panel on Tuesday of tough days ahead there.

"The situation in Iraq is dire," Lt. Gen. David Petraeus told lawmakers skeptical of the plan to commit 21,500 more troops and an additional $1 billion in aid.

"The stakes are high. There are no easy choices. The way ahead will be very hard. … But hard is not hopeless," Petraeus said at a Senate hearing on his nomination to lead U.S. forces in Iraq.

Petraeus and the chiefs of the Army and Marine Corps converged on Capitol Hill on Tuesday, fielding questions from lawmakers about Bush's plan and troop readiness.

Nobody has announced opposition to Petraeus' nomination, and Senate Armed Services Committee Chairman Carl Levin, D-Mich., said after the hearing that a vote will come quickly.

Petraeus has served two tours of duty in Iraq, one as commander of the 101st Airborne Division and another as the top trainer of Iraqi forces. He recently co-authored the Army and Marine Corps manual on counterinsurgency, a type of troop-intensive warfare that emphasizes security for local populations.

Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, D-N.Y., who has announced initial steps to enter the race for president, said Bush's plan "inspires skepticism for good reason." She accused former Defense secretary Donald Rumsfeld of refusing to adapt to increasing violence in Iraq and the previous Republican-led Congress for failing to challenge the administration's strategy there. She said she disapproved of the plan and called it a "dead end."

Supporters of the president's plan, including Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., another probable 2008 presidential candidate, also criticized the administration's approach in Iraq.

"We've made many, many mistakes in this war," McCain said. Among them, he said, were sending too few troops for the initial invasion in March 2003 and not responding to the "hostile actions" of Iraqi religious sects.

Sen. Joe Lieberman, an independent from Connecticut who is allied with the Democrats, pleaded with colleagues to reconsider adopting resolutions that oppose Bush's policy, which he called "perhaps a last chance to succeed in Iraq."

Lieberman asked Petraeus whether the resolutions could be interpreted as encouraging the enemy.

"That's correct, sir," Petraeus said.

Later, Petraeus said he was not taking a stand on the resolutions.

In the House Armed Services Committee, Chairman Ike Skelton, D-Mo., said Bush's plan would overextend U.S. forces and hinder their ability to deal with threats.

"Because I am convinced a 20,000-troop increase is too little far too late to make a difference in Iraq's security, this is a trade-off I cannot support," Skelton said.

Gen. Peter Schoomaker, the Army's chief of staff, told the committee that troops going into Iraq and Afghanistan are properly trained and equipped. But he said he had concerns about the military's readiness to fight other battles.

Schoomaker recently announced his retirement.

Marine Corps Commandant Gen. James Conway said that the response to threats outside Iraq and Afghanistan would be slower than he would like and that the military would not be equipped as it should.

"There is certainly a risk associated with that," Conway said.

Petraeus Discourages Anti-war Resolutions (POL)

By Christian Lowe

DOJ_NMG_0121112

The Politico, January 24, 2007

Though he would have preferred to sidestep the political debate in the Senate over Iraq policy, Lt. Gen. David Petraeus said yesterday that resolutions opposing the administration's "surge" strategy would give the enemy encouragement and the impression that America is divided.

"Speaking purely as a military commander, albeit one that understands the value of free and open debate . . . I would want the enemy to feel that there was no hope," Petraeus said during his confirmation hearing before the Senate Armed Services Committee to become the top commander of coalition troops in Iraq.

The general faced pointed questions from senators -- for and against President Bush's plan to boost troop levels in Iraq by 21,500. Both groups tried to draw Petraeus into the swirling political debate on how to confront the administration when polls show that nearly six in 10 American's oppose the plan.

"I don't think it is going to come as any surprise to the enemy that the American people are in fact deeply divided in this strategy," said Sen. Susan Collins, R-Maine, who unveiled a bipartisan resolution on Monday with Sen. John Warner, R-Va. It says: "The Senate disagrees with the plan to augment our forces by 21,500" and calls on Bush to achieve security "with reduced force levels than proposed."

Collins told Petraeus, however, that she wished success for the surge strategy -- and its other economic and political components -- and seemed to express hope that her resolution wouldn't be needed.

"Nothing divides us in our common support that we hope we're wrong," she admitted, "and that this strategy is a success."

Petraeus, a veteran commander in Iraq who co-authored the Army and Marine Corps' new counterinsurgency manual, faced questions from senators on the specifics of his plan to control the streets of Baghdad. In a sharp divergence from his predecessor, Gen. George Casey, Petraeus favors a buildup of American forces to "flood the zone" in insurgent hotspots as part of a three-pronged plan to secure the capital, rebuild local infrastructure and give the political process time to mature in relative calm.

Sen. John McCain, the Arizona Republican exploring a presidential run, asked Petraeus how troop limits would impact his counterinsurgency mission.

"A commander would like to go forward with as much flexibility as he can achieve," Petraeus said. "At some point, we may have to go back and say we cannot accomplish the mission because of the assets that have not been provided."

Petraeus Warns Of 'dire' Situation In Iraq (FT)

By Demetri Sevastopulo

Financial Times, January 24, 2007

General David Petraeus, the incoming US commander in Iraq, warned Congress on Tuesday that the situation in Iraq was "dire" but urged lawmakers not to oppose a military surge.

"None of this will be rapid. The way ahead will be neither quick nor easy and there undoubtedly will be tough days," he said.

Gen Petraeus, who will oversee the military surge in Iraq, said the US would have indications by late summer whether the plan to send another 21,500 US troops to help the Iraqi security forces stamp out sectarian violence was having success.

Earlier this month, however, Robert Gates, defence secretary, said it would be clear whether the Iraq government was living up to its pledges before all of the new US troops arrived in the Iraqi capital, which is expected by early June.

Gen Petraeus was appearing before the Senate armed services committee amid growing congressional opposition to the surge. Democrats and several key Republicans have introduced non-binding resolutions opposing escalating US troop levels.

"You talk about this being a race against the clock, but I wonder if the clock has already run out," said Susan Collins, a Maine Republican, who on Tuesday joined John Warner, the former Republican chairman of the committee, in opposing the surge.

Appearing more confident before the committee than Gen George Casey, the outgoing commander, Gen Petraeus waded into the political debate by agreeing with Republican senators John McCain and Lindsey Graham that congressional resolutions of opposition would send the wrong message to US troops and the enemy in Iraq.

"No matter how well-intentioned, a resolution. . .opposed to this new strategy is a vote of no confidence," said Mr Graham. "The enemy will see it as a weakened resolve . . . those people going to fight this war are going to say, well, I'm going, but the Congress says good luck, but you're going to lose."

Hillary Clinton, a New York Democrat, said: "I. . . have put forward ideas about disapproving the escalation not because we in any way embrace failure or defeat, but because we are trying to get the attention of our government and the government of Iraq."

DOJ_NMG_0121113

While senators welcomed the choice of Gen Petraeus, credited with bringing stability to Mosul in 2004, to replace Gen Casey, they grilled him over the Baghdad plan, saying it was inconsistent with the military counter-insurgency manual he wrote.

Instead of her usual methodical questioning, Mrs Clinton underscored her recently announced candidacy for president with a blistering attack on the Bush administration and the military surge.

"You wrote the book, general, but the policy is not by the book. And you are being asked to square the circle, to find a military solution to a political crisis," she said.

The counter-insurgency manual suggests that 120,000 troops would be needed to curb the sectarian violence in a city the size of Baghdad. Jack Reed, a Rhode Island Democrat, questioned how 41,000 US troops and 50,000 Iraqi forces could succeed.

In defending the plan, Gen Petraeus said US and Iraqi forces would be freed up for counter-insurgency operations because of the use of private security companies.

New Face On A Tough War (WP)

By David Ignatius

The Washington Post, January 24, 2007

For a nation bitterly divided over Iraq, the one point of agreement seems to be that Lt. Gen. David Petraeus is the right commander for U.S. forces in Baghdad. That gives Petraeus a surge of the most important strategic asset in this war -- which is time. But it also locks him into an awkward role for a professional military officer, as chief public spokesman for a war the public has come to doubt.

As long as Iraq was "Bush's war," it looked like a lost cause. This week, it became in part "Petraeus's war." The fundamentals on the ground appear as bleak as ever, and polls show the public doubts the war is winnable. But Petraeus offers something new: He is the last frail hope for a bipartisan consensus on Iraq.

Petraeus won plaudits yesterday from nearly every member of the Senate Armed Services Committee, continuing the celebratory tone that greeted his nomination by President Bush. Even Sen. Edward Kennedy, one of the sharpest critics of the war, had good things to say about the new commander. It was a momentary honeymoon from acrimonious debate.

The accolades for Petraeus symbolize a deeper change, one that carries benefits and risks for the general and the troops he will lead. Bush and his senior advisers have been wrong so many times on Iraq that the public no longer trusts them to frame a successful strategy. So now the public face of the war passes to a bright, ambitious general. It is an intensely political role, and it puts Petraeus in a hot seat that many military officers try to avoid.

Petraeus doesn't want to play politics. He tells friends that he doesn't vote in presidential elections, to maintain his political independence. In that, he emulates Gen. George Marshall, the architect of the Allied victory in World War II. But this is an inherently political command. As Petraeus answered questions yesterday from Sen. John McCain -- who is building his presidential campaign on the need for a troop surge and ultimate victory in Iraq -- it was clear just how charged the commander's job will be. As the publicly anointed "last, best hope" of a failing war, his actions will shape the key issue of the 2008 campaign.

Petraeus has embraced this kind of high-risk mission before. Indeed, he seems to thrive on the public role that many military officers shun. When he took command of the training of Iraqi forces in mid-2004, Newsweek featured Petraeus on its cover and asked, "Can This Man Save Iraq?" That prominence engendered some ill will among other officers, who saw him as too eager for publicity. But, at this point, I sense that senior officers wish him well. He's taking on a supremely demanding job that most know they couldn't do. And he's betting his carefully groomed reputation on the relatively small chance that he can salvage an American victory.

The smartest thing Petraeus has done is to draw Congress into his confidence, as co-manager of the new strategy. In his testimony yesterday, he promised regular progress reports and pledged to tell Congress if he decides that the new strategy can't succeed. The flip side is that Petraeus will tell Congress whether he needs more troops, which may prove to be the case. Petraeus helped draft the new counterinsurgency field manual, which warns that successful operations "often require a high ratio of security forces to the protected population." It's hard to believe that 21,500 more troops will be enough to protect an Iraqi population in the midst of a civil war.

Petraeus knows how tough his new job will be: He told senators yesterday that many of the e-mails he received over the past two weeks had as their subject line "Congratulations, I think." Asked about troop morale, he gave an answer that will surely apply to him in the wearying, testing days ahead: "One day at a time, sometimes one foot in front of the other."

I spent a week traveling with Petraeus in Iraq in 2004, and another week with him in 2005. As he visited with Iraqi troops, I often heard him repeat one of his trademark phrases: "We'll see who has tiny hearts" -- meaning he would see who among the Iraqi officers was really willing to fight.

DOJ_NMG_0121114

Petraeus is no "tiny heart." He believes in the power of his will to overcome adversity and prevail on the battlefield. That confidence is a necessary quality for a commander, but it is not sufficient to ensure success. Congress had a rare moment of unity yesterday in wishing Petraeus good luck as he heads back to Iraq, even as Petraeus himself must be wondering, deep down, whether he has taken on a mission impossible.

The writer co-hosts, with Newsweek's Fareed Zakaria, PostGlobal, an online discussion of international issues athttp://blog.washingtonpost.com/postglobal. His e-mail address isdavidignatius@washpost.com.

A Case Of Hearing Without Listening (NYT)

By Maureen Dowd

The New York Times, January 24, 2007

WASHINGTON

Madame Speaker didn't lean over and boink the president on the head with her gavel, or garrote him with her red pashmina.

No one was gelded or cuckolded or left to bleed on the floor of the Senate, as in HBO's "Rome," that other gory saga of a declining empire with people who can't stop talking.

Still, the nation's capital had the aroma of treachery, as former allies brutally turned on one another. Despite W.'s attempt to salvage his presidency last night by changing the subject and going all domestic-sensitive, Washington was more consumed with betrayal than substance.

The city was riveted by opening statements in the Scooter Libby trial, where the aspens were turning but not in clusters. Scooter's lawyer claimed that the White House had made his client a scapegoat in the Valerie Plame case to protect Karl Rove because "Boy Genius," as W. calls him, was critical to keeping the Republican Party in power.

In light of the 2006 debacle, the White House might have been better off saving Scooter and making Karl the fall guy.

Vice got an extra dose of unflattering limelight in the debut issue of The Politico, a Capitol Hill publication. In an interview with Roger Simon, John McCain stopped pandering to the White House long enough to lambaste Dick Cheney for stirring a "witch's brew" of a "terribly mishandled" war. What took the brave senator so long?

"The president listened too much to the vice president," he said, adding, "Of course, the president bears the ultimate responsibility, but he was very badly served by both the vice president and, most of all, the secretary of defense."

At a critical hearing yesterday, senators happily blew a chance to grill Lt. Gen. David Petraeus, W.'s choice to try to rescue Iraq, on whether those 21,500 additional troops will be cavalry to the rescue or lambs to the slaughter.

Why dwell on the most consequential elements of American strategy when they can linger over something even more repercussive: their own political reputations?

Hillary Clinton, who dodged a recent important Iraq hearing by flying to Iraq, did not have any questions at all for the general. She simply lectured him crisply on her belated discovery that the administration has a "dead-end" and "blank check" policy, as she tried to seem like the kind of gal who could command the most powerful military on earth. This is odd from someone who is running infomercials on her Web site promising "a conversation."

In their questioning, Senator Joe Lieberman and Mr. McCain seemed most interested in enlisting the general's prestige for their own campaign to discredit colleagues in both parties who are tired of passively watching W.'s disaster unfold.

If the Senate sends the additional troops but conveys the belief they cannot succeed, Mr. McCain asked, "what effect does that have on the morale of your troops?"

"It would not be a beneficial effect," the general replied.

Senator Lieberman also asked whether a Senate resolution expressing disapproval of The Surge would give the enemy in Iraq "encouragement" that the American people "were divided."

The general agreed: "That's correct, sir."

Much of the rest of the hearing was squandered in attempts by Democrats and Republicans who had criticized the war to get the general to back away from his opinion that the troops would be hurt and the enemy emboldened by any impediment that the legislative branch might throw in W.'s way.

"Honorable people have different views, and they will voice their criticisms," chided John Warner, who presented a bipartisan resolution on Monday declaring that the Senate "disagrees with the 'plan' to augment our forces."

He told General Petraeus that as President Nixon's secretary of the Navy, he had sat where the general was, justifying another impossible war. "I hope," he warned the witness, "that this colloquy has not entrapped you into some responses that you might later regret."

The fact that Senator Warner attacked The Surge in a formal way means that a substantial majority of the Senate are willing to stick their necks out. It's the beginning of a slow procession to limit spending on the war and rein in Mr. Bush.

DOJ_NMG_0121115

As one does in a job interview, the general tried to oblige everyone. After getting caught in a political mine field, he demurred that he had learned "that mine fields are best avoided and gone around rather than walked through."

The poor man. He probably thought that he came all this way to talk about how to fight the war, not to talk about how to talk about the war.

Senators Say Resolutions On Troop Plan Should Merge (NYT)

By Carl Hulse And Jeff Zeleny

The New York Times, January 24, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 23 — Senate critics of President Bush's troop buildup in Iraq suggested Tuesday that competing resolutions opposing the plan should be merged in an effort to attract the largest bloc of senators in a strong statement of Congressional dissent.

As they prepared for the Senate Foreign Relations Committee to consider the issue on Wednesday, both Democrats and Republicans said the two bipartisan resolutions were in fundamental agreement on objecting to the troop increase.

"The resolutions are so close in terms of the key issue: whether or not we support an increase in military involvement and increasing the number of troops in Iraq or not," said Senator Carl Levin, the Michigan Democrat who is the chairman of the Armed Services Committee and a co-author of one proposal. "There are other language issues, obviously, but they are not particularly significant. The likeness and the similarities far, far, far outweigh any language differences."

Senator Harry Reid of Nevada, the Democratic leader, said a hybrid version of the resolutions would produce a clearer sign of the depth of opposition to the president's plan than either of the proposals could individually. "The bottom line is that the situation we have is unacceptable, and both resolutions clearly indicate that," Mr. Reid said.

But Senator John W. Warner, Republican of Virginia and lead author of the other proposal, said he saw important distinctions between them. He said he was not prepared to enter any negotiations until after he saw wording approved by the Foreign Relations Committee.

"I think there is substantial difference," Mr. Warner said Tuesday, adding that his approach puts more emphasis on specific benchmarks to assess progress in Iraq and calls for military rules of engagement to reflect that American forces are not to play a role in sectarian violence. "There is a lot in ours that is not in the other one."

The proposal from Mr. Warner and Senators Susan Collins, Republican of Maine, and Ben Nelson, Democrat of Nebraska, also declares that the president is the commander in chief and that it is not the Senate's intent to contravene his authority — wording that drew the attention of some lawmakers.

"History tells us that Congress does have power when it comes to the president's authorities as commander in chief," said Senator Richard J. Durbin of Illinois, the No. 2 Democrat in the Senate. He and others said Democrats also raised questions about whether the Warner proposal would allow troops to be increased in areas outside Baghdad, particularly in Anbar Province, which Ms. Collins and others have said is a hub for activities of Al Qaeda.

Senate Republican officials acknowledged that the prospect of one bipartisan resolution emerging was troubling in a political sense because it held the potential to attract significant numbers of Republicans and nearly all Democrats, producing a vote that would be a major embarrassment to Mr. Bush as he seeks to sell his Iraq plan.

On Tuesday, Senator Gordon H. Smith, Republican of Oregon, announced that he would sign on to the Warner resolution. Supporters of Mr. Bush's strategy used a Senate Armed Services Committee confirmation hearing on Tuesday to raise the prospect that any resolution expressing opposition to the strategy could bolster insurgents in Iraq and demoralize the American military. Other lawmakers dismissed the idea.

Senator Joseph R. Biden Jr., Democrat of Delaware and chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, has said he is open to changes in the resolution he drew up with Mr. Levin and Senator Chuck Hagel, Republican of Nebraska. The panel will consider the proposal on Wednesday, and it could be sent to the Senate floor quickly.

Democrats Work To Clarify Message On Iraq (HILL)

By Elana Schor

The Hill, January 24, 2007

Senate Democrats yesterday worked to bridge the gap between the chamber's two resolutions of disapproval on President Bush's plan to increase troop levels in Iraq, although the stronger language of Foreign Relations Committee Chairman Joseph Biden (D-Del.) will form the basis of that panel's markup today.

Ongoing negotiations are intended to combine Biden's measure, cosponsored by Armed Services Committee Chairman Carl Levin (D-Mich.) and GOP Sens. Olympia Snowe (Maine) and Chuck Hagel (Neb.), with a less critical resolution released this week by Sen. Ben Nelson (D-Neb.) and three senior Republicans, all up for reelection in 2008.

DOJ_NMG_0121116

Senate Majority Whip Dick Durbin (D-Ill.) said Democrats have pointed to “two or three” elements of the Nelson resolution’s language as potentially problematic, including a portion that could allow a troop surge in Iraq’s restive Anbar province and a clause that implies Congress has no power to check presidential authority over the war.

“I’m not sure they’re deal-breakers,” Durbin said, remaining optimistic that one resolution can come to the floor without a competing substitute. Before that floor vote, which could occur as soon as next week, Senate presidential hopefuls Chris Dodd (D-Conn.) and Barack Obama (D-Ill.) said they are readying amendments for today’s Foreign Relations markup that could galvanize debate over capping troop levels.

A First Step In Iraq (USAT)

By Joseph Biden & Chuck Hagel

USA Today, January 24, 2007

Today, Congress takes an important step in what we believe is our constitutional responsibility to actively engage and debate the war in Iraq. We agree with the president that our previous strategy in Iraq was failing. Equally, we are convinced that to succeed in Iraq, America's objective and strategy must enjoy the support of the American people and a bipartisan support in Congress.

The Senate Foreign Relations Committee will vote on a resolution we introduced with our colleagues Carl Levin, D-Mich., and Olympia Snowe, R-Maine. The resolution says what we and many of our colleagues, Democrats and Republicans, believe: America should not deepen its military involvement in Iraq by sending more U.S. troops into the middle of a civil war. More troops in Baghdad will increase the likelihood of more American casualties and will not end the sectarian Iraqi massacres that are occurring every day.

Just as important, our resolution proposes an alternative. The primary objective of America's strategy should be to help Iraqis achieve a political settlement in Iraq, secure support for that settlement from Iraq's neighbors and refocus the mission of our remaining troops on achievable objectives. That is the only way to stop Shiites and Sunnis from killing each other and allow our troops to leave Iraq without leaving chaos behind.

Here are the main elements of our plan:

·Redeploy U.S. forces out of Iraq's cities with a more limited mission focused on defending Iraq's territorial integrity, counterterrorism, border control, and accelerated training of Iraqi forces;

·Transfer responsibility for internal security and halting sectarian violence to Iraqi forces under an appropriately expedited timeline;

·Continue to support Iraq's political process while making it clear that Iraqi leaders must make the political compromises necessary to help Iraq move forward;

·Engage Iraq's neighbors and the international community to build a regional framework to help support and sustain a political solution and national reconciliation.

Two weeks ago, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice presented the president's plan to the Foreign Relations Committee. The reaction from Democrats and Republicans alike ranged from profound skepticism to outright opposition.

A strong majority of the American people opposes sending more American troops into Iraq. So does a broad cross section of this country's leaders, military and civilian, as we have heard this month in hearings in Congress. In December, the Baker-Hamilton Commission issued a valuable report, suggesting a comprehensive strategy "to enable the United States to begin to move its combat forces out of Iraq responsibly" based on "new and enhanced diplomatic and political efforts in Iraq and the region."

Our fundamental objective is to build a bipartisan majority in Congress to support a U.S. policy on Iraq that stands the best chance of succeeding and bringing our men and women in uniform home.

We welcome debate of our resolution and proposed alternatives. The resolution by Sen. John Warner, R-Va., contributes to this debate. As we have made clear publicly and privately, we are prepared to adjust our resolution to help broaden bipartisan support. Ultimately, this debate will give every senator a chance to say where he or she stands.

We believe that the single most effective way for Congress to engage the president in developing a way forward in Iraq is to demonstrate the depth and breadth of bipartisan concern regarding his policy. The power of our resolution rests in its bipartisan foundation.

Iraq is not a partisan issue. It is a challenge that we must meet as Americans. No one in Congress and no one in America wants to see America defeated. We believe our nation is stronger when Congress fulfills its constitutional duty as a co-equal branch of government.

Sen. Joseph Biden, D-Del., is chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee. Sen. Chuck Hagel, R-Neb., is a member of the committee.

DOJ_NMG_0121117

McCain Bashes Cheney Over Iraq Policy (POL)

By Roger Simon

The Politico, January 24, 2007

With his presidential hopes tied to an administration whose Iraq policy he supports but cannot control, John McCain for the first time blamed Vice President Cheney for what McCain calls the "witch's brew" of a "terribly mishandled" war in which U.S. forces are on the verge of defeat.

McCain also for the first time opened the door to the possibility of a U.S. troop pullback to the borders of Iraq should the president's planned troop surge fail.

Although McCain had once lavished praise on the vice president, he said in an interview in his Senate office: "The president listened too much to the Vice President . . . Of course, the president bears the ultimate responsibility, but he was very badly served by both the Vice President and, most of all, the Secretary of Defense."

McCain added: "Rumsfeld will go down in history, along with McNamara, as one of the worst secretaries of defense in history." Donald Rumsfeld served as President Bush's secretary of defense from January 2001 to December 2006. Robert McNamara was Secretary of Defense during the Vietnam War.

McCain has long criticized Rumsfeld, but in July 2004 at a campaign rally in Lansing, Mich., McCain said he had "known and admired" Cheney for more than 20 years and described him as "one of the most capable, experienced, intelligent and steady vice presidents this country has ever had."

But that was then and this is now, and now McCain is making clear his frustrations with the Bush administration, the Iraqi military and "bureaucratic resistance" in the Pentagon to a troop surge.

McCain said in the interview that the success of the American mission in Iraq "will be directly related to the ability of the Iraqi military to take up responsibilities. Their record is terrible." Also, he said, "There is still enormous bureaucratic resistance (to the troop surge) in the Pentagon, and it bothers me a great deal. The bureaucrats in the military are saying this is a terrible strain on the (National) Guard and the active duty forces, and it is. There is only one thing worse than an over-stressed military, and that's a defeated military. And we are on the verge of that."

McCain said that even the planned insertion of 21,500 new U.S. troops into Iraq, which he supports, may not succeed. "I don't know if this is enough troops or not," McCain said. "I can't guarantee success by doing this."

The Arizona Republican, whose 2008 presidential campaign is well under way even though he has not yet officially announced, is keenly aware of how his support for the Iraq war is making him increasingly unpopular.

"The irony of all this for me is that I am the guy that for three years -- more than three years -- has said, 'You don't have enough troops there! And you are not running this war right! And you've (ital) got (unital) to change!' " McCain said. "And now I find myself the object of scorn because I think we can't afford to leave."

But McCain also said a withdrawal of troops to the borders of Iraq could be an option if the troop surge fails.

"If this strategy doesn't succeed, we will have to devise another strategy," McCain said. "But I have to hasten to add there are no good options." One of those options, McCain said "is to withdraw to the borders (of Iraq) to try to keep other countries from interfering. Maintaining our bases in Kuwait and other places. There are a lot of scenarios." But he also said the current troop surge strategy "has to be given time."

McCain's support for the Iraq war is unpopular with Democrats and Independents and is losing support within his own party, including among some of his fellow Republican senators. Sen. Chuck Hagel, Neb., has called the troop surge "the most dangerous foreign policy blunder in this country since Vietnam, if it's carried out."

Without naming names, McCain said, "It is ironic that many of my colleagues who are now wavering were those who were down the line in support (of the war) and would come back from Iraq saying that everything is fine and the troops are wonderful and it's the media (that is the problem). And I came back from my first trip saying, 'You better get more boots on the ground! You better change this.' Now I am (ital) hung (unital) with it. It's fascinating!"

"Life isn't fair, as Jack Kennedy said," McCain added with his typical mordancy.

McCain will almost certainly announce his presidential candidacy soon, but he said, "This whole Iraq situation has really diverted most of my attention."

In the primaries, McCain is in danger of being whipsawed between Republican conservatives who think he is not really one of them and Republican centrists who are opposed to the war.

"There are still some elements of the party that are very skeptical about me," McCain acknowledged. "I think also, even amongst Republicans, there is a real concern about my position on the war in Iraq."

He did, however, give a peek at his game plan to gain the White House. "Most people in New Hampshire, South Carolina, Michigan, Arizona, people around the country know me rather well," he said. "It's not as if I am a blank slate out there. Most of them, I think, have confidence that I have the experience, knowledge and background that, even though they disagree with me on a specific issue, they think I will do the right thing. Or at least what I believe is right."

DOJ_NMG_0121118

Join The Conversation (read all 64 comments)

You need to be a registered user of Politico.com to "join the conversation" If you are not a member yet, what are you waiting for? Register Now!

by Midway1 on 01.23.2007 at 06:38 AM

McCain has himself covered, knowing there will never be 'enough' troops to satisfy him, plus keeps his support for Bush. So now he will put it on Cheney, to take some heat off Bush. Bush must have some secret 'IOU' from McCain to explain his loyalty. McCain is so far down on my list for '08, he could never recover.

by erica on 01.23.2007 at 07:17 AM

imho, McCain is too old to be president.

by kittycago on 01.23.2007 at 08:28 AM

isn't it nice to be a player John? For starters you are not the only Viet Nam veteran in DC but you are the best marketer of your service.As you said the real heroes never came home.Play both sides in DC eventually your wicks burns out twice as fast.You have n chance of becoming president now so yuu did all that swinging for naught.

by south_yankee on 01.23.2007 at 08:32 AM

I could never support Senator McCain for President. I respect his service to our country with the exception of his refusal to stand up to this President on any issue. Blaming Cheney and Rumsfeld for our big mess is fine and they deserve part of the blame but the buck stops with the President, the Decider in Chief. Senator McCains unwavering support for the President and his policies is nauseating and will cost him in his attempt to capture the Presidency.

by matte on 01.23.2007 at 08:43 AM

All he had to do, was take up a moderately center-stand and stick to it. Instead, he tried this foolish gambit with "The Surge" which bet that Bush would never actually be allowed to do it, or it would be so watered-down, he could always say "See, they never did it my way, and that's why we lost." Now, he thinks he can regain some of that middle ground traction by peeing on Cheney's leg in public. Too little too late, John. You might as well * up a rope.

MOST EMAILED STORIES

ABOUT US | SUBSCRIPTION INFORMATION | ADVERTISTING INFORMATION | PRIVACY POLICY | EMPLOYMENT | RECEIVE EMAIL ALERTS

TM & © The Politico & Politico.com, a division of Allbritton Communications Company

Please read our Privacy Policy. By using this site, you accept our Terms of Service.

Daily Body Count In Baghdad Falls (LAT)

By Borzou Daragahi

The Los Angeles Times, January 24, 2007

BAGHDAD — Iraqi authorities found 19 bodies of young men scattered around Baghdad on Tuesday, a sharp drop from the scores found each day several weeks ago. The reported daily body count for the last week or so has hovered around 30 or lower.

The bodies of late also have not shown signs of torture often associated with Shiite Muslim militias, morgue and hospital officials say.

Officials cautioned that the casualty figures were preliminary and sketchy. Previous drops in Baghdad violence have been followed by upsurges.

U.S. and Iraqi officials hope an increase in the number of American troops, political pressure and aggressive new tactics to protect Baghdad neighborhoods can reduce the level of violence in the capital and pave the way for political reconciliation and an end to the country's undeclared sectarian civil war. In recent days, additional U.S. troops have begun to be deployed in certain volatile neighborhoods.

U.S. military officials in the capital's tumultuous northern district of Adhamiya confirmed the statistical drop shown in morgue and police casualty figures collected daily by the Los Angeles Times.

"During the last two weeks, Task Force 1-26 has seen a decrease in found dead bodies in Adhamiya," said Army Capt. Jared Purcell, spokesman for a Taji-based unit that patrols parts of northeastern Baghdad.

Purcell attributed the decline, which he said was in keeping with The Times' estimate of a 50% drop, to stepped-up pressure on cells of Sunni Arab insurgents and Shiite militiamen, including raids against high-level insurgents. Political pressure and aggressive patrols by the U.S. military and the Iraqi police and army are also factors, he said.

Some observers speculated that the drop in the number of bodies bearing marks of torture indicated a decline in Shiite militia activity, but Purcell said the decrease was not necessarily attributable to Shiite groups lying low.

"In our area of operations there are both Sunni and Shia terrorist groups," he said in an e-mail.

Still, violence continued across Iraq on Tuesday, with at least two U.S. military personnel and 56 Iraqis reported killed. And five Western security officers employed by Blackwater USA were killed in a helicopter crash in a residential neighborhood in east-central Baghdad amid reports of ground fire, officials and witnesses said.

The military said no U.S. forces were involved in the crash, but North Carolina-based Blackwater said the five employees, all American citizens, were killed while working on behalf of the U.S. government. Private security contractors sometimes dispatch small helicopters to accompany vehicle convoys throughout the country.

The incident apparently was the second in which an aircraft was forced down in Iraq in less than a week — the first being Saturday's crash of a Black Hawk helicopter northeast of Baghdad, which killed all 12 U.S. soldiers aboard. An American official in Washington said initial evidence suggested that helicopter was downed by ground fire.

Official word of Tuesday's incident coincided with reports that a chopper had been fired upon while flying low over a Sunni district.

Witnesses said authorities sealed off the area, known as Fadhil. They also reported hearing heavy gunfire and helicopters scouring the district after the apparent crash.

The U.S. military, meanwhile, reported the combat deaths of two service members.

A Marine assigned to the 1st Marine Expeditionary Force died Sunday of wounds from enemy action south of Baghdad. A U.S. soldier assigned to Regimental Combat Team 5 died Monday of wounds from enemy action while operating in Al Anbar province.

The deaths brought to 3,060 the total number of American military fatalities in the Iraq theater since the 2003 U.S.-led invasion, according to icasualties.org.

At least two British soldiers were injured when a Katyusha rocket struck their base in the southern city of Basra, a spokeswoman there said.

Bombings, shootings and rocket fire roiled a wide swath of the country.

In Baghdad, a day after a pair of car bombs killed 88 people in a crowded market, at least nine bomb blasts targeting official vehicle convoys and civilians shook the city, killing 11 people and injuring 36, many of them severely. Among those killed was Diya Meqoter, a business school professor who starred on a popular reality television show in which entrepreneurs received small loans to start businesses.

South of the capital in the religiously mixed province of Babil, gunmen killed a suspected former member of Saddam Hussein's Baath Party and a contractor working for the U.S. military.

Police also discovered the body of a police officer inside an explosives-packed vehicle, a booby trap apparently meant to kill responding officers.

Mortar shells struck various locations in Babil, killing 10 people and injuring six, many of them huddled in a tent during a pilgrimage to Karbala for the annual festival commemorating the martyrdom of Imam Hussein, a revered Shiite saint.

An Iraqi hospital official in Ramadi, Ahmed Jassem, said that at least 10 Iraqis were killed and 13 injured during apparent fighting between U.S. troops and insurgents in the war-torn capital of the western province of Al Anbar. The account could not be confirmed. The U.S. military said it killed nine insurgents and wounded another nine in various clashes with armed men in the city.

Violence also erupted in Iraq's north. In Kirkuk, capital of an oil-rich province claimed by Iraq's Kurds, Sunni Arabs and Turkmens, at least two Iraqis were killed and eight injured in insurgent violence.

Clashes broke out overnight between insurgents and police officers in the mostly Sunni Arab city of Mosul, leaving at least five officers dead and three wounded.

US Cracks Down On Iraq's Shia Militants (FT)

By Steve Negus

Financial Times, January 24, 2007

More than 600 members of Iraq's Mahdi Army are in detention awaiting prosecution, the US military announced in a statement late on Monday – the latest indication that operations against the radical Shia militia have been stepped up and that Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki has withdrawn political protection from the group.

The statement is unusual in that it detailed the number of operations against specific organisations and seems intended to show that there is a new emphasis on neutralising the Mahdi Army. It said that in the past 45 days, the US-led coalition and Iraqi security forces had carried out 52 operations focused primarily against the militia, compared to 42 targeting Sunni insurgents.

Mr Maliki has been accused of failing to act on his government's seven-month-old pledge to demobilise militias, but in the last two weeks his aides have hinted that the prime minister had authorised a crackdown on the Mahdi Army, some of whose commanders are believed to be responsible for the torture and killing of thousands of Sunni.

Mr Maliki may have decided that he needed to move against the militia to avoid losing US support and to avoid further alienating Iraq's Sunni Arab neighbours, or because he feels that his support among the Shia has been strengthened after the execution of Saddam Hussein.

Reaction from the Sadrists' political branch has been surprisingly muted, with parliamentarians on Sunday ending a two-month long boycott of the government even though a key Sadrist spokesman had been arrested the day before.

The Sadrists' apparent acquiescence to the dismantling of their military wing however might not last, if Sunni insurgents succeed in striking at Shia civilian targets. Many Shia consider Mahdi Army roadblocks, and Mahdi Army strikes against Sunni insurgent mosques, to be their best defence against the car bombers who have killed thousands over the past few years.

Bombers on Tuesday struck two separate Shia targets in the capital, killing at least five people, and on Monday a double car bombing in a Baghdad market district left at least 88 dead, the bloodiest attack in two months. The bombings are particularly sensitive as they come at the beginning of the month of Muharram, during which Shia commemorate the seventh-century martyrdom of the Prophet Mohammed's grandson Hussein.

Five American Security Employees Killed In Baghdad Helicopter Attack (NYT)

By Marc Santora And James Glanz

The New York Times, January 24, 2007

BAGHDAD, Jan. 23 — Five members of a private security detail protecting an American convoy were killed Tuesday when their helicopters came under attack, and one plummeted to the pavement through a tangle of electrical wires in one of Baghdad's most dangerous neighborhoods.

The four-man crew in one helicopter was killed, and the gunner in a second helicopter apparently died when he was struck by gunfire, American officials said. The crash set off a chaotic five-hour battle in which American attack helicopters crisscrossed the skies over Baghdad and fired at least one Hellfire missile into the streets below.

It is unclear if the first helicopter, nicknamed a Little Bird because it is small and nimble, crashed as the result of gunfire, because it got tangled in the wires or as it was trying to land because a passenger was wounded. But an American military official said that at least four of the victims had suffered gunshot wounds to the head, raising the prospect that some of them had been shot on the ground.

American ground forces made their way to the crash site to retrieve the bodies and secure the area, American officials said. It was unclear what condition the bodies were in when they were recovered.

The helicopters were operated by Blackwater, the same private security firm that lost four contractors in March 2004 in an ambush in the desert town of Falluja, their bodies mutilated, set on fire and hung from a bridge. That episode led to a three-week siege of the city by American marines.

This time, the Blackwater contractors were on a routine protection detail in Baghdad, monitoring an official convoy traveling by road, American and Iraqi officials said. The company has a major contract with the State Department to protect officials traveling outside the protected Green Zone.

A company statement said the men, all American citizens, "were killed while working on behalf of the United States government."

An Iraqi military officer said that the convoy being escorted also came under attack, but American and Iraqi officials said no one in the convoy was killed. Lou Fintor, a spokesman for the State Department, declined to comment on who was in the convoy.

The attack was carried out as the helicopters swooped low over the Fadhil neighborhood, an ancient warren of narrow, twisting streets that is home predominantly to Sunni Arabs and has been the site of numerous battles with insurgents in recent months. The crash took place near the Shorja market in central Baghdad, an military officer said.

On the ground, fierce gun battles lasting several hours could be heard from blocks away. American Apache helicopters took to the sky soon after the attack and could be seen sweeping over the area, making sharp loops over the eastern banks of the Tigris River and then flying low over the neighborhoods.

Initially, according to an American military official, they were just searching for the downed helicopter.

But at one point, they fired at least one Hellfire missile, although military officials could not confirm that it was in response to the downed helicopter. Other small helicopters like the one that carried the Blackwater contractors darted repeatedly over the Baghdad skyline, occasionally disappearing from view as they dipped close to the streets.

DOJ_NMG_0121121

Other violence swept the city all day, with multiple bombings in Shiite areas leaving at least seven people dead. Security forces recovered 27 bodies around the city, killed execution style. The killings may have been part of a cycle of revenge following sustained attacks on Shiite areas as they prepared for one of their most sacred holidays, Ashura.

In two other battles on Tuesday, American forces killed 16 insurgents, the military said. North of Baghdad in Haditha, the forces engaged in a hectic chase as a group of armed men tried to escape by boat across a lake. After those men met other insurgents across the lake, they were attacked by an American aircraft, killing seven. Separately, insurgents fled across rooftops in Baghdad before throwing grenades and firing at American forces that were in pursuit. The Americans returned fire and killed six of the insurgents.

Much about the helicopter attack remained unknown late Tuesday. But American officials said that no diplomats or embassy employees were killed. A spokesman for the State Department refused to comment on specifics.

“A small civilian helicopter crashed in Baghdad this afternoon,” Mr. Fintor said. “We are attempting to determine the facts.”

Insurgents have carried out a series of other sophisticated attacks in recent days. On Saturday, insurgents driving Humvees and dressed in American military clothing killed five American soldiers in an ambush in Karbala. The same day, an American Black Hawk helicopter crashed near Baghdad, killing all 12 people aboard.

An American officer who spoke with a witness in a second helicopter said flares from the Black Hawk’s antimissile systems were activated before it exploded in the air, strongly suggesting that it was shot down. As its investigation continues, the American military has so far refused to confirm officially that the Black Hawk was shot down.

Contractor Helicopter Downed In Iraq (WP)

By Ernesto Londono, Joshua Partlow And Karen Deyoung

The Washington Post, January 24, 2007

BAGHDAD, Jan. 24 -- A private security company helicopter was shot down after responding to assist a U.S. Embassy convoy that came under attack in central Baghdad on Tuesday afternoon, U.S. officials said.

One contractor traveling with the convoy and four contractors aboard the helicopter were killed. The contractors, officials said on condition of anonymity, were employed by North Carolina-based Blackwater USA. Blackwater officials declined to comment.

The convoy came under small-arms fire while traveling through a Sunni neighborhood en route to an Iraqi government ministry, officials said. The helicopter, a small, lightly armed surveillance craft, was dispatched to assist. According to a summary of events drafted by a U.S. Embassy employee and made available to The Washington Post, the convoy was also targeted with rocket-propelled grenades.

The helicopter crashed after being "riddled with small-arms fire," a State Department official said. The official said it was unclear whether the men aboard died from gunfire or from the impact of the crash.

No State Department employees were hurt in the attack, but some vehicles were destroyed, according to the summary of events in the report. Other vehicles in the convoy returned safely to the Green Zone.

Two separate Sunni insurgent groups, Ansar al-Sunnah and the Islamic Army in Iraq, asserted responsibility for the attacks on Web sites used by the groups. The accounts differ in significant detail, although Ansar published photos of what it said were the U.S. Embassy badge, credit cards and dog tags of one of the men killed in the attack.

The authenticity of the statements, translated and made available by the Washington-based SITE Institute, could not be independently confirmed.

The identification posted by Ansar was that of Arthur Laguna, 52, a pilot for Blackwater. His mother, Lydia Laguna, said in an interview that she received a call early Tuesday morning from her other son, also a Blackwater pilot in Baghdad, notifying her that Arthur had been killed.

"As far as any details, we're waiting for representatives from Blackwater to come by tomorrow," said Mary Beth Laguna, 52, Arthur Laguna's wife. "All I know is he's gone."

Arthur Laguna joined Blackwater about six months ago, after a military career that spanned about three decades with the U.S. Army and the California National Guard, she said.

The Pentagon has estimated that there are 100,000 government contractors operating in Iraq. More than 700 civilian contractors have been killed since 2003.

Doug Brooks, president of the International Peace Operations Association, an industry group that includes security contractors, said the type of helicopter downed, known as a "little bird," is among the safest modes of transportation in war zones.

"Their crews are the best -- they really know their stuff," he said in an e-mail. "They are very good at avoiding fire, flying low and fast -- and the tiny helicopters are very hard to hit."

It appears to be the second civilian helicopter downed in Iraq since the war began. The attack occurred three days after a U.S. military Black Hawk crashed north of the capital, killing 12.

In another development, U.S. military officials said Tuesday that they have in custody four people suspected of unleashing a brazen attack on U.S. troops Saturday at a government building in Karbala.

The assailants apparently drove to the building in GMC trucks, slipping through checkpoints by displaying official-looking badges and wearing what looked like U.S. military uniforms. U.S. and Iraqi officials were discussing security plans for a Shiite holiday in the holy city when the assailants attacked the Americans with grenades and other weapons.

Also Tuesday, the military reported the deaths of three U.S. service members. Their deaths bring the death toll of American troops over the weekend to at least 29.

A soldier with the 89th Military Police Brigade was killed Monday in Baghdad by an improvised explosive device; a Marine with the 1st Marine Expeditionary Force died Sunday from wounds suffered in fighting in Baghdad; and a service member assigned to the Marine Regimental Combat Team 5 was killed Monday in Anbar province in western Baghdad.

Newsman Escapes Injury In Iraq Bombing (WP)

By Howard Kurtz

The Washington Post, January 24, 2007

ABC newsman Chris Cuomo narrowly escaped harm in Iraq yesterday when a roadside explosion crippled the armored Humvee he was riding in but the shrapnel failed to fully penetrate the vehicle.

"I got very, very lucky," Cuomo, 36, said in a telephone interview from Baghdad. He praised "the greatness of the soldiers" involved, saying: "I know if I had been there with any other group of individuals, I would not be able to have this conversation."

The harrowing episode unfolded almost one year after another roadside bomb in Iraq badly injured ABC anchor Bob Woodruff, who is still recovering from head wounds.

Two CBS crew members were killed and correspondent Kimberly Dozier was seriously wounded in a car-bomb explosion in Iraq in May.

Cuomo, the news anchor of "Good Morning America" and the son of former New York governor Mario Cuomo, was embedded with a U.S. military police unit in Baghdad when his convoy of four Humvees responded to a report of a burning Iraqi police car. On the side of the road, the unit noticed some bodies, which turned out to be booby-trapped with an improvised bomb. The device exploded with massive force.

"It rocked the entire vehicle, blew out the tires on two of the vehicles, destroyed much of the glass, rocked the vehicles in a very, very big way," Cuomo said on "Good Morning America." "A piece of shrapnel was barely stopped by this armored door. It came within fractions of an inch of going through the entire vehicle."

The unit came under heavy small-arms fire, and Cuomo was trapped inside his disabled Humvee. He said another military unit arrived and provided cover while his and another crippled vehicle were towed to safety. No soldiers were wounded in the incident.

A hubcap-size piece of shrapnel broke the glass of one of the Humvees, creating a five-inch indentation in the armor, Cuomo said. He said his vehicle had less armored plating and that the situation could have been "catastrophic" if it had been hit by shrapnel of that size.

What impressed him most, Cuomo said, was the way the gunner, still spitting glass from a shattered window, sprang into action without complaint. Capt. Jay Shama of the 410th Military Police Company told Cuomo the unit would return to the same area today.

"This is their routine," Cuomo said. "They go out day after day while people are trying to blow them up. . . . It's one thing to question the mission. To question the soldiers is completely without basis."

ABC spokesman Jeffrey Schneider said Cuomo had volunteered for the week-long assignment.

"For a news division that's been through what we've been through, every single person who goes to Iraq -- every cameraman, every sound man, every correspondent, every anchor -- we don't ever stop worrying about them," Schneider said. "It reminds you once again that Iraq is a terribly dangerous place, but a place where we owe it to our audience to tell the story of what soldiers go through on a daily basis."

Asked if he was still shaken up, Cuomo said: "I'm trying not to deal with it. I'm trying to deal with it like a soldier, just do my job."

Martin Luther Al-King? (NYT)

By Thomas L. Friedman

The New York Times, January 24, 2007

It's hard to know what's more disturbing: the barbaric sectarian murders by Sunnis and Shiites in Iraq, or the deafening silence with which these mass murders are received in the Muslim world. How could it be that Danish cartoons of Muhammad led to mass violent protests, while unspeakable violence by Muslims against Muslims in Iraq every day evokes about as much reaction in the Arab-Muslim world as the weather report? Where is the Muslim Martin Luther King? Where is the "Million Muslim March" under the banner: "No Shiites, No Sunnis: We are all children of the Prophet Muhammad."

I can logically understand the lack of protest when Muslims kill Americans in Iraq. We're seen as occupiers by many. But I can't understand how the mass slaughter of 70 Baghdad college students last week by Sunni suicide bombers or the blowing up of a Shiite mosque on the first day of Ramadan in 2005 evoke so little response. Every day it's 100 more.

I raise this question because the only hope left for Iraq — if there is any — is not in a U.S. counterinsurgency strategy. That may be necessary, but without a Muslim counternihilism strategy that delegitimizes the mass murder of Muslims by Muslims, there is no hope for decent politics there. It takes a village, and right now the Muslim village is mute. It has no moral voice when it comes to its own.

"The Koran describes the Prophet Muhammad as a Prophet of Mercy," said Husain Haqqani, the Pakistani-born director of Boston University's Center for International Relations. "Muslims begin all their acts, including worship, with the words: 'In the name of God, the compassionate, the merciful.' The Koran also says, 'To you, your faith, and to me, mine.' But unfortunately, these mercy-focused, peacemaking ideas are lost [today] in the overall discourse in the Muslim world about reviving lost glory and setting right the injustice of Western domination. ...

"For a Muslim Martin Luther King to emerge, Muslim discourse would have to shift away from the focus on power and glory and include taking responsibility as a community for our own situation."

In fairness, for a Martin Luther King to emerge requires some free space, Saad Eddin Ibrahim, the courageous Egyptian democracy campaigner, remarked to me. But right now many liberals in the Arab world are in one way or another under house arrest by their regimes. "While Islamists in Egypt have access to thousands of mosques and can meet with their followers five times a day," Mr. Ibrahim said, liberal members of his own institute "can barely move in Cairo, let alone organize a march."

The Arab regimes want America to believe that there are only two choices: Islamists and the regimes, so it will side with the regimes.

This is one reason Mr. Ibrahim hopes the Islamists will take up the democratic agenda. They could carry it to the masses. One of the most popular Islamist leaders in the Arab world today, he notes, is Hezbollah's Sheik Hassan Nasrallah in Lebanon. Up to now, though, the leaders of Hezbollah and Hamas seem to prefer being of pawns of Syria and Iran than agents of democratic change and Muslim reconciliation.

There's a lot at stake. If Iraq is ultimately unraveled by Muslim suicide-nihilism, it certainly will be a blot on our history — we opened this Pandora's box. But it will be a plague on the future of the whole Arab world.

If Arab Muslims can summon the will to protest only against the insults of "the foreigner" but never the injuries inflicted by their own on their own, how can they ever generate a modern society or democracy — which is all about respecting and protecting minority voices and unorthodox views? And if Sunnis and Shiites can never form a social contract to rule themselves — and will always require an iron-fisted dictator — decent government will forever elude them.

The brutally honest Syrian-born poet Ali Ahmad Said, known as Adonis, gave an interview from Paris on March 11, 2006, with Dubai TV, and warned of what's at stake (translation by Memri):

"The Arab individual is no less smart, no less a genius, than anyone else in the world. He can excel — but only outside his society. ... If I look at the Arabs, with all their resources and great capacities, and I compare what they have achieved over the past century with what others have achieved in that period, I would have to say that we Arabs are in a phase of extinction, in the sense that we have no creative presence in the world. ...

"We have the quantity. We have the masses of people, but a people becomes extinct when it no longer has a creative capacity, and the capacity to change its world."

Can Al-Maliki Make The Bush Plan For Iraq Work? (USAT)

By Rick Jervis

USA Today, January 24, 2007

BAGHDAD — They killed more than 60 members of his extended family. They murdered even more of his friends. They issued a death warrant for him.

For most of his life, Nouri al-Maliki, a Shiite Arab, says he has been persecuted and hunted by the Sunnis who dominated the government of Saddam Hussein.

DOJ_NMG_0121124

Now, as Iraq's prime minister, al-Maliki must make peace between the two bitterly divided Muslim factions. President Bush has said that al-Maliki's ability to do that, and to shift responsibility from U.S. forces to Iraq's military and police, may determine the nation's fate.

"The prime minister has perhaps the hardest job in the world," says Zalmay Khalilzad, the U.S. ambassador to Iraq. Bush's new security plan for Iraq includes committing 21,500 additional U.S. troops and hinges on whether al-Maliki is willing and able to crack down on the Shiite militias that U.S. commanders blame for much of the violence in the capital.

Al-Maliki's critics accuse him of protecting Shiite allies with blood on their hands. Since taking office last May, al-Maliki has blocked several attempts by U.S. and Iraqi troops to confront the Mahdi Army, a Shiite militia group led by one of al-Maliki's key political supporters, the rebel cleric Muqtada al-Sadr.

Al-Maliki's "personality and background make reconciliation impossible," says Saleh al-Mutlaq, a leading Sunni politician. "What he's trying to do now is buy time. The plan is to push Sunnis out of Baghdad."

In an interview Friday with USA TODAY, Bush said that he believes al-Maliki is "beginning to" go after all militias with equal vigor. Last week, al-Maliki's government announced the arrests of 400 Mahdi Army militants and a high-ranking al-Sadr aide whom the U.S. military accuses of being involved in death squads.

"There will not be any house or party headquarters or any office that has impunity from security operations," al-Maliki told reporters last week.

The prime minister "is walking a very tight tightrope," says Stephen Biddle, a fellow at the New York-based Council on Foreign Relations. "The central narrative of this conflict, almost from the beginning, has been Shiite vs. Sunni. If he sides too overtly with Sadr, he loses our support. If he falls off the tightrope (by) siding too closely with us, he loses credibility among the Shiites."

Al-Maliki, 56, is a quiet, intense workaholic whose life has been intimately shaped by the long Shiite struggle against foreign and Sunni oppression, say colleagues such as Sami Alaskary, a Shiite lawmaker and close aide. Al-Maliki declined to be interviewed for this story.

Originally from Hindiyah, a small river village near Karbala, al-Maliki spent his youth in Iraq's Shiite-dominated south. His grandfather, Mohammed Hassan Abul Mahasin, was a poet and rebel fighter against British occupation in the 1920s. Al-Maliki studied literature and poetry at the College of Usol al-Din in Baghdad and later based his master's thesis on his grandfather's poetry. He still recites the verses today.

In the late 1960s, al-Maliki joined Dawa, a Shiite group that opposed Saddam and sought to establish an Islamic republic in Iraq. Al-Maliki worked in the political bureau, organizing groups and meetings.

When Saddam's regime mounted a campaign of mass arrests, torture and murder against Dawa members in the 1970s, al-Maliki took refuge in the marshes of southern Iraq. There, he and other Dawa members dressed as locals, moved from village to village and evaded Saddam's agents while trying to help fighters from Iran join Iraqi resistance efforts, Alaskary says.

Like many other opposition members, al-Maliki took on a nom de guerre — Jawad — in an attempt to protect family members from reprisals. It didn't work. His family was routinely targeted as a way to get to him, says Hassan al-Sunneid, an Iraqi Shiite lawmaker and longtime friend.

"People from his tribe and many, many of his friends were killed," Alaskary says.

In 1979, after Saddam's regime issued a death warrant for him, al-Maliki fled to Iran. Despite Tehran's strong support for the cause of Iraqi Shiites, al-Maliki "never felt comfortable around the Iranians," Alaskary says. "He thought the Iranians were dishonest, that they were not true to their word. And their ambitions were not in Iraq's best interest."

After just two months in Iran, Dawa Party leaders sent al-Maliki to Syria. There, his job was to recruit exiled Iraqis into the party and run the Dawa newspaper Al-Mawkif. Even there, al-Maliki still largely kept to himself. "There is a psychological structure inside of him that makes him want to work only with Iraqis," Sunneid says.

Al-Maliki long mistrusted Americans as well, Alaskary says. During the 1991 Gulf War, Bush's father, then-president George H.W. Bush, encouraged Iraqis to rebel against Saddam but didn't send U.S. support. Thousands of Iraqis, many of them Shiites, were killed in retaliatory attacks by the regime.

Al-Maliki was in Syria at the time and played no role in the largely spontaneous Shiite uprising. Many of his friends and tribal members were killed. Other family members fled Iraq, Alaskary says.

That sense of betrayal still lingered on the eve of the U.S. invasion. Alaskary relates how, during a Dawa meeting in Tehran in 2002, al-Maliki asked, "Why will George Bush's son be any different?"

Al-Maliki's difficult relationship with the United States came to the forefront when he was unexpectedly thrust into the premiership last May. Al-Maliki was a compromise candidate who emerged after Sunni, Shiite and Kurdish parties disagreed on two previous candidates.

DOJ_NMG_0121125

Al-Maliki was chosen because he had won the respect of many Sunni and Kurdish leaders during negotiations to form the constitution the previous year, said Mahmoud Othman, a leading Kurdish lawmaker. "We have a prime minister who never dreamed of becoming prime minister," says Mithal al-Alusi, an independent Sunni lawmaker who meets frequently with al-Maliki.

At first, al-Maliki bristled at what he saw as U.S. interference and grew frustrated at the lack of control he had over his fledgling Iraqi military, says Sadiq al-Rikabi, his political adviser. "He's not an easy man to ask him to do this and do that," he says. "Sometimes when you pressure him, he becomes tougher, rather than more flexible."

Sectarian violence took a turn for the worse, and the U.S. government pressed al-Maliki to take a tougher stance toward armed groups. However, in an October interview with USA TODAY, al-Maliki said he felt large street fights with the militias, particularly the Mahdi Army, would alienate Shiites from his government and embolden al-Sadr.

In October, al-Maliki ordered the release of a high-ranking al-Sadr associate arrested by U.S. troops for having links to death squads. A few weeks later, he demanded American troops remove a week-long cordon that had been set up around Sadr City, the volatile Shiite slum that is the stronghold of the Mahdi Army, as part of a search for a missing U.S. soldier.

According to a recent report by the United Nations, 34,452 Iraqi civilians lost their lives in 2006 as Sunnis and Shiites engaged in increasingly bloody revenge killings.

Then came the execution of Saddam on Dec. 30, which was marred by taunts and obscenities yelled by Shiites who took part in the hanging. Even Bush said it looked like "kind of a revenge killing."

The day before the execution, al-Maliki met with U.S. officials at his residence inside the Green Zone and signed stacks of papers to push the execution forward, even as his only son's wedding reception buzzed around him, says Basam Ridha, an adviser.

"The way the Saddam execution took place, the fact that sectarian violence has intensified the past several months, does not help in terms of establishing him as prime minister of all Iraqis," Khalilzad says.

Before becoming prime minister, al-Maliki served as deputy chairman of a committee that sought to remove former members of Saddam's Baath Party from government posts.

That has further deepened suspicions between him and Sunnis, says al-Mutlaq, the Sunni lawmaker.

Khalilzad acknowledges that al-Maliki has had trouble bridging divides between the two sects. "That has been a challenge for him," he says.

Many in the U.S. Congress have publicly wondered whether al-Maliki is the right man for the job.

Following a meeting with al-Maliki in Baghdad this month, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, D-N.Y., said that the prime minister had paid only "lip service" to easing sectarian tensions.

Also this month, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said that al-Maliki's government knew it was operating "on borrowed time." Al-Maliki reacted strongly, saying such statements bolster the morale of terrorists and lead them to believe they are winning. Rice later apologized.

In December, al-Maliki told The Wall Street Journal that he was exhausted and would rather not be prime minister. "I wish I could be done with it," he was quoted as saying.

Yet starting late last year, colleagues such as al-Alusi say they noticed a gradual change in al-Maliki's behavior and policies. He began speaking more favorably of American strategies toward Iraq.

The clearest sign of a broader shift came when al-Maliki agreed to allow U.S. troops into all parts of Baghdad, including Sadr City — a strategy he had previously bitterly resisted, al-Alusi says. "This is a huge development," he says.

Al-Maliki often reminds fellow Shiite leaders that he represents all Iraqis, not just one sect, Alaskary says. "I've heard him say this many, many times," he says.

The prime minister organized a reconciliation conference in Amman, Jordan, last year that brought all of Iraq's groups together. He has routinely met with Sunni tribal leaders from Anbar province to plot ways to combat the al-Qaeda-led insurgency there.

Some Sunni leaders have expressed qualified support. "Since he became prime minister, things have deteriorated," says Nasir al-Ani, head of the reconciliation committee of the Iraqi Islamic Party, a leading Sunni group. "But what makes us optimistic is that he is very loyal to this cause and this country."

Al-Alusi says he has learned to try to meet with the prime minister in the mornings, when al-Maliki fresh and attentive, rather than at night, when the stress of a hard day usually has him in a dour mood. Al-Maliki always listens, he says.

"One of the things unique about him is that he's very direct," Khalilzad says. "He speaks his mind, and when he disagrees with you, you know it."

Al-Maliki sometimes breaks up long, tense meetings by suddenly calling for tea and asking if anyone's heard any good jokes about him, Ridha says. On the rare moments when he's not working, al-Maliki follows the Iraqi national soccer team on TV or reads local newspapers.

DOJ_NMG_0121126

The coming weeks will show whether al-Maliki will rise to the occasion and bring Iraqis together, al-Alusi says.

"He's given us a few clues," al-Alusi says. "The question is: How far will he go?"

Analysts See A Chance For Maliki Success (WP)

By Walter Pincus

The Washington Post, January 24, 2007

The draft of a new National Intelligence Estimate on Iraq says it will be "very difficult" but "not impossible" for the government of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki to succeed in providing better governance in that war-ravaged country, a top intelligence official told a Senate committee yesterday.

"Security is an impediment," said Thomas Fingar, the deputy director of national intelligence for analysis and chairman of the National Intelligence Council. Fingar gave the Senate Select Committee on Intelligence a rare preview of what the classified National Intelligence Estimate (NIE) will say when it is completed at the end of the month.

"Gains in stability could open a window for gains in reconciliation among and between sectarian groups and could open the possibilities for a moderate coalition that could permit better government," Fingar said in response to a question written by Sen. John W. Warner (R-Va.) and read by Chairman John D. Rockefeller IV (D-W.Va.), which sought the intelligence community's judgments as reflected in the NIE.

"It will be very difficult for the Maliki government to do this," Fingar said, "but he [Maliki] does not wish to fail or to preside over the disintegration of Iraq." Fingar added that in the NIE, there are "a lot of conditional statements, but it is not impossible."

Fingar had earlier been asked by several senators about the time it had taken to complete the NIE, which Congress requested in legislation that passed the Senate last August. Sen. Ron Wyden (D-Ore.) raised the issue, saying that under the present timetable, Congress will vote on resolutions questioning President Bush sending additional troops to Iraq without seeing the forthcoming NIE. "Intelligence has got to be available in a timely way," Wyden said.

He said that in 2002, the administration pushed out an NIE on Saddam Hussein's weapons of mass destruction in three weeks. But Sen. Christopher S. Bond (R-Mo.) noted that the result was a flawed document. "We learned the hard way in 2002" to wait for an NIE to be prepared in a timely fashion, Bond said.

Fingar explained that the time for completing the NIE dragged out because the number of highly skilled Iraq analysts is small and they often are called on by the White House and military for quick analyses and assessments. Asked by Sen. Sheldon Whitehouse (D-R.I.) whether the president or vice president had input in the NIE timing or content, Fingar said they did not. The panel's hearing was primarily directed at the workings of the restructuring of the intelligence community under the 2004 legislation that established the Office of the Director of National Intelligence.

Iraq Parliament Finds A Quorum Hard To Come By (NYT)

By Damien Cave

The New York Times, January 24, 2007

BAGHDAD, Jan. 23 — Mahmoud al-Mashhadani, the speaker of Parliament, read a roll call of the 275 elected members with a goal of shaming the no-shows.

Ayad Allawi, the former prime minister? Absent, living in Amman and London. Adnan Pachachi, the octogenarian statesman? Also gone, in Abu Dhabi.

Others who failed to appear Monday included Saleh Mutlak, a senior Sunni legislator; several Shiites and Kurds; and Ayad al-Samaraei, chairman of the finance committee, whose absence led Mr. Mashhadani to ask: “When will he be back? After we approve the budget?”

It was a joke barbed with outrage. Parliament in recent months has been at a standstill. Nearly every session since November has been adjourned because as few as 65 members made it to work, even as they and the absentees earned salaries and benefits worth about $120,000.

Part of the problem is security, but Iraqi officials also said they feared that members were losing confidence in the institution and in the country’s fragile democracy. As chaos has deepened, Parliament’s relevance has gradually receded.

Deals on important legislation, most recently the oil law, now take place largely out of public view, with Parliament — when it meets — rubber-stamping the final decisions. As a result, officials said, vital legislation involving the budget, provincial elections and amendments to the Constitution remain trapped in a legislative process that processes nearly nothing. American officials long hoped that Parliament could help foster dialogue between Iraq’s increasingly fractured ethnic and religious groups, but that has not happened, either.

DOJ_NMG_0121127

Goaded by American leaders, frustrated and desperate to prove that Iraq can govern itself, senior Iraqi officials have clearly had enough. Mr. Mashhadani said Parliament would soon start fining members $400 for every missed session and replace the absentees if they fail to attend a minimum amount of the time.

Some of Iraq's more seasoned leaders say attendance has been undermined by a widening sense of disillusionment about Parliament's ability to improve Iraqis' daily life. The country's dominant issue, security, is almost exclusively the policy realm of the American military and the office of the prime minister.

Every bombing like the one on Monday, which killed 88 people at a downtown market, suggests to some that Parliament's laws are irrelevant in the face of sprawling chaos and the government's inability to stop it.

"People are totally disenchanted," Mr. Pachachi said in a telephone interview from Abu Dhabi. "There has been no improvement in the security situation. The government seems to be incapable of doing anything despite all the promises."

Though the Constitution grants Iraq's only elected body wide powers to pass laws and investigate, sectarian divisions and the need for a twothirds majority in some cases have often led to deadlock. Sunni and Shiite power brokers have blocked efforts to scrutinize violence connected to their own sects.

"Parliament is the heart of the political process," Mr. Mashhadani said in an interview at his office, offering more hope than reality. "It is the center of everything. If the heart is not working, it all fails."

Monday's attendance actually surpassed the 50 percent plus one needed to pass laws. It was the first quorum in months, caused in part by the return of 30 members loyal to the Shiite cleric Moktada al-Sadr, whose end to a two-month boycott created a public relations blitz that helped attract 189 members.

But the scene in the convention center auditorium where Parliament meets only underscored the rarity of the gathering. It seemed at times like a reunion. At one point Abdul Aziz al-Hakim, who is head of the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq and a Shiite rival of Mr. Sadr, arrived late — after being marked absent. He spent the first five minutes waving and nodding at colleagues, some of whom he apparently had not seen in months.

Parliamentary officials refused to provide attendance lists for every session, fearing retribution. They said all sects and regions had members who often did not come.

Each representative earns about $10,000 a month in salary and benefits, including money for guards. Yet on Monday, members from Baghdad neighborhoods to small towns in the hinterland — Sunnis, Shiites, Kurds, Christians and Turkmen — were all on the list of no-shows that Mr. Mashhadani read aloud.

The largest group of absentees consisted of unknown figures elected as part of the party lists that governed how most people voted in the December 2005 election. Party leaders in Baghdad said they had urged their members to attend but emphasized that for many, Parliament had become a hardship post.

Representatives who travel from afar stay at the Rashid Hotel in the Green Zone, across a road, two checkpoints and several pat-downs from the 1970s-era convention center. It is not luxurious. It is barely safe. The food is mediocre.

In short, many said, the job is not what members thought they had signed up for.

"Most of them were here for the game, for prestige, for the money," said Muhammad al-Ahmedawi, a Shiite member of the Fadhila Party. "It's upsetting and disappointing. We want the members to come, to pursue the interests of their constituents, especially in this sensitive time."

Mr. Ahmedawi said politicians who had larger shares of power before the elections seemed to view Parliament as a demotion best ignored. Mr. Allawi, for example, who did not return calls to his London aides requesting an interview, has been rallying support in Amman and London among exiles who have fled Iraq's violence.

Of the 25 members of his bloc, only six attended the session on Monday.

Mr. Pachachi, who is in his mid-80s, said he left Iraq a few months ago because his wife needed open-heart surgery and he did not trust that she would be well cared for in one of Baghdad's decrepit hospitals. He said he hoped to return in a few weeks, admitting that "one has to be there — you can't be a member of the Parliament and live abroad."

But he said the dangers involved with being a public figure in Iraq had made it much more difficult to participate in government. He has 40 guards to protect him when he comes to Iraq, he said, and the salary from Parliament pays for only 20.

"I have protection, and unfortunately the protection is not sufficient for anyone anymore," he said. "The level of violence has become unmanageable."

Other Iraqi politicians take a harder line. Adnan Dulaimi, a member of the largest Sunni bloc in Parliament, put it simply, "If there are some members who think there is no benefit to attending, then they should resign."

Mr. Mashhadani seems to be shaping a slightly softer approach that mixes persuasion with punishment. Like Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki, he has met repeatedly with party leaders, pushing them to ensure the attendance of their members.

DOJ_NMG_0121128

During an interview in his office, lined with baroque cushioned chairs with gold trim, he also acknowledged that more money should be set aside for members' security, but only if members show up to pass a budget.

He said the shaming of the absentees at the public session, a first, was the first step. He said the fines and threat of replacement would also help.

There is, of course, only one problem. For the proposals to be put in place, a majority of members in Parliament have to be present to pass them.

Iraq Struggles To Finish Oil Law (WP)

By Steven Mufson

Washington Post, January 24, 2007

Four months ago, about 80 oil company executives and consultants packed an office on St. James's Square in London for a briefing on exploration prospects in Iraq's Kurdish region and a Kurdish draft of an Iraqi national petroleum law.

Despite the immense risks of working in Iraq -- pipeline explosions, kidnappings, insurgency, political infighting -- the oil company executives were lured by the potential rewards, which are immense, too. Outside Saudi Arabia, no country has proven oil reserves as big as Iraq's. And the oil there is high quality, easy and cheap to produce, and bottled up in reservoirs that many major oil companies were familiar with three decades ago before wars and sanctions drove them out.

"Exxon Mobil has more seismic data on Iraq than on Houston real estate," says Fadel Gheit, an oil analyst at Oppenheimer & Co. who used to work for Mobil. "If Exxon had security on the ground, the following day it would have crews there," Gheit said. "And money would be no object."

Gheit estimated that Iraq could easily produce 6 million barrels a day, more than three times its current output and enough to help keep a lid on world prices.

Four months after the London meeting, however, security remains elusive and so does the national petroleum law. Barham Saleh, Iraq's deputy prime minister, said in a recent telephone interview that a compromise was "very, very close."

The proposed law has taken on significance beyond oil. While Iraq and foreign oil companies are eager to tap new revenue, the Bush administration and many Iraqis also hope that the law can be a model for resolving disputes and can bind Iraq's warring factions together.

Agreement has been reached on sharing oil revenue on a per-capita basis, a benefit for Sunnis who live mostly in areas with less production. A deal also has been struck that recognizes the power of regional authorities, such as the Kurdish Regional Government, to award oil contracts, but establishes a national petroleum commission with the power to review contracts within 60 days. A "revamped" national oil company would continue to manage existing production while new regional affiliates would participate in new exploration and production.

"We need to close the deal on one or two small issues," Saleh said. "A number of the major issues have been resolved."

But an adviser to the Kurdish authorities said those "small issues" included some significant details. On Friday, the Kurdistan Regional Government posted an item on its Web site denying news reports that a deal was complete. The "important annexes to the law are still pending," it said.

Outstanding issues include how much oil revenue will go to the central government; a charter for the new national oil company; the role of the oil ministry; and the principles upon which the new commission could reject regionally negotiated contracts. Also unsettled is whether the commission will require a simple majority vote or a two-thirds vote to reject a contract's terms. Those provisions must all be part of one package with the petroleum law, Kurdish leaders said.

If the Shia-dominated Iraqi central government spends heavily on its own projects, it could deny the Kurds and other regional authorities significant shares of oil revenue.

Even if negotiators agree on a draft, it must win approval from Iraq's cabinet and fractious parliament, which hasn't met in weeks.

The United States has been pressing Iraq to complete the law. "As awful as the Saddam Hussein government was, it did have a record of dealing with foreign investors that wasn't that bad," said James A. Placke, an expert at Cambridge Energy Research Associates. "That's gone and hasn't been replaced."

Now, forging a petroleum law requires a balancing of sharply divided interest and ethnic groups, not just the word of a dictator.

"This is not a regular piece of Iraqi legislation being signed off on," said Jonathan Morrow, an adviser to the Kurdistan Regional Government. If successful, he said, "it . . . might show the way forward in Iraq."

Saleh suggested that a deal might discourage attacks on oil installations and reduce corruption. "Since we all agree on revenue sharing, all elements of Iraqi society will have an interest in maximizing revenues and best business practices," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0121129

For now, however, the oil sector is a mess. Since the first attack on a pipeline on June 1, 2003, it has been a struggle to keep oil flowing. Basic production equipment has been looted or destroyed. Many wells still are not working properly. And last year, the U.S. special inspector general for Iraq reconstruction complained that Iraq's oil ministry was not reporting on its budget and had spent "only a fraction" of money set aside for capital costs.

While the Bush administration once thought that Iraqi oil revenue would cover occupation and reconstruction costs, the Iraq government still relies heavily on U.S. technical and financial aid. Placke estimated that Iraq produced 1.85 million barrels a day last year, less than the year before, less than the prewar output and well below the U.S. target of 3 million barrels a day.

Placke, who was part of the Iraq Study Group, estimated that 200,000 barrels a day is siphoned from the main export line through southern Iraq, put on barges, and loaded onto tankers waiting in the Persian Gulf. What's left after discounts and bribes goes to militias or insurgent groups, he said.

In the south, some local Shia militia, clan or clerical groups are trying to claim the rights to some Iraqi fields and a voice in negotiating access for foreign companies. A stake in a billion-barrel field could be more important than a stake in the parliament or cabinet. Some experts worry that, as in Sudan, oil could contribute more to tearing the country apart than to uniting it.

A senior Iraqi government official involved in the petroleum-law talks said that if militias and clans were to cut separate deals with foreign companies, it would be a "recipe for disaster and civil war." He warned foreign companies against signing such deals. "We are very interested in credible investment in the oil sector," he said. "We cannot afford to have these cowboys running around trying to manipulate the situation in Iraq."

The national petroleum law remains a touchy subject in part because of widespread suspicion that the U.S. invasion in 2003 was motivated by designs on Iraq's oil riches.

The Iraq Study Group report contained three pages of recommendations for the sector, including suggestions that international oil companies invest in the country and the government fight corruption on contracts.

"Before embarking on controversial measures such as this law favoring foreign oil firms, the Iraqi parliament and government must prove that they are capable of protecting the country's sovereignty," Kamil Mahdi, a senior lecturer in Middle East economics at the University of Exeter in England, wrote in the Guardian newspaper. "A government that is failing to protect the lives of its citizens must not embark on controversial legislation that ties the hands of future Iraqi leaders, and which threatens to squander the Iraqis' precious, exhaustible resource in an orgy of waste, corruption and theft."

In a telephone interview, Mahdi said, "My main worry is that if I were an official in the ministry of oil negotiating a contract and living under the kind of threats that people in Iraq are daily experiencing, I would probably be in a very weak negotiating position."

While the debate continues, the Kurdistan Regional Government is pushing ahead. In 2002, at the suggestion of Jalal Talabani, the Kurdish leader who is now Iraq's president, the Turkish conglomerate Cukurova Group set up an oil unit called Genel Enerji to look for oil in Kurdistan. Genel signed a production-sharing agreement in July 2002 and took over the Taq Taq oil field in February 2003 on the eve of the U.S-led invasion. It signed another exploration contract in July 2005. A Norwegian firm, DNO, and a Canadian firm, Heritage Oil, also struck exploration and production deals in the Kurdish region.

Tariq Shafiq, a former executive of Iraq National Oil and director of the consulting firm Petrolog & Associates, has drawn up three contracts -- service, buyback and production-sharing -- that the government will use in its new petroleum law. He said the Kurdish production-sharing contracts give away too much to the foreign companies; he said that after paying for capital and operations costs, as much as 55 percent of the oil goes to the foreign firms. "These, in the eye of many, are illegal and would have to undergo review to bring them in line with this law," he said.

But Kurdish authorities said they have no intention of submitting existing contracts for review. Duran said Genel's contract was renegotiated last November and falls within the 20 percent share production that would be the ceiling under the new law. "The commercial terms of the PSA are in conformity with internationally acceptable PSA terms," Duran said in an e-mail response to questions. "Therefore, our PSA is not generous at all."

Major U.S. oil companies haven't signed any contracts in Kurdistan yet. Some of them have tried to build goodwill with the central government. Chevron, for example, helped clear mines from the coastline. Others have collected seismic data or trained Iraqi oil company technicians in Dubai.

Some major companies from other nations -- Russia's Lukoil, a Chinese state company, France's Total -- are hoping to get their big Hussein-era concessions back. Their prospects remain uncertain.

Suicide Bomber Kills At Least 8 In Afghanistan (NYT)

By Abdul Waheed Wafa

The New York Times, January 24, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0121130

KABUL, Afghanistan, Jan. 23 — A suicide bomber wearing an explosive vest blew himself up Tuesday at the entrance to a NATO base in the southeastern province of Khost, killing 8 to 10 people, officials said.

The attack occurred as Afghan laborers were lining up for security checks at the pedestrian entrance of the base known as Camp Salerno. The bomber was trying to enter the base, NATO said, but detonated the vest when he reached the search point.

Arsalah Jamal, the Afghan provincial governor of Khost, visited the scene after the bombing and confirmed the deaths of eight civilian laborers and two Afghan security guards, though a NATO statement put the toll at six Afghan civilians and two policemen.

"I confirm 10 people, including two Afghan security guards, were killed in a suicide attack at the entrance of the military base," Mr. Jamal said.

He said 14 others had been wounded in the attack, all Afghan civilian daily workers for the military base. NATO said only five had been wounded.

Khost, in eastern Afghanistan, borders tribal areas in Pakistan that Afghan and Western officials contend offer a haven for militants organizing suicide attacks.

"Suicide attack is not an Afghani phenomenon," Mr. Jamal said by telephone. "There are madrasas and camps on the other side of the border where some elements promise passport and visa" to "young people for killing themselves and others."

The attack was one of the deadliest since Sept. 30, 2006, when a suicide bomber blew himself up outside the gates of the Interior Ministry in Kabul, killing 12 people and wounding up to 40.

General: Army Increase Will Cost $70B (AP)

By Pauline Jelinek

AP, January 24, 2007

WASHINGTON (AP) — Increasing the size of the Army, strained by America's two ongoing wars, will cost an estimated $70 billion, a top Army general said Tuesday.

And if yet another conflict were to develop before the force can be bolstered, it would take longer to fight and cost more American casualties than otherwise might be expected, said Lt. Gen. Stephen Speakes, a deputy chief of staff.

Reversing previous administration thinking, President Bush said last month that he wants a larger military. And Defense Secretary Robert Gates earlier this month recommended that the Army's troop strength be increased by 65,000 soldiers, to a total of 547,000 worldwide and the Marines be increased by 27,000 to 202,000. Almost half of that Army increase already has been achieved under a temporary program that Gates said would be made permanent; the full increase is to be achieved within five years.

The Army's preliminary estimate is that it would cost $70 billion to increase its size and the funds would be spread over budget years 2009 through 2013, Speakes told a defense writers group Tuesday .

Army Chief of Staff Gen. Peter Schoomaker has said that the service budget jumps $1.2 billion with each 10,000 soldiers that it recruits and trains. Speakes said the $70 billion figure includes everything — from equipment to pay to health benefits. No figure was immediately available for the increase in the Marine Corps.

"What we are asking is that Americans make a decision about priorities," he said of the huge new defense cost.

Meanwhile, he acknowledged, fighting the war in Iraq on top of the war in Afghanistan has left ground forces in a weakened state of readiness.

That is, some units are below the standard measure used to determine if they are ready to fight a conventional, high-intensity war. This is because they have substantial equipment shortfalls and their training is focusing on the low-intensity, counterinsurgency battle being fought in Iraq.

"What America needs to do is realize that we can fulfill the national strategy (of defending against another conflict simultaneously), but ... that it will take more time and it will also take us increased casualties to do the job," he said.

"We have an issue, and that's part of what, I think, the recent decisions by the president and secretary of defense have addressed," Speakes said. "We're going to build a more robust Army, we're going to continue to invest in a ground force that has the right capabilities, the right equipment, the right training to do it's job," he said, adding that enormous improvements in the quality of the Army have been made in recent years.

"This is a voyage in progress, it's being measured against the harsh litmus test of combat which has forced some grim realities on all of us," Speakes said.

U.S. Stages 2nd Airstrike In Somalia; Ethiopians Leaving Capital (WP)

By Karen Deyoung And Stephanie McCrummen

The Washington Post, January 24, 2007

A U.S. Air Force AC-130 gunship staged an airstrike against suspected al-Qaeda operatives in southern Somalia on Monday, the second such attack this month, U.S. officials said Tuesday.

There was no immediate information on specific targets or the strike's results. The United States has said that at least three senior al-Qaeda operatives were being sheltered by the Islamic Courts movement that was ousted from power in the Somali capital, Mogadishu, by the Ethiopian military last month.

Word of the new attack came the same day as a long line of Ethiopian artillery, armored vehicles and trucks loaded with soldiers rolled toward the edges of Mogadishu, beginning a withdrawal from a fragile capital that many residents fear will now slip further into chaos.

A spokesman for Somalia's transitional government, Abdirahman Dinari, said that the Ethiopians may take several weeks to complete a full withdrawal from the country and that a large force would remain on the Ethiopian side of the Somalia-Ethiopia border.

The Ethiopians have remained in the capital to protect the nascent transitional government, which hardly has enough forces to secure the oceanside city.

Without the Ethiopian muscle, Somali officials have a "deep concern" about Islamic fighters who remain hidden in the city and have asserted responsibility for a recent string of attacks against Ethiopian and Somali government troops, Dinari said.

Details of a proposal to send in a peacekeeping force of at least 8,000 troops from other African countries are under negotiation, and many analysts doubt that that number can be mustered. Dinari said an initial force of about 1,000 soldiers from Uganda will probably arrive next week, and others from South Africa, Malawi and Nigeria will follow. The United States has promised airlift and logistics support.

On Monday, European Union officials tied funding for the African Union peacekeepers to the Somali government's willingness to negotiate with certain ousted Islamic leaders, who are thought to be crucial to preventing a full-scale insurgency. U.S. officials have voiced similar concern.

The European demand infuriated the Somali government. Dinari said it only "gives the Islamic fighters a signal" to continue their attacks.

On the streets of the capital Tuesday, people watched and sometimes waved as the Ethiopians rumbled along the sandy road that eventually reaches the Ethiopian border.

"The elements of the Islamists will come back," said Hassan Abdi Aden, 45, who was eating lunch nearby. "The warlords are already in Mogadishu. The clan fighting will start again. All this is something that can happen in the near future."

Mogadishu has been in an almost perpetual state of clan warfare since the fall of the last central government, the military dictatorship of Mohamed Said Barre, in 1991.

For two weeks, Ethiopian and Somali government troops have been attacked with mortars and rocket-propelled grenades fired from cars.

If Mogadishu descends into another period of clan warfare, some regional analysts say, that is precisely what Ethiopian Prime Minister Zenawi Meles wanted all along. As evidence, they point to an Ethiopian government foreign policy report submitted to that country's Parliament two years ago.

According to an English translation, Ethiopian security officials wrote that Somalia was so divided that it "no longer posed a threat" to Ethiopia.

The two U.S. airstrikes in southern Somalia this month have been undertaken in close cooperation with Ethiopian forces, which have conducted their own ground and air assaults in the same area with shared intelligence and operational information. In addition to the three alleged al-Qaeda operatives, believed responsible for the 1998 bombings of two U.S. embassies in Africa, targets have included Somali Islamic leader Sheik Hassan Dahir Aweys and Aden Ayrow, who served as de facto defense minister of the Islamic government.

U.S. officials have said that none of the targeted individuals was hit in the initial strike Jan. 7, which killed at least 10 and perhaps as many as 20 people. Although a U.S. military team entered Somali territory to assess the strike site and recover bodies, no information has been released on their identities.

Ethiopian Forces Start Leaving Somalia (NYT)

By Jeffrey Gettleman

The New York Times, January 24, 2007

NAIROBI, Kenya, Jan. 23 — The Ethiopian troops who helped install Somalia's fledging government in Mogadishu, its capital, began to pull out Tuesday, officials from each country said.

Many Somalis say they now fear that a power vacuum will form and that the country will slip back into the lawlessness that has dominated it for much of the past 16 years.

“Why can’t they stay?” asked Muhammad Omar Ali, a milkman in Mogadishu, as he watched truckloads of Ethiopians chug away. “They’re leaving us to the bandits.”

Ethiopia played a pivotal role in rearranging Somalia’s internal politics last month when it sent tanks, jet fighters and thousands of troops to vanquish an increasingly aggressive Islamist movement that ruled most of south-central Somalia. After routing the Islamist army, the Ethiopians paved the way for Somalia’s transitional government, which until then was weak and divided, to take control of the country.

But the Ethiopians always insisted that they would not stay to police Somalia. And though several African countries have mused about sending peacekeepers to help quell Somalia’s volatile mix of warring clans, well-armed thugs and now a growing insurgency, a comprehensive peacekeeping force may be months away.

On Tuesday, 200 Ethiopian soldiers held a short goodbye ceremony at a defunct Somali Air Force base. “We have arrived in Mogadishu in support of the transitional federal government troops,” said an Ethiopian commander. “We have successfully completed our mission. We respect the order of the Ethiopian government to withdraw from Somalia.”

Some Somalis cheered. Others said the equivalent of good riddance.

“Our enemy is finally leaving the country,” grumbled Muhammad Gedi Nur, who was selling second-hand clothes on the street. “Now we can bring back Islamic law.”

Remnants of the Islamist army are suspected of the increasingly frequent attacks on transitional government soldiers and Ethiopian troops. Despite the limited withdrawal that began Tuesday, Ethiopian officials have reassured Somalia’s leaders that many troops would remain until international peacekeepers arrive.

Western diplomats have expressed hope the surrender to the Kenyan authorities last week of Sheik Sharif Ahmed, a moderate leader of the Islamist forces, could be another solution. As a well-respected figure among the Islamists and the influential Hawiye clan, he could help end the insurgency.

On Tuesday, American diplomats said they were eager to talk to him.

“The U.S. ambassador to Kenya plans to meet with Sheik Sharif later this week,” the embassy said. “The ambassador will urge Sheik Sharif to counsel his supporters not to carry out violence and to support the development of an inclusive government.”

Ethiopian Troops Begin To Leave Somalia (AP)

By Salad Duhul

AP, January 24, 2007

Ethiopian troops whose military strength was crucial to helping Somalia's government drive out a radical Islamic militia began withdrawing Tuesday, raising fears of a power vacuum unless peacekeepers arrive soon in this chaotic nation.

Somali government spokesman Abdirahman Dinari said Ethiopia helped chase out the Council of Islamic Courts militia, which had taken over the capital and much of southern Somalia. But it was time for the neighboring forces to leave.

"As of today, the Ethiopian troops have started to withdraw from Somalia. We are grateful that they played an important role in the restoration of law and order in the country," Dinari said.

Ethiopia's government spokesman, Zemedkun Tekle, confirmed Tuesday's pullout but gave no details.

The intervention of Ethiopia last month enabled a military advance that proved a stunning turnaround for Somalia's 2-year-old government. Without Ethiopia's tanks and fighter jets, the administration could barely assert control outside one southern town and could not enter the capital.

But the potential for violence in this Horn of Africa nation remains great because of clan rivalries, resentment of the government's Ethiopian backers and a threat of guerrilla war from remnants of the Islamic movement.

Nearly 200 people gathered at the former National University in Mogadishu, cheering as the Ethiopians moved out on trucks and tanks.

"Leave us alone and let us solve our problems," the crowd chanted.

The withdrawal gave a sense of urgency to the arrival of a proposed African peacekeeping force. The African Union has approved a plan to send about 8,000 peacekeepers for a six-month mission that would eventually be taken over by the U.N.

Many Somalis were angered by the presence of Ethiopian forces. Somalia, a Muslim country, and Ethiopia, which has a large Christian population, fought a brutal war in 1977.

"I am very happy the Ethiopians are leaving because it will end clashes in which civilians are the victims," said Ilmi Shardi Mahad, a resident of Mogadishu's Hurwa district, considered a hotbed of support for the Islamists.

The Islamic council has played on the traditional Somali-Ethiopian rivalry, saying the group would launch an Iraq-style guerrilla war on Ethiopian troops here.

DOJ_NMG_0121133

"The withdrawal of Ethiopia will be the end of our ongoing insurgency," said Sheik Ahmed Muumin, a member of the Islamic council who contacted The Associated Press by telephone on Tuesday.

But it was not clear whether his views represented those of the Islamic leadership, which is largely in hiding.

One top leader of the ousted movement, apparently afraid for his life, turned himself in to authorities in neighboring Kenya on Sunday and is in custody. Sheik Sharif Sheik Ahmed, considered by American officials a moderate who could contribute to rebuilding Somalia, is not believed to be wanted by the authorities.

U.S. Ambassador to Kenya Michael Ranneberger, who also represents U.S. interests in Somalia, plans to meet with Ahmed this week to "urge Sheik Sharif to counsel his supporters not to carry out violence and to support the development of an inclusive government," the U.S. Embassy said.

Ahmed was the chairman of the Executive Council of Islamic Courts and shared the leadership with Sheik Hassan Dahir Aweys, who was chairman of the court's legislative council. Aweys is on a U.S. list of people with suspected ties to al-Qaida, though he has repeatedly denied having ties to international terrorists.

In a newly released videotape, al-Qaida's deputy leader Ayman al-Zawahri vowed that the mujahedeen would "break (the) backs" of the Ethiopians in Somalia.

China Confirms Firing Missile To Destroy Satellite (WP)

By Edward Cody

The Washington Post, January 24, 2007

BEIJING, Jan. 23 -- Breaking 12 days of silence, China confirmed Tuesday that it had fired a guided missile into space to destroy one of its satellites in a test that generated protests from the United States and other nations.

A Foreign Ministry spokesman, Liu Jianchao, said the United States and other governments have now been informed about the secret test through diplomatic channels. He emphasized that the use of anti-satellite technology does not mean China has abandoned its long-standing opposition to the military use of space.

"I should stress at this time that the test was not targeted against any country and does not pose a threat to any country," Liu said at a ministry briefing. He added that he knew of no plans for another such test by the Chinese military.

The Chinese test shot, which culminated in the destruction of an overage weather satellite 537 miles above Earth, was detected by U.S. monitors Jan. 11, but the Chinese government refused to discuss it. The test raised concern in Washington, where officials and analysts interpreted it as a signal by China that U.S. military satellites could be vulnerable to attack.

With the U.S. military heavily reliant on satellites for reconnaissance, navigation, weapons guidance systems and anti-missile defenses, China's ability to shoot down satellites could pose an added threat in the event of hostilities over Taiwan. In addition, China's newly demonstrated ability could threaten Taiwanese satellites monitoring Chinese short- and medium-range missile deployments along the Taiwan Strait.

U.S. officials said they were also dismayed by the Chinese test because the United States and Russia, after testing anti-satellite technology in the 1980s, more recently have abstained from such tests, partly because destroying satellites creates debris that could damage satellites in nearby orbits. Liu declined to address questions on this danger.

Experts estimate that several hundred thousand debris fragments were created by the destruction of the satellite, which orbited in a section of space where as many as 125 other satellites fly.

China, which has embarked on an accelerated military modernization program, has repeatedly emphasized its desire to be able to compete in 21st-century warfare. The military, which runs the space program, has identified space-based communications and sensing systems as key to such efforts. Some Chinese military theorists also have advocated asymmetrical warfare, in which pinpoint weapons would be used to disrupt the more advanced and better-equipped U.S. military.

At the United Nations, China has consistently advocated the peaceful development of space and pushed for an international agreement to prevent it from becoming the theater for a new arms race. The Bush administration has opposed China's suggestion for an international conference to pursue such an accord, arguing there is no need for it.

In that light, Liu was asked whether the anti-satellite test violated the spirit of China's proclaimed position and, in any case, why China kept silent for nearly two weeks while officials around the world were discussing it on the basis of U.S. intelligence reports.

"We have nothing to hide," he responded. "After the relevant parties expressed their concerns, we made our response about the test quickly. We stressed that China opposes weaponization and an arms race in outer space."

China Verifies Antisatellite-Missile Test (WSJ)

By Jason Dean

The Wall Street Journal, January 24, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0121134

BEIJING -- China broke its public silence about its testing of an antisatellite missile this month, but its lack of openness has damaged its efforts to polish its international image, analysts said.

The Jan. 11 test, in which China destroyed one of its own aging weather satellites in orbit, triggered alarm in foreign capitals after news of it surfaced late last week. But Chinese officials had steadfastly refused to acknowledge the test publicly until yesterday, when Liu Jianchao, a spokesman for China's Ministry of Foreign Affairs, confirmed that it had occurred -- but offered no additional detail or explanation.

Mr. Liu, speaking at a routine news conference, offered reassurance that China continues to oppose the "weaponization" of space. And he said that China had briefed several foreign countries, including the U.S. and Japan, about the test after international concern arose. He declined to say when those briefings had occurred, but U.S. State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said Monday that Chinese officials had acknowledged the test to Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill during meetings in Beijing over the weekend. Mr. McCormack said the U.S. is hoping for more information.

Within China, there has been no discussion of the test in the Chinese press or on the Web, which is closely monitored by the government.

China has long tried to soothe international concerns about its rapid economic and military rise by telling the world that it is intent on "peaceful development." But the absence of any official explanation about the antisatellite test has fostered doubts about its intentions and plans, and given ammunition to critics in Washington who argue China is a growing military threat that the U.S. must do more to counter -- including in space. Indeed, analysts say, China's handling of the test could actually help bring about what Mr. Liu said yesterday that Beijing doesn't want: an arms race in space.

Beijing's approach has been "quite counterproductive as far as China's interests are concerned," said Andrew Yang, an expert on the Chinese military who heads the Chinese Council of Advanced Policy Studies, a Taiwan think tank. "I think they didn't really take into account the international concerns about this," said Mr. Yang, who was in Beijing yesterday meeting with Chinese military experts.

Analysts outside China have speculated that the test was aimed both at verifying China's antisatellite capability and at putting the U.S. on notice that it no longer enjoys unchallenged military domination of space. The U.S. military relies heavily on satellites for surveillance, communication and weapons-guidance systems.

The Chinese foreign ministry spokesman's comments are unlikely to calm international anxiety. Mr. Liu told reporters the test wasn't aimed at any particular country, and stressed that China "never has and never will participate in any form of arms race in space." But he offered no explanation for why China had conducted the test or why it took so long to confirm it. When asked about concerns that debris from the destroyed satellite could damage other countries' satellites, Mr. Liu said the issue was too technical for him to address.

Officials at China's Ministry of National Defense continued to decline to comment yesterday.

Mr. Yang said he believes the missile test was directed partly at Taiwan. The U.S. is Taiwan's biggest military backer, and U.S. satellites are an essential element of Taiwan's early-warning system against ballistic missiles that China has aimed at the island. Mr. Liu said the test wasn't directed at any particular country.

Write to Jason Dean at jason.dean@wsj.com1

China Confirms Missile Test (FT)

By Mure Dickie, Michiyo Nakamoto And Kathrin Hille

Financial Times, January 24, 2007

"China has nothing to hide," insisted foreign ministry spokesman Liu Jianchao on Tuesday as he issued Beijing's first public acknowledgment of its test of an anti-satellite weapon earlier this month.

But even as Mr Liu insisted that Beijing's opposition to any space arms race remained undimmed, his refusal to shed any further light on the test or his government's intentions offered ready ammunition to those who say China's military policy is all about concealment.

For days, Beijing officials have declined to comment on Washington's revelations about the destruction of an old satellite with a missile-launched "kinetic kill vehicle", a test that prompted concern from the US, Japan and other countries.

Even as Mr Liu was offering confirmation, a spokesman for China's defence ministry on Tuesday professed ignorance that the test had taken place. "We don't know anything about this," said the spokesman, who declined to give his name.

China's reticence is already drawing diplomatic fire.

“The failure by China to ensure transparency in the matter will only lead to suspicions," Yasuhisa Shiozaki, Japan's chief cabinet secretary, said on Tuesday.

"It is not sufficient [for China] just to say that it has conducted just one experiment. It is natural for Japan to continue to demand a thorough explanation,” Mr Shiozaki said.

Beijing analysts have long argued that it is understandable for a still relatively weak military power such as China to be reluctant to give too much information about its defence.

But the cost of the belated and terse acknowledgment of the anti-satellite test has been to yield the propaganda field to its critics.

Beijing has yet to defend its much-criticised decision to add new debris to the clouds of space junk orbiting the earth to the hazard of satellites and astronauts.

Questions have even been raised about the degree to which China's leaders control their military. The New York Times at the weekend quoted Stephen J. Hadley, national security adviser to US president George W. Bush, as saying Hu Jintao might not have been kept fully informed – a suggestion Mr Liu dismissed as "baseless speculation".

China's lack of effective public diplomacy on the test of an anti-satellite weapon is not difficult to understand.

The US tested such weapons more than two decades ago and has continued to develop them, ensuring it has at least the potential to threaten China's growing number of military satellites.

Meanwhile, satellites have become a cornerstone of US military might with the US appearing keenly interested in the potential for orbiting weapons that could either provide defence against missiles or attack earth-bound targets.

Finally, Washington has itself been the strongest opponent of efforts by China and Russia to push for an international treaty that would ban the deployment of weapons in space and the use of force against objects in orbit.

Of course, China's lack of military transparency can itself be cited in support of Washington's opposition to such a treaty, given US fears that it would be impossible to guarantee compliance.

However, Robert Karniol of Jane's Defence Weekly says Beijing's test itself was entirely predictable and that suggestions it will trigger an space arms race are a matter of the "pot calling the kettle black".

"There has been such an arms race under way for many years," says Mr Karniol.

"This development may be leapt upon for its propaganda value, but the US programmes were already well under way."

Additional reporting by Michiyo Nakamoto.

China Confirms Space Test; Denies Intent To Intimidate (NYT)

By Joseph Kahn

The New York Times, January 24, 2007

BEIJING, Jan. 23 — The Chinese government publicly confirmed Tuesday that it had conducted a successful test of a new antisatellite weapon but said it had no intention of participating in a “space race.”

The confirmation was made at a regular Foreign Ministry news briefing, 12 days after China used a medium-range ballistic missile to destroy one of its own weather satellites 535 miles above Earth. Several countries, including the United States, Japan, Britain and Australia, pressed Beijing to explain the test, apparently the first successful destruction of a satellite in orbit in more than 20 years.

Until now, Chinese officials declined to confirm or deny that it had occurred, despite news reports last week that quoted Bush administration officials describing the exercise in detail. Liu Jianchao, the Foreign Ministry spokesman, issued the first official comment.

“This test was not directed at any country and does not constitute a threat to any country,” he said. “What needs to be stressed is that China has always advocated the peaceful use of space, opposes the weaponization of space and an arms race in space. China has never participated and will never participate in any arms race in outer space.”

Mr. Liu did not say why the Chinese Army had conducted the test. He also did not directly address concerns that the use of a missile to shatter a satellite in a low orbit might be perceived as inconsistent with China’s repeated calls to ban the use of weapons in space.

Beijing’s prolonged silence about the test, which American intelligence officials said took place on Jan. 11, raised speculation about its intentions and the circumstances surrounding the test.

Senior Bush administration officials raised the possibility that the silence might have reflected the autonomy and isolation of the Chinese military. They said they could not be sure that President Hu Jintao, who oversees the military as well as the Communist Party, had personally authorized or overseen the test.

On Tuesday, Mr. Liu denied that officials had taken too much time before speaking publicly. “China has nothing to hide,” he said. “After various parties expressed concerns, we explained this test in outer space to them.”

Japanese and American officials said China had not volunteered any information until they had made formal diplomatic inquiries, and then it had taken at least four days to get a reply. The first confirmation apparently came when Christopher R. Hill, an assistant secretary of state, visited his counterparts in Beijing over the weekend to discuss efforts to revive six-nation negotiations on North Korea’s nuclear weapons program.

Sean McCormack, the State Department spokesman, said Monday that Mr. Hill had been assured that the test "was not meant as a threat against anybody" and that Chinese officials had acknowledged that it had taken place.

Independent experts on the Chinese military say China has sought a workable antisatellite weapon since the 1980s. One reason is that the United States military depends heavily on satellites for missile guidance, navigation and communications, and any widespread damage to that network could hamper military action overseas.

China has long feared that the United States might intervene in any military conflict with Taiwan, and has invested heavily in new arms that experts say are intended to give it the power to attack Taiwan while keeping American forces at bay.

But others say China's intentions in conducting this test may have been more diplomatic in nature, intended to put pressure on the United States to negotiate a treaty to ban weapons in space. Russia and China have pressed for an international treaty that would limit the use of space for military purposes. The Bush administration has declined to take part in such talks.

Over the summer, President Bush authorized a new space policy that seeks to preserve "freedom of action" in space, and he said the United States reserved the right to use force against countries seeking to disrupt American satellites.

Xu Guangyu, a former Chinese Army officer and an official at the government-run China Arms Control and Disarmament Association, said the antisatellite test amounted to an attempt to redefine the "rules of the game" and press the United States into negotiations.

"What China is saying is, 'Let's sit down and talk,' " Mr. Xu said. "There is a trend toward weaponization of space that no one, especially China, wants to see."

Officials Fear War In Space By China (WT)

By Bill Gertz

The Washington Times, January 24, 2007

China's anti-satellite-interceptor test Jan. 11 is part of a covert space-weapons program designed to cripple the U.S. military in a conflict, defense officials said yesterday as Beijing confirmed it had destroyed one of its weather satellites. China said it had not "weaponized" space.

The anti-satellite weapon was identified by U.S. government officials as a nonexplosive "kinetic kill vehicle," which destroys its target simply by colliding with it. It was the first success in four attempts by China to destroy an orbiting object in space over the past two years.

Chinese Foreign Ministry spokesman Liu Jianchao said in Beijing that the government briefed the Bush administration on the test and that international fears of Chinese space weapons were groundless.

"This test was not directed at any country and does not constitute a threat to any country," Mr. Liu said. It was the first official confirmation of the test, which was kept secret in Beijing as well as Washington until the magazine Aviation Week reported it Friday.

"What needs to be stressed is that China has always advocated the peaceful use of space, opposes the weaponization of space and arms races in space," Mr. Liu said at a press briefing.

The White House said China's explanation was not sufficient.

China's public and private "assurances" on the test were welcome but "are incomplete and do not answer many of the questions raised by the international community," said Gordon Johndroe, a spokesman for the National Security Council.

Protests were raised by the governments of Japan, Australia, India, Canada and other states, which saw the test as part of increasing Chinese military power that contrast with Beijing's public assurances of being engaged in a "peaceful rise."

"We are concerned about China's lack of transparency," Mr. Johndroe said. "For example, China has not explained the intent of this weapons test, nor has it stated whether or not it plans future tests."

Mr. Liu said he was not aware of plans for an additional test.

Mr. Johndroe also said that China's government failed to explain how the test "is compatible with its public stance against the weaponization of space," noting the issue will be pursued further in diplomatic channels.

U.S. officials familiar with intelligence reports said yesterday that three previous tests were unsuccessful. All four tests involved the launch of a commercial rocket booster carrying an anti-satellite (ASAT) warhead that would separate from the booster in space and seek to crash into the satellite about 530 miles above the earth.

Some U.S. policy and intelligence officials have tried in internal memorandums to play down the significance of the ASAT test, saying that the warhead hit a large, low-earth-orbit satellite and that it would be more difficult to hit higher-orbiting and smaller systems.

Other defense officials, however, said the test has raised alarm bells because it exposed a key strategic vulnerability. They also said that there are major gaps in U.S. intelligence about which other space weapons and capabilities China has or is developing that could cripple or disable U.S. satellites, which handle about 90 percent of all military communications, as well as intelligence and missile guidance.

The Jan. 11 test also alarmed military and defense officials because it undermined American intelligence estimates that China's military trails the U.S. military in terms of weapons and war-fighting capabilities by 10 years.

"The ASAT test showed they are not following us [militarily] but trying to leap ahead," one defense official said.

U.S. intelligence agencies received some advance indications of the test, in which a commercial KT-1 rocket, a version of the medium-range DF-21 missile, was launched from the Xichang space center, in southwestern Sichuan province.

The ASAT weapon separated from the last stage in space and then destroyed the Feng Yun-1C weather satellite, launched in 1999 and orbiting over both poles, by ramming into it at high speed. U.S. officials said debris from the destroyed satellite continues to orbit and poses a risk to some of the 800 satellites now in space, 400 of which are American.

China also illuminated a U.S. satellite with a ground-based laser in another anti-satellite test, according to a report by the congressional U.S.-China Economic and Security Review Commission.

The report, produced by defense analyst Michael Pillsbury, revealed that China has plans for secret space weapons that include ground-based lasers, air-to-space missile interceptors and an exotic plasma bomb that would destroy orbiting satellites by enveloping them in an electronic cloud.

The report also stated that three books written by Chinese colonels in 2001, 2002 and 2005 contain "proposals for covert deployment of antisatellite weapons directed at U.S. assets."

One author, Col. Jia Junming, stated in his 2002 book that Chinese space-weapons development should be covert and "intense internally but relaxed in external appearance to maintain our good international image and position."

The 2005 book, "Joint Space War Campaigns," by Col. Yuan Zelu, calls for deploying an orbiting network of strike weapons that "will be concealed and launched only in a crisis or emergency" to "bring the opponent to his knees."

De-militarize Space (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, January 24, 2007

We should not let space become a battlefield, but treaties banning weapons there will be difficult.

SPACE WARFARE may be a staple of science fiction, but almost no one in the real world thinks it's a good idea. That's why China's destruction this month of a moribund weather satellite is so alarming: It was the first time in more than 20 years that a ground-fired missile was used against a satellite.

Yet a ban on all weapons in space that could be enforced, while desirable, may be as utopian as some science fiction scenarios. Official U.S. space policy instructs the Pentagon "to ensure freedom of action in space and, if directed, deny such freedom of action to adversaries." The Chinese test, as well as other technological developments, suggest that a rethinking of this position is in order.

Some of the issues are easy. Space junk of the sort generated by the Chinese test now poses a danger to satellites from many nations. Whole orbital zones may become unusable in a decade — at great cost to science and commerce. The world should make more of an effort to reduce space debris. This could be done by amending the 1967 Outer Space Treaty, which bans weapons of mass destruction from space and which most nations, including China and the United States, have joined. Like other anti-litter laws, such a rule might be flouted, but it would at least set a standard for the need for good orbital hygiene. The space treaty's weak provisions against damaging others' satellites should be toughened with the addition of real enforcement mechanisms.

More thorny is whether new ways can be found to prohibit testing and development of anti-satellite systems without fatally compromising the ability to use anti-ballistic missile systems, which operate at altitudes of a few hundred miles. In the 1980s, arms control discussions foundered on disagreements about whether to ban only space-based weapons and ignore ground-based ones that could knock out objects in space. Because the United States had a technological advantage, it could afford to refuse to negotiate.

Now, U.S. government and commercial interests own 53% of the 845 satellites circling the Earth. Many more nations have or soon may have the technology to help put up such satellites or to knock them down. It is in the U.S. interest to work to keep space clean and safe. It will be difficult to design, negotiate, verify and enforce international agreements that both protect U.S. and global security concerns and prevent the weaponization of space. But the Chinese test demonstrates the futility — and danger — of refusing to try.

China May Lower Fines For Poor Who Violate One-Child-Only Policy (WP)

By Maureen Fan

The Washington Post, January 24, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0121138

BEIJING, Jan. 23 -- Fines imposed on Chinese who violate the country's one-child-only policy may be reduced for the poor, a top family planning official said Tuesday, as authorities stressed a broader approach to population management.

The announcement came a day after state media reported that many Chinese believe it is unfair that the wealthy can "buy" a second child by simply paying fines for breaking the one-child-only rule for most urban couples.

"Rich people and poor people, they are all equal before the law," Zhang Weiqing, the head of the National Population and Family Planning Commission, told reporters in Beijing.

"With very poor families, we may reduce part of the social compensation fee or waive the fee, depending on the actual situation," he said. "As for their other difficulties, we will help them by all means, including providing compulsory education and medical care."

The announcement appeared to be part of a broader attempt by officials to put a more human face on China's much-maligned family planning policies. As the most populous country on Earth -- China has 1.3 billion people -- the country is struggling with an aging population, a growing rich-poor gap, unemployment pressures and continued reports of family planning abuses, including forced abortions and sterilizations.

"Our priority is to invest in human development -- to change from a country with a huge population base to a country with rich human capital," Zhao Baige, vice minister of the family planning commission, said last week.

This month, officials released what they said was their first "population development strategy research report," assembled by hundreds of scholars. That report credited China's national family planning policy with preventing the birth of more than 400 million people over the last 30 years.

The policy has also contributed to an imbalanced sex ratio; allowed only one child, many couples choose to abort female fetuses, in keeping with the traditional preference of the Chinese for boys. According to the population report, there are 118 boys for every 100 girls, and the gap is expected to grow. By 2020, if the current birthrate remains stable, marriage-age men will outnumber women by 30 million, a "serious hidden danger which may lead to social disorder," the report said.

A survey conducted Monday by the China Youth Daily and the popular http://QQ.com Web site found that 61 percent of respondents thought it was unfair that wealthy people could essentially afford to have more babies by paying fines. One-third thought officials should develop some punishment other than a fine.

That fines might be eased for the poor shows the great attention the government is paying to public opinion about the rich-poor gap, said Ma Mingjie, director of the Social Research Center of the newspaper, which conducted the survey. "They really want to take some effective measures to ease the tension."

Zhang, the head of the family planning commission, called for the improvement of living standards and the status of women, a social security system for the elderly and stricter laws prohibiting sex-selective abortions. But he did not detail any new major policy changes.

Instead, he and Vice Minister Wang Guoqiang emphasized the complexity of China's population policy, based on residency and other factors. About 36 percent of China's families -- those who live in cities and some rural areas -- are "encouraged" to have just one child; 53 percent are allowed to have a second child if their first baby is a girl. Other families, depending on where they live, are allowed to have two children and, in rare instances, more.

"Actually our policy is a more multidimensional policy," Wang said.

That policy has been abused frequently as local officials manipulated it for financial gain.

In areas where poor, rural families have one child or only two girls, local governments will now give those parents a pension or reward, Zhang said. In an indication of rampant corruption, Zhang said distribution of aid to the poor will be managed by different agencies that will monitor each other.

Ban To Press Sudan President On Darfur (AP)

By Justin Bergman

AP, January 24, 2007

U.N. Secretary-General Ban Ki-moon will pressure Sudan's president next week to speed up the peace process in Darfur, which has been delayed by months of wrangling over the makeup of a larger peacekeeping force, U.N. officials said Tuesday.

Ban, on his first overseas trip as head of the world body, will meet with Sudanese President Omar al-Bashir on the sidelines of an African Union summit in Ethiopia. The meeting could be crucial to pushing through a three-phase U.N. plan to beef up the 7,000-member AU force that is struggling to maintain peace in the vast desert region.

Al-Bashir has refused to allow U.N. peacekeeping troops to replace the beleaguered African force in Darfur. Last month, he appeared to endorse the new U.N. plan that culminates with the deployment of a 22,000-strong "hybrid" AU-U.N. force, but Sudanese officials have since wavered on that support.

DOJ_NMG_0121139

"The secretary-general is hoping to make the whole issue of Darfur move forward," his spokeswoman, Michele Montas, said at a news briefing Tuesday. "The U.N. plan for the AU force is still on the table and being discussed. What we will see is how fast the different stages can be implemented."

Another U.N. official put it more bluntly: "We want unambiguous commitment on the schedule of the deployment. ... (The Sudanese) need to give us firm dates." The official spoke on the condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the negotiations.

Sudan's U.N. mission did not return several phone calls Tuesday seeking comment.

During Ban's week-long, seven-nation trip, which starts Wednesday, he plans to attend a donor's conference in Paris on reconstruction aid for Lebanon, and visit the European Union office in Brussels and the International Court of Justice and Yugoslav war crimes tribunal in The Hague.

But Africa will be the primary focus of the trip, part of what Ban said last week would be a theme throughout his tenure as U.N. chief.

The secretary-general is scheduled to spend a day in Congo, where 18,000 peacekeepers are serving in the world's largest U.N. mission. He plans to address the National Assembly and meet with newly elected President Joseph Kabila.

He will also travel to Kenya to hold talks with President Mwai Kibaki.

The Darfur crisis, in which more than 200,000 people have been killed and 2.5 million displaced, began in February 2003 when rebels from black African tribes took up arms, complaining of decades of neglect and discrimination by Sudan's Arab-dominated government. The government is accused of unleashing Arab tribal militia known as janjaweed against civilians in a campaign of killings, rapes and arson. The government denies the allegations.

The government signed a peace agreement with one of the rebel factions in May, but violence has since worsened in the region and the conflict has spilled over into neighboring Chad and Central African Republic.

In Ethiopia, Ban will seek to bolster support for the U.N. security plan by asking African countries to pressure Sudan to allow the hybrid peacekeeping force into Darfur, said the U.N. official who spoke on condition of anonymity.

Al-Bashir agreed to the force in a letter to former U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan last month, but his country's U.N. ambassador has since said the force must be smaller and have no U.N. peacekeepers in traditional blue helmets, only African troops supported by U.N. technical and logistical experts.

"Sudan has jumped at every opportunity to distance itself from the agreement," the U.N. official said.

Ban has also reached out to China, meeting Tuesday with U.N. Ambassador Wang Guangya. The U.N. official declined to offer details of their discussions, but said, "(Wang) is the one person who could put pressure on Sudan. ... Once we have a Chinese agreement, things will move a lot faster."

China, which is one of Sudan's biggest oil customers, has resisted U.N. attempts to force Khartoum to accept peacekeepers. China's U.N. mission declined to comment on Wang's meeting with Ban.

US Condemns Sudanese Government Assault Of UN Staff, Aid Workers (AFP)

AFP, January 24, 2007

The United States condemned the Sudanese government's arrest and subsequent assault of 20 staff from the UN, African Union and non-governmental organizations in strife-torn Darfur.

Sudanese police raided the International Non Governmental Organization (INGO) compound in Nyala, southern Darfur on Friday and arrested 20 people, including INGO, UN and African Union staff gathered for a social function, according to the United Nations.

US State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said the United States "condemns" their arrest and assault and added that the Sudanese government had an obligation to protect humanitarian aid workers and others providing "life-saving" assistance to Sudanese.

"There is no justification for these appalling recent attacks on humanitarian aid workers," he said in a statement.

But he pointed out that such attacks would not weaken international resolve to assist the people of war-ravaged Darfur.

"Rather, the Sudanese government's actions will only bring about additional international scrutiny," he said.

McCormack called on all parties in Darfur to demonstrate their commitment to peace and serving the needs of the people of Sudan.

More than 200,000 people have died, according to the United Nations, since the February 2003 civil war broke out in Darfur province where African Union peacekeepers supplemented by UN advisers struggle to maintain order.

Anti-government Protests Paralyse Lebanon (FT)

By Andrew England

DOJ_NMG_0121140

Financial Times, January 24, 2007

Supporters of Hizbollah and its Christian allies paralysed Lebanon on Tuesday as they dramatically escalated their campaign to overthrow the government, blocking highways with burning cars and tyres and triggering clashes that killed three people and injured dozens.

The protests – a conspicuous show of strength by the opposition, which had called for a general strike – took place in most parts of the country and ramped up a political confrontation between the Shia militant group and its allies and the pro-western government.

As a result of the demonstrations, Fouad Siniora, prime minister, cancelled a planned flight to Paris, where the government is to present an economic reform package at a donor conference on Thursday. It is seeking aid to rebuild the nation after last year's war between Hizbollah and Israel, which cost Lebanon an estimated $9bn (€7bn, £4.6bn).

"Our hands are stretched out for dialogue," Mr Siniora told reporters. "What happened today was very dangerous, it reminds us of the images of war."

The main road to the airport was among the highways blocked by burning cars, tyres and mounds of sand and dirt.

The Shia group and its allies, including Michel Aoun, who has the largest following of any Christian party leader, have been seeking to capitalise on Hizbollah's claimed success in the 34-day conflict since the United Nations-brokered ceasefire in August. The timing of the protests was seen as a deliberate attempt to draw attention away from the Paris3 conference, where the government will receive strong international support.

The finance and economic ministers, as well as the central bank governor, were already in France ahead of the conference, a government official said.

It was unclear how long the protests would last. "Most of the people of Lebanon are against the [economic] paper of the government and do not want any aid under any conditions," said Hussein Rahal, a Hizbollah spokesman. "The people of the opposition will not surrender to the government because it is illegal and it is supported by foreigners not by [the] Lebanese."

In a speech on Monday, Sayyed Hassan Nasrallah, Hizbollah's leader, launched a fierce attack on Mr Siniora, saying if his administration remained in power Lebanon was "headed to economic collapse".

Mr Nasrallah has vowed that all protests would be peaceful but clashes broke out between government and opposition supporters, particularly between rival Christian groups, whose community has become increasingly divided during the political crisis, as well as between Shia and Sunni.

Sectarian tensions have been escalating dangerously since the opposition began its campaign against the western-backed government. The administration has a parliamentary majority and accuses the opposition of attempting a coup.

In Lebanon and abroad the crisis is seen as part of a wider regional conflict, particularly the standoff between the US and Iran and Syria, which back Hizbollah.

The army took action in some areas where there were clashes and cleared some routes, but it did not attempt to remove blockades in others. The military was criticised by both sides and appeared keen to avoid direct confrontation, which could divide the army – an institution that mirrors the sectarian fabric of Lebanon.

Supporters of the Shia group have been camped outside the prime minister's office in downtown Beirut since the beginning of December as part of the opposition's efforts to pressure the government. But that protest has made little headway and both sides are deadlocked over the issue of the opposition's representation in the cabinet.

The opposition is seeking a blocking minority and wants to force early elections. Hizbollah and the country's highly politicised labour unions have also condemned the economic recovery package.

It includes privatisations, public sector reforms, fuel price increases and an incremental rise in VAT on goods and services, from 10 to 12 per cent, then to 15 per cent.

Clash Pits Hezbollah Against Rule In Lebanon (NYT)

By Nada Bakri And Hassan M. Fattah

The New York Times, January 24, 2007

BEIRUT, Lebanon, Jan. 23 — Thousands of supporters of the Iranian-backed Hezbollah, which is seeking to bring down the pro-Western government, clashed with government supporters and blocked highways leading into Beirut, the capital, on Tuesday, raising fears that the political crisis might lead to open sectarian conflict.

The police said at least three people died and 100 more were wounded throughout the country in the violence, the worst since Hezbollah began demanding more political power late last year. Mobs of men burned tires, set cars on fire and fought occasional gun battles with their political opponents.

In some cases, partisans yelled slogans with clear sectarian undertones, an especially frightening development for those who lived through Lebanon's bloody civil war from 1975 to 1990.

DOJ_NMG_0121141

By nightfall, the opposition began removing most of the makeshift roadblocks in the Beirut area and announced that it would call off the nationwide general strike that had set off the unrest. But the group warned that more protests could follow.

"This is a one-day show of force for the time being," said Paul Salem, director of the Carnegie Middle East Center in Beirut.

The opposition has accused Prime Minister Fouad Siniora, a Sunni, of corruption and graft and has dismissed him as a Western puppet. Opposition forces have called for his resignation and for a "unity" government that would ultimately give Hezbollah and its allies veto power.

The violence on Tuesday occurred two days before a crucial conference of donor nations in Paris to secure $5 billion in loans and aid to rebuild parts of Lebanon destroyed in the Israeli-Hezbollah war last summer. Hezbollah has vied with the government to provide help to residents in the country's south and in Beirut's southern suburbs, which were the worst hit during the monthlong war.

Mr. Siniora insisted Tuesday that nothing would keep him from Paris.

"I urge you to think clearly where they want to take you, away from your interest and that of the country," Mr. Siniora told the protesters on television. "We will stay together against intimidation. We will stand together against strife."

The turmoil started at dawn, when groups of protesters set up roadblocks along major thoroughfares leading into Beirut, blocking roads with burning tires, trucks and rubble said to be from buildings demolished last summer by Israeli bombs. They set fire to vehicles and, on several instances, were filmed attacking cars trying to pass their cordon.

In Beirut, many of the clashes were in mixed neighborhoods, where young men on each side shouted epithets and hurled stones at each other.

Along a thoroughfare, the men got into a brawl amid sporadic gunfire. One side raised photos of Sheik Hassan Nasrallah, the Hezbollah leader and a Shiite, and burned those of former Lebanese Prime Minister Rafiq Hariri, whose assassination in 2005 set off Lebanon's latest political turmoil, a witness said. The other side lined up across the street and raised photos of Mr. Hariri, Mr. Siniora and even of Saddam Hussein, a Sunni.

On the coastal highway north of Beirut, supporters of Gen. Michel Aoun, leader of the Free Patriotic Movement, a Christian group and a Hezbollah ally, fought with men loyal to Samir Geagea, a government ally, in especially violent clashes.

"It is a revolution against us, they are attacking us with stones and burning pictures of our leaders and blocking our roads," said Ibrahim Hijazi, 29, a government backer.

Opposition leaders insisted their supporters were protesting "peacefully" when residents began hurling stones at them. They also said they would not allow themselves to be dragged into a sectarian conflict.

"Blocking roads is a democratic expression that happens all over the world," said Hussein Haj Hassan, a member of Hezbollah's parliamentary bloc. "The government refused all the solutions we proposed, so we were left with only these options, and I warn them that we still have many other means of protest."

Mr. Siniora, on Lebanese television on Tuesday night, insisted that he would not step down and that he still enjoyed the country's support.

"We are at a crossroads today," he said. "Let's choose coexistence, civic peace, unity and stability, freedom and democracy instead of roads that will further split us and waste our energy and increase chances for violence and terrorism."

Stores and businesses in many parts of Lebanon were closed in support of the general strike called by Sheik Nasrallah, as streets remained empty and many areas were covered in smoke from the burning tires.

At Rafik Hariri International Airport, Hezbollah men in black ski masks and brandishing batons blocked travelers.

According to The Associated Press, two of the deaths were in Tripoli, where two groups — one largely Sunni and one Alawite, a Shiite Muslim offshoot — fought each other in a gun battle. The other death was in a gunfight in the Christian Batroun region, The A.P. said.

Hezbollah Leads A Fiery Strike (WP)

By Anthony Shadid

The Washington Post, January 24, 2007

BEIRUT, Jan. 23 -- The Hezbollah-led opposition cut roads in Beirut and across Lebanon with burning tires, uprooted trees, incinerated cars and barricades to enforce a strike Tuesday aimed at toppling the government, paralyzing the country and embarrassing Lebanese officials ahead of an international aid conference. Clashes erupted along the country's crisis fault lines, leaving at least three people dead and scores injured in the worst violence since the protests began in December.

Fires at dozens of barricades sent black smoke billowing against a pale blue sky, framing the capital in scenes redolent of war. Along the airport highway, the opposition sent trucks and bulldozers to pour more rubble on roadblocks set up by dawn, forcing some passengers to drag their luggage on foot to the airport, where airlines canceled flights.

An overextended army, hewing to a policy of neutrality, rarely intervened to break the blockades, effectively ensuring the success of the most dramatic escalation yet in the two-month campaign led by Hezbollah, the militant Shiite organization, to force the resignation of Prime Minister Fouad Siniora.

Opposition leaders hailed the success of a one-day strike that, by choice or circumstance, closed shops, shut schools, emptied streets of traffic and blocked key roads to the airport and seaport on the Mediterranean. Government supporters spoke darkly of a coup d'etat, warning that the violence would only escalate, and some suggested that elements within the military might be complicit.

"If it goes on like this, nobody will be able to do anything. The government will have to step down," said Mohammed Harb, a 20-year-old Hezbollah supporter, standing at a fiery barricade that blocked six armored personnel carriers from passing. "And what's beautiful? It's not just Beirut. We've shut down all of Lebanon."

Siniora, who was scheduled to travel to Paris for the international conference, remained in Beirut and delivered an address on national television Tuesday evening. He promised to stand firm against what he called "intimidation" and said the military should permit "no flexibility or compromise" in keeping the peace.

More than a fight between a government and its opposition, the struggle here pits two camps that roughly divide the country in half, each sensing the other's victory as an existential threat. The divisions are as diverse as Lebanon itself, with its 18 religious sects: whether the government's patrons in the United States and France will have a greater say here, or Hezbollah's allies in Iran and Syria; what posture the country will take toward Israel; which sect -- Sunni or Shiite Muslim -- will be decisive in politics.

There is a certain cynicism among many Lebanese that the deadlock will be broken only with more bloodshed, forcing a compromise short of civil war. Each camp has mobilized its supporters -- for the government, Sunni, Druze and some Christians; for Hezbollah and Amal, its Shiite supporters, along with allied Christians led by Michel Aoun, a former general and prime minister. Each side has escalated, with a sense it can mount pressure on the other while still controlling passions in the streets.

But Tuesday's clashes, from Sunni-Shiite and Christian fault lines in Beirut to outlying towns that have so far skirted the crisis, may prove most memorable for scenes of strife defying those assumptions: the army and security forces firing into the air and lobbing tear gas; at other times helpless in separating the feuding sides, which threw rocks, sticks and insults across barricades in fights that lasted hours. At least three people were killed in towns north of Beirut, and more than 100 were injured before the opposition declared an end to the strike and began removing barricades late at night.

At times in the confrontations, a dehumanizing language entered the discourse.

"This is not democracy," said Roger Hayek, a government supporter and member of the Phalange Party, a Christian group. He pointed across lines of soldiers separating the sides, standing in a smoky haze. "This is an image of Iraq."

A friend jumped in: "They're animals."

Hezbollah and its allies launched the campaign against Siniora's government with a sprawling protest in downtown Beirut on Dec. 1. Another one, possibly the largest in Lebanese history, followed Dec. 10, along with a sit-in that continues today in scores of tents pitched at the foot of the barricaded government headquarters.

The government has viewed it as a power grab through the street, vowing not to resign under pressure, and government-allied newspapers routinely refer to the opposition as coup plotters. But the opposition has its own collection of complaints, including what Hezbollah sees as Siniora's subservience to the United States and complicity in Israel's attack, as well as the populist economic grievances stressed by Aoun's supporters.

By any standard, Tuesday's campaign was a feat of logistics on parallel with December's protests. In addition to shutting down the capital, the vital thoroughfare to the Syrian capital, Damascus, was cut, and allied groups blocked roads in predominantly Sunni Muslim areas such as Tripoli and Akkar.

Virtually the only cars on the road to the airport were the incinerated carcasses of vehicles used as barricades, some of them sitting next to a smashed sign that read, "Beirut International Airport."

Hezbollah officials said privately that the strike was timed in part to embarrass the government ahead of Thursday's conference in Paris to consider what Lebanese officials hope will be $5 billion in grants and loans for reconstruction. The government, its priority mainly survival at this point, has made the conference, along with an international court to try the killers of a former Lebanese prime minister, its primary goals.

As the day dragged on, some of the barricades were removed or abandoned, and a smattering of traffic returned to the streets. But this faint sense of a typical weekday followed the worst violence since the opposition began its campaign.

At a road along Death River, one of the city's entrances, Christian foes and supporters of the government fought occasional melees with stones before the army intervened. With sticks, rocks and fists, crowds of government supporters attacked cars that carried orange banners, the color of Aoun, Hezbollah's ally. His partisans, tending blazing barricades, refused to make way for soldiers trying to open the road.

DOJ_NMG_0121143

"There is a saying in Lebanon that goes, 'It doesn't get smaller unless it gets bigger,' " said Nayla Abiaad, a 25-year-old Aoun supporter standing at the barricade.

Her sister, Rana, dressed in orange, stood next to her. "This is bigger," she said, smiling, as she pointed at burning tires, "and there's going to be more."

Across town, in the neighborhood of Mazraa, Sunni and Shiite residents fought a battle with rocks that lasted nearly two hours. By its end, they were separated by armored personnel carriers, a charred, rubble-strewn street, a dirt lot and the stones they threw.

In seemingly contradictory ways, the crisis has both politicized and disillusioned the country. Few people are without opinions on the righteousness of one side or the other, but tens of thousands have emigrated since the war ended last summer. Chantal Braidi, a 31-year-old cafe owner in Beirut, called the country "dead."

"I want to live in this country, and it hurts me to leave -- I'm leaving all my family and friends behind -- but I want to live my life," she said. "Everything I have, I put in this country. What did I get in return? Nothing. Absolutely nothing."

"I'm leaving for my sanity," she added. "We're going crazy in this country."

Special correspondents Alia Ibrahim and Lynn Maalouf contributed to this report.

Hezbollah Leads Bloody Clash With Siniora Camp (WT/AP)

By Zeina Karam

The Washington Times, January 24, 2007

BEIRUT -- Hezbollah-led protesters burned tires and cars and clashed with government supporters yesterday, paralyzing Beirut and areas across Lebanon in the worst violence yet in the pro-Iranian group's campaign to topple U.S.-backed Prime Minister Fuad Siniora.

At least three persons were killed and dozens injured as the two camps battled each other around street barricades with stone-throwing and in some cases gunfire. Black smoke poured into the sky over Beirut from burning roadblocks.

The fighting quickly took on a dangerous sectarian tone in a country whose divided communities fought a bloody 1975-90 civil war. Gunmen from neighboring districts in the northern city of Tripoli -- one largely Sunni Muslim, the other largely Alawites, a Shi'ite Muslim offshoot -- fought each other, causing two of the fatalities.

In the evening, the opposition announced that it would call off the roadblocks and the nationwide general strike that sparked the unrest, saying it had delivered a warning to the government. But it threatened more protests.

Suleiman Franjieh, a Christian opposition leader, told Hezbollah's Al-Manar television that the next steps "will be nothing compared to what we saw today" if the government does not respond to the opposition's demands.

The Hezbollah-led opposition is growing increasingly frustrated after two months of sit-in protests outside Mr. Siniora's offices in downtown Beirut failed to force him to step down or form a new government giving the opposition more power.

Mr. Siniora vowed not to yield, saying in a televised address: "We will stand together against intimidation and to confront sedition."

But he repeated his willingness to discuss a political solution to the impasse and called for a special session of parliament.

The violence called into question whether Mr. Siniora will be able to attend a conference of donor nations in Paris tomorrow aimed at raising billions of dollars in aid for rebuilding Lebanon after the devastation wreaked by the summer's Israel-Hezbollah war.

Cabinet Minister Ahmed Fatfat said the economy and finance ministers already were in Paris and the conference could proceed without Mr. Siniora.

The day's turmoil brought the Beirut airport to a halt, with Hezbollah supporters building earthen barricades on roads to the facility.

Their cars blocked, departing passengers wheeled suitcases past protesters and burning tires on the highway leading to the airport. Airlines canceled flights later in the day, and 400 passengers were stranded at the terminal. Among those stuck for hours were 146 Chinese troops who were joining U.N. peacekeepers in south Lebanon.

Protesters set up barricades of burning tires and cars at major intersections in Beirut and other cities. In many areas, violence erupted when government backers moved in to confront the protesters.

Security forces struggled to contain the violence. In some places, officers moved between battling camps of protesters amid a rain of stones. In others, they broke down barricades only to see them rebuilt.

Protests Bring Lebanon To A Halt (LAT)

By Megan K. Stack

The Los Angeles Times, January 24, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0121144

Hezbollah and its allies paralyzed Lebanon on Tuesday, sending thousands of demonstrators to seize control of major roads, brawl with government supporters and choke the seaside capital in the acrid smoke of burning tires.

The swift seizure of the country's roads took many here by surprise, and marked a major escalation in the militant group Hezbollah's campaign to overthrow Lebanon's U.S.-backed government. At least three people died and more than 100 were wounded as clashes flared around the country.

The opposition, dominated by the powerful Shiite Muslim Hezbollah, had called for a general strike Tuesday, and the roadblocks gave people little choice but to stay home.

The roads to Beirut's airport were impassable, blocked by sand berms, garbage and roaring fires. Some flights were canceled, and arriving passengers languished at the airport.

The roadblocks in the capital were being cleared overnight, but the opposition threatened further escalation if the government didn't step down.

Hour after tense hour, the army and security services gave free rein to the protesters. While young men barricaded neighborhoods and halted cars to interrogate the drivers, soldiers and police officers stood by and watched. Security forces in riot gear lined some streets, and armored personnel carriers crunched over the rubble. But to the delight of some Lebanese and the disgust of others, they didn't interfere.

"They are on our side," crowed Kamal Yehiya, a 20-year-old Hezbollah supporter who was hurling rubble into a fire near downtown.

The blockade tapped into the deep well of tribal rage and sectarian animosities that seem to fester just beneath the surface in Lebanon.

"Welcome to hell," said Mohammed Boukari, 29, who stood watching as his south Beirut neighborhood dissolved into a melee of religious taunts, gunfire and rock-throwing.

Sunnis, Shiites face off

On one side of the road, Sunni supporters of Prime Minister Fouad Siniora clambered onto the roof of a gas station, lobbed stones and cursed Shiite leaders. On the other side, young Shiite men responded in kind, waving the pipes and bedposts they carried as weapons and hollering with rage.

Clad in riot gear, soldiers raced through the streets between the two mobs, shooting into the air and blocking the young men from charging at one another.

"We are from the same neighborhood. We are Lebanese," Boukari said. "But look at this."

Barricaded indoors, the government decried the opposition's tactics as an attempted coup d'etat.

"This is not a strike. This is military action," Cabinet minister Ahmed Fatfat told Al Arabiya satellite channel.

Speaking on Lebanese television, Siniora said the government was ready for talks with the opposition and called for parliament to convene.

"The current explosive crisis needs to be dealt with quickly by moving the fights from the streets to the legitimate political institutions," he said.

For more than 50 wintry days, Hezbollah and its allies have camped on the pavement downtown in a massive sit-in aimed at toppling the government. The demonstrators deride the government as an illegitimate tool of the United States and Israel.

But Siniora's government has dug in its heels, vowing not to relinquish power. When hundreds of thousands of people flooded the capital to demand his ouster, he dismissed their calls as a coup attempt engineered by Syria and Iran, the main backers of Hezbollah.

"The opposition was well aware that it was running out of cards," said Amal Saad-Ghorayeb, a Hezbollah expert and visiting fellow at the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace. "This is perhaps their only remaining weapon."

In Washington, the Bush administration criticized the demonstrators and accused Syria of fueling the turmoil.

"These factions are trying to use violence, threats and intimidation to impose their political will on Lebanon," said chief State Department spokesman Sean McCormack.

But in the Lebanese capital, one of the many demonstrators at an intersection in front of Beirut's museum explained her motivation as fires blazed around her.

"We have to do something to make them hear us, to make them know we exist," said Natalie Rizek, 23, a medical student who supports popular Christian opposition leader Gen. Michel Aoun.

"We tried everything," she said. "They were continuing as if nothing was happening."

Residents who ventured forth held tissues to their noses or wore surgical masks to shield against the black smoke that billowed through the streets.

"This is not democracy," sputtered Noha Qaisi, a 48-year-old homemaker. "My kids are saying they're suffocating from all the smoke inside."

DOJ_NMG_0121145

Premier alters plans

As the capital smoldered around him, Siniora was forced to postpone his departure for an international donors conference in Paris. Supporters of the government have been banking on the Paris meeting to help Lebanon recover from the devastation of last summer's war between Israel and Hezbollah.

Like most events backed by Hezbollah, Tuesday's demonstrations were carefully coordinated. Trucks loaded with tires were parked along the roadsides to feed the fires. At intersections, older men with walkie-talkies supervised the fire building. Young men on mopeds buzzed from one corner to the next, passing along news and instructions.

A red Volvo rolled slowly between stained apartment blocks, a loudspeaker strapped to its roof and the driver's words echoing off the buildings:

"Starting now, and until our demands are met, the noble people of Lebanon must rise up," he said. He closed, as if signing a letter, with a curt "Hezbollah."

Mindful of the risk of igniting Shiite-Sunni tensions, especially as a civil war rages in nearby Iraq, Hezbollah has tried to fight the perception that the push against the government is being led solely by Shiites.

It's true that the old notion of a definitive Christian-Muslim split is now defunct; both religions are present on both sides of the political chasm, and some of the fiercest fighting erupted Tuesday among Christians allied with Hezbollah and those who back the government.

Corniche Mazraa, a boulevard in south Beirut that divides a predominantly Shiite neighborhood from a mainly Sunni area, degenerated into a scene of urban warfare as gangs from each neighborhood battled the army to get at their rivals across the street.

"If the government doesn't fall, there will be a sectarian war," said Ali Shihadi, a 23-year-old Shiite geography student. Behind him, men were smashing cinder blocks on the pavement, breaking them into rubble to hurl across the street. "Syria! Syria! Syria!" some of the Shiite men chanted.

On the other side of the road, Sunni youths stopped hurling rocks long enough to hang the flag of Sunni-ruled Saudi Arabia from an electrical pole.

"Saddam, Saddam, Saddam," chanted the young men, invoking the executed former president of Iraq, who was a Sunni. They thumped themselves on the head, mocking Shiite self-flagellation rites. They chanted for Siniora, beat a tambourine and danced wildly, waving their makeshift weapons.

"They want us to be ruled by Iran and Syria," said Omar Senou, a 27-year-old photography clerk. "That will never happen, even if we have to cut throats."

megan.stack@latimes.com

Times staff writer Paul Richter in Washington and special correspondent Raed Rafei in Beirut contributed to this report.

'We have to do something to make them hear us, to make them know we exist.'

Candidates Court Israel, Cite Iran Risks (WT)

By Joshua Mitnick

The Washington Times, January 24, 2007

HERZLIYA, Israel -- Presidential hopefuls Mitt Romney, John Edwards and John McCain all detoured through Israel on the way to New Hampshire this week, seemingly competing to see who could be strongest in defense of the Jewish state.

Speaking in person or by video link Monday and yesterday, the politicians spelled out tough measures they said were necessary to prevent Iran from acquiring nuclear weapons. Former House Speaker Newt Gingrich also addressed the conference.

Stressing the strong U.S.-Israeli relationship at the Herzliya security conference outside Tel Aviv, the Americans called for the United States to step up sanctions on Iran and leave the possibility of a military attack "on the table."

In less than a decade, the annual conference has become a mecca for Middle East specialists, partly because Ariel Sharon used it to outline his plan to pull out of the Gaza Strip when he was prime minister.

For American politicians, the gathering provides an opportunity to float policy positions and reach out to Jewish voters in the United States.

"This forum has become the Davos for Middle East wonks," said David Makovsky, a senior fellow at the Washington Institute for Near East Policy who also was scheduled to speak. The Swiss town of Davos plays host to World Economic Forum meetings.

"During the Cold War, the Middle East was a backwater of American policy. But with the end of the Cold War, the Middle East has become the center of American policy. [The conference is] a legitimate forum for them to express their views on a region that's important."

Mr. Romney, a former governor of Massachusetts and potential contender for the 2008 Republican presidential nomination, called for economic sanctions on Iran that are "at least as severe" as those imposed on South Africa during its apartheid era.

He compared the challenge posed by Iran and militant Islam to the great threats of the 20th century -- fascism and totalitarian communism. He also recommended that Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad be brought before an international court and be tried for threatening genocide.

"It is time for the world to plainly speak these three truths," said Mr. Romney, the only one of the four to attend in person. "One, Iran must be stopped. Two, Iran can be stopped. And three, Iran will be stopped."

Mr. Gingrich, speaking by satellite video link, said Israel faced the most serious threat to its existence since the 1967 Arab-Israeli war. But many in Israel and the United States do not fully appreciate the nature, size and scope of the Iranian threat, he said.

"I have two grandchildren," said Mr. Gingrich, who has declared that he would run for president next year only as a last resort, "and I think there is a greater danger of them dying in an action than I faced during the Cold War."

Mr. McCain, Arizona Republican and a presidential front-runner, said he supported exploring a strengthening of ties between Israel and NATO as a means of easing Israel's insecurity.

"A friendly democracy under siege should be closer partners to the world's most successful security alliance," he said via satellite link. "American support for Israel should intensify. The enemies are too numerous, the margin of error too small, and shared values too great."

Mr. Edwards, of North Carolina, the only Democratic presidential candidate to address the conference, similarly called to toughen sanctions on Iran and hold out the threat of military force, but he broke with the others by suggesting that Washington open a dialogue with Iran.

"I support being tough, but I think it's a mistake strategically and ideologically not to engage them on this issue," he said. "America should engage directly on this issue."

Iranian President Derides U.S. Threats (AP)

By Ali Akbar Dareini

AP, January 24, 2007

The United States is incapable of inflicting "serious damage" on Iran, President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad said Tuesday, as a second U.S. aircraft carrier group steamed toward the Gulf as a warning from Washington for Iran to back down in its attempts to dominate the region.

In an interview with Iranian state television, Ahmadinejad said Washington had not stepped up its campaign against Tehran, despite the standoff with the West over Iran's defiance of U.N. demands to halt uranium enrichment. The U.N. Security Council imposed limited sanctions on Iran last month.

"U.S. rhetoric against Iran has not increased," Ahmadinejad said. "In 2003, they openly threatened to attack Iran. Now they have indirectly made such threats."

He spoke with confidence over Iran's ability to withstand a strike. "The United States is unable to inflict serious damage on Iran," the president said. He also noted, "They (U.S.) are not really in a position to carry out this action (of attacking Iran). I believe there are many wise people in the United States who would not let it happen."

Iran says its atomic program is aimed solely at generating energy, but the United States and some of its allies suspect it is geared toward making nuclear weapons.

Ahmadinejad, during a meeting Tuesday with Syrian Foreign Minister Walid Moallem, accused the U.S. of stirring up conflict between rival Muslim sects to maintain influence in the Middle East.

"The U.S. intends to cause insecurity and dispute and weaken independent governments in the region to continue with its dominance over the Middle East and achieve its arrogant goals," Ahmadinejad said, according to the state-run Islamic Republic News Agency, or IRNA.

Opinion-makers from both ends of Iran's political spectrum have recently criticized Ahmadinejad, accusing him of stirring opposition to Iran by taking a hard line on the nuclear dispute and employing fiery anti-Western rhetoric.

But Ahmadinejad said his goals were peaceful. "Iran is not seeking confrontation with anybody," he told the state television interviewers.

U.S. officials have long refused to rule out any options in the faceoff with Tehran, but say military action would be a last resort.

Nicholas Burns, U.S. undersecretary of state for political affairs, ruled out direct negotiations with Iran and said a rapprochement between Washington and Tehran was "not possible" until Iran halts uranium enrichment.

DOJ_NMG_0121147

"The Middle East isn't a region to be dominated by Iran. The Gulf isn't a body of water to be controlled by Iran. That's why we've seen the United States station two carrier battle groups in the region," Burns said Tuesday in an address to influential think-tank Gulf Research Center, based in the United Arab Emirates.

"Iran is going to have to understand that the United States will protect its interests if Iran seeks to confront us," Burns continued.

Some among the audience of Dubai-based diplomats and analysts complained that American wars in the Middle East were already threatening the region's stability and asked Burns to sort out Iraq and the Israel-Palestinian conflict before turning attention to Iran.

"What we are not interested in is another war in the region," Mohammed al-Naqbi, who heads the Gulf Negotiations Center, told Burns. "Iraq is your problem, not the problem of the Arabs. You destroyed a country that had institutions. You handed that country to Iran. Now you are crying to Europe and the Arabs to help you out of this mess."

The aircraft carrier USS John C. Stennis and accompanying warships have been sent to the Gulf as part of a buildup of forces that U.S. Defense Secretary Robert Gates has said is aimed to impress on Iran that the four-year war in Iraq has not made America vulnerable.

The Stennis, which is expected to arrive in late February, will join an aircraft carrier group already in the region, the USS Dwight D. Eisenhower.

The Stennis's arrival in the Middle East will mark the first time since the U.S.-led Iraq invasion in 2003 that the United States has had two carrier battle groups in the region.

Iran conducted missile tests on Monday, the first of five days of military maneuvers. The Islamic republic also barred 38 inspectors from the U.N. nuclear watchdog — the International Atomic Energy Agency, prompting fears that it was seeking to restrict access to its facilities.

"This is obviously not a sign of goodwill, nor a sign of willingness to cooperate with the international community," French Foreign Ministry spokesman Jean-Baptiste Mattei told reporters.

But Ali Larijani, Iran's top nuclear negotiator, said Tuesday that the decision had been misinterpreted and that there had been no change in Iran's cooperation with the IAEA.

___

Associated Press Writer Jim Krane in Dubai contributed to this report.

Red Lines (WSJ)

By Michael Young

The Wall Street Journal, January 24, 2007

BEIRUT -- A recurrent theme in history, literature and, lately, engagé academics is that of brash Westerners trying to possess the East and failing -- or at best leaving a transitory mark. From Alexander the Great to George W. Bush, few have successfully reshaped the Middle East in their own image. In his book "Figures de Proue," the great French historian René Grousset used an excellent formulation to express a discordant interplay between West and East. Describing how the Orientalization of Hellenism under Alexander had removed from Hellenism its "superior humanism," even though concepts were still being expressed in Greek, Grousset wrote: "As so often in history, words would, henceforth, lie to [the reality of] things."

A similar thought came to my mind when reading from a letter written at the end of December by Iran's supreme guide, Ali Khamenei, to religious pilgrims. In his missive, Supreme Guide Khamenei condemned all those who criticized Hezbollah, who believed in the "illusory danger" of a so-called Shiite arc in the Middle East, who sought to bring down the "Islamic government" in Iraq, and who applied pressure against Hamas. They were "criminals who will be remembered in Islamic history, and by future generations, with hatred and anger as agents of the perfidious enemy." If Iran's supreme guide thought the Arab world would welcome his words, his pushing of ideological buttons in expectation of a rallying response among his listeners, then he underestimated how the Arabs' growing suspicion of Iran means they see his words increasingly as "lying to things."

Western grand projects frequently succumbed to Middle Eastern intransigence. But as Shiite Iran makes a bid for regional hegemony, its leadership should consider that the mostly Sunni Arabs may be as resistant to hubris coming from the East as from the West. That Arab regimes are weak, and because of their autocratic nature enjoy only dubious legitimacy at home, might only harden their resistance. Facing what they see as an Iranian threat, unsure of their ability to contain it, with or without American assistance, aware of the tenuousness of the oil weapon, these regimes may ultimately resort to the most ready defense at hand, one that would briefly enhance their influence: Sunni sectarian mobilization.

Take Lebanon and the Palestinian territories. Since December, the Lebanese government of Prime Minister Fouad Siniora has been facing opposition demands to resign. While that opposition includes members of all religious groups, its vital force and street muscle are the Shiite supporters of Hezbollah. That's why Lebanese viewed the open-ended protests through a sectarian prism. The Sunni community rallied to the side of the government, whose prime minister and a majority of ministers are allied with or members of Saad Hariri's Future Movement, which now represents most of Lebanon's Sunnis. Mr. Siniora, in order to protect himself, asserted that Hezbollah was bent on staging an Iranian- and Syrian-backed coup d'état, by which he effectively meant a Shiite coup.

DOJ_NMG_0121148

Not surprisingly, the Sunni Arab regimes entered the fray to bolster the government. They dispatched Arab League secretary general Amr Moussa to Beirut to mediate. Sunni-Shiite tensions remain alarmingly high, and on Tuesday the opposition escalated its confrontation with the government by cutting off roads. Sunnis and Shiites clashed in some neighborhoods, though neither Hezbollah's leader, Hassan Nasrallah, nor Mr. Hariri (nor, for that matter, their respective sponsors in Iran and Saudi Arabia) wants to let the sectarian genie out of the bottle. However, as political interests kick in, sectarianism may emerge as the default weapon that the parties, in Lebanon and outside, may use against each other.

Something similar is happening in the Palestinian territories. Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas's recent call for early elections, like his ongoing differences with Hamas, transcends local politics. His aim is to check Hamas at a time when the organization is consolidating its ties with Tehran. Mr. Abbas failed to reach an agreement last weekend in Damascus with exiled Hamas leader Khaled Mashal, who controls Hamas from Syria, Iran's main Arab partner. In rallies in Palestinian areas, the president's Fatah movement has taken to taunting members of the rival Hamas by calling them "Shiites," though they are Sunni.

Wherever they look today, Arab Sunnis see setbacks, real or imagined. In Iraq, where Sunni dominance ended in 2003, Saddam Hussein's hanging provoked an angry sectarian response. Saudi Arabia's King Abdullah recently warned Vice President Dick Cheney that the kingdom would openly support Iraqi Sunnis if the Americans withdrew. In the Palestinian territories and Lebanon, accusations are now routine that Hezbollah and Hamas are serving Tehran's agenda. In Syria, a minority Alawite regime rules over a mostly Sunni society. In Bahrain, the Shiite majority is affirming itself against a Sunni royal family. And in Saudi Arabia, the oil-rich Eastern Province is home to a sizeable though marginalized Shiite minority. While the notion of a Shiite arc stretching from Iran to Lebanon is crude, Ayatollah Khamenei overlooked that many Arab Sunnis are buying into that view, and do not see themselves as criminals for doing so.

A primarily sectarian Arab counter-reaction to expanding Iranian power would be a disaster. It might halt Iran and its comrades in the short term, but Arab regimes could soon become sorcerers' apprentices, swallowed by the forces they unleash. Iran, wrongly believing that popular anti-Israeli and anti-American sentiment would overcome Sunni suspicions of their true intentions, should realize what a Sunni backlash would mean for their security. Once opened, the floodgates of Sunni-Shiite antagonism could become a Leviathan, sweeping away the fragile reality on the ground: Even in societies where Sunnis and Shiites now peacefully coexist, sectarian discord would become the norm.

Then there is the United States. Whatever one thinks of the war in Iraq, it will soon become obvious that it was easier for the Americans to enter the country than to leave it. If a departure leads to metastasizing sectarian hostility throughout the Middle East, then the U.S. will have to seriously rethink its strategy. Whatever else happens, the one assured winner of such a fracas would be the Islamists. Only democracy could prepare Arab states to withstand Iran without recourse to sectarianism. But the Bush administration seems to have abandoned that inventive undertaking for the region.

A chain of sectarian wars is not inevitable. But the only way to avoid it is for all sides to understand the existential red lines of the other sides. Iran's overconfidence is no easier for the region to stomach than was America's. For the first time in decades, the nationalism, tribalism or regime-sponsored Islamism of the Sunni Arab states seem incapable of steeling them against a resurgent Iran, but also its allies, striving to fill the vacuum of fading Arab power. Only these regimes' Sunni identity, an offended Sunni identity at that, might do so. The problem is that what shields them will likely lead the Middle East into further disarray.

Mr. Young is opinion editor at the Daily Star newspaper in Beirut and a contributing editor at Reason magazine.

Israeli President Faces Indictment (AP)

By Ravi Nessman

AP, January 24, 2007

Israeli President Moshe Katsav faced indictment Tuesday on charges of rape and abuse of power in the most serious accusation against a top Israeli official in the country's history.

The allegation that Katsav used his position as Israel's ceremonial head of state — a job supposed to serve as the nation's moral compass — to force himself on his female employees has left the nation reeling.

"It is a sad day for the state of Israel," said lawmaker Benny Elon, who called on Katsav to resign to spare Israel further trauma. But Katsav gave no indication he was preparing to step down, despite a wave of demands that he quit.

Attorney General Meni Mazuz's announcement that he intended to indict Katsav on a raft of charges was only the latest corruption scandal roiling the government, with accusations reaching as high as Prime Minister Ehud Olmert.

DOJ_NMG_0121149

Katsav has insisted he is innocent and his lawyers said Tuesday they hoped to persuade Mazuz to change his mind before a formal indictment, a step that would make Katsav Israel's first sitting president to be charged with a crime. But many Israelis say the enormity of the scandal has already badly tainted the office of the presidency.

"He should be the symbol of Israel, the uniting person and an ideal model for all the politicians ... So this is a bad sign for Israeli politics," said Gabriel Sheffer, a political science professor at Hebrew University in Jerusalem.

The presidency was once filled by Zionist legends and revered statesmen. Albert Einstein declined an invitation to serve as the nation's first president, with the job eventually going to the scientist Chaim Weizmann, a Zionist leader who was instrumental in creation of the Jewish state. The presidency has also gone to a biophysicist, a historian and other men of letters.

But the office, whose main responsibilities include receiving foreign diplomats and representing Israel at formal ceremonies, has dropped in esteem in recent years.

Katsav's predecessor, the outspoken war hero turned peacemaker Ezer Weizman, resigned in 2000 after the attorney general ruled he had improperly accepted more than $300,000 in gifts from a French millionaire. Weizman was never indicted.

Katsav, 61, has a far less lofty resume than his predecessors. He had been a low-level Cabinet minister and a Likud Party stalwart when the parliament chose him to be president in 2000 in a shocking upset over Nobel Peace Prize winner Shimon Peres, after a revered rabbi said a "vision" showed him that Katsav was favored by the heavens, swinging votes among believers.

But Katsav's relatively quiet presidency was rocked last summer when one of his employees accused him of forcing her to have sex in his office. A flood of other women quickly came forward with similar accusations, describing a politician who had abused his power throughout his career.

In the face of the growing scandal, Katsav disappeared from public life, hunkering down in the president's compound in Jerusalem. He even briefly removed himself from office in September instead of presiding over the inauguration of a new chief justice for the Supreme Court.

On Tuesday, Mazuz said he had collected enough evidence to indict Katsav on charges of rape, harassment, abusing his power for sex, obstructing justice and illegally accepting gifts, stemming from his time as president and Cabinet minister.

Legal authorities said the charges could carry a sentence of more than 20 years in jail, though in most cases the defendant, if found guilty, would receive a five-to-10-year sentence. A final decision on the indictment would only be made after Katsav is given the opportunity to present his case.

Katsav's lawyers said they believed Mazuz would drop the indictment after hearing his side of the story.

"The president believes that everyone will see that he is the victim of false charges," said his lawyer David Libai. Some of the complainants were motivated by "revenge" after they were fired from their jobs, he said.

The president enjoys immunity while in office and could be tried only after his resignation, his impeachment by three-quarters of the parliament or the conclusion of his term, which ends this summer. Katsav had previously said he would step down if indicted. His lawyers declined to address the issue, and he was expected to hold a news conference Wednesday.

Lawmakers from across the political spectrum — including those from his old party — called on him to resign.

"The fact that he is going to be indicted is neither good for our reputation abroad nor for the morale of this country, and I hope that the sooner the president himself draws the conclusion, the sooner he decides to leave office, the better off we all will be," said Colette Avital of the Labor Party, mentioned as a possible successor.

Kineret Barashi, an attorney for one of the Katsav's accusers, praised the indictment, saying it proved no one was above the law in the Israeli justice system.

The Katsav scandal erupted amid a spate of other political scandals that have darkened the Israeli government's reputation.

Police opened a criminal investigation earlier this month into Olmert's involvement in the sale of a government-controlled bank in 2005. Several other high-level politicians have been implicated in separate scandals.

Jimmy Carter's 'Peace' Mission To Brandeis (WP)

By Michael Powell

The Washington Post, January 24, 2007

WALTHAM, Mass., Jan. 23 -- Former president Jimmy Carter flew north to Brandeis University to speak on Tuesday of his hurt at the personal attacks by some American Jews that followed publication of his latest book, "Palestine Peace Not Apartheid," which urges Israel to turn away from a policy of creating "Bantustans" on the West Bank.

"This is the first time that I've ever been called a liar and a bigot and an anti-Semite and a coward and a plagiarist." Carter paused and squinted at the audience. "This has hurt me."

DOJ_NMG_0121150

At the same time, he acknowledged, with a flash of his trademark smile, that he did not simply stumble into the title of his new book. "I can see it would precipitate some harsh feelings. I chose that title knowing that it would be provocative."

Provocative mission accomplished.

Carter, who won the 2002 Nobel Peace Prize partly for brokering peace between Israel and Egypt in 1998, has a long history of involvement in the Middle East. But the former president has encountered much criticism since the publication of his latest book, in which his frustration with the current Israeli policy in the West Bank is palpable. In particular, he has attracted much anger for his use of the word "apartheid," redolent as it is of South Africa's policy of state-sanctioned racism.

Fourteen members of the board of the Carter Center at Emory University in Atlanta recently resigned in protest, and several expressed particular disappointment with the use of the word "apartheid."

Carter did not step back from the word Tuesday. He noted that he and his successors, notably Bill Clinton, have tried and failed to nudge the Palestinians and Israelis toward a lasting peace. The last six years, he said, have been marked by failure on all sides. The administration of George W. Bush all but abandoned such efforts, putting the onus on the Palestinians to turn their back on PLO leaders and now the fundamentalist Islamic Hamas leadership. And the Israelis, too, have all but abandoned negotiation, he said, turning instead to the building of walls.

Carter spoke of Israeli's decision to build barriers and set aside certain highways for Israelis only as creating a "spider web" that constricts and divides historic Arab lands. The West Bank, he said, has become a place of "Bantustans, isolated cantons," referring to the territories created for black South Africans under apartheid. He noted that many liberal Israelis, from newspaper journalists to professors to peace activists, also refer to Israeli policy on the West Bank as apartheid, albeit a policy grounded not in racism but in a religion-based desire to control land.

Israelis "have all used and explained the word 'apartheid' in much harsher words than mine," Carter said.

The Israeli government and others have defended the barriers as a successful tool to prevent suicide bombings against civilians. Fatalities from such bombings have fallen by 90 percent since the construction of the barriers, according to government officials.

Carter referred several times to the fact that his arguments might stir anger in a largely Jewish audience. But the former president received a mostly polite reception at Brandeis, a nonsectarian college founded by Jews where 50 percent of the students are Jewish. Students and faculty gave him a standing ovation at the beginning and end of his talk. But in between he received a number of tough questions. As a moderator noted, "There are not too many matzoh balls coming your way."

In particular, some students challenged Carter on a sentence that has brought him much grief. On Page 213 of his book, Carter wrote: "It is imperative that the general Arab community and all significant Palestinian groups make it clear that they will end the suicide bombings and other acts of terrorism when international laws and the ultimate goals of the Roadmap for Peace are accepted by Israel."

This sentence, the students noted, suggests that suicide bombings are a tactic of war, to be suspended only when peace is achieved. Carter agreed -- and apologized -- and said this sentence was a great mistake on his part.

"The sentence was worded in an absolutely improper and stupid way," Carter said. "I apologize to you and to everyone here . . . it was a mistake on my part."

He added that Palestinians who embrace terrorism draw no support from him. Calls for the destruction of Israel, he said, "are completely obnoxious to me. I would have no brief for them and no sympathy for them."

But Carter insisted that one botched line in his book should not drain his larger argument of its power. He urged Brandeis to send a delegation of students and professors to the West Bank and to report back on their findings. "You decide if I was accurate," he said, leaving little doubt as to what he thought they would find.

It was an argument that left more than a few students shaking their heads afterward. They said Carter is not quite so rare a voice on college campuses as he might imagine. They said they were familiar with his arguments and acknowledge some of the criticisms of Israel.

Yuval Brokman, a 20-year-old junior majoring in Islamic and Middle Eastern studies, said, "He underestimates how hard it is for Israel to live in that part of the world. It's ridiculous to think that they have a choice. The Palestinian people have been oppressed more by their own leaders."

What If Israel And Syria Find Common Ground? (NYT)

By Michael B. Oren

The New York Times, January 24, 2007

ISRAEL'S newspapers are rife with reports of a peace agreement secretly forged between Israeli and Syrian negotiators. Though both the Syrian and Israeli governments have denied any involvement in the talks, past experience shows that such disavowals are often the first indication of truth behind the rumors.

DOJ_NMG_0121151

Certainly, there is nothing new about the details of the purported plan, which involves a staged Israeli withdrawal from the Golan Heights, occupied since 1967, and the full normalization of relations between Damascus and Jerusalem. Nor is there a precedent in the willingness of Israeli and Arab leaders to enter into direct discussions without the participation or knowledge of the United States.

What is new is the Bush administration's apparent opposition to a Syrian-Israeli accord and the possibility that Israel, by seeking peace with one of its Arab neighbors, risks precipitating a crisis with the United States.

On more than one occasion, Israeli and Arab leaders have engaged in clandestine talks without informing the White House. In 1977, the envoys of Prime Minister Menachem Begin of Israel and President Anwar Sadat of Egypt quietly met and laid the groundwork for Sadat's historic visit to Jerusalem and for the advent of the Egyptian-Israeli peace process. Only later, when negotiations snagged, did the parties turn to the United States and request presidential mediation.

In 1993, Israeli and Palestinian interlocutors, convening in Oslo, worked out the details of a peace arrangement and requested President Bill Clinton's imprimatur on the accord only days before its signing. Jordan and Israel also asked Mr. Clinton to sponsor their peace treaty, initialed the following year, after they had independently agreed on its terms.

And in 2005, Prime Minister Ariel Sharon of Israel unilaterally ordered the evacuation of the Gaza Strip, a move widely welcomed as a stepping stone toward peace but from which the Bush administration, committed to the multilateral process stipulated by the "road map," kept its distance. Syria and Israel have also exchanged peace proposals in the past, sometimes under American auspices, as in the 1991 conference in Madrid.

Yet even when the two sides negotiated bilaterally, as during the secret exchanges between Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and Hafez al-Assad of Syria in the late 1990s, Washington approved of the contacts. American leaders agreed that the Syrian-Israeli track offered a promising alternative to the perennially stalled Israeli-Palestinian talks, and that achieving peace between the Syrian and Israeli enemies would open the door to regional reconciliation.

All that was before Sept. 11, however, and Syria's inclusion, alongside Iran and North Korea, in President Bush's "axis of evil." Once regarded as a possible partner in a Middle East peace process, the Baathist regime of Bashar al-Assad was suddenly viewed as a source of Middle East instability, a state sponsor of terrorist groups and an implacable foe of the United States.

Hostility toward Damascus intensified after the incursion into Iraq, during which administration officials accused the Syrians of abetting the insurgency and concealing unconventional weapons in Iraq. More recently, the United States has accused Mr. Assad of plotting to undermine Lebanon's efforts to achieve independence from Syria, of assassinating anti-Syrian Lebanese and of acting as an Iranian agent in the Western Arab world.

The last thing Washington wants is a Syrian-Israeli treaty that would transform Mr. Assad from pariah to peacemaker and lend him greater latitude in promoting terrorism and quashing Lebanon's freedom. Some Israeli officials, by contrast, see substantive benefits in ending their nation's 60-year conflict with Syria. An accord would invariably provide for the cessation of Syrian aid to Hamas and Hezbollah, which endanger Israel's northern and southern sectors.

More crucial still, by detaching Syria from Iran's orbit, Israel will be able to address the Iranian nuclear threat — perhaps by military means — without fear of retribution from Syrian ground forces and missiles. Forfeiting the Golan Heights, for these Israelis, seems to be a sufferable price to pay to avoid conventional and ballistic attacks across most of Israel's borders.

The potentially disparate positions of Israel and the United States on the question of peace with Syria could trigger a significant crisis between the two countries — the first of Mr. Bush's expressly pro-Israel presidency. And yet, facing opposition from a peace-minded Democratic Congress and from members of his own party who have advocated a more robust American role in Middle East mediation, Mr. Bush would have difficulty in withholding approval from a comprehensive Syrian-Israeli agreement.

Mr. Bush may not have to make that decision for some time, if ever. For all his talk of good will, Mr. Assad has made no Sadat-like gestures to Israel, and many Israelis agree with Mr. Bush that Syria should not be rewarded for its assistance to terrorism and its denial of Lebanese liberty.

But if trust is established on both sides and the conditions are conducive to peace, a settlement between Syria and Israel may yet be attained — and a clash between Israel and Washington ignited.

Noriega Set To Be Released (MH)

By Gerardo Reyes And Jay Weaver

The Miami Herald, January 24, 2007

Former Panamanian dictator Manuel Antonio Noriega, imprisoned in South Miami-Dade on drug-trafficking and racketeering convictions since 1990, will be released on Sept. 9 -- due in part to good behavior and other credits.

Noriega, the military ruler toppled by a massive U.S. invasion of his country in late 1989, was automatically eligible for parole after serving close to two-thirds of his 30-year federal sentence.

"There is no turning back," said Noriega's attorney, Frank Rubino. ``The order is obligatory, and nobody can stop it. He's in good health and he wants to go home. He has no intention of remaining here."

The federal judge who sentenced the former general agreed he has paid his debt.

"I think under the circumstances, he has served a sufficient sentence," Senior U.S. District Judge William Hoeveler said Tuesday night.

When Noriega steps out of his specially built, apartment-like cell at the Federal Correctional Institution in Southwest Miami-Dade, he probably won't be free. Noriega -- reportedly 68 or 72, depending on conflicting birth records -- is wanted in Panama and in France.

The U.S. attorney's office in Miami is expected to file a request for his extradition on behalf of the French later this year, authorities said.

Panama's foreign minister, Samuel Lewis Navarro, recently told the daily La Prensa newspaper that his government has already filed a petition for Noriega's extradition but has not received a response from U.S. officials.

"As much as Noriega may be celebrating his early release, the truth is it's a celebration for naught," said former U.S. Attorney Guy Lewis, who tried his case along with prosecutors Richard Gregorie and Michael "Pat" Sullivan. ``He's been convicted in absentia on murder charges in Panama, and he's been convicted in absentia on money-laundering charges in France.

"The real question is not whether he will be released from custody," said Lewis. ``The real question is will he be turned over to the Panamanians or the French to continue his prison sentence?"

Rubino said Noriega wants to go home and will deal with the charges in Panama.

An opinion poll conducted by La Prensa showed that 62 percent of 859 respondents believed Noriega must be sent to Panama.

Some say the presence of Noriega followers in the current government might mean he won't pay for his crimes, the newspaper said.

The president is Martin Torrijos, son of Gen. Omar Torrijos, for whom Noriega professed great loyalty. Gen. Torrijos led Panama from 1965 to 1981, when he died in a plane crash.

Noriega eventually seized power, ruling Panama until the U.S. invasion, Operation Just Cause, in December 1989. Noriega took sanctuary in the Vatican Embassy in Panama City but surrendered to U.S. troops a few weeks later. While he was there, the U.S. military played rock music, including Guns 'n' Roses -- at top volume. The music stopped after the Vatican complained of harassment.

The general was whisked to Miami, where he would later stand trial. It took until 1992 for the U.S. attorney's office to convict him.

The case posed legal and political problems, primarily because Noriega was a head of state. "It was the big one," said Tom Raffanello, who headed the team of 22 DEA agents.

Raffanello, his agents and prosecutors convinced imprisoned Medellín cartel figurehead Carlos Lehder to testify against Noriega, who allowed Panama to be used as a transshipment point for tons of U.S.-bound cocaine.

After his conviction and sentencing, Hoeveler declared him "a prisoner of war" who should be accorded special privileges, including the apartment-like cell -- complete with phone, color TV and exercise bike -- at the low-security Southwest Miami-Dade federal prison.

Noriega sought early release four times, starting in 2000. He was denied at every turn.

In March 2000, Noriega lost his bid because former President George H.W. Bush said he feared Noriega would try to assassinate him if he were released early, Rubino said -- calling Bush's involvement in Noriega's request ``outrageous."

"It is a low blow, a cheap shot," Rubino said at the time.

In February 2004, Hoeveler recommended Noriega's early release in a letter to the U.S. Parole Commission -- the first time in 27 years he had done so for a defendant convicted in his court.

"Among other things, which I take seriously myself, he has converted to the Baptist faith," Hoeveler wrote. ``It has been reported to me that while incarcerated, General Noriega has frequently received the pastor who baptized him."

But the next month, a parole commissioner rejected the former general's request.

With good behavior and other prison credits, Noriega became automatically eligible to serve about two-thirds of his 30-year sentence.

Noriega had spoken well of Hoeveler in the past.

Before the 1991-92 trial began, Noriega said in open court: ``The one shining light through this legal nightmare has been your honor. You have acted as honest and fair as anyone could hope for."

DOJ_NMG_0121153

Miami Herald staff writer Carol Rosenberg and translator Renato Pérez contributed to this report. Gerardo Reyes is an El Nuevo Herald staff writer.

Lawmakers Urge Easing Of Cuba Embargo (FT)

By Guy Dinmore

Financial Times, January 24, 2007

Members of Congress who believe Cuba is making a smooth transition of power said on Tuesday they would propose legislation to ease US embargo and travel restrictions.

"Contrary to the notion that once Fidel Castro was gone there would be uproar and the Americans would come marching in, I didn't sense that at all," said Jo Ann Emerson, a Republican representative for Missouri who visited Cuba last month as part of a delegation of US lawmakers.

Ms Emerson and James McGovern, a Massachusetts Democrat, said the House Cuba working group, equally represented by both parties, was agreed on the need to remove travel restrictions and loosen the embargo. This was the "mainstream view" in Congress, Mr McGovern said.

Previous initiatives have failed in committee, but with both houses of Congress under Democratic control for the first time in 12 years, President George W. Bush may be forced to use his veto if he is to keep his hardline Cuba policy intact.

"Our policy to Cuba has done more to keep Castro in power than anything else," Mr McGovern told a seminar hosted by the Council on Foreign Relations think-tank. He said the Cuban people were taking the demise of Mr Castro in their stride, and that the Bush administration was starting to accept this "reality".

John Negroponte, director of national intelligence, said the Cuban "regime" was trying to create a "soft landing" while transitioning power to Raúl Castro. "We don't want to see that happen," he told the Senate intelligence committee. "But what is not known is whether people are holding back. Maybe we're not seeing the kind of ferment yet that one might expect to see once Mr Castro has definitively departed the scene."

Julia Sweig, analyst at the Council on Foreign Relations, says Washington must "finally wake up to the reality of how and why the Castro regime has proved so durable, and recognise that, as a result of its wilful ignorance, it has few tools with which to effectively influence Cuba after Fidel has gone."

The official Commission for Assistance to a Free Cuba, whose recommendations have been accepted by Mr Bush, has proposed maintaining economic pressure on Cuba to undermine its succession strategy. A big humanitarian relief operation is ready to be mounted – once a new Cuban government asks for it. "Our Cuba policy hasn't changed," the State Department said.

Thomas Shannon, assistant secretary of state, on Tuesday spoke of 2007 being the year of engagement and listening in the region for the US. He spoke positively about efforts to get a dialogue going with Venezuela's President Hugo Chávez, but made no mention of Cuba in more than an hour speaking to the Center for Strategic and International Studies.

Russian Court Backs Closing Of Chechen Rights Group (WP)

By Peter Finn

The Washington Post, January 24, 2007

MOSCOW, Jan. 23 -- The Russian Supreme Court on Tuesday upheld a lower court ruling that shut down the Russian-Chechen Friendship Society, a Western-funded grass-roots organization that had challenged the Kremlin's interpretation of events in the continuing conflict in Chechnya.

The society's leadership called the decision a chilling example of the government using a recently enacted law on nongovernmental organizations to quash activism that clashes with official policy. The society, which had a network of correspondents and activists in Chechnya, a republic in southern Russia, reported on rights abuses by Russian forces and their Chechen allies.

Oksana Chelysheva, one of the group's leaders, promised to fight the ruling. "We are going to take our case to the European Court of Human Rights and, possibly, our Constitutional Court."

Last February, Stanislav Dmitrievsky, co-chair of the society, was convicted of inciting racial hatred for publishing in a society newsletter a statement by Aslan Maskhadov, a Chechen separatist leader, calling for negotiations to end the Chechen conflict. Another published statement cited by prosecutors was a commentary critical of the Kremlin by the London-based Chechen separatist Akhmed Zakayev.

Maskhadov -- who officials here say played a role in the 2004 Beslan school massacre in southern Russia that left 331 people dead, including 186 children -- was killed by Russian forces in March 2005. After that, the society, in its monthly newsletter Human Rights Defender, ran a portrait of the separatist with a black mourning border, a decision that infuriated Russian officials and raised eyebrows among other Russian human rights activists.

DOJ_NMG_0121154

Dmitrievsky was given a two-year suspended sentence by a court in Nizhny Novgorod, about 250 miles east of Moscow, where the society was based.

The law on nongovernmental organizations, signed by President Vladimir Putin in January 2006, makes it illegal for grass-roots groups to have people convicted of extremism as leaders or members.

The Russian-Chechen Friendship Society was later prosecuted for failing to remove Dmitrievsky from its board and membership roll. Moreover, the society was supposed to publicly denounce Dmitrievsky within five days of his conviction, which it refused to do.

The judicial assault on the group has drawn protests from Western Europe and the United States. A group of Western politicians and intellectuals wrote an open letter to Putin this month asking him to allow the group to continue to work.

"Neither the act of printing statements by separatist leaders, nor the content of the statements themselves, would be considered extremist in most Western countries, no matter how unpopular the cause involved," said the letter, which was signed by members of the European Parliament, among others.

"Moreover the flood of genuinely extremist material that appears almost daily in the Russian media, which has gone without comment from the Russian prosecutor's office, makes it clear that the law is being selectively applied in order to silence the society."

The Russian-Chechen Friendship Society was almost entirely underwritten by the European Union, the U.S. government-funded National Endowment for Democracy and the Norwegian Foreign Ministry.

Chelysheva said her group would try to work in Russia in another form.

Doha Revival Talks Are Set, But Accord Is Unlikely (WSJ)

By John W. Miller

The Wall Street Journal, January 24, 2007

BRUSSELS -- Global trade negotiators hope to restart the Doha round of world trade talks at the World Economic Forum in Davos, Switzerland, this week, but a return to the bargaining table will likely be more symbol than substance.

The key players -- the U.S. and the European Union -- remain unwilling to cut farm subsidies enough to satisfy emerging economies like Brazil and India.

Trade representatives from 30 leading economies, including the EU, the U.S., China, India and Brazil, will hold one-on-one talks in the Swiss resort before meeting as a group Saturday. They hope to tell the World Trade Organization they are prepared to resume "serious" formal negotiations, said EU Trade Commissioner Peter Mandelson.

Started in 2001, the Doha round is meant to help poor countries gain access to the developed world's markets by cutting subsidies and tariffs in rich markets -- especially in agriculture. In return, wealthy nations would win access to key markets for services such as banking and insurance.

Talks collapsed in July after the EU and U.S. turned down requests by emerging economies such as Brazil and India to trim their generous farm handouts. With little change since then, the ministers are "trying to save face, to show they're working hard for a deal," says an official familiar with the negotiations.

"We've reached the end game," Mr. Mandelson told businesspeople and lobbyists in Brussels yesterday. "It's up to the EU and the U.S. to show leadership."

In both the U.S. and the EU, however, trade negotiators face resistance from powerful farm lobbies.

Mr. Mandelson proposes a 54% cut in agriculture import tariffs. France, Europe's largest agriculture producer, wants to cut tariffs by just 39% -- and isn't budging. Without France there is no deal: Mr. Mandelson needs support from all 27 EU members in order to reach a global trade deal.

U.S. agriculture subsidies total some $20 billion a year, above the $17 billion ceiling demanded by the Europeans. At a farmers' conference last week, U.S. Rep. Collin Peterson, a Minnesota Democrat and chairman of the House Agriculture Committee, promised that the next round of subsidies would "look a lot like what we have now."

Reworking The A-List (NYT)

By Mark Landler

The New York Times, January 24, 2007

DAVOS, Switzerland, Jan. 23 — The World Economic Forum convenes its annual conference here Wednesday with the theme “Shaping the Global Agenda: The Shifting Power Equation.” To judge by the names on the guest list — and those not on it — the phrase aptly reflects the turnout at this high-altitude huddle.

Missing are Davos regulars like Bill Clinton, as well as marquee names from the Bush administration, which is sending only its trade negotiator, a deputy secretary of the Treasury, and a few other officials.

DOJ_NMG_0121155

On the list is Prime Minister Nguyen Tan Dung of Vietnam, newest member of the club of rising world economies, as well as Chad Hurley, the head of YouTube, the Internet site that allows anyone to post a video on the Web.

"The power shift is twofold," said Klaus Schwab, the Swiss organizer who has managed to keep Davos a hot ticket for three decades by latching onto the latest political and business trends. "Power is shifting from the center to the periphery, and from the top to the bottom."

Mr. Schwab insists there will be no shortage of familiar names at this Alpine ski resort, with 24 heads of state or government, 85 cabinet ministers and more than 800 corporate chiefs. But the sense of flux in the United States, Europe and elsewhere is hard to miss in the program.

For example, Mr. Schwab played down the absence of a top Bush administration official like Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, who was invited to speak but could not find time. Senator John McCain, a strong presidential candidate, however, will be here to give his views on Iraq and other issues.

"People may be interested to listen to him to get the longer-term perspective," Mr. Schwab said in an interview.

Some of the traditional heavyweights who do plan to attend are themselves victims of fading fortunes. Prime Minister Tony Blair of Britain will close the conference with a speech that amounts to a farewell address — his tenure running out amid recriminations over the Iraq war.

John Browne, the chief executive of BP and a co-chairman of the conference, has announced he will step down from the giant energy company in July, a year earlier than planned, after a team of outside investigators harshly criticized BP for safety lapses that led to 15 deaths at its Texas refinery.

Davos also says it is shunning Hollywood celebrities, even though they have lent this sober event a dash of sex appeal. Angelina Jolie and Brad Pitt, who stopped moguls and ministers in their tracks last year, will not be here, leaving Bono, the Irish rock star who has assumed a statesman's mantle, to twinkle on his own.

"We noticed there was undue publicity given to the attendance of those celebrities at the last meeting," Mr. Schwab said. "We have to be careful that we are not hijacked by the celebrity world."

That does not mean the World Economic Forum is playing down big names in other fields. Among the political leaders scheduled to take part are Chancellor Angela Merkel of Germany; Gordon Brown, Mr. Blair's presumptive heir; King Abdullah of Jordan; and Mahmoud Abbas, the head of the Palestinian Authority, who canceled last year.

Davos lost another sure-fire draw when Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger of California, who had planned to discuss climate-related issues, pulled out after breaking his leg in a skiing accident.

Climate change will nevertheless be a lively topic of conversation, and not just because the Swiss Alps have had little snow during this Caribbean winter. There will be 17 sessions on climate-related issues, and the organizers are hoping for announcements on a number of initiatives.

From the corporate world, the organizers have booked repeat guests like Bill Gates, Michael S. Dell, Carlos Ghosn of Renault and Nissan, and the Google co-founders Sergey Brin and Larry Page, as well as a few newcomers, like Rex W. Tillerson, the chief executive of Exxon Mobil.

Rupert Murdoch, who last attended the conference when it was held in New York in 2002, is scheduled to come. Mr. Murdoch will take part in a panel about the global agenda.

For anyone with a laptop or a BlackBerry, the future of media will be clear in the Web logs that are proliferating at the conference, including one by The New York Times and The International Herald Tribune. The organizers are aggregating blogs in something called the Davos Conversation.

Already, bloggers are busy debating the merits of minute-by-minute coverage of the doings at Davos. For some, the openness at a gathering of world leaders is welcome. Others wonder whether the ubiquitous scrutiny will reduce the likelihood of anything real getting done here.

In truth, Davos has rarely been a place for political breakthroughs, and while the schmoozing opportunities are nonpareil, it is not a seedbed for business deals, like Allen & Company's annual media conference in Sun Valley, Idaho.

Mr. Schwab views the spread of Web logs as more evidence of the changing power equation. He said he might have to rethink guidelines for reporting events, which put many of the sessions off the record.

The one issue on which progress is possible at Davos — trade — will be discussed behind closed doors. More than 30 trade and agricultural ministers are expected here, including the United States trade representative, Susan C. Schwab, and the chief European negotiator, Peter Mandelson.

On Saturday, the ministers will gather to try to revive the stalled Doha round of global trade negotiations. After reports of a renewed focus on reaching a deal in the United States and Europe, there is cautious optimism that Doha could get a breath of new life in Davos.

DOJ_NMG_0121156

“Everyone knows we’re just about out of time,” said a spokesman for the World Trade Organization, Keith Rockwell, referring to the approaching summer expiration of President Bush’s special negotiating authority. “This will mark the negotiations’ kicking into a higher gear.”

Remote Control (WSJ)

By Marcel Granier

The Wall Street Journal, January 24, 2007

CARACAS -- The president of the Bolivarian Republic of Venezuela, Hugo Chávez, has verbally announced his decision to shut down Radio Caracas Television (RCTV) -- our TV station, the oldest in Venezuela as well as the one with the largest audience.

So continues a long series of attacks against journalists, employees, management and shareholders of many independent media companies. The aim of all this is to limit the citizens' right to seek information and entertainment in the media of their choice, to impede public access to those media where they might express or encounter criticism of the government or their proposals for reform, to stifle the pluralism of opinion in news and talk programs, and to cut off the free flow of information and debate in Venezuela. Instead, the Chávez government seeks to install a system that it has described, without apparent irony, as the "communicational and informative hegemony of the state."

On June 14, 2006, President Chávez -- dressed in military fatigues -- gave a speech on the occasion of the delivery of a batch of Kalashnikov AK-103s to an army battalion. He brandished a weapon, then pointed it at a cameraman and said: "With this rifle, which has a range of 1,000 meters, I could take out that wee red light on your camera." Moments later, he declared: "We have to review the licenses of the TV companies."

In the weeks that followed the incident, various government officials repeated the same threat and started to monitor the editorial positions of the media. "There have been qualitative changes in programming, in news selection, and in the editorial line" of some media, an official observed; "[but] there are other cases in which we have not seen this change, this rectification . . ." He reminded us all that the government "has the ability not to renew a [media] license."

On Nov. 3, 2006, a month before the Venezuelan presidential elections, President Chávez repeated his threat: "I'm reminding certain media, above all in television, that they mustn't be surprised if I say, 'There are no more licenses for certain TV channels.' . . . I'm the head of state."

On Dec. 28, 2006, President Chávez, again in military uniform, declared that the broadcasting license for RCTV would not be renewed: "The order has already been drafted, so they should start shutting down their studios." He provided detail: "the license ends in March"; but two weeks later, in the National Assembly, he contradicted himself, saying that our license would end in May. At that same time, he launched a campaign of attack ads in all state-run media, paid for with public funds, aimed at discrediting our station in the eyes of the country.

On Jan. 13, in his annual address to the National Assembly, he changed his tune again and said: "The transmission signal belongs to the Venezuelan people and will be nationalized for all Venezuelans." He added: "RCTV has only a few days left . . . they can scream, stomp their feet, do whatever they want, but the license is finished. They can say whatever they want, I don't care, it's over."

These verbal threats constitute, de facto, a public decision to silence RCTV. But RCTV has never been informed legally or formally of the measures that are to be taken against it; nor have we ever been told what exactly are the accusations against us, which makes it difficult for us to defend ourselves. President Chávez has violated the presumption of innocence and has denied us due process.

The actions against RCTV of President Chávez and his subordinates are in violation of the Venezuelan constitution, the American Convention on Human Rights, and the Inter-American Democratic Charter. They are a clear example of abuse of power, and violate the right to work of all those in the media industry, not to mention a violation of the freedom of thought and expression of millions of citizens who seek information and ideas of their own free choice.

We are faced, in effect, with an aggressive campaign to extinguish all thought that differs from that which is officially dubbed "revolutionary."

In fact, President Chávez's threat to shut down RCTV has even led Jose Miguel Insulza, secretary general of the Organization of American States, to express his dismay publicly: "The shut-down of a large media company is a very rare occurrence in the history of our continent, and has no precedent in the last decades of democracy."

Organizations such as Human Rights Watch and the Committee to Protect Journalists, among others, have also raised the alarm. But the reaction of Hugo Chávez has been typically crude. It's the way he reacts whenever faced with someone who has the temerity to disagree with him. He says, and has said repeatedly, that there's nothing to discuss. "RCTV has only a few days left. They can scream, stomp their feet, do whatever they want. But it's all over."

Mr. Granier is chairman of Radio Caracas Television. (This piece was translated from the original Spanish by Tunku Varadarajan.)

DOJ_NMG_0121158

USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs

From:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Sent:	Thursday, January 25, 2007 8:10 AM
To:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Subject:	Attorney General's News Briefing for Thursday, January 25, 2007
Attachments:	agnb070125.pdf; agnb070125.doc

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL'S NEWS BRIEFING

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: THURSDAY, JANUARY 25, 2007 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Gonzales' Remarks On Habeas Spark Debate 3
No Penalty For Attorney Who Leaked Transcript Of Padilla Call 4
Chilling Video Shown At London Terror Trial 4
US-Georgian Operation Thwarts Sale Of Weapons-Grade Uranium 5

Homeland Response:

Taheri-Azar Pleads Not Guilty To SUV Attack Charges 5
Senate Unlikely To Approve Cargo Screening Provisions Of House Bill 5
Biden Proposes Tax Increase To Boost Homeland Security Spending 5
TSA Said To Have Chosen Lockheed For TWIC Contract 6
Bush Criticized For Speech's Lack Of Katrina Mention 6

War News:

Senate Panel Approves Resolution Against Bush's Iraq Strategy 7
Senate Panel Approves Petreaus Nomination 10
"Defiant" Cheney Defends US Actions In Iraq 10
Cheney Thinks Bin Laden Is Alive, Defends US Efforts Against Al Qaeda 11
Rumsfeld Remains "Nonpaid Consultant" To DOD During Transition 11
Gates Orders Reduction Of Stop-Loss Policy 12
White House Quieting Planning Overhaul Of Afghan Mission 12
US, Iraqi Forces Fighting Insurgents House By House In Baghdad 12
High-Ranking Officers Killed In Copter Crash 14
Spanish Court Issues International Search and Capture Warrant For US Soldiers 14
Military Tests Nonlethal Ray Gun 14
Military Scholar Urges Increase In Defense Spending 14

DOJ:

Arkansas Lawyer Challenges Authority For US Attorney's Appointment 15
Unisys To Continue Supporting DOJ Asset Tracking System 16

Corporate Scandals:

Former Enron Official Begins 18-Month Prison Term 16

Criminal Law:

Former Official Says Libby Sought To Blame CIA For Faulty Iraq Intel 17
Mayors Blame Federal Government For Crime Surge 18
Navy Contractor Jailed In Mexico On Kidnapping Charges 19
DOJ Asked To Probe "Hounddog" Movie For Possible Porn Law Violations 19
New Mexico Treasurer Sentenced To Prison For Extortion Plot 19
FBI Arrests Memphis Police Officer On Money Laundering Charges 19
Neteller Co-Founder Vows To Fight US Charges 19
FBI Arrests UC Riverside Official On Bribery Charges 20
Federal Investigators Widening Pirro Probe 20
Florida Man Convicted Of Defrauding Medicare With Stolen Patient IDs 20
Chicago Investment Adviser Convicted Of Fraud 20
New York Man Pleads Guilty To Scamming $200,000 From Priests 21
Former BLA Members Were Living "Comparatively Quiet Lives." 21
Convicted Cop Killer Had Stolen Pennsylvania Man's ID 21
Coke Formula Theft Trial Delayed By Dispute Over Sensitive Documents 21
Duncan "Confession" To FBI Insufficient To Bring Murder Charges 22
Federal Prosecutors Reveal Deal With Jeffs Over Seized Documents 22

Closing Arguments Made At Federal Abortion Murder Trial .. 22
Texas Man Sentenced To 10 Months In Prison For Red Cross Relief Fraud 22
NC Bar Brings Ethics Charges Against Prosecutor In Duke Case 22
Mortgage Fraud On The Rise Across The Nation 23
Prosecutors Want DeLay Charge Reinstated 23
NYTimes Criticizes Mandatory Sentencing Laws 23

Civil Law:

PBS&J Settles Contract Claims With DOJ For $6.4 Million 24
Winners Of FBI Wrongful Death Suit Drop Additional Claims Against Agents 24

Civil Rights:

Former Deputy Charged With 1964 Racial Murders 24
Federal, State Authorities To Monitor Police-Involved Shootings In Georgia 25
Cleveland Police Officer Under Probe For Allegedly Beating Drug Suspect 25
Testimony Begins In Former Agent's Discrimination Suit Against FBI 26
Port Chester, NY, Challenges DOJ Suit On Election System . 26
NAACP Criticizes Medicare For Not Covering Heart Drug For Blacks 26

Antitrust:

Senators Ponder Implications Of Airline Merger 26
CME To Dominate Leadership Of Merger CME-CBOT 27
Juror Dismissed From Iowa Microsoft Trial 28
Italian Fuel Refiner Denies Price-Fixing Scheme 28
EU Expands Anti-Cartel Efforts With Fines 28
Norway Rebuffs Apple's ITunes 29
Siemens To Buy UGS For $3.5 Billion 29
Brazilian Legal Dispute Threatens CSN's Bid For Corus 29

Environment:

Bush Takes Fuel Efficiency Message To Delaware 30
Navy Sonar Exemption Angers Environmentalists 32
Appeals Court Blocks Craig Bid To Eliminate Fish Agency ... 32

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

"Operation Ragdoll" Nets 18 Arrests 32
NFL Players To Face Tougher Drug-Testing Rules 32
California Meeting Focuses On Anti-Gang Efforts 33
Former ATF Agent Testifies She Feared Corrupt Officer 33
Maine Woman Sentenced For Federal Firearms Violation ... 34

Immigration:

GOP Opponents Of Bush Immigration Plan Vow To Fight 34

Tax:

Judge Bars New York Tax Preparation Firm From Practice .. 34
WSJournal Notes Move To Cut, Abolish State Income Taxes 34

Congress-Administration:

Bush Health Care Proposals Could Face Hard Time On Capitol Hill 35
CBO Predicts Budget Surplus In 2012 If Tax Cuts Are Not Renewed 36
New Bush Education Proposals Would Boost Vouchers, Charter Schools 37
Signs Of Hope Seen For Bipartisan Cooperation 38
Webb Response Speech Gets Strong Reactions From Both Sides 39
SMU Faculty Continue To Question Bush Library Plans 40
Bush To Ask For Fast-Track Authority Next Week 40
Tax Breaks Could Stall Senate Minimum Wage Bill 40
Pelosi, Hoyer Relationship Appears To Have Improved 41
Mica Angered By Perceived Slight At Transportation Meeting 41
Democratic Control Of House Could Benefit Philip Morris 41
House Restores Voting Rights To Delegates 41
Cheney Says Question About Daughter's Pregnancy "Out Of Line." 42
Higgins Exits Church After Sermon Criticized Stem Cell Vote 42
Oldest-Ever Senate Showing Signs Of Aging 42
NTEU Challenges Federal Intern Program 43
Union Launches Organizing Campaign At GAO 43
White House Social Secretary Berman Stepping Down 43

Other News:

Dow Reaches Its 26th Record Since October 43
Kerry Won't Seek Democratic Nomination In 2008 43
Obama Calls Claim He Studied At Madrassah "Scurrilous." .. 45
McCain Tops GOP Competitors In Arizona Poll 46
Republicans Wonder Whether Giuliani Is In A Stall 46
Four Large States Could Move Primaries Up To February 46
Gingrich Backs Bill To Make English Official Language 46
Bergen County Seen As Warning For GOP 47
Washington School Board Faces Backlash Over Ban On Gore Film 47
Steele To Head GOPAC 47
WPost Says Virginia GOP Finally Serious About Transportation Funding 47
WS Journal Provides Guide To Energy Security Flashpoints . 47
Bolton Says US Iran Policy Flawed 48
Timing Of Mideast Talks Questioned 48
Rice Announces $770 Million Aid Package For Lebanon 49

DOJ_NMG_0121161

Defense Officials Confirm New Airstrike In Somalia 50
Rice Dismisses Report Pyongyang Is Helping Iran Prepare Nuke Test 50
Greek Militants Claim Responsibility For Attack On US Embassy..... 50
British Defense Ministry Denies Rift With US 50
Hu To Visit Sudan For Talks On Darfur Conflict..... 50
Reactions To China Missile Test Mixed..... 51
Russia Defense Minister Criticizes US Missile Plans 51
Plot To Smuggle Uranium Shows Gaps In Anti-Proliferation Efforts 52
Litvinenko's Poisoning Jump Starts Development Of New Radiation Exposure Treatments 52
Davos Forum Highlights Globalization Debate 52
Liberia's President Seen As Making Progress During First Year In Office 52
OPEC President Not Worried About Recent Slide In Oil Prices 52

The Big Picture:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages 53

Washington's Schedule:

Today's Events In Washington 54

Online Version

Visit www.bulletinnews.com/justice for searchable archive, interactive story index, and links to complete stories where appropriate.

TERRORISM NEWS:

Gonzales' Remarks On Habeas Spark Debate. The San Francisco Chronicle (1/24, Page A1, Egelko) reports, "One of the Bush administration's most far-reaching assertions of government power was revealed quietly last week when Attorney General Alberto Gonzales testified that habeas corpus -- the right to go to federal court and challenge one's imprisonment -- is not protected by the Constitution. … 'The Constitution doesn't say every individual in the United States or every citizen is hereby granted or assured the right of habeas,' Gonzales told Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., during a Senate Judiciary Committee hearing Jan. 17." The Chronicle continues, "Gonzales acknowledged that the Constitution declares 'habeas corpus shall not be suspended unless ... in cases of rebellion or invasion the public safety may require it.' But he insisted that 'there is no express grant of habeas in the Constitution.'" The Chronicle adds, "Specter was incredulous, asking how the Constitution could bar the suspension of a right that didn't exist -- a right, he noted, that was first recognized in medieval England as a shield against the king's power to dispatch troublesome subjects to royal dungeons. … Later in the hearing, Gonzales described habeas corpus as 'one of our most cherished rights' and noted that Congress had protected that right in the 1789 law that established the federal court system. But he never budged from his position on the absence of constitutional protection -- a position that seemingly would leave Congress free to reduce habeas corpus rights or repeal them altogether." The Chronicle notes, "Justice Department spokesman Brian Roehrkasse said this week that Gonzales stood by his remarks but was asserting only that the text of the Constitution does not guarantee habeas corpus. The attorney general recognizes, Roehrkasse said, that the Supreme Court has declared 'the Constitution protects (habeas corpus) as it existed at common law' in England. Any such rights, he added, would not apply to foreigners held as enemy combatants."

In a column for the Weekly Standard (1/25), DC Attorney Adam J. White writes, "Gonzales's answer, though not unassailable, enjoys much historical support. Although the Constitution expressly provides that the writ of habeas corpus may only be 'suspended' in certain circumstances, it does not expressly provide that the writ is implemented in the first instance without an affirmative enactment by Congress. … Specter takes what may well be the more intuitive reading of the Constitution's provision: that Article I, Section 9 presumes that the privilege of habeas corpus exists absent a valid suspension. (Indeed, it's phrased in a manner similar to the First Amendment: 'Congress shall make no law . . . abridging the freedom of speech,' clearly presumes that there is a freedom of speech.) … But history suggests that Gonzales (whom Rolling Stone promptly deemed the 'Human Constitution Shredder') may well be correct. At the 1787 constitutional convention, the first habeas provision, proposed by South Carolina's Charles Pinckney, not only limited habeas's suspension, but also expressly created the writ. The final version, though, included only the former provision; when it was presented to the States for ratification, four States criticized the lack of an express habeas grant, and proposed alternatives resembling Pinckney's. … Shortly thereafter, the first Congress enacted the Judiciary Act of 1789, expressly granting Supreme Court justices and other federal judges the authority to grant the writ. If, as Specter suggests, the Constitution itself granted the writ, then such a statute would seem utterly superfluous." White adds, "None of this is to say that Specter is, in the end, certainly wrong. Specter's reading of the provision certainly enjoys as much--if not more--support than Gonzales's. Again, the Constitution's mention of the writ appears to imply its existence. Furthermore, in Federalist 84, Alexander Hamilton reassured his readers that the Constitution included the "establishment" of the writ, thereby suggesting that further statutory provision was unnecessary. … Surely the issue is due to be debated for another 200 years. In the meantime, it's probably premature for either Specter or Gonzales to declare victory."

DOJ_NMG_0121162

In a piece in the Fort Worth (TX) Star-Telegram (1/25), editorial writer Linda P. Campbell writes, "Justice Robert Jackson famously wrote in 1949 that the Bill of Rights isn't 'a suicide pact.' … But loyalty to George W. Bush increasingly seems to be one -- at least in the way that Attorney General Alberto Gonzales reads the Constitution." Campbell continues, "Even if you believe, as I do, that the Bush administration has upset the balance among the three branches of government by arrogating excessive authority to the executive branch, you can understand that the president's lawyers would zealously defend his power. … When Gonzales switched from White House counsel to attorney general, though, he presumably became the people's top lawyer, defender of our rights. Instead, he sounds all too often like the evader in chief, the astounder, the contradicter, the rationalizer extraordinaire. … Just last week, he told members of the Senate Judiciary Committee that White House officials had discussed whether a secret wiretapping program unilaterally ordered by the president could be conducted under the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act, which is supposed to govern that kind of information gathering. … Those discussions were had, Gonzales testified, because of 'concerns raised' and 'questions asked here in this committee.' Odd that he should say that. Because he also has claimed that he started looking into bringing the wiretapping program under FISA as soon as he became AG in 2005, well before public disclosure of the program triggered alarms and questions from the Judiciary Committee. … But if that inconsistency eluded attention, his stubborn obtuseness about the Constitution did not." Campbell adds, "Gonzales and Sen. Arlen Specter, a Pennsylvania Republican, got into a did so/did not debate about whether the Supreme Court's 2004 ruling in Rasul v. Bush dealt with the statutory or constitutional right of habeas corpus. … Gonzales was right that the court based its ruling on statutory law: The justices said that the law gives federal courts jurisdiction to hear the prisoners' claims of unlawful detention. … Well, we'll just get that written out of the law, the Bush administration countered -- and did, last year. … Maybe Gonzales' hard line stems from an honest belief in a stingy reading of the Constitution -- unless, of course, provisions dealing with presidential power are involved." Campbell concludes, "Maybe he sees nothing to lose from continued myopic allegiance to the president he has served since their Texas days -- though it's questionable how much sway Gonzales has anymore. Jan Crawford Greenburg writes in her new book, Supreme Conflict, that Gonzales tried, and obviously failed, to warn Bush away from nominating fellow Texan Harriet Miers to the Supreme Court. … With his own Supreme Court ambitions certainly dashed, maybe Gonzales considers it a badge of honor to be lampooned on Comedy Central's Colbert Report. … That might be good for late-night guffaws, but it's hardly the promising future he took to Washington with him."

No Penalty For Attorney Who Leaked Transcript Of Padilla Call. The AP (1/25, Anderson) reports US District Judge Marcia Cooke found "a lawyer for suspected al-Qaida operative Jose Padilla violated a court order by leaking his wiretapped phone conversations." Judge Cooke did not impose a penalty, but "ordered all defense lawyers in the case to sign papers indicating they understood and would follow rules barring disclosure of certain evidence. Cooke also said she might hold in contempt anyone who receives such prohibited material, and she specifically mentioned several reporters attending Wednesday's hearing." Defense lawyers "have said that Padilla is never overheard discussing any violent acts and that many of the conversations involve family matters, casting doubt on the strength of the government's case."

Chilling Video Shown At London Terror Trial. NBC Nightly News (1/24, story 8, 2:20, Williams, 9.87M) reported on the use of surveillance video from the trial of four would-be suicide bombers in London. The video shows "just how narrow an escape it was for those Londoners riding the underground train in the summer of 2005." NBC (Myers) added, "Only two weeks after Britain's first home grown suicide bombers killed 52, these four men allegedly tried to inflict more carnage. This dramatic surveillance video is the first glimpse of what happened that day when the would-be bomber Ramzi Mohammad boards a train and places his back pack full of explosives next to a woman and a child in a stroller." Lord Toby Harris, London Metropolitan Police Authority: "Some of the footage showing the bomber close to a woman with a baby is frankly quite nauseating." Myers: "Mohammad fires the detonator but the bomb fails to explode." Although chased by fellow passengers, "Mohammad escaped that day but was arrested eight days later and is now on trial along with others whose bombs also failed to detonate." A "senior British intelligence official warns some 200 possible terror cells are now under investigation, and that British teenagers as young as 16 are being groomed to become suicide bombers."

DOJ_NMG_0121163

US-Georgian Operation Thwarts Sale Of Weapons-Grade Uranium. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (1/15, Butler) reports, "Republic of Georgia authorities, aided by the CIA, set up a sting operation last summer that led to the arrest of Russian man who tried to sell a small amount of nuclear-bomb grade uranium in a plastic bag in his jacket pocket, U.S. and Georgian officials said. … Details of the investigation, which also involved the FBI and Energy Department, were provided to The Associated Press by U.S. officials and Georgian Interior Minister Vano Merabishvili. Authorities say they do not know how the man acquired the nuclear material or if his claims of access to much larger quantities were true. He and three Georgian accomplices are in Georgian custody and not cooperating with investigators." The AP notes, "The CIA declined to comment on the case. FBI spokesman Richard Kolko confirmed that the FBI was involved in the investigation and called it a success, but he would not provide details."

The New York Times (1/25, A1, Sheets, Broad, 1.16M) reports that the "smuggling case, which has not been previously reported, is expected to be noted in a report from the United Nations International Atomic Energy Agency on illicit nuclear activities, agency officials said. That report is expected to be released this week." The Times also notes Kolko "confirmed that the bureau had taken part in the inquiry but declined to elaborate." Georgian Interior Minister Ivane Merabishvili "said that agents had learned about the raw uranium from sources in the criminal underworld and that the investigation was continuing. The Georgian officials said they believed that corrupt law enforcement officials in Abkhazia had helped ensure the safe passage of the shipment."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Taheri-Azar Pleads Not Guilty To SUV Attack Charges. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (1/25) reports, "A man accused of trying to kill students at the University of North Carolina by driving through campus in an attack he said was intended to avenge the treatment of Muslims by the United States pleaded not guilty Wednesday. Mohammed Taheri-Azar, 23, said three weeks ago that he wanted his case to conclude as soon as possible and had said previously he intended to plead guilty to the charges stemming from the attack in March. James Williams, declined to discuss specifics about the case. But when asked after the brief hearing why his client pleaded not guilty, he said only, 'That's a very good question.'"

Senate Unlikely To Approve Cargo Screening Provisions Of House Bill. The AP (1/25, Lumpkin) reports, "House-passed requirements for intensified screening of cargo on passenger aircraft and ship-borne goods heading toward the U.S. are unlikely to survive in the Senate, a House leader on security issues conceded Wednesday." The provisions were "part of a House bill that was ballyhooed as the first legislation to pass in the Democratic-controlled Congress this year." But Rep. Bennie Thompson, D-Miss., "who chairs the House Homeland Security Committee, told reporters that two key provisions of the House bill are unlikely to make it through the Senate." Thompson said "his staff has heard from Senate staff members about what's realistic to expect as the Senate considers the House-passed homeland security bill."

Biden Proposes Tax Increase To Boost Homeland Security Spending. The Washington Times (1/25, Hudson, 88K) reports Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr. proposed legislation this week that "would raise taxes to fund billions in new Homeland Security spending on more police officers, interoperable communications equipment and 100 percent screening of cargo entering the United States." He "said by rolling back President Bush's tax cuts that up to $50 billion could be generated over five years for security improvements." The bill "calls for 'scanning' 100 percent of cargo containers, development of new 'screening' technology and the hiring of 50,000 new police officers and 1,000 FBI agents." Rep. Peter T. King referred to Biden's bill as a "gimmick," adding that the senator "is making a class warfare argument to raise money on an issue without any knowledge of the issue."

DOJ_NMG_0121164

TSA Said To Have Chosen Lockheed For TWIC Contract. The Washington Post (1/25, D1, Witte, 690K) reports, "The Transportation Security Administration has decided to award a closely watched contract to supply high-tech identification cards at ports nationwide to Lockheed Martin of Bethesda, according to sources familiar with the choice." The Transportation Worker Identification Credential, with an estimated initial value of $70 million, "is the first of many identity contracts slated to be announced in the next few years." TSA spokesman Darrin Kayser "would not confirm yesterday that the agency had made its decision but indicated that an announcement is imminent."

Bush Criticized For Speech's Lack Of Katrina Mention. In a harshly critical report, the CBS Evening News (1/24, story 9, 2:10, Couric, 7.66M) said that "in his State of the Union address, President Bush took note of the unrest in Lebanon as well as the suffering in Darfur but there was no mention of Katrina though the suffering and hardship continue. The federal government has spent $80 billion on recovery efforts in the Gulf region, but there are still 13,000 people living in FEMA trailers." CBS (Keteyian) added, "Seventeen months after Katrina, nearly 200 people uprooted by a hurricane still live in Mount Olive Gardens -- whole families packed into 200 square foot FEMA trailers they now call home. … In places like Mount Olive Gardens, words like 'relief' and 'recovery' now seem as empty to them as last night's Presidential address."

The Los Angeles Times (1/25, Simmons, 850K) reports that as New Orleans "continues its struggle to recover from Hurricane Katrina, some observers thought the absence of any mention in…Bush's State of the Union address was telling. Mayor C. Ray Nagin was unfazed. 'We're 18 months into this thing," said Nagin as he announced a two-year pilot loan program. "I'm tired of complaining and bellyaching." However, "Other Louisiana residents and lawmakers took exception to the omission of the state's plight from Bush's speech." Rep. William Jefferson said it was shocking "that there was no mention at all of it, as if the problem has been solved or simply gone away."

Meanwhile, the AP (1/24, Burdeau) reported, "Gov. Kathleen Blanco angrily criticized President Bush on Wednesday for not mentioning" the hurricane. "'I guess the pains of the hurricane are yesterday's news in Washington,' Blanco said. 'But for us it's still very real, very real, and it's something that we live every single day,' the governor said." The AP ran the same Nagin quote as the LATimes, but reported that the mayor "echoed Blanco's disappointment at Bush's omission." Blanco also "accused the White House of repeatedly delivering less money than Louisiana has needed to repair the damage to housing, schools and hospitals. She said Mississippi has received much more help."

New Orleans Recovery Czar Envisions Smaller, Denser City. The Christian Science Monitor (1/25, Jonsson, 59K) profiles Ed Blakely, "the planning guru hired to steer New Orleans out of its muddle," likening him to "the Forrest Gump of disaster recovery. California earthquake? There he is, amid wrecked interstates. Tsunami? That's him touring rebuilt villages. Terror attacks in Manhattan? When the dust settles, the distinguished-looking African-American man is at the center of a phalanx of planners. His arrival in New Orleans two weeks ago as the city's new recovery czar may be the biggest challenge for the 'master of post-disaster,' as his hometown paper, the Los Angeles Times, calls him." His "plans in New Orleans are straightforward: Encourage a smaller, more dense city by offering landowners in wrecked neighborhoods the opportunity to swap their land for lots on higher ground. Get pilot projects launched by summer. Build community centers. Begin to generate private investment."

Lenders Have Difficulty Tracking Homeowners' Compliance With Flood Insurance Requirement. USA Today (1/25, Chu, 2.27M) reports, "Nearly a year and a half after Hurricane Katrina, federally regulated lenders are still struggling to comply with a requirement that they force homeowners in high-risk flood zones to buy flood insurance. By law, homeowners in flood-prone areas — such as along the coast — must buy such a policy if they get a mortgage from a federally regulated lender. … One problem: Some homeowners who buy a flood insurance policy drop it later. Lenders 'do a fairly good job of finding out whether someone is in a flood plain, but they don't do as good a job of tracking if you lose (flood insurance),' says J. Robert Hunter, director of insurance at the Consumer Federation of America."

DOJ_NMG_0121165

WAR NEWS:

Senate Panel Approves Resolution Against Bush's Iraq Strategy. The Senate Foreign Relations committee yesterday voted 12-9 to condemn President Bush's Iraq strategy. The vote came largely along party lines, with only GOP Sen. Chuck Hagel crossing the aisle to back the resolution. As a result, said George Stephanopoulos on ABC World News (1/24, story 2, 1:20, Gibson, 8.78M), "supporters of the President's policy in the White House, actually believe they made some progress today. … They've been working furiously behind the scenes. They're using the argument of David Petraeus, he'll be the commander in Iraq. He said, a vote for this resolution will hurt the morale of the troops and hurt the war effort in Baghdad. So people like Senator John McCain and Lindsey Graham say if you vote for it, you're going to be voting against the troops." But the CBS Evening News (1/24, lead story, 2:05, Attkisson, 7.66M) reported that while "right now there probably aren't enough Republican votes" for the Democratic measure, "with subtle language changes…it could be a done deal." CBS was referring to talks in the Senate between backers of the Democratic resolution and one sponsored by GOP Sens. John Warner and Susan Collins, among others.

The Wall Street Journal (1/25, A8, Rogers, 2.04M) says the committee vote gives Chairman Joseph Biden "a solid foothold from which to begin talks with Republicans who share his concern about sending more US troops to try to quell sectarian violence in Baghdad. Chief among these is…Warner…who last evening introduced an alternative resolution also challenging the increased commitment of 21,500 troops. Merging the two to achieve a larger consensus is the Democrats' goal and the quickest route may be to embrace much of Mr. Warner's proposal with some changes." Senate Majority Leader said, "It's pretty good, but it's not perfect." Reid "will play an increasing role with Mr. Biden in trying to reach some common ground, but he must walk a fine line."

The New York Times (1/25, Zeleny, 1.16M) reports that "even Republicans who opposed the resolution, including Senator Richard G. Lugar of Indiana, expressed deep doubt about whether the troop increase could succeed and suggested it was time for a new direction. … Some Republicans expressed reluctance to support the legislation because they feared it could be seen as a political attack on Mr. Bush, but left themselves open to backing a similar plan offered by…Warner." Democrats "say they believe that at least 8 of the 49 Republicans might join with nearly all Democrats in embracing a resolution -- Mr. Biden's or Mr. Warner's -- critical of the president's troop increase plan." The Washington Times (1/25, Hurt, 88K) notes Warner said last night "his nonbinding resolution is less politically combative than the Biden resolution and has the support of three fellow Republicans and six Democrats."

ABC World News (1/24, lead story, 2:40, Tapper, 8.78M) also said that other than Hagel, "all the other Republicans on the committee refused to sign on to the resolution." Last night, on MSNBC (1/24, O'Donnell), Collins discussed her opposition to the committee measure, "We worked very hard to come up with a resolution that didn't have some of the loaded words that the resolution reported today included in it. … One of them was struck today, and that is 'escalation.' That's become a politically loaded word. We also tried to keep our resolution really focused on Iraq. The resolution reported today has a lot of extraneous issues in it. It mentions North Korea, for example. … We're picking up co-sponsors on both sides of the aisle. And I hope we'll be able to go forward next week, perhaps as a substitute to the resolution reported today." USA Today (1/25, Kiely, 2.27M) notes the resolution "declares Bush's plan to send 21,500 additional troops to Baghdad and Anbar province 'not in the national interest.'"

The Los Angeles Times (1/25, Levey, 850K) says "not a single senator on the committee endorsed the White House plan." But in fact, NBC Nightly News (1/24, lead story, 3:25, Williams, 9.87M) reported, one Republican did make "a clear statement in favor of the President's build up -- and even for him, it was not easy." Sen. David Vitter was shown saying, "After a lot of careful thought, I decided to support the President's plan as a final attempt to stabilize a viable democracy in Iraq."

Tim Russert said, also on NBC Nightly News (1/24, story 3, 1:45, Williams, 9.87M) that "the biggest concern" for the White House "is the Republicans. … There is growing concern, deep concern and anxiety about Republicans, not only voting against the President, but at least speaking out in his defense. We heard so little of that today." The Washington Post (1/25, A1, Weisman, 690K) reports Lugar

DOJ_NMG_0121166

"called the Bush strategy 'dubious' even as he denounced the resolution as 'the legislative equivalent of a sound bite.' Sen. John E. Sununu (R-N.H.) said additional troops should not be deployed until the Iraqi government showed more resolve. Sen. Lisa Murkowski (R-Alaska) said she opposed the president and was not afraid to tell him so. And Sen. George V. Voinovich (R-Ohio) said he had delivered a tough message to the White House personally: 'You are not listening.'" Meanwhile, "Republican leaders' efforts in the House to placate their members with calls for tougher oversight also appeared to be faltering. Rep. Frank R. Wolf (R-Va.) introduced his own resolution of disapproval yesterday, calling for the administration to adopt in full the recommendations of the bipartisan Iraq Study Group, recommendations that Bush has largely rejected."

On the network newscasts, much was made of Hagel's strong words during committee debate yesterday. ABC World News (1/24, lead story, 2:40, Gibson, 8.78M) showed Hagel saying of Bush's proposal, "This isn't a strategy. It's a ping-pong game with American lives. Hagel, added ABC (Tapper), "criticized his fellow Republicans for their cowardice." Hagel was shown saying, "What do you believe? What are you willing to support? What do you think? Why are you elected if you wanted a safe job? Go sell shoes." Both the CBS Evening News (1/24, lead story, 2:05, Couric, 7.66M) and NBC Nightly News (1/24, lead story, 3:25, Williams, 9.87M) also showed Hagel's "ping-pong" quote.

Hagel was also interviewed on PBS' NewsHour (1/24, Ifill), where he said, "If, in fact, the Senate passes a resolution, that's rather significant." The Senate "is part of a co-equal branch of our government. It's worked pretty well for 200 years. For a president to step away from that -- if, in fact, we would pass a resolution, putting the Senate on record opposing his plan -- that's rather significant, and it represents the voices of the people we represent. … We have not had a real, legitimate debate in four years on the most divisive issue facing this country since Vietnam. … The President can't sustain a war policy. He can't sustain any policy."

The Financial Times (1/25, Luce) portrays the vote as a sign that Bush has not "succeeded in stemming the rapid haemorrhaging of his authority," as "most Democrats and several prominent Republicans remained fixed on Mr Bush's unwillingness to listen to his growing army of critics over the war in Iraq, to which he devoted about a quarter of the 50-minute speech on Tuesday night." The Times adds, "In spite of an impassioned plea for Congress to give his Iraq strategy a chance, Mr Bush failed even to sway waverers within his own party." The AP (1/25, Espo) calls the vote "a calculated snub" to Bush.

A large number of local TV newscasts across the country took note of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee's vote. The coverage usually described the vote as an attempt by the committee to rebuke the President's for his comments on Iraq during his State of the Union Address. For example, WLNY-TV New York (1/24, 11:11 pm) said in its broadcast, "Just one day after...Bush addressed the situation in Iraq in his State of the Union, the Senate Foreign Relations Committee passed a resolution condemning his plan to send more troops overseas. Only one Republican, Senator Chuck Hagel, supported the non-binding resolution. … The measure is expected is come before the full Senate next week." WFLD-TV Chicago (1/24, 9:19 pm) reported, "The resolution has no teeth, but its supporters say it does send a message to the White House." And KABC-TV Los Angeles (1/24, 5:01 pm) noted Hagel "called the political wrangling over Iraq 'a ping pong game with American lives.'"

Democratic Rift Noted. The Hill (1/25, Schor) says "a separate rift opened yesterday between Biden and two fellow competitors in the 2008 White House chase over whether to attempt a further check on Bush by placing a binding cap on troop levels in Iraq. Sen. Chris Dodd (Conn.), the first Democrat to support a troop ceiling that would trigger a new congressional vote on authorizing the war, tried to add that cap as an amendment to the resolution." Dodd "failed by a wide margin, but Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.) backed his effort and another defender of a troop cap, Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.), awaits at the head of the presidential pack." Biden "suggested collaborating with Dodd and other supporters of binding action to limit Bush's Iraq policy, noting that the White House budget is likely to arrive with a yearlong war-funding request." Dodd "ultimately won just five of the 11 committee Democrats, including two onetime presidential aspirants, John Kerry (Mass.) and Russ Feingold (Wis.)."

Biden's Style As Chairman Mocked. In the Washington Post (1/25, A2, 690K), Dana Milbank writes that Biden "was trying to uphold two resolutions yesterday: one criticizing the Bush administration's Iraq policy and the other Biden's own resolution to himself -- to stop talking so much. The Iraq resolution passed 12 to 9. Biden's other resolution failed, by a voice vote -- Biden's voice." Biden "ran the hearing more like a talk show host than a chairman: inviting the other senators to speak and then commenting on each senator's remarks. He opened the hearing with a 3,000-word statement in which he used the word 'I' 88 times, including a lengthy discussion of the types of questions he has asked himself and how he has answered himself. Finally, the committee's ranking Republican, Richard Lugar (Ind.) got a chance to speak. Then Biden spoke again. Sen. Chris Dodd (D-Conn.) introduced an amendment. Biden interrupted him four times." Milbank adds, "Some of Biden's wordiness had to do with presidential jostling. Eclipsed in media exposure by presidential rivals Hillary Clinton and Obama -- Biden was bumped from network interviews Wednesday morning by Obama -- he relies on such hearings to boost his visibility for the presidential race. At one point, Sen. Barbara Boxer (D-Calif.) accidentally called Biden 'Mr. President.'"

DOJ_NMG_0121167

Snow Makes Case For Bush Strategy. White House Press Secretary Tony Snow said on MSNBC's Hardball (1/24, Barnicle), "We understand right now that there are going to be a lot of people having conversations on Capitol Hill. Meanwhile we're moving forces in to Iraq and furthermore a demonstration of American strength and determination. I think it is going to make a difference in Iraq. The President believes strongly that his way forward if the proper way. Members of Congress are going to assess it in the next few weeks. It'll be interesting to see what happens if in fact we have success on the ground and whether they'll have new resolutions. … The President understands wars are tough and he also understands if the United States were to leave without victory in Iraq it would up leash a chain of circumstances that could be catastrophic to us. It would allow a terror network to have access to the second-largest proven oil reserves on the face of the earth, the wealth that would generate, the be able to use that to train, equip, and send forth people to come and kill us and also create the ability to intimidate neighboring oil states make them calculate for themselves, 'Do we rely on the Americans for security or do we cut a side deal with these guys?' It would be catastrophic for our security. So he understands the importance of it."

Webb, Reed, Clark Blast "Surge." Sen. Jim Webb said on CNN's Lou Dobbs Tonight (1/24), "The key failure of this Administration, even from before we went into Iraq, was that it never clearly articulated a strategy that had an endpoint. That's the same place we are right now. You get measurements for success. They talk about a lot of rhetorical issues but not clearly what is it going to take, in specific terms, for us to decide that we are going to leave?"

Sen. Jack Reed said on MSNBC's Hardball (1/24, Barnicle), "I don't think" the President "listened effectively, because not only with members of Congress, but also the Iraqi Study Group, a significant opinion, I think, on the military side, in terms of the Joint Chiefs and others. And I think he tended to disregard that. He thinks he has a better way. I personally don't think it is the appropriate approach. In fact, I think even the terms as he described it, a 20,000 increase, is probably inadequate in terms of manpower to be a decisive factor in Iraq."

Retired Gen. Wesley Clark said on Fox News' Your World (1/24, Cavuto), "If you look at the response to last night's State of the Union address, if you look at what is happening in the United States Congress, this is not partisan. The American people have spoken. They have looked at it. … What President Bush said last night is, nobody voted to go over there and lose. That's true. But nobody went over there with the understanding that this was going to be the kind of problem that it has turned out to be."

Lieberman Says US "Making Progress." On PBS' NewsHour (1/24, Ifill), Sen. Joseph Lieberman said of the surge, "Why do I think it will work? … There is a cycle of sectarian violence in Baghdad. It's not armies of Shia and the Sunni clashing in open civil war. But until that stops in the capital city, there's not a chance either to create the economic growth that will tell the average Iraqi in Baghdad that they've got a chance to live a better life, nor is there the stability that will allow the Iraqi government to do what they want them to do, to begin to govern. … There's a second front in Anbar province. … We're making progress there. An additional 4,000 troops, which is part of the 21,000 that the President is sending, I think will turn that conflict in Anbar in the right direction, and actually it has the potential to achieve a victory for us."

Lieberman said on PBS' NewsHour (1/24, Ifill), "The Congress has the power to authorize war, which has been done, and to appropriate, to support that war. If members of Congress are opposed to the troop increase, then I think what they should do is to use the power given to Congress by the Constitution, and that is to directly try to cut off funds for additional troops in Iraq. Otherwise, what is being done here…is a nonbinding resolution. It will have no effect on the conduct of the war." But as Sen. Lugar said, it will "send a message of disarray and division, both to our friends and our enemies in Iraq and, more broadly, in the world."

DOJ_NMG_0121168

Anti-Surge Rally Planned For This Weekend In Washington. The Washington Post (1/25, B6, Ruane, 690K) reports, "Tens of thousands of peace advocates from across the country are expected in Washington on Saturday for an anti-war rally that could be among the biggest since the war in Iraq began, organizers said yesterday. They said the rally on the Mall, followed by a march near the Capitol, will target…Bush's intention to send more troops to the Iraq war. … Among the featured speakers will be Vietnam War-era protester Jane Fonda, according to the organizers. Others include actors Danny Glover, Tim Robbins and Susan Sarandon, civil rights activist Jesse Jackson, and Carlos Arredondo, who in 2004 set himself on fire after learning of the death in Iraq of his Marine Corps son, Alexander."

More Commentary. In an editorial, the Wall Street Journal (1/25, A18, 2.04M) writes, "To understand why the Founders put war powers in the hands of the Presidency, look no further than the current spectacle in Congress on Iraq." The Journal says Bush was "conciliatory and respectful in his State of the Union Address Tuesday night, asking Congress to give his new Iraq strategy a chance. In a better world, the Members would do so. But if they insist on seeking political cover by trying to operate as a committee of 535 Commanders-in-Chief, Mr. Bush will have to start reminding Congress who really has the job."

The Wall Street Journal's (1/25, A18) Daniel Henninger writes, "The United States is talking itself into defeat in Iraq. Its political culture is now in a downward spiral of pessimism. In the halls of Congress, across endless newspaper columns, amid the punditocracy and on Sunday morning talk shows -- all emit a Stygian gloom about America." While he concedes that "on any given day on some discrete issue, the criticism of the American role is not without justification," Henninger says "the cumulative effect of this unremitting ill wind is corrosive. We are not only on the way to talking ourselves into defeat in Iraq but into a diminished international status that may be harder to recover than the doom mob imagines."

Senate Panel Approves Petreaus Nomination. The Washington Post/AP (1/25) reports, "A Senate committee on Wednesday approved the nomination of Army Lt. Gen. David Petraeus to command American forces in Iraq, replacing Gen. George Casey. The Senate Armed Services Committee sent the nomination to the full Senate, which is expected to approve the nomination on Thursday, including promoting Petraeus to four-star rank for the top military post in Iraq."

Meanwhile, another AP story (1/25, Riechmann) reports "President Bush asked the Senate Wednesday to quickly confirm the top commanders he has chosen to oversee the war in Iraq. 'It is important to get these three fine individuals in their posts as soon as possible so that we have continuity as we do our duty to protect the American people,' the president said." Bush "was referring to Adm. William Fallon, chosen to replace Gen. John Abizaid, the top US commander overseeing the military theater that includes Iraq; Army Lt. Gen. David Petraeus…and Gen. George Casey, leaving the top Iraq job to take over from the retiring Gen. Peter Schoomaker as Army chief of staff."

WPost Welcomes Petraeus' Offer To Update Congress On Progress. In an editorial, the Washington Post (1/25, A24, 690K) notes that during a Senate Foreign Relations Committee hearing Tuesday, Lt. Gen. David H. Petraeus, "made his own suggestion…offering to report to Congress regularly about the mission, including updates on the performance by Iraqis on their commitments." Taking Gen. Petraeus "up on that," the Post says, "and closely and systematically monitoring the progress of events in Iraq during the coming months, is probably the best contribution that Congress can make to helping the new American commander address what he calls a 'dire' situation."

"Defiant" Cheney Defends US Actions In Iraq. Vice President Cheney gave a lengthy and at some points testy interview to Wolf Blitzer on CNN's The Situation Room (1/24) that largely focused on Iraq. The CBS Evening News (1/24, story 2, 1:05, Axelrod, 7.66M) said Cheney was, "in a word, defiant, saying about the idea of any kind of resolution from the Senate, quote, 'It won't stop us.'" CBS showed Blitzer saying, "So you're moving forward no matter what the Congress does." Cheney: "We are moving forward. The Congress has control over the purse strings. They have the right, obviously, if they want to cut off funding, but in terms of this effort the President has made his decision and I think it's far too soon for the talking heads on television to conclude that it's impossible to do, it's not going to work, it can't possibly succeed." In a front-page headline, the Washington Post (1/25, Baker, 690K) also calls Cheney "defiant," reporting that the Bush Administration "has achieved 'enormous successes' in Iraq but complained that critics and the media 'are so eager to write off this effort or declare it a failure' that they are undermining U.S. troops in a war zone, striking a far more combative tone than President Bush did in his State of the Union address the night before."

DOJ_NMG_0121169

The AP (1/24) says Cheney said "it's 'hogwash' to suggest the Bush administration's credibility is on the line because of mistakes in Iraq," acknowledging that the "situation in Iraq was very unstable but said toppling Saddam Hussein had been the right thing to do." On CNN's The Situation Room (1/24, Blitzer), Cheney said, "The world is much safer today because of it. There have been three national elections in Iraq. There's a democracy established there, a constitution, a new democratically elected government. Saddam has been brought to justice and executed. His sons are dead. His government is gone. And the world is better off for it."

The Los Angeles Times (1/25, Reynolds, 850K) writes that "a day after President Bush struck a conciliatory tone toward critics of the Iraq war," Cheney "did the opposite Wednesday," defending the invasion and insisting "that 'there's been a lot of success' since then. His comments came during a CNN interview, an exception to the vice president's more common practice of talking to conservative media outlets."

Cheney Warns Against Giving Up; Hagel Calls Statement "Astounding." At another point in his interview with CNN's The Situation Room (1/24, Blitzer), Cheney said, "After 9/11, we learned that we have a vested interest in what happens on the ground in the Middle East. If you are going to walk away from Iraq today and say, well, gee, it's too tough, we can't complete the task, we just are going to quit, you will create exactly that same kind of situation again."

On PBS' NewsHour (1/24), Gwen Ifill asked Sen. Chuck Hagel about Cheney's comment that "part of what's going on here is that people do not have the stomach to complete this mission." Hagel said, "I'm so sorry the Vice President so underestimates the people of this country. He has so little faith in this country to say something like that. That's an astounding statement from the Vice President of the United States. You're telling me -- or maybe more directly, maybe the Vice President should tell the families of those who have lost their lives, over 3,000, and over 23,000 wounded, some very seriously for life -- that they don't have the stomach? Come on, let's get real here."

Cheney "Out In The Open And On The Defensive." McClatchy (1/25, Hutcheson) headlines a report "Cheney Increasingly On The Defensive," saying that the man "often considered the hidden power behind the White House throne" is "increasingly out in the open and on the defensive. He's scheduled to testify at the perjury trial of his former top aide; congressional Democrats want to probe his role in the White House; and his unprecedented clout may be waning. Once widely considered a source of wisdom and experience in the White House, the vice president has become a frequent target of criticism."

Cheney Thinks Bin Laden Is Alive, Defends US Efforts Against Al Qaeda. On CNN's The Situation Room (1/24), Wolf Blitzer asked Vice President Dick Cheney, regarding Osama bin Laden, "Why can't you find this guy?" Cheney replied, "Well, he's obviously well hidden. We've been looking for him for some time. I think the fact is, that he's gone totally to ground. He doesn't communicate, except perhaps by courier. He's not up on the air. He's not putting out videos, the way he did oftentimes in the past. … If you've ever been in that part of the world, it is some of the most rugged territory imaginable. … And that general area is a remarkably difficult area to get people into." Asked if bin Laden is still alive, Cheney said, "I think so." Cheney went on to say, "We have not gotten Osama bin Laden, obviously, because he's very careful. … But we've taken out, several times, that whole layer of leadership underneath Osama bin Laden" and Ayman al-Zawahiri. We have "successfully defended the country for over five years against any further attacks."

Rumsfeld Remains "Nonpaid Consultant" To DOD During Transition. The Washington Times (1/25, Scarborough, 88K) reports that while Donald Rumsfeld has "left the Pentagon" he has not left the Defense Department. Earlier this month, Rumsfeld "opened a government-provided transition office in Arlington and has seven Pentagon-paid staffers working for him. … The Pentagon lists Mr. Rumsfeld as a 'nonpaid consultant,' a status he needs in order to review secret and top-secret documents." The transition office "has raised some eyebrows inside the Pentagon. Some question the size of the staff, which includes two military officers and two enlisted men. They also ask why the sorting could not have been done from the time Mr. Rumsfeld resigned Nov. 8 to when he left the building Dec. 18."

DOJ_NMG_0121170

Gates Orders Reduction Of Stop-Loss Policy. The Hill (1/25, Tiron) reports Defense Secretary Robert Gates "is ordering military service chiefs to reduce the use" of the "controversial" stop-loss policy "intended to keep troops in war zones beyond the end of their original commitments." According to a memo sent to the chiefs and other top DOD decision-makers, "Gates asked to see plans to minimize the use of the so-called stop-loss policy for active duty and reserve components by the end of next month." Last week, several House Republicans sent Gates a letter "asking that members of the National Guard and Reserve not be kept on active duty beyond their original commitment."

White House Quieting Planning Overhaul Of Afghan Mission. The Washington Post (1/25, A1, Abramowitz, 690K) reports, "After the bloodiest year in Afghanistan since the US invasion, the Bush administration is preparing a series of new military, economic and political initiatives aimed partly at preempting an expected offensive this spring by Taliban insurgents, according to senior US officials. Even as it trumpeted a change of course in Iraq this month, the White House has completed a review of US policy in Afghanistan. It will ask Congress for $7 billion to $8 billion in new funds for security, reconstruction and other projects in Afghanistan as part of the upcoming budget package, officials said." That "would represent a sizable increase in the U.S. commitment to the strife-torn country; since the 2001 U.S.-led invasion that toppled the Taliban, the United States has provided a little more than $14 billion in assistance for Afghanistan, the State Department says."

CBS Evening News (1/24, story 4, 1:55, Couric, 7.66M) reported "a troop build up is continuing" in Afghanistan "as well. There are now a total of 24,000 soldiers and Marines fighting in Afghanistan, the most ever."

Pakistani Prime Minister Blames Weak Afghan Government For Border Problems. The New York Times (1/25, Bennhold, Landler, 1.16M) reports, "Pakistan's prime minister, Shaukat Aziz, acknowledged Wednesday that people sympathetic to the Taliban were active in the frontier regions near the border with Afghanistan. But he insisted that the root of the problem was the Afghan government's weak authority, not Pakistani support of the Taliban. 'We believe the core of the problem is in Afghanistan,' Mr. Aziz said, in an interview at the World Economic Forum here in Davos." Aziz also "said three million Afghan refugees were crowded into Quetta, Peshawar and other Pakistani cities close to the 1,700 mile-border between the countries. Despite what he described as stepped-up Pakistani efforts to root out extremists, the refugee population remains a recruiting pool for the Taliban insurgency, Mr. Aziz said."

US, Iraqi Forces Fighting Insurgents House By House In Baghdad. The CBS Evening News (1/24, story 3, 2:25, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "In Baghdad…we have a vivid and riveting example of what US forces are up against. Weeks have gone by and US and Iraqi troops are still fighting insurgents house by house for control of one notorious neighborhood. Iraq's government says as many as 30 insurgents were killed today, 27 other captured. But the street is still not secure." CBS (Logan) added, "This is Operation Tomahawk Strike 11 underway in central Baghdad just a mile-and-a-half from the heavily guarded Green Zone, launched as President Bush was addressing the nation in Washington last night."

NBC Nightly News (1/24, story 6, :30, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "There were conflicting reports on the number of Iraqi casualties. The US military says one American was killed in fighting today," and "two other Americans died yesterday in fighting in Anbar Province."

The Washington Post (1/25, A20, Londono, Partlow, 690K) reports, "The recurring fighting on Haifa Street illustrates the severe challenges facing the 17,500 additional U.S. troops that President Bush plans to send to Baghdad to try to secure the city. In a treacherous, cramped urban setting, and surrounded by civilians, US and Iraqi troops have repeatedly fought for control of neighborhoods in the capital, only to have insurgents return to fight again." Yesterday, "US and Iraqi forces came under attack around Haifa Street and responded with mortar fire, the military said in a statement. … More than 30 'terrorists' were arrested during the operation and roughly 25 were killed." A US military spokesman, Lt. Col. Scott Bleichwehl, "said he was aware of seven arrests and did not know whether anyone had died."

The Washington Times/AP (1/25, Mroue) reports, "Apache attack helicopters buzzed past the tall buildings and radio towers, with several Humvees on the tree-lined street below. Gunfire rang in the background as shells fell, according to AP Television News footage. Black smoke rose from the area, on the west bank of the Tigris River about one mile north of the Green Zone, site of the US and British embassies as well as the Iraqi government headquarters."

DOJ_NMG_0121171

The clashes "were the second major fighting to break out in the area in less than a month."

The Los Angeles Times (1/25, Zavis, 850K) reports, "Sunni political and religious leaders protested the operation, which Adnan al-Dulaimi, a lawmaker with the main Sunni bloc, called 'barbaric.' Residents accused the United States of unwittingly aiding Shiite Muslim militiamen accused of trying to force the mostly Sunni Arab inhabitants from their homes in recent weeks, as part of a pattern of sectarian cleansing that is redrawing the map of the once largely integrated capital." The US military "stressed in a statement that the operation did not target only Sunni insurgents, but was 'rather aimed at rapidly isolating all active insurgents and gaining control of this key central Baghdad location.'"

Iraqi Forces Arrives Late With "The Air Of A Class Outing." The New York Times (1/25, Cave, Glanz, 1.16M) says "Haifa Street has changed hands so often that it has taken on the feel of a no man's land, the deadly space between opposing trenches. On Wednesday, as American and Iraqi troops poured in, the street showed why it is such a sensitive gauge of an urban conflict marked by front lines that melt into confusion, enemies with no clear identity and allies who disappear or do not show up at all." The Times adds that "as the sun rose, many of the Iraqi Army units who were supposed to do the actual searches of the buildings did not arrive on time, forcing the Americans to start the job on their own. When the Iraqi units finally did show up, it was with the air of a class outing, cheering and laughing as the Americans blew locks off doors with shotguns. A s the morning wore on and the troops came under fire from all directions, another apparent flaw in this strategy became clear as empty apartments became lairs for gunmen who flitted from window to window and killed at least one American soldier, with a shot to the head."

Mahdi Army Negotiating With British. The New York Times (1/25, Tavernise, 1.16M) reports, "An Iraqi official authorized to speak on behalf of field commanders for the country's most powerful militia has approached Western military officials and laid out a plan to avoid armed confrontation, senior Iraqi and American officials said this week. The official is Rahim al-Daraji, the elected mayor of the Sadr City district, the vast grid in the northeast corner of the capital that is the stronghold of the militia, the Mahdi Army." Daraji "has met twice in the past two weeks with Lt. Gen. Graeme Lamb, a British officer who is the deputy commanding general in Iraq, said a senior Iraqi official in the office of the prime minister." The groups "were eager to head off a major American military offensive in the district, home to two million Shiites, as the Americans begin a sweeping new effort to retake the streets of Baghdad. Mr. Daraji said in an interview that field commanders would forbid their foot soldiers to carry guns in public if the American military and the Iraqi government met several basic demands, mostly involving ways to ensure better security for Sadr City. He is communicating with the commanders through a Shiite politician who is close to them." The Times adds, "The talks appeared to have been the first between an intermediary for the Mahdi militia and a senior commander from the American effort."

50% Of Iraq Children Have Been Affected By Violence. ABC World News (1/24, story 7, 2:20, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "Almost every night on this broadcast, we do report on the casualties in Iraq. The numbers of soldiers and civilians killed. It's easy in doing so to overlook another category of victims -- those traumatized by violence, especially Iraqi children. One study indicates almost 50% of the children in Baghdad report they have been touched by a major traumatic event." ABC (Harris) added, "This is child's play in the new Iraq. A video that Iraqis are trading via e-mail and cell phones, shows young boys reenacting the hanging of Saddam Hussein. 'Go to hell' they're shouting. In this country, where nearly 50% of the population is under 18 a new generation is being raised on violence. The violence, which has turned so many neighborhoods here in Baghdad into virtual ghost towns, is keeping a staggering number of children out of school. The education ministry says elementary school attendance rates dropped from 75% in 2005, to only 30% last year."

Palestinians In Difficult Position In Post-Saddam Iraq. The Washington Post (1/25, A20, Partlow, 690K) reports, "Baghdad is a dangerous place for anyone to live, and the fighting between Sunni and Shiite Muslims has displaced hundreds of thousands. Largely forgotten amid this violence is the plight of thousands of Palestinians in Iraq, who face an increasingly hostile environment because they are predominantly Sunni and perceived as having been favored during the rule of Iraqi President Saddam Hussein. Palestinians and human rights officials in Baghdad say members of the group are being targeted by roving Shiite militias and Iraqi police in efforts to expel them." The Post adds, "Iraqi officials said the 17 Palestinian men were detained Tuesday for 'investigation purposes' because they seemed suspicious, according to Brig. Gen. Saad Abdullah of the Interior Ministry. During the detention, the officials discussed steps to 'get the approvals for them to be refugees in other countries,' he said." An "estimated 19,000 Palestinians have fled Iraq since 2003, leaving about 15,000 behind, according to the United Nations. About 350 Palestinians are now stranded in a desolate refugee camp in a no man's land at the Al Tanf border crossing into Syria."

DOJ_NMG_0121172

Brooks Warns Of Worsening "Tactics Of Genocide" In Iraq. In his New York Times (1/25, A25, 1.16M) column, David Brooks writes, "Iraq is at the beginning of a civil war fought using the tactics of genocide, and it has all the conditions to get much worse. As a Newsweek correspondent, Christian Caryl, wrote recently from Baghdad, 'What's clear is that we're far closer to the beginning of this cycle of violence than to its end.' As John Burns of The Times said on 'Charlie Rose' last night, 'Friends of mine who are Iraqis -- Shiite, Sunni, Kurd -- all foresee a civil war on a scale with bloodshed that would absolutely dwarf what we're seeing now.' Iraq already has the warlord structures that caused mass murder in Rwanda, Bosnia, Sierra Leone and elsewhere. Violent, stupid men who would be the dregs of society under normal conditions rise amid the trauma, chaos and stress and become revered leaders. … Once this mental descent has begun, it is possible to kill without compunction."

High-Ranking Officers Killed In Copter Crash. ABC World News (1/24, story 6, :25, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "We learned…of an extraordinary loss by the US Army in Iraq. Among the 12 personnel killed in that helicopter crash on Saturday, were high-ranking officers. They included the military's chief medical officer, for Iraq, Colonel Brian Allgood. A 46-year-old surgeon from Oklahoma. Another colonel, a Lieutenant Colonel, a Major, a Captain and two Sergeants Major also were killed. It is believed the helicopter was shot down."

USA Today (1/25, 6A, Brook, 2.27M) reports the crash "was the deadliest single incident for National Guard troops in at least 50 years, the National Guard Bureau said Wednesday. Ten National Guard soldiers died in the crash Saturday, including Col. Paul Kelly, the highest-ranking Guard member to die since the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks. President Bush's plan to commit 21,500 more troops to Iraq relies in part on sending National Guard troops, raising the possibility of more casualties among the citizen-soldier units."

Four Or Five Americans Shot Execution Style After Tuesday Crash. The Washington Times/AP (1/25, Mroue) reports "new details…emerged about the downing of a private US security company helicopter on Tuesday, with US and Iraqi officials saying four of five Americans who died in the incident were shot execution-style -- in the back of the head." The AP adds, "A senior Iraqi military official said a machine gunner downed the helicopter, but a US military official in Washington said there were no indications that the aircraft, owned by Blackwater USA, had been shot out of the sky. Two Sunni insurgent groups, separately, took responsibility for the crash."

Spanish Court Issues International Search and Capture Warrant For US Soldiers. The Christian Science Monitor (1/25, Abend, Pingree, 59K) reports that four years after the death of Spanish TV cameraman José Couso, shot by US forces, "Spain's Supreme Court agreed" that his relatives "may have a case, and last week, the lower National Court issued an international search and capture warrant for the American soldiers implicated in the incident. Although it is unlikely the three will ever stand trial in a Madrid courtroom, the case has drawn worldwide attention and is raising serious questions about wartime justice and the right of one country to judge another's citizens." The Monitor adds, "According to the New York-based Committee to Protect Journalists, which conducted interviews with eyewitnesses, many Western reporters were observing the struggle for Baghdad from the hotel's balconies when the American M1A1 Abrams tank, stationed roughly three quarters of a mile away, turned toward the Palestine and fired a single round which mortally injured both Couso and…cameraman Taras Protsyuk. The American tank sergeant, Thomas 'Shawn' Gibson, later said he reported a suspicious spotter on the roof of the hotel to his superior, Capt. Philip Wolford, and received an order to fire."

Military Tests Nonlethal Ray Gun. The New York Times/AP (1/25, A21) reports the US military is testing "a ray gun that shoots a beam that makes people feel as if they are about to catch fire. Apart from causing that terrifying sensation, the technology is supposed to be harmless -- a nonlethal way to get enemies to drop their weapons," according to military officials.

Military Scholar Urges Increase In Defense Spending. In a Washington Times (1/25, 88K) op-ed headlined "Boost Military Spending," Lt. Col. Peter Huggins of the School of Advanced Air and Space Studies writes, "Our nation stands at a crossroads. The versatility and robustness of our armed forces will be crucial to our country's future foreign-policy success in a world where the only certainty is uncertainty. Zero-sum arguments that advocate shifting money to one service at the expense of another overlook the other choice -- increasing the defense budget. While the nature of the current conflict suggests that boosting defense spending to a share in line with past conflicts, such as World War II, Korea and Vietnam, is not necessary, an increase to the levels seen at the end of the Cold War -- our nation's most recent 'long war' -- is warranted. It's the best, and smartest, decision we can make."

DOJ_NMG_0121173

DOJ:

Arkansas Lawyer Challenges Authority For US Attorney's Appointment. The Arkansas Democrat Gazette (1/25, Satter) reports, "A Little Rock attorney appointed Friday to represent a man charged with capital murder and possibly facing the death penalty has filed a motion to declare Tim Griffin's appointment last month as U. S. attorney for the Eastern District of Arkansas unconstitutional." The Gazette continues, "John Wesley Hall Jr., who represents Antoine Demetrius Baker, said in a 16-page motion filed Tuesday that Griffin's appointment last month by U. S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales violates Article II, Section 2, of the U. S. Constitution, which covers presidential appointments. He said it also violates a section of the U. S. Code altered last year during Congressional reauthorization of the USAPATRIOT Act. … The reworded section of the act omits a subsection that previously caused an attorney general's appointment of a U. S. attorney to expire within 120 days. The effect is that an appointee may now serve indefinitely without having to go through the standard procedure of being nominated by the president and then scrutinized by the Senate, which then votes to confirm or deny the appointment." The Gazette adds, "Little noticed at the time, the revision has stirred anger since the discovery that a handful of U. S. attorneys across the country were inexplicably forced to resign recently and then were replaced under the new provision by appointees who had not gone through the standard procedure — although the Justice Department says it is subjecting all of them to the process. … Among those ousted was Bud Cummins, U. S. attorney for the Eastern District of Arkansas, whose job as chief federal prosecutor has generated praise in the legal community. Cummins said he was asked to resign so that Griffin, who had worked in the White House as a Republican strategist, could have a chance to serve as U. S. attorney." The Gazette notes, "Griffin declined to comment on Hall's challenge to the method in which Griffin secured the top legal position in the eastern part of the state. But the challenge was rebuffed Tuesday by the U. S. Department of Justice with more of the same language that the department has used over the past few weeks to defend its appointment of Griffin. … 'Congress provided the Attorney General the authority in federal law (28 United States Code § 546) to appoint a United States Attorney because we must ensure that someone is able to carry out the important function of leading a U. S. Attorney's office in the event a vacancy arise,' said Brian Roehrkasse, deputy director of public affairs. 'We have clearly stated our commitment to having a U. S. Attorney in every district who is confirmed by the Senate, and thus there is no merit to the assertion that we are using this authority in an attempt to circumvent the confirmation process.'"

The Los Angeles Times (1/25, Weinstein) reports, "Some Democrats have suggested that the moves were made to reward friends of the White House or punish prosecutors who had taken actions that angered the administration." The Times continues, "Administration officials have denied that the moves were political and assert that Gonzales has the authority to take these actions under a 2006 amendment to the Patriot Act that allows recess appointments. … But Hall's challenge contends that the section of the Patriot Act that Gonzales is relying on is an attempted 'end run' around the appointments clause, which mandates that the Senate confirm the president's appointees." The Times adds, "

The AP (1/25) reports, "Griffin was named interim U.S. attorney for the Eastern District of Arkansas by Attorney General Alberto Gonzalez in a 'recess appointment' after Congress adjourned for the year in 2006. The USA Patriot Act now allows Griffin to serve without having to be nominated by the president and go through Senate confirmation. … Previously, the appointment would have been good for 120 days." The AP notes, "Justice Department spokesman Brian Roehkrasse said the department is committed to having Senate confirmation hearings. … 'There is no merit to the assertion that we are using this authority in an attempt to circumvent the confirmation process,' he said."

DOJ_NMG_0121174

More Commentary. The New York Times (1/25) editorializes, "The federal investigation into Congressional corruption is approaching a crucial deadline and potential dead end. Feb. 15 is the last day on the job for United States Attorney Carol Lam of San Diego, the inquiry's dedicated prosecutor, who is being purged by the Bush administration." The Times continues, "Her investigation led to the imprisonment of former Representative Randy Cunningham, the California Republican who took millions of dollars in bribes in exchange for delivering lucrative government contracts. But just as Ms. Lam was digging into other possible wrongdoing, the White House decided to force her from office without explanation." The Times adds, "Ms. Lam has been investigating the dealings of Brent Wilkes, a private contractor and deep-pocketed political contributor who was designated co-conspirator No. 1 in the Cunningham case. … The question now is whether her successor, as yet unnamed, will pursue the inquiry with the same dedication or will quietly smother it. … The outlook isn't promising. The administration is defenestrating at least six other U.S. attorneys. Yet Attorney General Alberto Gonzales is refusing to provide Congress with details on these unmerited dismissals. He insists that there's no attempt to quash fresh Republican scandals and says only the 'very best' will be named as replacements." The Times concludes, "We are skeptical, especially since the White House's reported choice to replace Little Rock's federal attorney is a Republican operative close to Karl Rove. Congress must demand a clear explanation from Mr. Gonzales and the White House on why these prosecutors are being ousted. It must search out every shady aspect of this clearly politically motivated purge — with a particular eye on Feb. 15."

The Houston Chronicle (1/25) editorializes, "In the past year 11 U.S. attorneys have resigned their positions, some under pressure from their Justice Department superiors and the White House, even through they had commendable performance records. … Democratic senators are concerned that the high turnover is linked to an obscure, recently passed provision of the Patriot Act. … U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales denied political motives figured in the multiple resignations of top prosecutors, and pledged that all interim appointments would be submitted to the Senate for confirmation. He reiterated that U.S. attorneys serve at the pleasure of the president and can be removed for a number of reasons, including job performance and their standing in their districts. That isn't good enough for (Sen. Diane) Feinstein and her Democratic colleagues, who have introduced legislation to reinstate the appointment of interim prosecutors by federal judges." The Chronicle adds, "Gonzales is correct that the president is vested with the power to appoint U.S. attorneys. Unfortunately, the Patriot Act change eliminated the ability of the Senate to exercise its constitutional oversight of those nominations to make sure they are qualified and not simply political plums handed out to supporters in the waning years of the administration. … No president should be able to fire top government prosecutors from their positions for political reasons and then install successors without a thorough vetting by the constitutionally charged legislative body."

Unisys To Continue Supporting DOJ Asset Tracking System. Washington Technology (1/24, Welsh) reports, "Unisys Corp. will continue supporting a consolidated asset tracking system used by the Justice Department to monitor property seized from criminals under a new contract. The eight-year deal may be worth as much as $112 million, the company said." WTech continues, "Under a blanket purchase agreement, Unisys of Blue Bell, Pa., will provide applications and managed services support for all system operations. … Unisys will handle systems integration, systems development, engineering, network management, production support, and security and certification. The company also will be responsible for customer support, program management, verification and validation." WTech adds, "The Justice Department's asset tracking system tracks, monitors and reports on property seized and forfeited in the prosecution of criminal activities. Ten law enforcement agencies used the consolidated system. … The new contract extends Unisys work on the asset tracking system project. Over the past five years, Unisys has modernized all of the system's core business applications while maintaining legacy system operations during the process, the company said."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Former Enron Official Begins 18-Month Prison Term. The Houston Chronicle (1/25, Hays) reports, "Enron's former investor relations chief entered a federal prison in Texas today to serve an 18-month sentence for helping top executives mislead Wall Street about the company's financial viability." The Chronicle continues, "Mark Koenig, 51, surrendered at a men's prison in Three Rivers, about 74 miles south of San Antonio, at noon today, prison spokesman Michael Ginster said." The Chronicle adds, "With his surrender, Koenig became the eighth former Enron executive to serve prison time in the aftermath of the company's collapse more than five years ago. … Koenig pleaded guilty in August 2004 to aiding and abetting securities fraud for misleading Wall Street analysts to conceal Enron's precarious financial condition before the company collapsed in December 2001. As head of investor relations, he was Enron's main liaison to Wall Street. … Koenig's former second-in-command, Paula Rieker, pleaded guilty to insider trading earlier in 2004 and is serving probation for two years."

DOJ_NMG_0121175

CRIMINAL LAW:

Former Official Says Libby Sought To Blame CIA For Faulty Iraq Intel. USA Today (1/25, Willing, 2.27M) reports I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby was "part of a White House strategy to use press leaks to blame the CIA for faulty intelligence about Iraq's efforts to acquire nuclear bomb material, a former top CIA official testified Wednesday." Robert Grenier, the CIA's former assistant secretary for operations, said Libby was "annoyed by reports that the administration had ignored evidence that its claims that Iraq sought nuclear fuel were wrong." Libby had "asked Grenier about former State Department official Joseph Wilson, who had investigated the claims about Iraq's nuclear intentions for the CIA. Grenier testified that he also told Libby that Wilson's wife, Valerie Plame, was a covert CIA official."

The Washington Post (1/25, A3, Leonnig, Goldstein, 690K) reports, "Summoned out of a meeting with the CIA director to take" Libby's "urgent call later that same afternoon," Grenier said "he relayed all he had learned about former ambassador Joseph C. Wilson IV, the man behind news reports of the trip that had Libby so concerned." Grenier said Wilson "had gone on a CIA-sponsored mission to check out intelligence that Iraq was trying to buy uranium for nuclear weapons and had concluded that the tip was unfounded," and he "told Libby, it appeared that Wilson's wife, a CIA officer, had suggested Wilson for the trip." The Post adds, "The timing of Grenier's response and Libby's anxiety over Wilson are central to the prosecution's allegation that Libby lied to investigators when he said that he believed he first learned CIA officer Valerie Plame's identity from NBC's Tim Russert a month later."

The New York Times (1/25, Lewis, 1.16M) reports prosecutors "paraded a roster of former government officials before the jury on Wednesday to testify that they had informed him about the identity of the C.I.A. operative Valerie Wilson, contrary to Mr. Libby's claim that he had learned about her weeks later from reporters." Libby's lawyers "spent their time cross-examining those witnesses in an effort to attack both their credibility and their memory." The "purpose of Mr. Grenier's testimony from the prosecutor's point of view was to cast doubt on Mr. Libby's account that he did not remember learning about Ms. Wilson from officials when he testified that he learned about her from journalists." But William H. Jeffress Jr., "one of Mr. Libby's lawyers, quickly set about taking apart Mr. Grenier's account. He noted that in his first appearance before a grand jury and in an interview with F.B.I. agents, Mr. Grenier did not say he had told Mr. Libby about Ms. Wilson." Libby's lawyers "seemed to have two agendas in mind. Not only did they want to underscore the fragility of memory — Mr. Libby has said that if he testified incorrectly about his conversations with reporters it was only because he simply remembered incorrectly — but also to create a vexing, lengthy and complicated narrative for the jury."

The Los Angeles Times (1/25, Schmitt, 850K) reports Libby's "defense against perjury charges, which rests in part on what he has described as innocent memory lapses, appeared to gain some ground Wednesday when his lawyers showed that two government witnesses in the case had memory issues of their own." Grenier, "questioned by Libby's lawyers, acknowledged that he initially told a federal grand jury in January 2004 that he did not believe he had shared information about the status of CIA operative Valerie Plame when he spoke with Libby weeks before she was identified in a newspaper column. But Grenier said he testified 18 months later in another grand jury appearance that he believed he had given Libby that information after all." Another official — Marc Grossman, "a former State Department undersecretary for political affairs — also testified Wednesday that he had discussed Plame with Libby but conceded there were discrepancies in the accounts that he had initially given FBI agents. Grossman said he could not account for the differences. "

Little "Known Evidence" To Support Libby Scapegoat Claim. The New York Times (1/25, Johnston, Rutenberg, 1.16M) reports "the assertion" by Libby attorneys "that White House aides had sacrificed him to protect Karl Rove, the senior political adviser, appears to be based primarily on Mr. Libby's own sense that the administration had failed to defend him adequately as the C.I.A. leak case unfolded." But there is "little known evidence to buttress the suggestion by Mr. Libby's defense team in his obstruction and perjury trial that unnamed White House officials were deliberately setting Mr. Libby up to be a scapegoat." The defense team's statements "set off a debate across Washington about whether they were part of a legal gambit to divert attention from the underlying charge that Mr. Libby lied to F.B.I. agents and the grand jury or whether his lawyers had evidence of an effort within the White House to focus the blame on Mr. Libby." Libby's lawyers have "so far offered few details about how he might have been set up as a fall guy for Mr. Rove. White House aides said little about the alleged rift on Wednesday, indicating they were prepared to grant their former colleague wide latitude to present an aggressive defense — even if it meant letting stand unanswered a story of intrigue and disloyalty involving President Bush's and Mr. Cheney's most trusted aides."

DOJ_NMG_0121176

Libby Trial May Intensify White House Factionalism. The White House Bulletin/US News (1/25) reports the "new accusations in the Lewis 'Scooter' Libby trial are opening a window on the pattern of infighting within the Bush White House, which has been mostly kept hidden from public view." Libby attorney, Theodore Wells, Jr., argued at Libby's perjury trial "that White House officials tried to protect political guru Karl Rove from legal damage in the Valerie Plame CIA leak case and attempted to make Libby the scapegoat. White House insiders say these allegations could intensify hard feelings between the Libby faction, led by Vice President Dick Cheney who was Libby's boss, and the Rove faction, led by President Bush."

Cheney Declines To Discuss Libby Trial. When asked about the trial of I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby on CNN's The Situation Room (1/24, Blitzer), Vice President Dick Cheney said, "I'm going to be a witness in that trial within a matter of weeks. I'm not going to discuss it. I haven't discussed it with anybody in the press yet; I'm not going to discuss it with you today. … I'm a strong friend and supporter of Scooter's. I have not contributed to his legal defense fund. I think he is an extraordinarily talented and capable individual."

Mayors Blame Federal Government For Crime Surge. USA Today (1/25, El Nasser) reports from Louisville, KY, "A minister who regularly conducts prayer vigils against violence and counsels crime victims is beaten by a gang of youths. Five people are shot and wounded at a community festival. A softball player is shot and wounded at a game, in front of 100 witnesses. One person is killed and four wounded in a shooting outside a funeral home as people gather for a wake." USA continues, "These crimes happened in very public settings here last year — two of them within 2 miles of the heart of this Ohio River city's downtown. Such incidents inevitably give communities the jitters, but cities are especially skittish now because the nation's violent crime rate is rising after more than a decade of decline, and the stakes are higher. … The drop in crime helped spark an urban revival that attracted thousands of residents and billions of dollars of investment to downtowns from Louisville to Miami, St. Louis and Denver. Now, city leaders across the nation are fearful that crime will kill the renaissance." USA adds, "For a city such as Louisville, where downtown is flourishing, keeping crime in check is paramount. More than $1 billion has been invested in the commercial heart of the city this decade. By 2010, at least another $1 billion is expected to come in. Five hotels are set to open, and the 2000 housing units now downtown are expected to double by 2009. … Rising crime 'has the potential of being damaging,' says Jerry Abramson, mayor of Louisville from 1985 to 1998. He was elected again in 2002 after Louisville merged with surrounding Jefferson County; he was re-elected in 2006. 'We all live day by day in terms of concern of some horrific thing happening in our central business district that would set us back.' … Murders and robberies continued to rise nationwide during the first six months of 2006, according to the FBI, and violent crime overall appears headed for a second straight year of increases. Mayors and police chiefs regularly assure the public that violent crimes still are confined mostly to poorer drug- and gang-infested areas, but they are sounding alarms:" USA notes, "Abramson and some other mayors also blame the federal government for cutting funding for crime prevention and phasing out a Clinton administration program that added 100,000 police officers nationwide. They say Washington's focus has shifted to homeland security at the expense of hometown security. … 'The consensus is that the federal government walked away from that partnership,' Abramson says. 'Crime all of a sudden begins to ratchet up but police on the street have ratcheted significantly down. We draw a correlation.' … Justice Department spokesman Brian Roehrkasse disagrees. 'The increase in violent crime in some areas does not appear to be related to federal spending for law enforcement,' he says. 'DOJ spending has never accounted for more than 4% of total spending on state and local law enforcement.'"

DOJ_NMG_0121177

Navy Contractor Jailed In Mexico On Kidnapping Charges. NBC San Diego (1/25) reports, "A San Diego man is in jail in Tijuana, accused of kidnapping a 12-year-old girl." NBC San Diego continues, "The U.S. Department of Justice confirmed that Tijuana police arrested Manuel Martinez, 41, on Monday. He is accused of abducting the girl outside a school. … According to police, Martinez pulled the girl into a burgundy Toyota truck with California license plates, tied her up and threatened to rape and kill her. Police found the truck and rescued her, officials said. They also found U.S. Navy credentials, a military knife and various sexual aids in the truck, police said. … Martinez is a civilian contractor working for the U.S. Navy, according to the Justice Department. He is being held on kidnapping, attempted murder and other charges."

DOJ Asked To Probe "Hounddog" Movie For Possible Porn Law Violations. The AP (1/25, Hummel) reports from Park City, UT, "At a festival that features several films with sexual content, including full male nudity and a documentary about bestiality, a Southern Gothic tale that includes the rape of a young girl is causing the biggest stir. … 'Hounddog' is the story of Lewellen, a girl played by 12-year-old Dakota Fanning, who is growing up in the 1960s South. She is a free spirit obsessed with Elvis Presley and has little supervision by her abusive father and alcoholic grandmother." The AP continues, "Even before the first screening of 'Hounddog' at the Sundance Film Festival this week, a Christian film critic, citing Fanning's age, decried the movie as child abuse, and Roman Catholic activist Bill Donohue called for a federal investigation. … Fanning is defending her work as well as the movie, and so is the head of Sundance, who said it was courageous for director Deborah Kampmeier to tackle 'challenging material.' 'Hounddog' is entered in the festival's dramatic category." The AP adds, "The disturbing scene lasts a few minutes, but is not graphic. There is no nudity, the scene is very darkly lit and only Fanning's face and hand are shown. … Ted Baehr, chairman of the Christian Film and Television Commission and publisher of the Web site movieguide.org, claims 'Hounddog' breaks federal child-pornography law. He said the law covers material that 'appears' to show minors engaging in sexually explicit conduct. … Donohue, president of the Catholic League for Religious and Civil Rights, said he has asked the U.S. Justice Department to investigate whether antipornography laws have been broken."

New Mexico Treasurer Sentenced To Prison For Extortion Plot. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (1/25, Korte) reports, "Former state Treasurer Robert Vigil was sentenced Wednesday to three years in federal prison for pressuring a contractor to hire the previous treasurer's wife, despite concerns that she was unqualified. Vigil, 53, was convicted in September of a single count of attempted extortion. Jurors acquitted him of 23 other counts of extortion and racketeering. Vigil remained free after sentencing, wearing an ankle monitoring bracelet, but the judge ordered him to report to prison within 60 days." The AP adds, "Vigil was also fined $97,000 and sentenced to three years of probation after his release."

FBI Arrests Memphis Police Officer On Money Laundering Charges. WMC-TV Memphis (1/24, Douglas) reported on its Web site from a broadcast story, "A Memphis Police officer was arrested Wednesday as a result of Operation Tarnished Blue." Officer Orlando Hebron allegedly "made several offers to launder money for an undercover informant. … Federal documents say that the informant agreed to give Hebron about $3,000 in cash. In exchange for the cash, Hebron promised to launder the money and return $2,400 of it in the form of a check." Hebron also allegedly "agreed to assist the informant in a robbery at a mini-storage last November where the informant says thousands of dollars in cash and two kilos of cocaine were stored. This time the informant gave Hebron $4,900 to launder." The Memphis Commercial Appeal (1/25, Conley, 163K) notes Hebron, "an officer since 1995 and currently assigned to Mitchell High School, was arrested by FBI agents Wednesday, after the return of a sealed indictment by a federal grand jury on Tuesday." He "Hebron is the 15th law enforcement officer snared in the FBI's ongoing investigation of police corruption dubbed 'Tarnished Blue.' Eight other officers have been charged in related anti-corruption operations in the past two years."

Neteller Co-Founder Vows To Fight US Charges. The Financial Times (1/25, Pimlott) reports, "John Lefebvre, the co-founder of Neteller who stands accused of laundering billions of dollars in illegal online gaming proceeds, plans to fight all of the charges against him, his lawyer said. 'He's going to be contesting everything we know about the charges right now,' said Vincent Marella, his attorney, outside the New York court where Mr Lefebvre was due to appear yesterday for a bail hearing." The Times adds, "The US justice department considers online gambling to be illegal although it is an established and regulated industry elsewhere in the world," and "some US lawyers have questioned whether criminal prosecutions are likely to be successful because the companies involved are not based on US soil."

DOJ_NMG_0121178

FBI Arrests UC Riverside Official On Bribery Charges. The Orange County Register (1/25, Carcamo) reports, "Officials arrested a man Wednesday on suspicion of federal bribery charges after prosecutors said he solicited bribes from an Irvine-based company, U.S. Attorney's officials reported. Federal prosecutors accuse Theodore Chiu, 53, of Riverside of receiving a series of bribes from and Irvine-based general contractor in charge of the construction of a psychology building on the campus of UC Riverside. FBI agents arrested Chiu on the campus after they said he met with the president of the Irvine-based FTR International Inc. Chiu is an associate director of design and construction at the university." The Register notes that "Chiu allegedly received $18,000 in bribes from FTR. The company and its president cooperated with FBI agents during the investigation, prosecutors said." The Los Angeles Times (1/25, 850K) also briefly reported on Chiu's arrest.

Federal Investigators Widening Pirro Probe. The New York Daily News (1/25, Standora, 729K) reports, "The feds have again widened their criminal probe of former Westchester District Attorney Jeanine Pirro - this time to see if she used the resources of her office in her failed campaign against Sen. Hillary Clinton, WNBC reported yesterday. FBI agents and local investigators are focusing on whether Republican Pirro or her staffers ran background checks on donors to her 2006 senatorial campaign using computers and databases at the DA's office, the station's Jonathan Dienst reported. A number of former members of Pirro's campaign have been questioned by investigators, he said." However, "Pirro spokesman Michael Edelman told the Daily News last night that Pirro had done nothing wrong, calling the probe 'nonsense.'"

Florida Man Convicted Of Defrauding Medicare With Stolen Patient IDs. The Naples Daily News (1/25, Freeman) reports, "A jury Wednesday convicted a Collier County man of stealing the identities of 1,130 patients at Cleveland Clinic Naples that were used to submit more than $7 million in false claims to Medicare, according to the U.S. Attorney's Office in Miami. Fernando Ferrer Jr. of Naples, a registered owner of Advanced Medical Claims in Naples, was convicted after a three-day trial in U.S. District Court in Fort Lauderdale on eight counts of conspiracy to defraud the U.S. government, computer fraud, wrongful disclosure of individual health information and aggravated identity theft." Ferrer and co-defendant Isis Machado "became the first individuals in South Florida convicted of criminal charges for violating the federal law protecting patients' privacy rights, known as the Health Insurance Portability and Accountability Act (HIPPA), according to the U.S. Justice Department."

The AP (1/25) notes Machado "worked as a front desk coordinator at Cleveland Clinic in Weston from May 2005 to June 2006. She downloaded patient files and then sold them to Ferrer, who then made false Medicare claims as owner of Advanced Medical Claims Inc. in Naples, the indictment said. Ferrer used the information to bill medical providers in Miami for services that were not rendered, resulting in $7 million fraudulently billed to Medicare, federal investigators said."

Chicago Investment Adviser Convicted Of Fraud. The Chicago Tribune (1/25, O'Connor, 617K) reports, "A former Chicago investment adviser whose business card touted him as 'Ambassador to Cash' was convicted Wednesday by a federal jury of conning an ailing woman out of more than a quarter million dollars. Jurors took about three hours to find Brian D. McGowan guilty on 18 counts of wire fraud and one count of investment-adviser fraud. During the nearly three-week trial, testimony by the mother of Michael Jordan and that of athletes with ties to Chicago denied claims by McGowan that he had managed their financial affairs. Following the verdict, U.S. District Senior Judge John Grady said McGowan's testimony was the most egregious perjury he had seen in more than three decades on the bench."

The Chicago Sun-Times (1/25) notes McGowan "tricked Camille La Mie, 63, into handing over the bulk of her wealth by boasting that his clients included Michael Jordan's mother and former NBA star Tim Hardaway. Prosecutors said McGowan used some of La Mie's money to pay his own bills. McGowan's attorney argued that La Mie, formerly of Chicago, was angry with McGowan because he'd failed to hide her income from the government. She then proceeded to set up McGowan, defense attorney Robert Gorence argued."

DOJ_NMG_0121179

New York Man Pleads Guilty To Scamming $200,000 From Priests. The New York Times (1/25, 1.16M) reports, "Robert Riggio of Manhattan, who was charged with defrauding more than 60 priests over several years, pleaded guilty to wire fraud in Federal District Court yesterday, prosecutors said." US Attorney Michael Garcia "said that Mr. Riggio stole more than $200,000 from 2004 to 2006 by calling priests with bogus pleas for help and requests for money. The funds often came from the priests' personal savings, Mr. Garcia said. Mr. Riggio was arrested in September after he asked for money from an F.B.I. agent posing as the niece of a priest who had been defrauded, Mr. Garcia said."

Former BLA Members Were Living "Comparatively Quiet Lives." The AP (1/25, Curtis) reports, "They'd long since exchanged the radical idealism of their youth for comparatively quiet lives as janitors, job counselors and Little League coaches. They'd become husbands, fathers and grandfathers. But memories of a violent era in American history came rushing back this week when eight men with ties to the Black Panther Party were arrested in the 1971 killing of a San Francisco police officer." The AP notes, "Two years after the killing," alleged lookouts John Bowman and Harold Taylor "were arrested in New Orleans. But a judge dismissed the charges in 1976 because the men had allegedly been tortured by San Francisco police officers during an interrogation. Over three days, the men said, they were stripped, blindfolded and beaten." Bowman and Taylor "went public, speaking to activist and community groups from Boston to Chicago and vowing to dedicate the rest of their lives to stopping torture. … Two defense lawyers said Wednesday they believe the new charges are retaliation for the former Panthers' public statements." In a story also largely sympathetic toward the suspects, the San Francisco Chronicle (1/25, A1, Fulbright, Bulwa, 384K) reports on local reaction to the arrests, under the headline "Stunned Friends Laud The Men They Know Now."

Defense Lawyers Expect Former BLA Member To Be Key US Witness. The San Francisco Chronicle (1/25, Van Derbeken, 384K) reports, "More than 30 years ago, Ruben Scott testified against his alleged Black Liberation Army brethren in the slaying of two New York City police officers. Now, defense attorneys suspect, Scott will be alone among the former militants to testify against his one-time confederates, who were charged Tuesday in the 1971 slaying of San Francisco police Sgt. John Young and a larger conspiracy to kill police. While state prosecutors won't say whether Scott will take the witness stand, defense attorneys say he is the only insider whose testimony has ever been used to convict BLA members of a crime. And he is the only former BLA member previously indicted in the slaying of Young whom prosecutors have chosen not to name again in the current case. The charges against him were dismissed in 1976."

Convicted Cop Killer Had Stolen Pennsylvania Man's ID. The AP (1/25, Kates) reports John T. Healy, of Yardley, Pa., "has endured a nightmare over the past two weeks after learning that the man who apparently stole his identity two years ago was charged with -- and ultimately convicted of -- killing an upstate New York police officer." The AP notes, "The man authorities prosecuted under the name John Healy was convicted Monday of second-degree murder for his role in the death of New Hartford Police Officer Joseph Corr following a million-dollar jewelry store robbery. … FBI Special Agent Jerri Williams in Philadelphia said Wednesday that the defendant is known to her agency as Toussaint Martin, 38, formerly of Philadelphia. He has been 'known to law enforcement for a number of years' and was a suspect in other jewelry store robberies when he was caught in New York, she said."

Coke Formula Theft Trial Delayed By Dispute Over Sensitive Documents. The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (1/25, Stanford, 379K) reports, "The judge in the Coke secrets trial sent the jury home Wednesday morning so attorneys could haggle over how to handle sensitive documents the company says contain proprietary trade information. Coke's lawyers and prosecutors had thought the judge was going to seal hundreds of pages of Coca-Cola documents from public view, showing them only to jurors who would be sworn to secrecy. But U.S. District Court Judge J. Owen Forrester told the lawyers they misunderstood his intentions. He said he had agreed to seal only two documents. That sent Coke's lawyers into a tizzy." The AJC adds, "The judge also admonished federal prosecutors for allowing the defense attorney to deal directly with Coke's lawyers. … 'You and you only are responsible for the representation you make to this court' about the introduction of evidence."

DOJ_NMG_0121180

The AP (1/25, Clark) reports, "A government prosecutor asked for a recess to review more than 750 pages of defense documents to determine whether portions should be redacted before being shown to the jury." Forrester "granted the recess until 11 a.m. Thursday," when defendant Joya Williams' former boss, Coke executive Javier Sanchez Lamelas, "is expected to return to the stand." On Tuesday, Lamelas testified "that there was no reason for Williams to bring confidential Coca-Cola documents to her home." Bloomberg News (1/25) also briefly reports on the recess.

Duncan "Confession" To FBI Insufficient To Bring Murder Charges. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (1/25, Johnson) reports, "A convicted murderer's statements to the FBI about the deaths of two young girls in Washington are not sufficient to bring criminal charges in the deaths, though the man remains 'a viable person of interest' in the slayings, investigators said Wednesday. Federal prosecutors in Idaho said Tuesday that Joseph Edward Duncan III had confessed to the Washington killings and the slaying of a California boy in statements to the FBI after he was arrested in July 2005 with an Idaho girl who had vanished seven weeks earlier." The AP adds, "Though Duncan's statements revealed some knowledge of the case, he could have gleaned it from a fellow inmate or elsewhere, King County sheriff's spokesman Sgt. John Urquhart said. … 'Characterizing what Duncan said as a "confession" has a huge impact on the family,' Urquhart said. 'They think the case has been solved and that we know who killed their kids. But we don't know that for sure, and we continue to investigate.'"

Federal Prosecutors Reveal Deal With Jeffs Over Seized Documents. The Deseret Morning News (1/25, Winslow) reports, "Federal prosecutors say they have struck a deal with Fundamentalist LDS Church leader Warren Jeffs over documents, letters and other evidence seized when he was arrested. That deal voids any claims Jeffs has that the documents are privileged communications between the polygamist leader and his followers, the U.S. Attorney's Office for Utah said in a motion asking a federal judge to dismiss the evidence-dispute case in Nevada." The Deseret News adds, "In an affidavit obtained by the Deseret Morning News on Wednesday, an FBI agent revealed more details about Jeffs' arrest. Conflicting stories raised suspicions about a man in the car who identified himself as 'John Findley.' … After getting the driver's consent to search, the trooper found envelopes addressed to 'President Jeffs' and two yellow envelopes containing cash, debit cards and tools. FBI agents arrived on the scene and spoke to "John Findley," who admitted he was Warren Jeffs."

Closing Arguments Made At Federal Abortion Murder Trial. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (1/25, Thompson) reports, "Anti-abortion extremist James Kopp made a last attempt Wednesday to convince jurors he didn't mean to kill a doctor he shot, while a prosecutor countered there are 'no do-overs' when shooting someone. The two sides presented their closing arguments in Kopp's trial on charges he violated the federal Freedom of Access to Clinic Entrances Act by killing Dr. Barnett Slepian with a single shot from a Russian military rifle in 1998." The AP notes, "After the Oct. 23, 1998, shooting, Kopp fled to Mexico, Ireland and finally France, where he was captured in March 2001. He was added — along with Osama bin Laden — to the FBI's list of the Ten Most Wanted fugitives in June 1999. Jurors deliberated about an hour Wednesday before being sent home after asking to review testimony concerning the timeline of the shooting."

Texas Man Sentenced To 10 Months In Prison For Red Cross Relief Fraud. The AP (1/25) reports, "A Dallas man who used stolen Hurricane Katrina debit cards is joining two of his siblings in prison over the same scam, authorities said. Abram Wesley Hines, 25, was sentenced Wednesday to 10 months behind bars, the U.S. attorney's office said." The trio "admitted stealing at least 80 Red Cross debit cards meant for victims of Katrina." Brian Hines "was sentenced to 30 months and ordered to make nearly $203,000 in restitution," and Charmaine Denise Hines "was sentenced to 41 months in prison and ordered to repay more than $23,000."

NC Bar Brings Ethics Charges Against Prosecutor In Duke Case. USA Today (1/25, Koch)

DOJ_NMG_0121181

reports, "Mike Nifong, whose prosecution of three Duke University lacrosse players on rape and sexual misconduct charges has faced growing criticism, has been hit with a second set of misconduct charges." USA continues, "In a complaint filed Wednesday, the North Carolina State Bar accused Durham County District Attorney Nifong of withholding evidence from the defense and making misleading statements in court. It charged him last month with violating rules of professional conduct by making misleading and inflammatory statements to reporters about the athletes, who were suspended from the university." USA adds, "Duke permitted two of the athletes, Reade Seligmann and Collin Finnerty, to return to school this month, following the dismissal Dec. 22 of rape charges, the most serious charges against them. The third defendant, David Evans, has graduated. All three say they are innocent. … The expanded ethics complaint, which says Nifong's actions amount to a 'systematic abuse of prosecutorial discretion,' could lead to his disbarment, says L. Thomas Lunsford II, the state bar's executive director."

The New York Times (1/25, Wilson) reports, "The new charges added to a previous ethics complaint accusing Mr. Nifong of making false and prejudicial remarks about the case to the news media. A three-member independent panel is expected to hear the matter against him this summer. Penalties could include disbarment." The Times adds, "Mr. Nifong's lawyer, David B. Freedman, denied yesterday that there had been 'any sort of intentional unethical conduct.' In a telephone interview, Mr. Freedman said that Mr. Nifong had a 'flawless record' for ethics in 28 years as a prosecutor and that a written response, to be issued within 30 days, would give his side of the case."

Mortgage Fraud On The Rise Across The Nation. USA Today (1/25, Knox) reports from Leavenworth, KS, "When Brent Barber tells you -- and he's about to -- how easy it is to steal your house out from under you, or take your money and ruin your credit, even while he's sitting in prison, you'd better listen. … A one-time millionaire with a house on a golf course, Barber was sentenced in October to 12 years in prison for masterminding the largest mortgage fraud ever prosecuted in Missouri, and most other states too, the FBI says. He pleaded guilty to a five-year scam that involved nearly 300 properties in Kansas City, Mo., and victimized more than 80 people." USA continues, "Nationally, mortgage fraud has spread in the past few years, with losses totaling around $1 billion last year, the FBI says. The real estate boom, along with looser lending standards, built an ideal breeding ground for smooth-talking con artists like Barber. Those hurt by fraud are not only lenders, but also the thousands of other homeowners who pay higher interest rates as a result, and the neighborhoods where foreclosures depress property values, invite crime and drain city resources. … Florida is the No. 1 hot spot for mortgage fraud, followed by Utah, Georgia, Colorado, Illinois and Missouri (chart, right)." USA adds, "Fraud cases are likely to continue rising this year and next, the Mortgage Asset Research Institute says. That's because fraud has become harder to hide in today's slower housing market, when lenders have more time to review applications and appraisals. And because fraudulent loans tend to fall into foreclosure after about three years, many bad loans from the real estate boom have yet to surface."

Prosecutors Want DeLay Charge Reinstated. The AP (1/25, Shannon) reports, "Prosecutors attempting to restore a conspiracy charge against former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay argued Wednesday that the 'plain language' of Texas law means he can be charged with conspiring to violate the election code." But "lawyers for DeLay and two co-defendants told the Court of Criminal Appeals the law is clear in their view -- that conspiracy was added to the state election code after prosecutors allege the crime happened." Travis County District Attorney Ronnie Earle's office "is appealing lower court rulings that threw out the charge accusing DeLay and Republican fundraisers Jim Ellis and John Colyandro of conspiring to violate the Texas election code and its ban on corporate campaign contributions. It could be weeks or months before the appeals court makes a decision."

NYTimes Criticizes Mandatory Sentencing Laws. The New York Times (1/25, 1.16M) says in an editorial that the US "is paying a heavy price for the mandatory sentencing fad that swept the country 30 years ago. After a tenfold increase in the nation's prison population — and a corrections price tag that exceeds $60 billion a year — the states have often been forced to choose between building new prisons or new schools. Worse still, the country has created a growing felon caste, now more than 16 million strong, of felons and ex-felons, who are often driven back to prison by policies that make it impossible for them to find jobs, housing or education." The "only real way to reduce the inmate population — and the felon class — is to ensure that imprisonment is a method of last resort. That means abandoning the mandatory sentencing laws that have filled prisons to bursting with nonviolent offenders who are doomed to remain trapped at the very margins of society."

DOJ_NMG_0121182

CIVIL LAW:

PBS&J Settles Contract Claims With DOJ For $6.4 Million. The Miami Herald (1/25, Danner, Christensen) reports, "The embezzlement by three former employees at engineering firm PBS&J continues to cost the firm: PBS&J paid more than $6.4 million to settle claims it overcharged the federal government on 'hundreds of contracts,' the Justice Department announced." The Herald continues, "The overbilling, the government said, arose from a $36 million embezzlement scheme perpetrated by PBS&J's former chief financial officer and two underlings between 1992 and 2005. … The embezzlement involved shifting funds and fabricating entries in the company's books to cover up the scheme and resulted in PBS&J's audited overhead rates being overstated, the Justice Department said in a statement. Overhead includes items like management salaries, rent, insurance and benefits." The Herald adds, "The settlement resolves claims that PBS&J violated the False Claims Act. … The three former PBS&J employees, ex-CFO W. Scott DeLoach, Maria A. Garcia and Rosario Licata, each pleaded guilty in September to their roles in the embezzlement. They are scheduled to be sentenced next month. … Joining the Justice Department in the civil investigation of PBS&J were the Office of the Inspector General for the Department of Transportation and the Defense Contract Audit Agency. … 'Companies that enter into contracts with the government must maintain accounting controls and procedures that ensure that the costs and rates that they submit to the government are accurate,' said Peter D. Keisler, assistant attorney general of the civil division in Washington."

Winners Of FBI Wrongful Death Suit Drop Additional Claims Against Agents. The Boston Globe (1/25, Murphy, 413K) reports, "It took 22 years for the family of slain Quincy fisherman John McIntyre to prove that the FBI's mishandling of longtime informants James 'Whitey' Bulger and Stephen 'The Rifleman' Flemmi caused his brutal killing in 1984. But after winning a landmark $3.2 million wrongful death suit against the government in September, lawyers for McIntyre's mother and brother notified a judge yesterday that they are dropping additional claims they had made against six retired FBI agents. 'We proved what we wanted to prove,' said McIntyre's brother, Christopher, adding that he and his mother want to get on with their lives and weren't up for another drawn-out legal battle that would once again rehash his brother's murder." The Globe notes, "US District Judge Reginald C. Lindsay…had yet to rule on the agents' assertions that federal law barred the McIntyres from seeking damages from them, since they had already won a damages claim against the government."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Former Deputy Charged With 1964 Racial Murders. The AP (1/25, Pettus, Jordan) reports from Jackson, MS, "A white former sheriff's deputy who was once thought to be dead was arrested on federal charges Wednesday in one of the last major unsolved crimes of the civil rights era — the 1964 killings of two black men who were beaten and dumped alive into the Mississippi River." The AP continues, "The break in the 43-year-old case was largely the result of the dogged efforts of the older brother of one of the victims, who vowed to bring the killers to justice. … James Ford Seale, a 71-year-old reputed Ku Klux Klansman from the town of Roxie, was charged with kidnapping hitchhikers Charles Eddie Moore and Henry Hezekiah Dee, both 19. … The victims' weighted, badly decomposed bodies were found by chance two months later in July 1964, during the search for three civil rights workers whose disappearance and deaths in Philadelphia, Miss., got far more attention from the media and the FBI. … Seale is expected to be arraigned Thursday in Jackson." The AP adds, "The arrest marked the latest attempt by prosecutors in the South to close the books on crimes from the civil rights era that went unpunished. In recent years, authorities in Mississippi and Alabama have won convictions in the 1963 assassination of NAACP activist Medgar Evers; the 1963 Birmingham, Ala., church bombing that killed four black girls; and the 1964 Philadelphia, Miss., slayings. … The U.S. Justice Department reopened the case after The Clarion-Ledger of Jackson uncovered documents indicating that the beatings had occurred in the Homochitto National Forest, giving the FBI jurisdiction. But the case languished until Seale was located."

DOJ_NMG_0121183

USA Today (1/25, Mitchell) reports, "Since 1989, Mississippi and six other states have re-examined 29 killings, leading to 22 convictions, most recently in 2005 when a Neshoba County jury convicted Edgar Ray Killen of manslaughter for orchestrating the Klan's killings of three civil rights workers, James Chaney, Andrew Goodman and Michael Schwerner. … 'We are extremely pleased to see that the federal government is truly committed to taking care of its unfinished business from the civil rights era,' said Alvin Sykes, a Kansas City activist whose work helped lead to the reinvestigation of the 1955 killing of Emmet Till. … The Till case may be presented to a grand jury later this year." USA adds, "Sykes is now pushing legislation that would create a cold cases unit within the Justice Department to track down unpunished killers from the civil rights era. 'When Congress passes the Till bill, you can best believe there will be a lot more perpetrators from that era who will be facing the bar of justice for the lynchings they thought they got away with many years ago,' Sykes said."

The New York Times (1/25, Dewan) reports, "The charges against Mr. Seale, some seven years after the Federal Bureau of Investigation reopened the case, are the latest in a string of prosecutions of racially motivated slayings from the 1950s and '60s. While virtually all the prosecutions so far have proved successful, investigators have long warned that every passing year makes it more difficult to build a case." The Times continues, "Many of those killings became nationally infamous, like the murder of three civil rights workers — James Chaney, Andrew Goodman and Michael Schwerner — portrayed decades later in the movie 'Mississippi Burning.' But like dozens of lynchings in that era, the deaths of the two victims in this case, Henry H. Dee and Charles E. Moore, both 19, were far more obscure. … The discovery of their bodies, in the Old River near Natchez, Miss., attracted attention mainly because it was initially thought that they might be those of two of the three missing rights workers, who, as the nation looked on, were being sought by federal agents, dozens of volunteers and 400 Navy sailors." The Times notes, "Still, the F.B.I. took on the Dee-Moore case, and in November 1964 Mr. Seale, the son of a chapter leader of the White Knights of the Ku Klux Klan, and another man, Charles M. Edwards, were arrested. Local authorities never prosecuted them, however, even though Mr. Edwards, according to the case file, had told federal agents that he, Mr. Seale and others had beaten Mr. Dee and Mr. Moore, who, Mr. Edwards said, were alive when he left them."

WLOX-TV, Biloxi, Gulfport, Pascagoula, MS (1/24, 10:00 p.m.) broadcasted, "71-year old James Seale is expected to be arraigned tomorrow in Jackson. US Attorney Dunn Lampton, who led the investigation, along with Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and FBI Director Robert Mueller will be holding a news conference tomorrow in Washington.

Federal, State Authorities To Monitor Police-Involved Shootings In Georgia. In Tucker, Georgia, the AP (1/24) reported that newly appointed DeKalb County Police Chief Terrell Bolton "said Wednesday that reducing the number of police-involved shootings is his top priority, and said federal and state authorities will now be called to the scene to monitor those incidents. … GBI and DEA agents will respond to police-involved shootings as they happen, working as monitors and reporting inappropriate behavior to DeKalb superior officers."

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (1/25, Simpson) reports DeKalb "apparently will be the first major metro Atlanta police department to bring state and federal officials to shooting scenes to observe the police investigation. … Bolton said the GBI and DEA agreed to his request to supply investigators who will be trained in DeKalb procedures so that they can go to shooting scenes."

Cleveland Police Officer Under Probe For Allegedly Beating Drug Suspect. The Cleveland Plain Dealer (1/25, Puente) reports, "A Cleveland police officer is under investigation over allegations he beat a suspected drug dealer to find out where he hid a package of cocaine." The Plain Dealer continues, "Narcotics Detective Jamal Ansari, a 22-year-veteran, is accused of dragging Damon Alexander, while handcuffed, around his Shaker Heights home last April until Alexander told him where he hid the cocaine. … Ansari is being investigated by the Cleveland police Internal Affairs unit, the U.S. Justice Department and the federal Drug Enforcement Administration." The Plain Dealer adds, "Alexander testified in a federal court hearing in November that Ansari repeatedly punched him in the face, kicked him in the chest and slammed his head into walls with enough force to break drywall, federal court records say. Alexander suffered cuts and bruises on his chest, and doctors gave him an electrocardiogram, according to court records. … Ansari testified that he hit Alexander 15 to 25 times to gain control of him even though he was handcuffed. But U.S. District Judge James Gwin did not believe Ansari. … 'This testimony is not credible,' Gwin wrote in a ruling last month. … Gwin also ruled Ansari violated Alexander's constitutional rights by continuing to question Alexander after his request for a lawyer."

DOJ_NMG_0121184

Testimony Begins In Former Agent's Discrimination Suit Against FBI. The Minneapolis Star Tribune (1/25, Browning, 395K) reports, "Ex-FBI agent Jane Turner spent more than five years fighting to get her case against her former employer into federal court, and on Wednesday she told a jury in Minneapolis about what she said was a plot to wreck her career as retribution for a sexual discrimination complaint she filed against her boss in 1998." However, Assistant US Attorney Martha Fagg said of Turner in her opening argument, "She was seriously burned out. She just stopped working." Fagg added that "FBI supervisors didn't try to sideline Turner," and "to salvage her career, she said, they transferred her from an outpost in Minot, N.D., to Minneapolis, where they tried to help her get back on track." The Star Tribune notes Turner "testified…that she had never had an unsatisfactory job review until after she filed a sexual harassment complaint against her supervisor, Senior Supervisory Agent Craig Welkin." Meanwhile, "Assistant U.S. Attorney Clare Hochhalter testified that he never saw Turner 'stop working,'" and she "offered strong praise for Turner's investigative and interrogation skills."

Port Chester, NY, Challenges DOJ Suit On Election System. The New York Journal News (1/25, Sadler) reports that the village of Port Chester, NY, "filed court papers yesterday that pick apart the federal lawsuit that accuses its election system of illegally suppressing the Hispanic vote." The News continues, "In the papers, the village asked U.S. District Judge Stephen Robinson to deny the government's request to block the March 20 election for two seats on the Board of Trustees. … 'There will be irreparable harm if the election does not go forward,' the papers say. The village contends that the move could disenfranchise voters in the March mayoral election and that 'government may come to an effective standstill due to the expiring terms of current members.'" The News adds, "The papers were filed in response to a lawsuit filed by the Justice Department in December claiming that the village's 'at- large' method of electing its six trustees violates the federal Voting Rights Act. … Though nearly half of the village's 28,000 residents and 22 percent of its eligible voters are Hispanic, no Hispanic has ever been elected to village office." The News notes, "The Justice Department is asking the judge to replace Port Chester's at-large system with one in which trustees are elected from six districts. … It has presented a proposal for voting districts, including a majority Hispanic ward. … But the village is questioning the validity of the proposed Hispanic district because the estimated number of Hispanic residents is only eight higher than the number of non-Hispanic residents, fewer than the margin of error, it claims."

NAACP Criticizes Medicare For Not Covering Heart Drug For Blacks. The Wall Street Journal (1/25, A20, Winstein, 2.04M) reports an NAACP official "condemned Medicare for declining to promote insurance coverage of a cardiac medication for African-Americans, in a letter that blamed government policy for disparity in the treatment of blacks with heart failure." The "sharply worded letter, addressed to the Boston regional office of the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services, or CMS, detailed tension between the local arm of the civil-rights organization and the agency over BiDil, the only drug approved for use by a single race." BiDil has "been shown to reduce deaths in blacks with congestive heart failure by about 40% a year, but NitroMed says it is used by only about 2% of the 750,000 African-Americans who have the condition." But many groups, "including the American Heart Association and the American College of Cardiology, say there is no evidence that the medication, which costs insurers roughly $1,400 to $2,800 a year to offer to a customer, works any better than its two generic parts -- isosorbide dinitrate and hydralazine -- taken separately."

ANTITRUST:

Senators Ponder Implications Of Airline Merger. The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (1/25, Geewax, 379K) reports, "Appearing at a packed hearing before the Senate Commerce Committee Wednesday, Delta Air Lines CEO Gerald Grinstein said both workers and consumers will suffer if US Airways' takeover bid for Delta succeeds. 'Delta does not need to be acquired to be saved,' Grinstein declared in an overstuffed hearing room ringed by Delta pilots, standing ramrod straight in their black uniforms."

The Wall Street Journal (1/25, Trottman, Dade, 2.04M) reports members of the Senate committee "expressed strong skepticism that sweeping consolidation in the US airline industry would be good for consumers and were particularly unenthused about US Airways Group Inc.'s $9.8 billion hostile bid for Delta Air Lines Inc. A three-hour hearing was punctuated by testiness as US Airways Chairman and Chief Executive Doug Parker defended the Tempe, Ariz., carrier's takeover offer, which was condemned by Gerald Grinstein, Delta's CEO, who insisted that the Atlanta airline would be best to emerge from bankruptcy on its own later this year." The Journal adds, "Despite a grilling from lawmakers on the Senate Committee on Commerce, Science and Transportation, the hearing was somewhat anticlimactic because in recent days the official committee of Delta creditors appears to have been shying away from the US Airways bid, according to people familiar with the situation. … One of the biggest concerns by committee members is that a merger could force Delta to remain in bankruptcy while a deal is ironed out and that resistance by Delta executives could derail the process."

DOJ_NMG_0121185

USA Today (1/25, 4B, Adams, 2.27M) reports, "From the start, the tone of the hearing was critical. Many of the committee members hail from largely rural states -- Alaska, Minnesota, Maine, West Virginia, North Dakota -- and worried aloud that consolidation would reduce service to cities in their states." And the Washington Post (1/25, D1, Wilber, 690K) says "senators from Maine to Mississippi expressed skepticism. 'The inevitable will happen, which is to say that we're going to, you know, lose service and also, I think, [the outcome will] result in higher prices,' said Sen. Olympia Snowe (R-Maine)." Sens. Byron L. Dorgan and Trent Lott "said they did not think the merger would help their residents and were not pleased by the hostile nature of the bid."

The Financial Times (1/25, Kirchgaessner, Cameron) reports, "Washington lawmakers on both sides of the aisle on Wednesday expressed deep scepticism about US Airways' $9.8bn hostile bid for Delta." The Times continues, "The poor reception for the deal in Congress raises significant questions about the future of the proposed transaction. The airline merger would lead to a wave of consolidation that would cut sharply the number of national carriers in the US, the lawmakers said. … In a small, packed hearing room to discuss the prospects of the deal, some Democratic and Republican senators appeared unconvinced by promises from Doug Parker, chief executive of US Airways, that the proposed deal, which would create the largest US carrier, would not lead to cuts in service, large-scale redundancies or increased fares." The Times adds, "While Congress does not have a formal say in deciding whether the deal could move forward, lawmakers – particularly those representing rural states – could put political pressure on both the airline industry and the Justice Department, which would review the deal on antitrust grounds. Although the White House has been largely hands-off on merger reviews, the Justice Department blocked a proposed merger between United and US Airways in 2001. … Andrew Steinberg, assistant secretary for aviation at the Department of Transportation, which would likely confer with antitrust authorities on the deal, declined to comment on the US Airways case, but presented mixed signals on where the Bush administration might stand on the issue."

Delta CEO Denies Merger Plans. The Detroit News (1/25, Shepardson) reports, "Delta Air Lines CEO Gerald Grinstein told Congress Wednesday the airline isn't interested in merging with US Airways or with Northwest Airlines, the largest carrier at Detroit Metropolitan Airport. … 'One such rumor is that Delta is negotiating a merger or similar deal with Northwest. One point we want to make very clear: We are not negotiating any such deal with Northwest,' Grinstein said in prepared testimony before the Senate Commerce, Science and Transportation committee." The News continues, "The hearing was called to discuss the potential impact of airline mergers and industry consolidation. … 'In the face of US Airways' hostile takeover bid, our Official Creditors Committee asked us to help gather information about potential strategic alternatives from other airlines, including Northwest.'" The News adds, "Grinstein said that to fulfill that request, the airline 'recently retained an investment banker to obtain that information, a far cry from negotiating a merger. We are compiling this information, but there has not been any negotiation regarding a merger or similar deal with Northwest or any other airline.' … Grinstein heavily criticized US Airways' $10 billion-plus hostile takeover bid, saying it would never be approved by the Justice Department. Analysts have noted that there is a great deal of overlap between the two carriers' route structure, and that a merger could result in the elimination of many duplicative flights."

CME To Dominate Leadership Of Merger CME-CBOT. The AP (1/25, Wisnefski, Packowitz) reports, "Chicago Mercantile Exchange Holdings Inc. and CBOT Holdings Inc. Wednesday named those who will be on their post-merger management team, with CME executives dominating the leadership roster." The AP continues, "The exchanges also said they 'believe they are on track' to complete the merger by mid-2007, noting that 'significant milestones' have been reached recently. The two largest U.S. futures exchanges cited, as examples, the filing in December of a registration statement with the Securities and Exchange Commission, and decisions made regarding a high-level organizational structure and a senior leadership team." The AP adds, "As previously announced, CME Chief Executive Craig Donohue will be CEO of the merged company, to be known as CME Group. CME Executive Chairman Terry Duffy will retain that role in the merged group, and CBOT Chairman Charles Carey will serve as CME Group vice chairman. Also as previously disclosed, CBOT CEO Bernard Dan will serve as a special advisor to the combined company for one year after the merger closes. … The only current CBOT executive who will be on the CME Group's management team is Bryan Durkin, who will serve as chief operating officer. Durkin, who currently serves as CBOT's chief operating officer and has been with the exchange since 1982, will be responsible for overseeing the transition of CBOT's electronically traded products to CME's Globex platform and the transition of CME trading floor operations to the CBOT facility."

DOJ_NMG_0121186

Competition Abroad Seen As Leveling Playing Field For Financial Markets. The Wall Street Journal (1/25, A1, lp, Scannell, Solomon, 2.04M) reports, "Prominent figures in the U.S." such as Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson and former White House economic adviser Glenn Hubbard "are warning that the nation's financial markets have been handicapped by post-Enron regulatory overreach." Their "key evidence is data suggesting that U.S. stock markets are increasingly unattractive places for companies to list shares." Yet this position, "which has gone largely unchallenged, downplays a different explanation for why U.S. exchanges are under pressure -- the changing nature of global finance. Stock markets around the world have become better and deeper, encouraging companies to seek IPOs in their home market. Trading across borders has become simpler, cutting the prestige and usefulness of a big-country listing everywhere. And private-equity buyouts are a global phenomenon, not a uniquely American one." Meanwhile, other countries "are stiffening their own rules, bringing them closer to the U.S. model."

Juror Dismissed From Iowa Microsoft Trial. The AP (1/25, Pitt) reports from Des Moines, IA, "A juror was dismissed Wednesday for undisclosed reasons from the class-action antitrust lawsuit against Microsoft Corp." The AP continues, "The dismissal leaves 11 jurors to review allegations that Microsoft used anticompetitive practices that caused thousands of Iowans to pay more for the company's software than they would have otherwise. … Judge Scott Rosenberg said he considered the dismissal a personal matter and would not say why the juror was dismissed." The AP adds, "Plaintiffs attorneys Roxanne Conlin and Richard Hagstrom said juror dismissals are not unusual in lengthy trials. … 'It will not affect our case,' they said in a statement Wednesday." The AP notes, "Rich Wallis, a Microsoft lawyer, said he does not anticipate any other dismissals, though he expects the remaining jurors will be in court longer than the six months initially predicted. … Seven men and five women were seated Nov. 21 to hear the case in Polk County District Court. They began hearing opening statements Dec. 1."

Italian Fuel Refiner Denies Price-Fixing Scheme. The AP (1/25) reports, "ERG SpA, Italy's biggest independent refiner, denied on Wednesday it had conspired to fix retail fuel prices, in a statement released one day after the country's antitrust regulator started an investigation." The AP continues, "The Italian Competition Authority opened an inquiry into whether nine of the biggest oil companies agreed gasoline prices in the country's service station network, limiting competition and keeping prices at the pump at one of the highest levels in the European Union." The AP adds, "The companies being investigated are Eni SpA, the Italian units of Royal Dutch Shell PLC, Total SA and ExxonMobil Corp., as well as Kuwait Petroleum Italia SpA, Tamoil SpA, local firms ERG SpA, Anonima Petroli Italiana SpA, or API, and IP SpA. Privately-held API bought IP from Eni in 2005. … ERG said it had a 'total lack of involvement' with the alleged price fixing of gasoline and diesel. Eni declined to comment."

EU Expands Anti-Cartel Efforts With Fines. AFP (1/25) reports, "EU antitrust chief Neelie Kroes stepped up her anti-cartel crusade, hitting 11 companies with a record fine for fixing prices and carving up the market in electrical generation equipment." AFP continues, "After bumper fines in 2006, the EU competition watchdog demanded ABB, Alstom, Areva, Fuji, Hitachi Japan AE Power Systems, Mitsubishi Electric Corporation, Schneider, Siemens, Toshiba and VA

DOJ_NMG_0121187

Tech pay 750 million euros (972 million dollars) for running a cartel. … The total fine was the second biggest EU regulators have imposed in a cartel case after slapping 855 million euros in penalties on eight vitamin makers in 2001. That fine was later reduced to 790 million euros by an EU court." AFP adds, "Siemens was told to pay 418 million euros (543 million dollars) for its leading role, the biggest fine EU regulators have ever slapped on a single company for participating in a cartel. … 'The Commission has put an end to a cartel which has cheated public utility companies and consumers for more than 16 years,' EU Competition Commissioner Kroes said. … She has made cracking down on cartels a top priority and last year imposed fines totalling 1.8 billion euros against the illegal clubs, a new annual record for regulators at the European Commission."

Norway Rebuffs Apple's ITunes. The Financial Times (1/25, Ibison, Terazono, Waters) reports, "Apple was dealt a blow in Europe on Wednesday when Norway's powerful consumer ombudsman ruled that its iTunes online music store was illegal because it did not allow downloaded songs to be played on rival technology companies' devices." The Times continues, "The decision is the first time any jurisdiction has concluded iTunes breaks its consumer protection laws and could prompt other European countries to review the situation. … The ombudsman has set a deadline of October 1 for the Apple to make its codes available to other technology companies so that it abides by Norwegian law. If it fails to do so, it will be taken to court, fined and eventually closed down." The Times adds, "Apple, whose iTunes dominates the legal download market, has its proprietory system Fairplay. Songs and tunes downloaded through iTunes are designed to work with Apple's MP3 player iPod, but cannot be played on rival devices. … Torgeir Waterhouse, senior adviser to the Norwegian Consumer Council, who originally launched the complaint, told the Financial Times he was in negotiations with pan-European consumer groups to present a unified position on iTunes' legality. … Sweden and Finland have already backed Norway's stance, but have yet to take action, and Mr Waterhouse said the campaign was joined on Wednesday by Germany and France."

Siemens To Buy UGS For $3.5 Billion. The Financial Times (1/25, Saigol, Milne, Buck, Politi) reports, "Siemens, Europe's largest engineering group, is set to strengthen its core automation division by paying about $3.5bn to buy private equity-owned UGS as it seeks to show it has not been paralysed by bribery allegations." The Times continues, "Details of the plan emerged as Siemens suffered a fresh blow to its reputation and finances on Wednesday, when the European Commission ordered the German engineering group to pay a record €397m fine for its "leadership role" in a long-running price-fixing cartel." The Times adds, "In addition to the UGS deal, the German conglomerate was last night also considering whether to float its VDO division, one of the world's largest car parts suppliers with annual sales of about €10bn, according to people close to the situation. Both measures were discussed last night at a supervisory board meeting but because of worker sensitivities on disposals, it is possible the plans could be disrupted. The approach on VDO was 'undecided', one person familiar with the discussions said. … The moves highlight the determination of Klaus Kleinfeld, Siemens' chief executive, to push ahead with strengthening and restructuring his businesses despite being enmeshed in harmful corruption allegations. UGS, a US company specialising in product lifecycle management, is currently owned by US private equity groups Silver Lake, Bain Capital and Warburg Pincus."

The Wall Street Journal (1/25, C4, Esterl, Singer, Berman) reports, "The steps follow a flurry of moves in the past 18 months by Germany's largest conglomerate, which is overhauling far-flung industrial holdings that manufacture items including steam turbines, medical scanners, high-speed trains and light bulbs." The Journal continues, "A share listing of Siemens VDO Automotive could generate significant cash for the Munich-based company. The unit booked €10 billion ($13 billion) in revenue and €669 million in operating profit in the most recent fiscal year ended Sept. 30. Siemens didn't say how big a minority stake it would float. … Management said last year it would narrow its focus to three fast-growing areas: energy and environment; automation, and public and private infrastructure; and health-care." The Journal adds, "The UGS acquisition marks Siemens's largest purchase since last June, when it agreed to pay €4.2 billion for the medical-diagnostics division of Bayer AG. Europe's largest engineering company by sales, Siemens also has been investing heavily in areas such as wind power and water treatment."

Brazilian Legal Dispute Threatens CSN's Bid For Corus. The Financial Times (1/25, Wheatley, Marsh) reports, "The bid by Companhia Siderurgica

DOJ_NMG_0121188

Nacional, the Brazilian steelmaker, to acquire the Anglo-Dutch group Corus for £5.7bn ($11.2bn) could be blown off course by a legal dispute in Brazil, it has emerged." The Times continues, "The dispute, over CSN's rights to an iron-ore supply that would be crucial to a merged business, could lend fresh impetus to rival bidder Tata Steel of India. Tata is expected in the next few days to raise its £5.5bn bid above CSN's offer. Both bidders are due to finalise their offers for the world's eighth biggest steelmaker by next Tuesday." The Times adds, "The tussle arose after Companhia Vale do Rio Doce, the Brazilian mining group, said it would challenge CSN's ability to supply iron ore to Corus should its bid succeed. A big part of the rationale behind CSN's offer is that it would be able to supply cheap iron ore from its Casa de Pedra mine in Brazil to Corus's European plants. Tata has limited supplies of iron ore and, under Indian export regulations, is unlikely to be allowed in the next few years to ship it overseas. … But José Martins, CVRD's director for ferrous operations, told the Financial Times that CVRD would question CSN's ability to ship iron ore under the terms of a contract signed between the companies in 2001."

ENVIRONMENT:

Bush Takes Fuel Efficiency Message To Delaware. NBC Nightly News (1/24, story 2, 2:50, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "The day after the State of the Union address is traditionally when the President hits the road and the sales campaign begins. Today was no different and the President spent much of this day trying to point out the speech last night was about much more than Iraq." NBC (Gregory) added, "The morning after, and a big push on a new domestic agenda: the President in Delaware, meeting with microbiologists developing alternative fuels to power cars, part of an effort to wean the country off foreign oil that President Bush claims can bring Democrats and Republicans together." President Bush: "It doesn't matter what side of the aisle we sit on. What the American people expect is for people on both sides of the aisle to come together and solve problems." The CBS Evening News (1/24, story 5, :15, Couric, 7.66M) said Bush" today used the war on terror to frame his new alternative energy plan. He told employees at a chemical plant in Wilmington, Delaware, that our dependence on foreign oil is a natural security risk."

The New York Times (1/25, A21, Stolberg, 1.16M) says Bush "made a big deal about ethanol" in his Tuesday address, and on "Wednesday morning, he got up close and personal with it, poking his head through stalks of corn and wheat while scientists for DuPont gave him a crash course in ethanol production in a tour of their research greenhouse here. The presidential visit to the DuPont Experimental Station, which conducts federally financed research into the development of alternative fuels, amounted to a sales pitch for Mr. Bush's plan to reduce projected gasoline consumption by 20 percent over the next 10 years." USA Today (1/25, Jackson, 2.27M) reports Bush "toured a plant that develops biofuels from corn, switch grass and wood chips. He also touted his plan to reduce the use of gasoline over the next decade to an audience of more than 1,000, most of whom were DuPont employees."

The Los Angeles Times (1/25, Gerstenzang, Wilson, 850K) says the President "ordered the federal government Wednesday to move toward purchasing hybrid-powered vehicles and reducing the federal fleet's petroleum consumption by 2% each year, part of an effort to boost alternatives to gasoline." He "announced the executive order during a morning devoted to promoting new-technology fuels." The Delaware News Journal (1/25, Montgomery) says Bush discussed "what he described as 'an interesting opportunity for our country,'" saying that dependence on oil "creates both a national security problem for the country and environmental concerns."

WWAY-TV Wilmington (1/24, 11:05 p.m.) reported Bush "left behind the battle over the Iraq war as he visited an alternative fuels research complex in Delaware, pushing his new domestic agenda outlined in Tuesday's State of the Union address." WFMZ-TV Philadelphia (1/24, 6:01 p.m.) reported the President "spoke at the DuPont plant in Delaware in an effort to persuade Americans to curb their gas-guzzling habits."

Bush, Congress On "Collision Course" Over Fuel Efficiency. The Washington Post (1/25, D3, Freeman, 690K) reports Bush and Congress "appear to be on a collision course on how best to increase motor-vehicle fuel efficiency. Transportation Secretary Mary Peters said yesterday that Bush would oppose attempts by Congress to raise fuel-efficiency standards if its approach differs from the administration's." But "lawmakers from both parties are beginning to push for stronger action."

Energy Secretary Samuel Bodman said on Fox News (1/24, Smith), "The President has recommended to Congress that we need to set an alternative fuel standard that would be seven times as large as the current one. … What this really is, is setting a goal and then loosing the American inventive genius to go after it."

DOJ_NMG_0121189

Bush Pleases Ethanol-Makers, Frustrates Oil Refiners. The Washington Post (1/25, D1, Mufson, 690K) writes that Bush's focus on alternative energy is "good news" for the ethanol industry, but "not everyone thinks Bush's speech is good news. Oil refiners complain about mandates telling them how to blend fuels," and critics say "it will be impossible to hit the proposed requirement of 35 billion gallons a year by 2017 because the main renewable fuel used now, ethanol made from corn, is already driving up corn prices and will use much or all of the U.S. corn harvest." In a piece headlined "Deck's Stacked Against Ethanol These Days," USA Today (1/25, 3B, Krantz, 2.27M) writes that "many investors trying to cash in on the gold rush in ethanol are coming away with husks," with high corn prices and dropping oil prices dampening potential gains.

Bush Proposals Could Aid Auto Industry. The Wall Street Journal (1/25, McKinnon, Spector, 2.04M) reports on its front page that Bush's plans on both energy and health care could "boost the ailing American auto industry, whose pleas for help have largely been ignored by Washington in recent years. … The energy proposals -- crafted in a way that would erase some of the advantages enjoyed by the U.S. industry's Japanese competitors -- appear to have a shot at becoming law. The health program, which critics say could help auto companies but hurt auto workers, seems unlikely to gain traction anytime soon."

Blair, UN Official Pleased By Bush Comments On Climate Change. The Washington Times (1/25, Sands, 88K) reports Bush's "brief State of the Union comments on 'the serious challenge of global climate change' sparked sharp interest, comment and criticism around the globe." British Prime Minister Tony Blair, UN global-warming chief Yvo de Boer, and "senior business leaders at the posh annual gathering in Davos, Switzerland, all seized on Mr. Bush's Tuesday night remarks on energy, oil and the environment as a sign that the United States has a new appreciation for the problem." Blair said, "I do believe that this whole debate is now moving in a completely different and more positive direction." De Boer "called the energy-conservation measures outlined by Mr. Bush in his address 'very encouraging,' saying it was significant that the president linked his policies for the first time to the climate-change issue."

Meanwhile, the Financial Times (1/25, Giles, Tett) reports, "The twin demands of action to prevent climate change and enhance energy security requires Europe to commit to challenging mandatory controls on greenhouse gasses after 2012, Angela Merkel, the German chancellor, said on Wednesday." In "a marked contrast to George Bush's State of the Union address on Tuesday, when he set an ambition to reduce gasoline usage in the US by 20 per cent over the next 10 years, Ms Merkel said she welcomed the opportunity for the European Union to 'offer a [greenhouse gas] reduction target of 30 per cent, but we expect other large emitters to participate in that.'" The Times adds, "With the US still refusing to set a mandatory limit on its emissions, the transatlantic differences remain wide, even though Ms Merkel welcomed the moves made by President Bush."

But The Hill (1/25, Snyder) reports ex-EPA administrator Christine Todd Whitman said Bush "missed the 'perfect opening' to call for a cap on greenhouse gas emissions in his State of the Union address Tuesday night. While such a move would have represented a major policy shift for the administration, Whitman said she had hoped the fact that 10 major American companies called for a cap earlier this week would have provided sufficient political cover."

NYTimes, LATimes Skeptical About Bush Initiatives. The New York Times (1/25, A24, 1.16M) editorializes, "For six years, off and on, President Bush has been talking about the need for alternative fuels and conservation to make the country less beholden to unreliable sources of foreign oil. Yet all he has to show for it is a growing dependence on foreign oil, a growing climate problem and an increasingly cynical public. Mr. Bush talked the same game on Tuesday night, offering several impressively specific goals. But whether these new pledges turn out to be as empty as the old ones depends on his capacity for follow-through, and history is not encouraging. … Once again, we have heard this president make big promises about energy independence. Once again, we fear that very little will change. It would be nice, for once, to be surprised." "

The Los Angeles Times (1/25, 850K) editorializes, "One of President Bush's crowd-pleasers on Tuesday was a new energy policy designed to show his environmental side. It deserved no more than a golf clap. Nice putt, Mr. President. Too bad it took you 10 strokes to reach the green. Bush's rigid attitude toward climate change is beginning to thaw, though not quite as fast as the polar ice caps. His ideas for reducing oil consumption were tougher than anything he's offered before, and his mandate for 35 billion gallons of alternative fuels by 2017 was a nice gesture. But his plan does much too little to make a dent in the carbon emissions that are fueling global warming."

DOJ_NMG_0121190

Navy Sonar Exemption Angers Environmentalists. The AP (1/25, McAvoy) reports from Honolulu, "Angering environmentalists, the U.S. Defense Department exempted the Navy from complying with the Marine Mammal Protection Act for the next two years so sailors can practice tracking submarines with sonar." The AP continues, "Environmentalists on Tuesday said the Navy was not doing enough to protect whales, dolphins and other marine mammals from the harmful effects of the underwater sound technology." The AP adds, "Navy officials said they need the exemption, allowed for under the 2004 National Defense Authorization Act, to give them enough time to conduct environmental impact statements for sonar use at major underwater training ranges off Hawaii, southern California and the East Coast. … 'We cannot stop training for the next two years,' Don Schregardus, deputy assistant secretary of the Navy for the environment, told reporters. 'That would put our sailors in the Navy at considerable risk.'" The AP notes, "Sailors use active sonar by pumping sound waves through the ocean and listening to the echo as it bounces off objects. Navy leaders have made practicing sonar techniques a top priority as other nations have bought more advanced diesel submarines, which are quieter than earlier models and harder to find. … But environmentalists cite incidents of marine mammals that have died or been stranded en masse on beaches after being exposed to sonar."

Appeals Court Blocks Craig Bid To Eliminate Fish Agency. The Washington Post (1/25, A12, Harden, 690K) reports that in a "slap at the power of a single U.S. senator to change federal policy, the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 9th Circuit struck down today an attempt by Sen. Larry E. Craig (R-Idaho) to eliminate a small agency that counts endangered salmon in the Columbia River." Craig tried "to eliminate all funding in 2005 for the Fish Passage Center, which is based in Portland, Ore., and has 12 employees, because he said its data were 'cloaked in advocacy.'" Craig "inserted a sentence in a spending bill that directed the Bonneville Power Administration (BPA), which sells power generated by federal dams, to stop funding the center, which has a $1.3 million budget." The San Francisco-based appeals court "said that the BPA 'acted contrary to law in concluding that the congressional committee report language carried the force of law.'"

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

"Operation Ragdoll" Nets 18 Arrests. The Fall River (MA) Herald News (1/25) reports 19 people "have been charged in a multi-state drug trafficking ring in which the lead target of the federal investigation ran a drug distribution operation based in this city. Seized in the investigation, in which four others from this city were charged, were several kilograms of cocaine allegedly sent through U.S. Mail. … The charges stem from an Organized Crime and Drug Enforcement Task Force investigation, dubbed 'Operation Ragdoll,' which was spearheaded by the Drug Enforcement Administration in Hartford." As "alleged in the indictment, from January 2006 to June 20, 2006, the lead target of the investigation, Luis Joel Soto-Solivan, also known as 'The 27,' ran a drug trafficking operation based in Fall River, which supplied narcotics to various distributors in Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Connecticut, New York and Pennsylvania." The Herald News says 18 of the 19 people charged have been arrested.

NFL Players To Face Tougher Drug-Testing Rules. There are more than 400 media references to the NFL changing its drug-testing rules. In a widely reported story, the AP (1/25) says the NFL "is going deeper into the wallets of players who get caught using steroids and other performance-enhancing drugs. After four months of sometimes intense negotiations, the league and union announced Wednesday more extensive testing for performance-enhancing drugs and the addition of the blood-boosting substance EPO to its list of banned substances. The union also agreed that players suspended after testing positive will, for the first time, forfeit a portion of their signing bonuses in addition to the salary they will lose during their time away."

The New York Times (1/25, Battista) reports Gene Upshaw, the executive director of the National Football League Players Association, "said in an interview that as soon as next season, players who tested positive could also be barred from consideration for postseason awards. Such recognition became an issue during the regular season that ended last month when Shawne Merriman, a San Diego

DOJ_NMG_0121191

Chargers linebacker, was suspended for four games after a positive steroids test, but was named to the Pro Bowl."

The Washington Post (1/25, E7, Maske) reports, "In this round of modifications, the two sides agreed to increase the number of random tests from seven players per team to 10 players per team each week during the preseason, regular season and playoffs. Under the existing terms of the policy, every player is tested during training camp and a player can be tested as many as six times during the offseason. A first positive test results in the player being suspended four games without pay. A second positive test results in an eight-game suspension and a third positive test brings a one-year suspension."

USA Today (1/25, Wood) reports the program "does not include HGH, or human growth hormone, but the commissioner said he is 'investing money for doing that.' Blood tests are the reliable measure for HGH, and the players union has balked at taking blood from players."

For the AP (1/25), Tim Dahlberg writes, "Sure, it may have taken a bit of prodding from some Washington politicians to get everyone moving. But give some credit to the league for twisting the arm of its always-wary players' association and coming to terms on a tougher plan. Players will be tested more often, and it will be harder for them to cheat. When they are caught, they will fork over some of their lucrative signing bonuses as well as their weekly paychecks."

USA Today Profiles Lead Prosecutor In BALCO Case. USA Today (1/25) profiles Kevin Ryan, the outgoing U.S. attorney for the Northern District of California, who has been lead prosecutor since the BALCO case broke in 2002. USA Today (1/25) also has posted a BALCO investigation timeline on its Web site.

California Meeting Focuses On Anti-Gang Efforts. The San Francisco Chronicle (1/25, Johnson) reports, "A coalition of law enforcement, educators and civic leaders from 13 California cities meeting in Oakland today pledged to fight crime statewide by working together to address the root causes of street gangs." The Chronicle continues, "Participants in the first California Cities Gang Prevention Network, which includes San Francisco, Oakland, Richmond and Los Angeles, said during a press conference at the Waterfront Plaza Hotel that the two-day conference would produce a blueprint that could be used nationwide by cities struggling with rising crime rates." The Chronicle adds, "Oakland Deputy Police Chief Howard Jordan said he's looking for new ways to combat a surge in violence last year that resulted in 148 homicides, compared to 94 in 2005. About 38 percent of those murders were attributed to gang members. … Oakland had about 150 known gang members 10 years ago, compared to 1,500 today, Jordan said." The Chronicle notes, "Teams of delegates will meet to outline procedures for sharing crime data and information on successful anti-gang programs. Cities represented at the conference also include Santa Rosa, San Diego, Stockton and Fresno. The main sponsors are the National League of Cities and the Oakland-based National Council on Crime and Delinquency. … Violent crime rose 3.7 percent nationally and 4.1 percent in California in the first six months of 2006, compared with the same period in 2005, according to FBI statistics. … Gangs were involved in 56 percent of all crimes in the Western region of the country in 2005, according to the federal Justice Department's National Gang Threat Assessment."

Former ATF Agent Testifies She Feared Corrupt Officer. The Chicago Tribune (1/25, Coen) reports, "A former federal agent who alleges the Chicago Police Department protected corrupt officers and destroyed her career testified Wednesday that she feared for her life after confronting notorious former Officer Joseph Miedzianowski." The Tribune continues, "Diane Klipfel, a former agent with the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms, has sued the city and Miedzianowski, charging that Miedzianowski turned investigators against her after she tried to report that he had stolen from a drug dealer." The Tribune adds, "Miedzianowski eventually was arrested in 1998 for running a massive drug ring and was convicted of drug conspiracy and racketeering charges in federal court. … Klipfel's husband, ATF agent Michael Casali, also contends he was retaliated against by Miedzianowski. … Lawyers for the city and Miedzianowski have denied the accusations and promised to show that the Police Department was not notified in a timely fashion that Miedzianowski might be corrupt. … Klipfel told jurors hearing the federal civil trial that she began to suspect Miedzianowski six years earlier, when he was working an ATF detail that targeted gangs and drugs. Agents and officers conducted a search at the home of a drug dealer, she said, and she saw Miedzianowski going through the dealer's pants and wallet."

DOJ_NMG_0121192

Maine Woman Sentenced For Federal Firearms Violation. Foster's (NH) Daily Democrat (1/25, Keefe) reports from Berwick, ME, "The recent sentencing of 36-year-old Bobbi Lynn Bolduc of Berwick is what U.S. Attorney Thomas P. Colantuono called an example of a commitment to the 'Project Safe Neighborhoods' initiative." The Democrat continues, "Bolduc was charged with making a false statement in the purchase of a firearm in New Hampshire in May 2006 as she showed a New Hampshire address on her ATF form, a document required by the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives at the time of a firearms purchase. … It is a violation of federal law to make a material false statement in connection with the purchase of a firearm." The Democrat adds, "The .22-caliber revolver Bolduc purchased from Renaissance Firearms in Gonic, N.H., was later recovered in Somersworth, N.H., by police in connection with the May 2006 arrests of a 19-year-old Rochester man, a 20-year old Philadelphia, Pa., man and a 19-year-old Bronx, N.Y., man on charges of possession of 43 grams of crack cocaine and the .22-caliber handgun with ammunition. … Bolduc was sentenced Monday in U.S. District Court in Concord to six months of home confinement and two years probation."

IMMIGRATION:

GOP Opponents Of Bush Immigration Plan Vow To Fight. The Washington Times (1/25, Hurt, 88K) reports House Republicans "opposed to amnesty vowed yesterday to fight President Bush's proposal to legalize millions of illegal aliens as outlined in his State of the Union address on Tuesday." Rep. Tom Tancredo said, "The President worked hard to get a Congress that agrees with him on this and now he's got it. But we're still going to fight him on it." On Fox News (1/24), Tancredo said President Bush "said we're not going to do anything that's an amnesty, but of course, that's exactly what he is planning. … You want to stand up and say, Mr. President, say what you mean, and you mean an amnesty. And say what you mean when you say a temporary worker. You're talking about a guest worker program that will also include 15 million people who are here illegally. Say what you mean, Mr. President."

On NBC Nightly News (1/24, story 3, 1:45, Williams, 9.87M), Tim Russert said, "Immigration was debated thoroughly last year. People know where they stand on that issue. The Democrats are much closer to President Bush. They have told him if he can deliver half of the Republicans in his party in both houses of Congress, they can put forward a comprehensive immigration bill. But the Democrats want to put some pressure on the Bush White House to bring some Republicans along so it is simply not a Democratic immigration bill."

TAX:

Judge Bars New York Tax Preparation Firm From Practice. The Buffalo News (1/25) reports, "A federal judge has permanently barred a Hamburg tax preparation firm from preparing federal income taxes." The News continues, "Duffek, O'Connor & Associates of Hamburg can no longer legally prepare returns because an investigation showed that the firm prepared tax returns for clients that included deductions for 'fictitious and inflated charitable contributions,' the U.S. Justice Department said." The News adds, "According to the Internal Revenue Service, the firm understated tax liabilities of its customers by more than $2 million. … '[The] government alleged that the returns prepared by the defendants claimed fictitious and inflated employee expenses for such items as work clothes, teaching and coaching supplies, student and athlete rewards and cellular telephone expenses,' the Justice Department said in a news release issued Tuesday. … According to the release, U.S. District Judge William M. Skretny issued a permanent injunction barring the firm, Brian Duffek and Patrick O'Connor from preparing federal returns."

WSJournal Notes Move To Cut, Abolish State Income Taxes. The Wall Street Journal (1/25, 2.04M) says in an editorial that the "next big thing in American politics" could be "the abolition of state income taxes. In Georgia, Missouri and South Carolina, Governors and state legislatures are drafting serious proposals to repeal their income taxes to promote economic development. St. Louis, one of America's most distressed cities, may overturn its wage/income tax as a way to spur urban revival. And in Michigan, the legislature is in the last stages of phasing out its hated business income tax -- the most onerous in the land." Economist Arthur Laffer, who is advising several Governors and legislators on the issue, said, "States are now in a ferocious competition to attract jobs and businesses, and one of the best ways to win this race is to abolish the state income tax." State lawmakers "also seem to have learned from two of the most recent states to adopt an income tax: New Jersey and Connecticut. As recently as 1965 New Jersey had neither an income nor sales tax, but managed to balance its budget every year. Now it has both taxes -- its income tax is the 5th highest in the nation -- but the state is facing what Stateline.org calls a 'staggering budget deficit.'"

DOJ_NMG_0121193

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush Health Care Proposals Could Face Hard Time On Capitol Hill. The Washington Post (1/25, A10, Lee, Montgomery, 690K) reports, "Economists are still sorting out the implications of the broad health-care proposals President Bush unveiled this week, but already some clear winners and losers are emerging. Families with generous employer-sponsored coverage would be worse off, while those who buy insurance on the individual market, or whose health plan costs less than $15,000 annually, would come out ahead. But some of the winners will probably become losers over time, analysts said." And while the President's plan "would alter a historic imbalance in the tax code that favors generally better-off consumers who get insurance through their jobs, it also could undermine coverage for some sicker, older people and erode the employer-sponsored system that still provides coverage to more than half of all Americans."

USA Today (1/25, 3B, Block, 2.27M) headlines a report "Bush Plan Spotlights Uneven Tax Treatment Of Health Benefits," saying the Bush plan "faces stiff political resistance. Some lawmakers in the Democrat-led Congress said they wouldn't even hold hearings on the plan, arguing that it would hurt many Americans who do have insurance coverage. But Bush's proposal has managed to focus attention on the uneven tax treatment of health care benefits." The Christian Science Monitor (1/25, Trumbull, Lamb, 59K) says with his health plan, "Bush has launched what may be his most ambitious bid to tackle the issue from a free- market basis."

In a rather critical assessment, ABC World News (1/24, story 3, 2:15, Gibson, 8.78M) examined President Bush's "proposal to reform the health care system by way of the tax code. He said a series of new taxes, with tax breaks, will help more Americans afford held insurance." ABC (Stark) added that some worry the President's plan to provide "anyone who gets health insurance" with a tax deduction "will encourage businesses to stop offering health insurance." Paul Fronstin, Employee Benefit Research Institute: "Their workers will now be able to get the same tax break if they buy insurance on their own, as they now get through the work place. And employers will view this, and say, 'Why am I bothering to offer health insurance coverage for my workers?'" Stark: "The Administration disagrees. It says the tax break will allow three million to five million more Americans to buy health insurance. But that would still leave more than 40 million people uninsured." More criticism on ABC World News (1/24, story 4, 1:15, Gibson, 8.78M) came from the network's medical editor, Dr. Tim Johnson, who said, "I have several concerns. First, it doesn't make any kind of measurable dent in the horrible problem of the uninsured. Even more significant, I think, all the focus on taxes has diverted attention from the real problem, which is the terrible waste and inefficiency in our health insurance system. … I would call this proposal tinkering with taxes, rather than reforming health care. We're going to throw good money at a bad system."

The Wall Street Journal (1/25, A6, Zhang, Lueck, 2.04M) headlines its report "Bush Health Plan Shifts Onus To The Consumer," writing that Bush's "proposal for easing the nation's health-care woes…differs from approaches favored by Massachusetts and California as well as many Democrats in Congress." The Massachusetts plan, "which was supported by Democratic Sen. Edward Kennedy, requires all but the smallest employers to offer health insurance, or else pay an assessment to the state. In California, a similar requirement would compel employers that don't offer insurance to pay a 4% payroll tax. Both states would require all residents to have health insurance, offering government coverage or subsidies to those who are without coverage through an employer." The Bush plan, "in contrast, avoids mandates and instead would use the tax code to make individually purchased health insurance more appealing and affordable."

Leavitt Calls For "Rigorous And Robust Debate." During a Christian Science Monitor (1/25, 59K) "Monitor Breakfast" Wednesday, HHS Secretary Michael Leavitt said a "'rigorous and robust debate is about to ensue on how to accomplish' the goal of providing affordable health insurance for all." Leavitt added, "In my mind, it is simply indefensible for our country to have a tax policy that provides a tax benefit to part of our citizens and simply ignores the rest."

WPost Says Leavitt Opens Door For Possible Compromise. The Washington Post (1/25, A24, 690K) editorializes, "One of the tweaks that would make President

DOJ_NMG_0121194

Bush's new health-care proposal much more attractive would be changing the proposed tax deduction for those who purchase insurance to a tax credit." Leavitt "signaled the administration's openness to doing just that. … Leavitt said there were 'redeeming tax policy features to using a credit' but that the administration had decided to 'propose as a starting place' to use the mechanism of a standard deduction instead. That sounds like a door opening to us -- and a door skeptical Democrats ought to be willing to poke their heads through. Transforming the deduction into a credit would create a proposal that is fairer and that would do more to reduce the ranks of the uninsured."

CBO Predicts Budget Surplus In 2012 If Tax Cuts Are Not Renewed. The New York Times (1/25, Andrews, 1.16M) reports, "The nonpartisan Congressional Budget Office predicted on Wednesday that the federal budget deficit would shrink again this year and could actually swing into a surplus in 2012 -- but only if President Bush's tax cuts expire in 2010. The agency predicted that the deficit for 2007 would decline to about $200 billion. It would be the third big annual decline in a row, and it would come even though spending on the war in Iraq is expected to remain high this year." The Times adds, "The decline of the deficit comes on the heels of unexpectedly large increases in tax revenue over the last two years and slower-than-expected increases in spending on Medicare. Much of that increased revenue came from taxes on sharply higher corporate profits and big gains in the stock market, even though Congress reduced the tax rate on capital gains and stock dividends in 2003." It is "a rare piece of good news for President Bush, coming as he is struggling to persuade Congress to accept his strategy of sending more troops to Iraq and as his public approval ratings are at an all-time low." White House officials "boasted that the projections validated Mr. Bush's strategy of cutting taxes to stimulate the economy and ultimately generate higher tax revenues."

USA Today (1/25, Wolf, 2.27M) headlines its story "Surpluses Could Be Just Promises," and says "Bush pledged to balance the federal budget by 2012 without raising taxes," but "Congress' budget agency said it probably can't be done." Bush and Congress, however, "are seeking tax changes that would wipe out the projected surpluses and drive up the deficit by hundreds of billions of dollars. Those changes include extending Bush's 2001 and 2003 tax cuts and preventing millions of taxpayers from being hit by the alternative minimum tax, which increases taxes on people with large deductions."

The Los Angeles Times (1/25, Havemann, 850K) reports, "The nonpartisan CBO, in its annual report on where current spending and tax policies would take the budget over the next 10 years, did not contradict Bush in so many words. But its tables painted an unmistakable picture of a budget that needed an extra infusion of cash or a sharp reduction in outlays if revenue were ever to exceed spending." And "even if the budget could be balanced by 2012, said Peter R. Orszag, the CBO's director, the retirement of the baby-boom generation could quickly unbalance it: Not only would the wave of retirees force the government to spend more for Social Security, Medicare and other benefit programs, he said, but it would drain the population of taxpaying wage-earners."

The Washington Post (1/25, A11, Montgomery, 690K) says "virtually nobody -- not even top CBO officials – believes" the CBO prediction about a surplus. That is "because the CBO…is required to make some whopping assumptions, including: that all of…Bush's tax cuts will expire on schedule in 2010; that the alternative minimum tax will be permitted to ensnare millions of additional taxpayers; and that the war in Iraq and other military operations will never cost much more than the $70 billion that has so far been approved for the fiscal year that ends in September. Back in the real world, even Democrats want to extend at least some of the Bush tax cuts" and "even the White House wants to halt the expansion of the alternative minimum tax."

The Wall Street Journal (1/25, A2, 2.04M) reports, "Congressional budget experts said the fiscal 2007 deficit could fall to $172 billion if current policies remain in place, down from $248 billion in 2006, but the gap could worsen depending on how Congress addresses several looming tax-policy decisions." The CBO projections, adds the Journal, "exclude the cost of an anticipated $100 billion war supplemental-spending bill. If that money is approved, CBO expects about $25 billion of it will be spent in 2007, bringing the year's deficit to about $200 billion, according to new CBO Director Peter Orszag. Fiscal year 2007 began Oct. 1, 2006." Office of Management and Budget Director Rob Portman "said the president's budget will likely result in a higher deficit for fiscal year 2007 than predicted by CBO. 'Our number will be a little higher than theirs,' Mr. Portman told reporters. 'But, it will be consistent with the broad theme of reducing deficits and [reaching] balance by 2012,' Mr. Portman said." Bush

DOJ_NMG_0121195

"will continue a US military buildup while offering a package of entitlement cuts as part of a plan to balance the budget by 2012, a senior administration official said yesterday."

The Washington Times (1/25, Dinan, 88K) notes Portman "said Mr. Bush's budget…will show declining deficits and a balanced budget in 2012. 'Congress should be encouraged by this news, and I am optimistic that we can work together -- across party lines -- to keep the economy strong and spend taxpayer dollars wisely,' he said."

The AP (1/25, Taylor) says "Bush has one significant advantage in the upcoming debate. In designing his budget, Bush can assume his changes are put in place. He does not have to consider the political difficulties of getting the Democrat-controlled Congress to go along with cuts to hospitals and other Medicare providers and new fees on airline passengers and veterans seeking health care." The chairman of the House Budget Committee, Rep. John Spratt, and his Senate counterpart, Sen. Kent Conrad, "have the difficult job of trying to advance a budget that unites politically fractious factions of their party. Their task is made even tougher because the CBO's figures understate the true magnitude of the nation's fiscal woes."

Byrd Says Without Increased Spending, Key Federal Workers Will Be Laid Off. Roll Call (1/25, Pierce) reports, "In an apparent attempt to head off conservative Republicans intent on restraining Congressional spending, Senate Appropriations Chairman Robert Byrd (D-W.Va.) is circulating a memo warning that without increased funding for some programs the federal government may have to lay off or furlough thousands of key homeland security, consumer safety and health care personnel." With "the current stopgap funding measure set to expire Feb. 15, Byrd and House Appropriations Chairman David Obey (D-Wis.) are gearing up for a fight with Republicans over how to make sure that 13 Cabinet agencies, Congress and countless independent government agencies continue to operate for the remainder of fiscal 2007, which ends Sept. 30. Congress already has approved fiscal 2007 funding for the Defense and Homeland Security departments." The current continuing resolution "freezes federal spending at fiscal 2006 levels, and conservative Senators such as Jim DeMint (R-S.C.) and Tom Coburn (R-Okla.) have pushed to keep the government funded at 2006 levels for the remainder of the fiscal year to trim as much as $7 billion from the discretionary spending budget."

New Bush Education Proposals Would Boost Vouchers, Charter Schools. The New York Times (1/25, Schemo, 1.16M) reports on changes to the No Child Left Behind Act proposed by U.S. Secretary of Education Margaret Spellings in a telephone news conference that "would give local school officials new powers to override both teachers' contracts and state limits on charter schools in the case of persistently failing schools." Spellings said that "the goal was to provide students in failing schools with other options and 'to make sure we have our best personnel in the neediest places.'" She said that there are "about 1,800" schools that are persistently failing, but "loopholes in the current law allowed them to avoid serious action indefinitely." The proposals were criticized by teachers union officials and Congressional Democrats. Yet some proposals, "seemed likely to be more acceptable, among them: a call for a federal fund that would give extra pay to teachers who are most effective in raising children's test scores, or who agree to teach in the neediest schools; and allowing districts with failing schools to first offer children tutoring before allowing them to transfer."

USA Today (1/25, 9D, Toppo, 2.27M) reports the Administration's "education wish list" includes "more leeway for administrators to move good teachers into poorly performing schools and would provide a $4,000 check for students who would rather leave the public system for private school." Spellings said that "she'll 'fight hard' for the vouchers and the rest of the plan" adding, "I see this as a very vigorous package of proposals that are sound and make sense when they are taken together."

The Washington Times (1/25, A1, Fagan, 88K) reports Spellings said that "the administration will fight tenaciously for a few key changes…including helping children in chronically failed public schools to attend private schools instead." Spellings said that "a bill to renew the law will be ready to move through the Senate education panel by March or April." The "top goal" of Congressional Democrats is said to be "to secure a steep funding boost for the law, and Mrs. Spellings indicated the administration will use that as a bargaining chip."

The Pittsburgh Post-Gazette (1/25, Chute, 230K) reports Spellings "emphasized the desire to keep the 'core principles,' which include having all students proficient in math and reading by 2014 and using annual tests and results broken down by race, income and other factors to hold schools accountable."

DOJ_NMG_0121196

Democrats, Teachers Unions Oppose Plans. The Washington Post (1/25, A16, Paley, 690K) reports the plan to "allow poor students at chronically failing public schools to use federal vouchers to attend private and religious schools" upset "Democrats who vowed to fight the measure." They "assailed the plan…and expressed concern that the politically charged proposals could delay the reauthorization." Yet the proposals also include "measures that enjoy bipartisan support" such as limiting options of tutoring and transfers to "students in the categories that failed" to meet state standards. Spellings "insisted that the administration will try to push through even those proposals likely to face stiff resistance in Congress."

The AP (1/25, Zuckerbrod) reports, "Democrats and teachers' unions are criticizing the Bush administration for proposing to let school officials override collective bargaining agreements and state laws." Officials said that "the federal government has the right to include the charter school and contract language in a renewed No Child Left Behind law as strings attached to the billions of dollars in aid it provides to these schools." Yet "some aspects…won bipartisan praise" including proposals "to stick with the law's 2014 reading and math goal;" "to allow schools to consider how much students progress each year;" to "hold states accountable for students' science scores;" and to require "states to create standards and tests linked to what students should know when they start college or go to work."

The Chicago Tribune (1/25, Banchero, 617K) reports, "The plan already is coming under fire from some Democrats, who object to vouchers, and from teachers union officials, who are opposed to a plan that would allow districts to subvert collective bargaining agreements and move teachers to underperforming schools." NEA President Weaver said, "Once you put vouchers and teacher contracts out there, this is war."

Signs Of Hope Seen For Bipartisan Cooperation. The Christian Science Monitor (1/25, Feldmann, Grier, 59K) writes, "The final quarter of George W. Bush's presidency has begun, and a big question looms: Can he achieve anything significant in his remaining time in the White House?" There is "some hope. Both the Democrats in Congress and Mr. Bush, each for their own reasons, need to show accomplishments. The Democrats don't want to lose control of Congress in two years, after fighting so hard to regain it. And Bush has his legacy and the Republican Party's image to consider. Polls show the public clamoring for an end to the intense partisanship that has dominated national policymaking since the 1990s."

In his Washington Post (1/25, A25, 690K) column, David Broder writes, "Despite the raging controversy over Iraq military policy, President Bush's plea for bipartisan cooperation on the domestic agenda has a chance of success in the Senate. The reason has less to do with sympathy for the politically weakened chief executive than a dynamic that has gone largely unnoticed among the senators themselves. Since the midterm election created a near-even balance in the Senate -- 51 Democrats and 49 Republicans -- serious efforts at cross-party communication have developed momentum."

House Democrats "Hedging" On Bipartisanship. The Washington Times (1/25, Miller, 88K) reports House Democrats "say they intend to honor their pledge to allow Republicans to participate in writing legislation, but they won't say when." Majority Leader Steny Hoyer, "wary of Republicans using amendment votes as ammunition for future campaign attack ads," said, "I said we were going to be fair, not stupid." Hoyer added, "But we do intend to engage, involve and allow Republicans to have substantive opportunities as we consider legislation." The Times adds Hoyer "still hasn't said when the majority will open up the amendment process, known as using 'regular rules.' What's more, Republicans say, the majority is flouting the rules that are in place." Minority Leader John A. Boehner introduced "a resolution rebuking House Democrats" that failed in a party line vote. Boehner said, "You simply can't talk about cooperation at the same time you're circumventing the rules of the House to shut the other side out."

Novak Says Bipartisan Efforts Could "Go Nowhere." In his Washington Post (1/25, A25, 690K) column, Robert Novak writes, "The self-confident Democratic leadership is uninterested in being cut into potentially disastrous outcomes in Iraq. It wants to function as a coordinate branch of government, not as friendly colleagues in the spirit of bipartisanship. … On both sides, the prevailing attitude is that Bush looks like a president at bay. Statements made to me this week by two prominent political figures, one from each party, were so candid that these sources did not want to be quoted by name. The Republican, a ranking House committee member, said: 'The president and his aides are irrelevant and out of touch, removed from realizing what happened in the election.' A Democratic state party leader said that 'Bush is in such bad shape that the result of the 2008 election is already decided.' In that atmosphere, pleas for consultation go nowhere."

DOJ_NMG_0121197

Conservatives Fear Bush Is Ceding Ground On Key Issues. The Wall Street Journal (1/25, A8, Calmes, 2.04M) reports, "Fallout from the war in Iraq, which already has weakened President Bush among the general public and in Congress, now is causing problems with the group that has been his mainstay: social and economic conservatives." The "longtime loyalists, appreciative of Mr. Bush's record on issues ranging from tax cuts to his veto of federal funding for embryonic stem-cell research, also have supported his war policies." But this week's State of the Union address "aggravated their underlying fear: that the president might become so consumed by the worsening conflict in Iraq -- and chastened by Democrats' takeover of Congress -- that he will give up on the issues they care about."

Bush's Use Of "Democrat" Label Draws Attention. The Washington Post (1/25, C1, Copeland, 690K) writes, "The president in his State of the Union address Tuesday night left out a tiny little suffix that means a whole lot to some people. He did it so subtly you could have missed it. Just a little '-ic.'" Bush "started the speech on a bipartisan note, honoring the first Madam Speaker, Democrat Nancy Pelosi, and calling on the country to come together. Then: 'I congratulate the Democrat majority,' he said, dropping the last two letters from 'Democratic.' Bush does this a lot, and while it's hard to say if the omission was intentional in this instance, it is a semantic tactic that's been part of Republican warfare for decades."

More Commentary On Bush Agenda, Chances For Bipartisanship. In a Wall Street Journal (1/25, A19, 2.04M) op-ed, David Frum of the American Enterprise Institute writes, "On State of the Union night, Americans witnessed two President Bushes. The first President Bush delivered a firm foreign policy message in tones of passion and commitment. The second President Bush dragged his way wearily through a domestic agenda that seemed to interest him as little as it excited Congress. The first President Bush pledged himself to bold free-market reforms in health care -- including the removal of a treasured but destructive tax loophole from the wealthy and powerful. The second President Bush proposed to regulate America's way to energy security with a plan that might have been dusted off from the Carter administration. The first President Bush insisted that the budget can be balanced without raising taxes. The second shrugged off Medicaid, Medicare and Social Security as problems for later. The first President Bush spoke with realism about the generational struggle against Islamic extremism. The second President Bush offered false hopes about the good intentions of the government of Saudi Arabia and other sometime allies." Frum writes that Bush "has always been at his best in adversity. Americans face no shortage of adversity now."

In his New York Times (1/25, A25, 1.16M) column, Bob Herbert writes that Bush's address was "a study in governmental dysfunction. The audience kept mindlessly applauding -- up and down, like marionettes -- when in fact there was nothing to applaud. The state of the union is wretched, which is why the president's approval ratings are the worst since Nixon and Carter. If Mr. Bush is bothered by his fall from political grace, it wasn't showing on Tuesday night. He seemed as relaxed as ever, smiling, signing autographs, glad-handing."

In his Roll Call (1/25) column, Morton Kondracke writes, "A new, non-polarized, problem-solving politics is trying to be born in this country, but -- lip service aside -- most current politicians are stuck in the old model of nonstop partisan warfare. The old politics was richly on display Tuesday as President Bush delivered his State of the Union address and Congressional Democrats reacted. Bush enunciated -- once again -- the clear message of the 2006 elections: 'Our citizens don't care which side of the aisle we sit on -- as long as we are willing to cross that aisle when there is work to be done.' The agenda he offered created some opportunities for bipartisan agreement…but most Democratic commentary emphasized the negative."

In his column in The Hill (1/25), Dick Morris writes that Bush "boldly broadened his presidential agenda and vision. He once again became the president of the United States, not the mayor of Baghdad. By articulating viable, and potentially bi-partisan, proposals on energy independence, global climate change, healthcare, immigration reform, education standards and a host of other issues, he renewed the 360-degree mandate that should be the span of vision of any president." Bush "finally seems to have grasped a crucial but ironic fact: The only way he can keep sufficient credibility and power to continue his commitment to victory in Iraq is to raise his approval ratings."

Webb Response Speech Gets Strong Reactions From Both Sides. The Washington Post

DOJ_NMG_0121198

(1/25, A4, Shear, 690K) reports Sen. Jim Webb "earned a full day of praise -- and some tough rhetorical jabs -- for his sharply worded response Tuesday night to President Bush's State of the Union address. Liberal bloggers, national pundits and local Virginia politicians said the freshman senator's critique of the economy and the Iraq war was among the best retorts to Bush's administration they could remember." But "conservatives scoffed at Webb's less-than-animated demeanor," and some "assailed his adherence to the Democratic orthodoxy, especially on the Iraq war."

Dobbs, Dionne Praise Webb's Candor. On CNN's Lou Dobbs Tonight (1/24), host Dobbs and Sen. Jim Webb discussed Webb's Democratic response to President Bush's State of the Union address. Dobbs told Webb, "The consensus amongst those that I have talked with is that you did extraordinarily well in very short order. … You were forthright in saying that this President lead us into war recklessly in Iraq."

Under the headline "Reagan Democrat," Washington Post (1/25, A25, 690K) columnist E.J. Dionne writes, "Like him or not, Ronald ('Tear Down This Wall') Reagan spoke in a clean, clear prose that almost always left listeners with a sense that he stood for something. It may thus be no accident that Jim Webb…was once a Reaganite." In his response, Webb "defined the two central moral issues that animate most of the Democratic Party's rank and file: the mess in Iraq and the fact that the fruits of a growing economy are not being shared by all Americans. Then Webb did something rather astonishing: He didn't fudge on his language or try to take the hard edge off his impatience with the status quo. … There was no mush from Webb."

SMU Faculty Continue To Question Bush Library Plans. The Washington Post (1/25, A10, Wright, 690K) reports Southern Methodist University faculty members "again raised concerns that the building of the George W. Bush presidential library on campus might damage the school's reputation," according to a "participant at a closed-door meeting." At the "tightly guarded meeting, several members of the faculty questioned school president R. Gerald Turner about the political institute that will accompany the library. The institute will conduct research on issues that will be determined by Bush. Many of the questioners wondered whether such a powerful institution on campus will influence the type of research that can be conducted by SMU faculty and whether it will have an impact on the university's reputation."

Bush To Ask For Fast-Track Authority Next Week. The Hill (1/25, Swanson) reports, "President Bush will ask Congress to extend fast-track negotiating authority in one of two speeches on the economy next week, according to administration sources, after choosing not to make the request in his State of the Union address." The White House "intends to announce more details of next week's economic speeches today, according to White House Deputy Press Secretary Tony Fratto. He said President Bush intends to get his trade agenda completed, and this would include a continuation of fast track."

Tax Breaks Could Stall Senate Minimum Wage Bill. The AP (1/25, Kuhnhenn) reports, "The minimum wage increase that was supposed to zip through Congress veered onto a collision course Wednesday as lawmakers argued over business tax breaks that would be attached to ensure Republican support. Democratic leaders in the House began laying groundwork to blame the Republicans for any impasse. Senate Democrats, however, cautioned their House colleagues not to jeopardize legislation they'd promised to approve if they gained control of Congress." House Democrats "demanded a clean bill from the Senate -- no tax attachment -- setting up a confrontation that could delay final congressional passage of the $2.10 an hour increase." The Senate "did vote 54-43 to advance a House-passed measure that would lift the pay floor without any accompanying tax cut. However, that was well short of the 60 votes needed to keep that version moving." The vote "was a signal to the House that without the tax breaks a minimum wage bill appeared doomed in the Senate. And the Senate promptly moved to a broader bill, backed by its Democratic leaders, that would raise the minimum wage to $7.25 an hour over 26 months and provide $8.3 billion in tax benefits to businesses over 10 years."

The New York Times/Bloomberg (1/25) reports "a spokesman for Mr. Rangel, Matthew Beck, said Wednesday: 'The Senate needs to pass a clean bill. They shouldn't hold the minimum wage hostage.' … Under Congressional rules, Mr. Rangel can block House consideration of the Senate's minimum-wage measure. Any legislation would have to be reconciled between the two chambers before being sent to President Bush for his signature."

DOJ_NMG_0121199

Pelosi, Hoyer Relationship Appears To Have Improved. The Washington Post (1/25, Romano, 690K) reports that after "years of tension between House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) and Majority Leader Steny Hoyer (D-Md.) , the two appear to be getting along much better these days, or so report the staff and allies of the Democratic leadership." Sources say the "tension and mistrust that long existed between the two native Marylanders is no longer evident. She no longer seems to be keeping him in the dark on insider maneuvering, and he no longer feels as if he's being kept out of the loop."

Pelosi, Dingell Make Nice At DC Auto Show. The Washington Post (1/25, A23, Layton, 690K) reports a "highly choreographed peace accord was reached in the middle of the Washington Convention Center yesterday, when Rep. John D. Dingell (D-Mich.) escorted House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) through the auto show, hoping to smooth over the public rift that erupted between them last week." Pelosi had "irritated Dingell by announcing her desire to create a special committee on global warming. As chairman of the House Energy and Commerce Committee, Dingell had planned hearings on global warming and saw Pelosi's proposed committee as an affront to his authority." To "soften the edges of the turf battle, Dingell's wife, Debbie, an executive with General Motors Corp., suggested that he invite Pelosi to the Washington Auto Show to see the hybrid vehicles manufactured in his home state." With "20 minutes of peacemaking over, Pelosi, Dingell and their entourage walked to a rear exit and climbed into two gas-guzzling Chevy Suburbans."

Mica Angered By Perceived Slight At Transportation Meeting. The Washington Post (1/25, Romano, 690K) reports Democratic Rep. Jim Oberstar of Minnesota, "the new chairman of the House Transportation Committee, wanted to show members of his panel how bipartisanship and policymaking can work in tandem." Oberstar and ranking Republican John Mica (Fla.), "organized a roundtable discussion for members last week. And to drive home the point, Oberstar invited back Bud Shuster (R-Pa.), the retired Republican chairman of the committee." The move "seemed like a great idea until Mica arrived for the roundtable and discovered that he did not have one of the nice, cushy chairs at the head of the table that were occupied by Oberstar, Shuster and other speakers, including New York financier Felix Rohatyn." Sources say Mica "threw a fit and demanded to know from staff why he didn't have a special chair of his own next to Oberstar and the others." But "before staff could rectify the situation, and as startled members looked on, a furious Mica stormed out of the room and ordered the other Republican members to leave. Among the uncomfortable departees was Shuster's own son and successor, Rep. Bill Shuster."

Democratic Control Of House Could Benefit Philip Morris. The Wall Street Journal (1/25, B1, O'Connell, Mullins, 2.04M) reports that while "the new Democratic Congress looks like big trouble for big tobacco," from the "point of view of the nation's largest cigarette maker, Philip Morris, the shift in power could be a blessing in disguise. That's because it could help ease the way for legislation to give the Food and Drug Administration new powers to control how cigarettes are made and marketed. That, ironically, could help Philip Morris maintain its current market domination." Most tobacco companies "are opposed to FDA regulation of cigarettes, which, among other things, would likely ban the use of descriptors such as 'light' and 'mild' and require big new warnings to cover at least 30% of cigarette packs." But Philip Morris "has embraced the idea that the FDA should have broad powers over tobacco." The "company's rivals contend that new restrictions would hurt them more because their brands are much less known than the famous Philip Morris Marlboro brand. With marketing potentially dramatically curtailed by FDA regulation, they would have fewer ways to promote themselves."

House Restores Voting Rights To Delegates. The New York Times (1/25, Hulse, 1.16M) reports, "The Democratic majority in the House restored limited floor voting rights to the Congressional delegates from the District of Columbia and four territories on Wednesday after a rancorous debate with echoes of the days before the Republicans won the majority in 1994." The change "approved on a party-line vote of 226 to 191 was mostly symbolic because the five delegates will be allowed to vote just on floor amendments, not on final approval of bills. If their votes influence the outcome on amendments, a new vote will be taken without their participation."

The Washington Post (1/25, B4, Sheridan, 690K) reports, "Democratic supporters acknowledged that it provided mainly symbolic privileges but said it would give delegates greater participation in Congress. 'It is not enough

DOJ_NMG_0121200

what we do today,' said Majority Leader Steny H. Hoyer (D-Md.), who has expressed strong support for the District having a full vote in the House. 'But it would be tragic if we do not do this basic step.'"

Roll Call (1/25, Brotherton) says Republicans "are considering challenging the rules change in court. … Rep. Tom Price (R-Ga.), who spent much of his week rallying against the proposal, called it 'flawed policy' and said Republicans will continue to fight it. 'At this point, because there are internal rules, the only option we have is through the courts,' Price said. 'We'll be in discussions with that.'"

Cheney Says Question About Daughter's Pregnancy "Out Of Line." Near the end of Vice President Dick Cheney's interview with CNN's The Situation Room (1/24), Wolf Blitzer asked Cheney if he wanted to respond to criticism of daughter Mary Cheney's pregnancy. Cheney: "No, I don't. … I'm delighted I'm about to have a sixth grandchild. And obviously I think the world of both my daughters and all of my grandchildren. And I think, frankly, you're out of line with that question." Blitzer: "I think all of us appreciate..." Cheney: "I think you're out of -- I think you're out of line." Blitzer: "No, we like your daughters. Believe me, I'm very, very sympathetic to Liz and Mary. I like them both. That was just a question that's come up, and it's a responsible fair question." Cheney: "I just fundamentally disagree with you."

White House Press Secretary Tony Snow said on Fox News' Your World (1/24, Cavuto), "He said it was out of line, and he was right. You know what's interesting, is that in prior administrations -- think about Chelsea Clinton. Nobody ever butted into Chelsea Clinton's business, and good for the press back then. And the Clintons were rightly protective of their daughter. Nobody questioned Al Gore when he son ran into difficulty. Again, right choice to make. It is tough enough to become president or vice president that people should not be trying to draw family members in. I don't know why the rules are different in this Administration, but it does seem that for some members of the press it's been open season on the President's daughters, and it seems that it's a time for people to get into the private life of the Vice President's daughter."

The AP (1/24) says Cheney "bristled when asked to respond to critics who question his daughter Mary's decision to have a baby and raise it with her female partner." The Los Angeles Times (1/25, Reynolds, 850K) says Cheney's "words became most pointed when Blitzer asked" about the pregnancy. The Washington Post (1/25, A1, Baker, 690K) writes that Blitzer "has been in the Cheney doghouse since October, when he interviewed the vice president's wife, Lynne, and asked about steamy scenes in a novel she wrote. … Lynne Cheney angrily rebuffed Blitzer, and her husband later congratulated her for what he called 'the slapdown.'"

Higgins Exits Church After Sermon Criticized Stem Cell Vote. The AP (1/24) reports Democratic Rep. Brian Higgins "walked out of his Catholic church in Buffalo after a clergyman berated the lawmaker for his recent vote on stem cell research." The "public tongue-lashing" came "during last Sunday morning's Mass at Saint Thomas Aquinas Catholic Church in South Buffalo." Deacon Tom McDonnell "criticized Higgins for voting earlier this month for a bill that would allow federal funding for research involving stem cell lines derived from surplus embryos created in fertility clinics. The Catholic church opposes embryonic stem cell research." As McDonnell "spoke, Higgins -- who was baptized and married at Saint Aquinas -- walked out with his wife and son."

Oldest-Ever Senate Showing Signs Of Aging. The Politico (1/25, Martin, Bresnahan) reports that the "average age of members of the U.S. Senate is older than it has ever been," and "for many senators, advanced age is starting to show, raising questions about their ability to govern." The "average age of the 100 senators is 62, up from 60 in the last Congress. Among the new Democratic committee chairmen, it is 69. And, of the five longest-serving senators, three are there today," including 89-year-old Sen. Robert Byrd. In terms of illnesses, "at least 10 senators have fought various cancers or suffered severe injuries," and Sen. Tim Johnson "remains hospitalized here for a brain hemorrhage suffered last month."

McCain Would Be Oldest President At Inauguration. The Politico (1/25, Simon) reports writes that if John McCain is elected president, he would become the oldest ever inaugurated. And, "as is evident from the scar on the left side of his face, he has had malignant melanoma, the most invasive and dangerous form of skin cancer. … The media often demands the release of medical records these days, and the candidates sometimes comply. There were so many false rumors circulating about McCain's health when he ran for president in 2000, that he released 1,500 pages of medical and psychiatric records. They showed him to be in good health and not nuts."

DOJ_NMG_0121201

NTEU Challenges Federal Intern Program. The Washington Post's (1/25, D4, Barr) "Federal Diary" column reports, "The Federal Career Intern Program has become one of the most popular ways for federal agencies to recruit on college campuses and hire young professionals. Agencies may hire interns at any time, do not have to advertise the job openings in advance, and can take advantage of the two-year job tryouts to evaluate the interns before deciding whether to offer them permanent civil service jobs." The Post adds that the NTEU "challenged" the popular program "in federal court" asserting "that the intern program 'has become the hiring method of choice' and has undermined century-old laws that require federal jobs to be filled through fair and open competition with applicants afforded equal opportunity. The union asked the US District Court for the District of Columbia to throw out the program's regulations and to stop agencies from using the hiring program." The Post adds, "NTEU also objected to the program's rule that places interns on probation for two years, instead of the one year that generally applies to civil service jobs, and to an IRS decision to extend the probation to three years for revenue agents."

Union Launches Organizing Campaign At GAO. The Washington Post's (1/25, D4, Barr) "Federal Diary" column reports, "The International Federation of Professional and Technical Engineers announced yesterday that it has launched a union-organizing campaign to represent employees at the Government Accountability Office, the congressional auditing and investigations agency." Affiliated with the AFL-CIO, the union "represents federal scientists, engineers, immigration and administrative law judges and others, including the staff at the Congressional Research Service. A group of GAO analysts approached the CRS local union several months ago about forming an organizing committee, the union said."

White House Social Secretary Berman Stepping Down. The Washington Post reports in its "Reliable Source" column (1/25, Argetsinger, Roberts) that White House Social Secretary Lea Berman "is stepping down next month after two years on the job." The decision "to leave was entirely Berman's, said Susan Whitson, spokeswoman for Laura Bush. 'Mrs. Bush adores Lea and thinks her work is outstanding. Lea will be greatly missed.'" The Post adds the "prominent Republican hostess became the nation's most prestigious party planner in December 2004 -- after stints as social secretary for Dick Cheney, chief of staff to Lynne Cheney and a staffer in the president's 2004 reelection campaign."

OTHER NEWS:

Dow Reaches Its 26th Record Since October. The New York Times/AP (1/25) reports, "Wall Street soared yesterday, sending the Dow Jones industrial average to a new high. The Nasdaq composite index jumped 1.4 percent after profit reports from Yahoo and Sun Microsystems restored the confidence of investors in the technology sector." The Dow Jones "rose 87.97 points, or 0.7 percent, to 12,621.77, passing a record close of 12,582.59 set Jan. 16. It was the Dow's 26th record close since the surge began at the start of October. The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index reached a six-year high, rising 12.14 points, or 0.85 percent, to 1,440.13. The Russell 2000 index of smaller companies was up 8.65 points, or 1.10 percent, at 794.03." NBC Nightly News (1/24, story 10, :10, Williams, 9.87M) also noted the Wall Street numbers. The Washington Post/AP (1/25, D6) and Wall Street Journal (1/25, C1, Browning, 2.04M), among other newspapers, run similar reports.

"Growing Inequality" In America Triggers Debate On Fairness. The New York Times (1/25, Cowen, 1.16M) reports, "The growing inequality in wealth and income has led many people to question whether the contemporary American economy is rigged in favor of the rich. While there is little doubt that the gap between the wealthy and everybody else has widened in recent years, the situation is not as unfair as some of the numbers seem to imply. … In general, there is more income inequality among older populations than among younger populations, if only because older people have had more time to experience rising or falling fortunes. Furthermore, more-educated groups show greater income inequality than less-educated groups. … Since the United States is growing older and also more educated, income inequality will naturally rise."

Kerry Won't Seek Democratic Nomination In 2008. The Boston Globe (1/25, Klein, 413K) reports an "emotional Senator John F. Kerry today said he will not run in the 2008 presidential race and vowed to use his Senate perch to hasten an end to the war in Iraq, saying he would work with lawmakers from both parties to reverse President

DOJ_NMG_0121202

Bush's troop 'surge' and force him to withdraw virtually all troops from Iraq by early next year." Kerry "used the unusual forum of the Senate floor to announce his political ambitions. Choking up as he harkened back to his service in Vietnam, Kerry said he would work to make sure the next president doesn't have to cope with the consequences of a 'wider war' sparked by the failed policy in Iraq." Kerry's "decision to stay out of the presidential race reflects a realization that he would have had an uphill climb in capturing the Democratic nomination, given the other party heavyweights who are already in the race, according to Kerry associates." These associates said "the senator's plans changed dramatically in the fallout of his election-eve 'botched joke' about the education levels of US troops."

The Politico.com (1/24, Simon) reports, "Serious candidates and candidates who want to be serious in 2008 will have to raise more than a million and a half dollars a week in $2,000 increments starting right about now. And Kerry, who was criticized by many in his party for not running a more vigorous campaign last time, found it tough going." A source close to Kerry said, "He was calling around Wednesday and Thursday to close advisers and they had talked to donors several times and the money wasn't going to be there. That coupled with (Barack) Obama-mania, which gave people looking for a Hillary alternative a viable option, is what ended his plans."

The story was briefly reported by each of the networks. ABC World News (1/24, story 5, :20, Gibson, 8.78M) reported it was "a major political story tonight. Senator John Kerry has decided not to make another White House run in 2008. On the Senate floor this afternoon, the Massachusetts Democratic who lost the 2004 Presidential election said he will stay in the Senate and focus on trying to change the Bush Administration policy in Iraq."

The CBS Evening News (1/24, story 7, :25, Couric, 7.66M) reported Kerry "made a hard choice of his own today." Kerry, "who lost to President Bush in 2004, said he was tempted to run again but decided this is not the time. At least nine others have decided this is the time for them." NBC Nightly News (1/24, story 4, :25, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "While most Americans might not have thought he was in the race to begin with, today Massachusetts Democratic Senator John Kerry said that he will not run for President in 2008."

The Boston Herald (1/25, Ratliff, Ross, 184K) reports that in "a speech to the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, Kerry put pressure on the current administration to set a date to withdraw U.S. troops from Iraq but dedicated the last few minutes of his time on the floor to announce to his colleagues that though he was 'tempted to try again,' he would not make a push for the presidency." Gov. Deval Patrick, "who has previously said he would support Kerry in a 2008 White House bid, is now undecided on who he will back on the Democratic side for the office."

The AP (1/25, Espo) reports Kerry, "who fell 118,601 Ohio votes short of the White House in 2004, said Wednesday he will not run for president in 2008." Kerry said, "There are powerful reasons to want to continue that fight now. But I have concluded this isn't the time for me to mount a presidential campaign." The AP adds Kerry's decision "leaves a field of nine Democrats running or signaling their intention to do so, including Sens. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York and Barack Obama of Illinois, and John Edwards, Kerry's 2004 vice presidential running mate." Edwards said "he knew the decision was a difficult one for Kerry 'because we know his first instinct is always to respond to any call to serve his country'"

The AFP (1/25) reports Kerry "alluded to his failed presidential bid, which hinged largely on his strong opposition to the US war in Iraq, in making his announcement." Kerry said, "We came close -- certainly close enough to be tempted to try again." AFP added Kerry's "decision to pull out is the latest major development in the accelerated 2008 presidential race, in which several candidates have felt compelled to declare their intentions earlier than ever to lock up vital funds and campaign staff, or to bow out."

CQ Politics (1/25, Giroux) reports Kerry "announced his decision in a 36-minute speech on the Senate floor Wednesday afternoon. In a long prelude to his brief announcement, Kerry issued a lacerating denunciation of how Bush has handled the war in Iraq — including the president's recently announced decision to increase American troop strength in that nation." The news "will disappoint some Kerry loyalists who say he was hindered in 2004 by attacks from Republicans that they view as unfair." But "less downcast will be many Democrats who criticized Kerry, contending he ran an ineffective campaign that allowed Bush to win re-election."

Bloomberg (1/25, Roberts) reports, "Kerry said he is determined to use his position in the Senate to force a withdrawal of most U.S. troops from Iraq by next year." Kerry said, "Congress bears some responsibility for getting us into this war and Congress must take responsibility for getting us out."

DOJ_NMG_0121203

The Los Angeles Times (1/25, Neuman, 850K) reports analysts "said Kerry also may have surveyed the field of Democratic candidates -- with Sens. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York and Barack Obama of Illinois among the front-runners -- and determined that there was little interest in a candidate given to long speeches, a less charismatic style, and a similar position on the war." Jennifer Duffy of the Cook Political Report said, "The writing was on the wall. He was getting squeezed. Where once you saw the possibility of his running an 'I told you so' campaign, his position on Iraq is not unique anymore."

The New York Times (1/25, Nagourney, 1.16M) reports Kerry's announcement, "though it came in an unorthodox place, was not a surprise. He was bowing to a Democratic Party that was clearly unreceptive and had turned its attention to new candidates, in particular Senators Barack Obama of Illinois and Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York, who both got into the race this month." Many Democrats "had said they expected that Mr. Kerry would decide not to run after assessing how much support he had in his party. Already, most of his aides from the 2004 campaign have moved on."

The Hill (1/25, Blake) reports Kerry, "who has eyed the White House since coming up just short in 2004 and has raised money accordingly, had become a long shot for a repeat bid. He languished in early polls despite high name recognition." Kerry "damaged his cause with comments shortly before the 2006 midterm elections in which he told students at a rally in California that they had better take their education seriously. Otherwise, he said, 'you get stuck in Iraq.'"

The Washington Post (1/25, A4, Cillizza, 690K) reports, "Several people close to Kerry said he struggled with the decision over whether to run again, weighing the narrowness of his 2004 defeat against the obvious hurdles presented by a Democratic field filled with popular figures such as" Sens. Clinton and Obama. But the sources "said his decision was not motivated by national and state polling that showed him trailing Clinton, Obama and Edwards in hypothetical 2008 matchups. They noted that Kerry has nearly $13 million in the bank, which could have been used to reintroduce himself to voters. But there are real concerns that a second national candidacy could endanger Kerry's standing in his home state."

The Washington Times (1/25, Lambro, 88K) reports, "Democratic campaign strategists privately have been saying for some time that the senator was no longer a contender in a crowded field of candidates, led" by Clinton, Obama, and Edwards. Democratic leaders "in the early caucus and primary battlegrounds of Iowa and New Hampshire also said that Mr. Kerry was registering little support in their states, running far behind the front-runners, who already have considerable campaign organizations and fundraising pledges."

Obama Calls Claim He Studied At Madrassah "Scurrilous." The AP (1/25, Pickler) reports Sen. Barack Obama "fought back Wednesday against an allegation that he was educated at a radical Islamic school as a child in Indonesia, determined to avoid being tripped up by unsubstantiated charges like those that undermined John Kerry in 2004." Interviews "by The Associated Press at the elementary school in Jakarta found that it's a public and secular institution that has been open to students of all faiths since before the White House hopeful attended in the late 1960s." Obama, who "was born in Hawaii, moved to Indonesia at age 6 to live with his mother and stepfather, attending schools in the country until age 10, when he returned to Hawaii to live with his maternal grandparents." The "contention that Obama was educated at a radical Muslim madrassa surfaced on the Web site of the conservative Insight magazine the day after Obama announced he was jumping into the 2008 presidential race. Conservative Internet blogs and the Fox News Channel picked up the story and spread the charges just as his candidacy was getting off the ground." Obama "on Wednesday called the reports 'scurrilous,' and his communications director e-mailed reporters a lengthy memo attempting to set the record straight."

The Hill (1/25, Schor) reports Obama "fired back yesterday against Insight magazine and Fox News for purveying a discredited report that he attended a radical Islamic religious school during his childhood years in Indonesia." In a memo to reporters, Obama communications director Robert Gibbs "reiterated that CNN has officially debunked claims published last week in Insight, a property of Washington Times owner Rev. Sun Myung Moon."

Obama Faces Dilemma In Appeal To Black Voters. The Washington Post (1/25, A1, Fletcher, 690K) reports in a front page story that the "question of how Obama chooses to define and approach race looms large as he moves closer to formally launching his campaign next month. Although he rides a wave of enthusiasm among Democrats who like his vision of a different kind of politics and see him as an alternative to Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (N.Y.), it is not clear that his multiracial message can excite black voters hungry for affirmation of their top concerns." Melissa V. Harris-Lacewell, "a Princeton University professor who has followed Obama's political ascent, said that he may be forced to choose: 'You can be elected president as a black person only if you signal at some level that you are independent from black people' -- a move she said would be 'guaranteed' to make black people angry." The Post adds, "Already, that balancing act is causing some strains. Some of Obama's longtime black supporters in Illinois are grumbling about the largely white crowd of advisers who now surround Obama as he gears up his national campaign."

DOJ_NMG_0121204

The Washington Times (1/25, DeBose, 88K) reports Obama "will have a tough time generating support for his presidential bid among key black Democratic leaders -- many of whom are loyal to the Clintons -- and he must guard against undermining his electability by becoming the civil rights candidate, campaign strategists say." Several strategists "said Mr. Obama, Illinois Democrat, will have to walk the tightrope of wooing black liberal activists, including such polarizing figures as the Rev. Al Sharpton and Mr. Jackson, while avoiding limiting his appeal by leading with his race and running primarily on civil rights issues."

McCain Tops GOP Competitors In Arizona Poll. Phoenix Business Journal (1/25, Sunnucks) reports Sen. John McCain "fared well in a poll of Arizona voters, but trailed former New York Mayor Rudy Giuliani among Republicans in surveys taken nationally and in Iowa, a key primary state." A poll released Wednesday "by Arizona State University and KAET-TV 8 shows McCain with a mammoth lead over GOP rivals in a potential Arizona primary." The ASU survey "gives McCain a 54 percent edge. Former U.S. House Speaker Newt Gingrich checks in as the second most popular candidate, favored by 14 percent of respondents, followed by Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney. The ASU poll did not ask voters about Giuliani."

Republicans Wonder Whether Giuliani Is In A Stall. The White House Bulletin/US News (1/25) reports Republican insiders are asking if Rudy Giuliani will "back out of his fledgling presidential campaign." The insiders "note that while Giuliani leads in some national polls of GOP voters, he has not moved as aggressively as some of his rivals, especially John McCain and Mitt Romney, to recruit a campaign team or solicit support from key Republicans at the national, state, and local levels. The insiders point out that Giuliani didn't run against Hillary Rodham Clinton for the Senate in 2000 in a decision that disappointed many of his supporters." A "prominent GOP insider who formerly advised President Bush" said, "Some of us aren't sure he will really make this race this time, and if he does jump in, there will be doubts that he will stay in."

Four Large States Could Move Primaries Up To February. The New York Times (1/25, Nagourney, 1.16M) reports that as many as "four big states — California, Florida, Illinois and New Jersey — are likely to move up their 2008 presidential primaries to early next February, further upending an already unsettled nominating process and forcing candidates of both parties to rethink their campaign strategies, party officials said Wednesday." The changes "mean that the presidential candidates face the prospect of going immediately from an ordered series of early contests in relatively small states in January to a single-day, coast-to-coast battlefield in February, encompassing some of the most expensive advertising markets in the nation." The move would "appear to benefit well-financed and already familiar candidates and diminish the prospects of those with less money and name recognition going into such a highly compressed series of contests early next year." Associates of Sens. Hillary Clinton and John McCain "said that should either of them stumble early on, the respective party primaries in California and New Jersey — two states that would seem particularly hospitable to them — could offer an expensive but welcome firewall." But New Jersey and California "could provide an opening for Rudolph W. Giuliani, the former mayor of New York, who faces the daunting prospect of overcoming resistance among social conservatives in the Republican contests in Iowa and South Carolina in January."

Gingrich Backs Bill To Make English Official Language. The Washington Times (1/25, Pfeiffer, 88K) reports former House Speaker Newt Gingrich "announced his support for legislation that would make English the nation's official language in order to combat what he calls 'an unprecedented influx of non-English-speaking immigrants.'"

DOJ_NMG_0121205

Gingrich "has said he is speaking out now to infuse his party's presidential primary with ideas and will not make a formal decision about running until September." Gingrich said, "If you are pro-immigration into America, you should be pro-assimilation into the American way of life. Bilingual education has been stunningly destructive."

Bergen County Seen As Warning For GOP. In his Roll Call column (1/25), Stuart Rothenberg says, "For Republicans, New Jersey, once a GOP-leaning, anti-tax state, stands as a stark reminder of how things have changed, particularly in the Northeast. But the better example — and warning of things to come — is Bergen County, a suburban bedroom community that has moved away from its Republican roots and toward the Democratic Party." The county, "once bedrock Republican territory and the most populous county in the state, has voted Democratic in the past four presidential elections — twice for Bill Clinton, and more recently for Al Gore and John Kerry." Republicans have "three major problems in the county: the national party, changing demographics and a fractured GOP that is being outworked by Democratic strategists." If Bergen "were an isolated case, it might not even be worth mentioning. But what's happening there could happen (and indeed has happened) in other northern suburbs. While the GOP has made gains in Georgia, Tennessee and Kentucky, it continues to lose ground in New Jersey, Illinois and southeast Pennsylvania."

Washington School Board Faces Backlash Over Ban On Gore Film. The Washington Post (1/25, A12, Harden, 690K) reports Frosty E. Hardiman of Federal Way, Washington, "is neither impressed nor surprised that 'An Inconvenient Truth,' the global-warming movie narrated by former vice president Al Gore, received an Oscar nomination this week for best documentary." Hardiman said, "Liberal left is all over Hollywood." The Post adds Hardiman, "a parent of seven here in the southern suburbs of Seattle, has himself roiled the global-warming waters. It happened early this month when he learned that one of his daughters would be watching 'An Inconvenient Truth' in her seventh-grade science class." Hardiman's "angry e-mail" to the local school board "(along with complaints from a few other parents) stopped the film from being shown to Hardiman's daughter." The e-mail "also pressured the school board to impose a ban on screenings of the film for the district's 22,500 students. The ban, which the school board says was merely a 'moratorium,' was lifted Tuesday night, subject to rigorous conditions. Still, the action has appalled the film's producers and triggered a ferocious national backlash."

Steele To Head GOPAC. The Washington Times (1/25, Lobianco, 88K) reports former Maryland Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele "will lead a major Republican fundraising group and start a public affairs consulting firm in Maryland." Steele will "be the chairman of GOPAC, the national fundraising outfit that former House Speaker Newt Gingrich elevated to national prominence in 1994, and start the Legacy Strategies public affairs firm, he told The Washington Times yesterday."

WPost Says Virginia GOP Finally Serious About Transportation Funding. The Washington Post (1/25, A24, 690K) says in an editorial, "Eyeball to eyeball with a potential electoral disaster in this fall's legislative elections, Virginia Republicans have finally blinked -- a little. They have put forward a transportation funding package that is at least partly serious, which is to say that it relies to a significant degree on new taxes and fees to address the state's most urgent problem. It is an imperfect plan but also a sound starting point for a deal." Having signed pledges "to oppose any new taxes and having torpedoed one funding plan after another, the conservative ideologues who hold sway in the House of Delegates haven't found the courage to raise taxes much themselves. But they have decided to allow the localities where traffic is worst -- in Northern Virginia and Hampton Roads -- to increase their own taxes, particularly on commercial real estate and home sales."

WS Journal Provides Guide To Energy Security Flashpoints. The Wall Street Journal (1/25, A12, Cummins, Bahree, Minczeski, 2.04M) reports, "The past four years have seen the biggest oil-price spike in a generation. That shock has shown energy insecurity to be one of the chief political, economic and military challenges facing the world." The "worry is that the geopolitical and economic equilibrium that long enabled the oil industry to smoothly supply customers is a thing of the past." One concern is whether power has "permanently shifted to producers." Another "worry is turmoil in exporting nations." The "quest for energy security, in short, is a global scramble of power, money and ideas." The Journal provides a map-based "guide to flashpoints likely to shape the outcome of that scramble in 2007."

DOJ_NMG_0121206

Bolton Says US Iran Policy Flawed. The AP (1/25) reports former UN Ambassador John Bolton says the United States "may not be able to prevent Iran from acquiring nuclear weapons because the Bush administration is following a flawed diplomatic strategy." In an interview with Fox News airing Wednesday night, Bolton "said that contrary to administration claims, the U.N. Security Council resolution against Iran that was approved last month is 'very weak.'" The former envoy said, "The disjunction between that objective and the diplomacy we have been pursuing is ultimately going to be a problem for the president."

Fox News' Special Report (1/24, story 13, 3:20, Rosen) reported, "Bolton urged the White House to pursue regime change in Iran" and his "conservative views generally aligned with those of some other members of the President's foreign policy team, notably Vice President Cheney and Robert Joseph, the Undersecretary of State for Arms Control." According to Fox News, "Conservatives in the State Department bureaucracy blame the undersecretary for political affairs, Nicholas Burns, who served under President Clinton, and whose portfolio has included the Iran file, with ceding too much control to the Europeans negotiating directly with Tehran."

Khalilzad Promises Evidence On Iran's Activities In Iraq. The Los Angeles Times (1/25, Daragahi, 850K) reports outgoing US Ambassador in Iraq, Zalmay Khalilzad, "said Wednesday that he would soon reveal details he asserted would show Iranian interference in the country, in the latest round of diplomatic jousting between Washington and Tehran." Khalilzad told a group of Western journalists that American officials would provide details "in the coming days" about Iranian officials detained and interrogated in Baghdad and the Kurdish city of Irbil within the last month. The presentation, Khalilzad said, "would include details about who the detained Iranians are and what they were doing in Iraq, as well as information about alleged contraband coming across the Iran-Iraq border." The upcoming presentation, he said, is "a response to public comments by Iranian Ambassador Hassan Kazemi-Qomi, who this week publicly challenged Americans to show 'any shred of evidence that Iran is working to destabilize Iraq,' according to Iranian news agencies."

Iran Receives Russian Defense Missiles. The AP (1/25, Karimi) reports Iranian officials "said Wednesday that they have taken delivery of advanced Russian air defense missile systems -- weapons intended, according to one Russian news agency, to defend Tehran's major nuclear facilities." Iran's Minister of Defense, Mostafa Mohammad Najjar, "did not say how many missiles were delivered or when they arrived." In New York, spokesman for the US mission to the United Nations, Richard Grenell, called the development "troublesome given that Iran is the leading state sponsor of terror in the world."

Olmert Says Israel Will Response To Iranian Nuke Threat With "All Means At Our Disposal." The AP (1/25, Gutkin) reports Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert "devoted one of his most important policy speeches of the year Wednesday to a single topic -- Iran -- saying Israel will respond to a nuclear threat 'with all the means at our disposal.'" Addressing an annual security conference in Tel Aviv, he "said the international community has no choice but to act forcefully" against Iran and its president, Mahmoud Ahmedinajad, who has repeatedly called for Israel's destruction. "When the leader of a country announces, officially and publicly, his country's intention to wipe off the map another country, and creates those tools which will allow them to realize their stated threat, no nation has the right to even to weigh its position," Olmert said. The AP says Olmert's decision to "devote the high-profile speech to Iran reflected his country's growing concern over" Iran.

Timing Of Mideast Talks Questioned. In a news analysis, the New York Times (1/25, A10, Erlanger, 1.16M) writes, "It would be hard to imagine a less promising moment for the United States to restart serious Palestinian-Israeli peace negotiations." Six years after the last round of talks, "the Palestinian government is controlled by Hamas, which preaches Israel's destruction. Approval ratings for the Israeli prime minister are barely in double digits. Gaza and neighboring Lebanon are in turmoil. President Bush is weak." Despite these factors, the Bush administration "is holding a meeting on Feb. 2 of the so-called Quartet…to be followed by 'informal talks' between Israeli and Palestinian leaders, with help from [Secretary] Rice, about the shape of a final peace treaty and the nature of a Palestinian state beside Israel." The Times says that "expectations are purposely low" and notes that a "senior US official" said while it is unlikely that either Ehud Olmer or Mahmoud Abbas has the political strength to deliver big concessions, "sometimes it's best to try to buy in at the bottom."

DOJ_NMG_0121207

Musharraf Proposes Mideast Peace Initiative. AFP (1/25) reports Pakistan President Pervez Musharraf "said that he had agreed with five Arab leaders to develop a Muslim peace initiative for the Palestinian conflict, which he said lay at the root of worsening violence around the region." Speaking with reporters in the United Arab Emirates at the end of a five-nation Middle East tour, Musharraf said, "Destructive violence is going on in Iraq, Lebanon is mired in crisis, and the most dangerous aspects of these two are the visible sectarian undertones which cause a special concern to us in Pakistan."

Rice Announces $770 Million Aid Package For Lebanon. The AP (1/25, Gearan) reports Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice announced Wednesday that the US "will offer nearly $770 million to help the fragile democratic government in Lebanon" in a "tripling of US aid announced a day after deadly protests in Beirut underscored the country's deep political and sectarian divisions." The donation, which must be approved by Congress, "would include $220 million in military aid" for the purchase of "small arms, ammunition, spare parts and Humvees," US officials said. Tuesday's violent protests "underscore the world's duty to help the democratic government survive in Lebanon, Rice said." Rice will meet privately with Prime Minister Fuad Siniora Thursday, "patching up a relationship strained by Saniora's frustration that it took 34 days to get a United Nations cease-fire in the Israeli-Hezbollah war."

The New York Times (1/25, A8, Cooper, 1.16M) says the US aid package demonstrates the "level of concern about the deteriorating situation" in Lebanon, and "in many ways, the donor conference [in Paris] on Thursday will serve as a snapshot of the larger proxy war between the United States -- joined by its Sunni Arab allies and Europe -- and Iran and Syria. Lebanon, like Iraq, is a battleground in that war, and Mr. Siniora, a Sunni Muslim, is fighting for his political survival." However, "Just how much money it will take to prop up Mr. Siniora is in question." Assistant Secretary of State C. David Welch told reporters in Paris, "You will find that the United States will be very supportive of Lebanon at this conference. Of course, you all know the importance of our political voice; now we are going to put some money behind that." How much "Saudi Arabia and other Sunni Arab countries come up with will also be of interest, analysts say."

The AP (1/25, Keaten) also quotes Assistant Secretary Welch as saying, "The government of Lebanon may be stressed by what's going on, but I believe they are strong and will weather this crisis."

The Washington Times (1/25, Kralev, 88K) notes McCormack said Rice was accompanied by chief executives of US companies with plans to invest in Lebanon, although he did not name them. The spokesman told reporters, "Long after direct US government assistance has gone through the pipeline and been delivered, investment by foreign companies and US companies is going to continue to create jobs and opportunity in Lebanon."

AFP (1/25, Millikin) notes Rice "linked the latest US aid, and other pledges expected during Thursday's 30-nation donors meeting, to efforts to strengthen Siniora's government in a power struggle with Hezbollah and other Syrian-backed parties in Lebanon." Rice said she hoped the pro-Syrian camp "would not want to push Lebanon into open conflict and to kill lots of innocent Lebanese to pursue their political goals." A senior official accompanying Rice "said the direct aid will be tied to 'benchmarks' in the implementation of Siniora's five-year reform plan, which calls for raising some taxes and privatizing the country's electricity and mobile phone sectors."

Hariri's Son Urges Support From International Community. Saad Hariri, son of the late Rafik Hariri and majority leader of Lebanon's national parliament, writes in the Wall Street Journal (1/25, A19, 2.04M) that his country "is truly at a crossroads; the choices and actions Lebanese government officials and their supporters in the international community make are critical for what my country will look like in the future." This week's donor conference, he continues, "will be decisive for the future of Lebanon as a democratic and moderate Arab country with a liberal economy, and as a beacon of coexistence and tolerance for the entire region." Hariri notes that "while the people of Lebanon are free today, we are not free of foreign intervention," citing "outside powers" that are "supporting a move by a coalition of Lebanese parties to topple the elected government."

Nasrallah Says Hezbollah Won't Topple Lebanese Government. The New York Times (1/25, A9, Bakri, 1.16M) reports Hezbollah's Sheik Hassan Nasrallah said Wednesday that Lebanon's opposition movement "had decided to stop short of toppling the government of Fouad Siniora, fearing civil strife." He warned, though, that Hezbollah and its allies "would continue to ratchet up the pressure on Mr. Siniora in coming weeks and vowed not to back down on their demands."

DOJ_NMG_0121208

US Criticizes Iranian Overtures To Saudis. The Washington Times (1/25, Kralev, 88K) reports the United States Wednesday "criticized Iranian overtures to Saudi Arabia suggesting the two countries cooperate to resolve a political crisis between the Lebanese government of Prime Minister Fuad Siniora and the Shi'ite group Hezbollah." Tehran's proposal, made during a visit to Riyadh last week by Ali Larijani, head of the Supreme National Security Council, is "aimed at giving the Iranian-backed Hezbollah a bigger role in the Lebanese Cabinet," diplomats said. State Department spokesman Sean McCormack told reporters, "We certainly wouldn't support any effort to try to negotiate something over and above the heads of the Siniora government."

Defense Officials Confirm New Airstrike In Somalia. The AP (1/25, Burns) reports US defense officials Wednesday confirmed the United States launched a second airstrike in Somalia against suspected terrorist targets. The officials, "who spoke on condition of anonymity because the action was carried out in secret, provided few details about the strike by an Air Force AC-130 gunship earlier this week and were uncertain whether the intended target was killed." One official "suggested that early indications showed that no high-value target was killed or captured." At the Defense Department, spokesman Bryan Whitman declined to confirm any new strike but said in general that the United States is "going to go after al-Qaeda in the global war on terrorism wherever it takes us."

NYTimes Urges Washington To Broker Peace Accord. In an editorial, the New York Times (1/25, 1.16M) writes, "Thanks to an unusual and probably fleeting set of events, Somalia has a chance to return to the community of law-abiding and legitimate states. For a country that dissolved years ago into chronic clan warfare and became a way station for international terrorists, that would be an enormous gain -- and an enormous gain for the rest of the world. To make the most of this opportunity, Washington needs to move quickly, along with Arab and African leaders, to try to broker a political compromise between responsible leaders of the Islamic Courts Union…and the internationally endorsed transitional government installed in its place."

Rice Dismisses Report Pyongyang Is Helping Iran Prepare Nuke Test. AFP (1/25) reports Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice "sought to play down a report in a British newspaper that North Korea was helping Iran prepare an eventual nuclear test explosion." Responding to questions about a report published in The Daily Telegraph, Rice told reporters in Paris, "I don't see that it's based on anything that I've seen." Citing an unnamed senior European defense official, the newspaper "said that North Korea has agreed to share all the data it received from its nuclear test last year as both countries face Western pressures over the development of their own nuclear programs." The Secretary also said she had spoken with her South Korean counterpart Wednesday and the foreign ministers of China and Japan on Tuesday as part of efforts to hold a new round of six-party talks. Rice said, "We've had productive preparatory discussions with all of the parties, including the North Koreans, but there's not going to be an agreement until we're in the six-party format."

Greek Militants Claim Responsibility For Attack On US Embassy. The AP (1/25, Gatopoulos) reports, "A Greek militant group has claimed responsibility for a rocket attack on the US Embassy in Athens earlier this month, blaming American policy in Iraq and the Middle East for the strike." The "far-left" group Revolutionary Struggle issued a statement to the weekly Pontiki newspaper, its publisher Dimitris Benekos said Wednesday. He said the statement would be published on Thursday and police said forensic experts were examining the document. Benekos told the AP the five-page statement "explains why it chose the embassy as a target, linking (the attack) with US foreign policy in various parts of the world -- Afghanistan, Iran, Iraq, Palestine and so on."

British Defense Ministry Denies Rift With US. AFP (1/25) reports the British defense ministry "denied there was any rift with the United States over the two countries' plans for troop levels in Iraq following comments made" by outgoing US Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad to the BBC. The ambassador said the US "would like the British to co-ordinate and for us to have a joint plan." A ministry spokeswoman said, "There is no tension between US and UK objectives and activities in Iraq," stressing that "this is the strategy of transition, which we are working towards, as are the Americans."

Hu To Visit Sudan For Talks On Darfur Conflict. The New York Times (1/25, A6, French, 1.16M) reports Chinese officials announced Wednesday that President Hu Jintao "would visit Sudan in early February and would seek a diplomatic solution" to the conflict in Darfur. As part of an eight-country tour of Africa, a Foreign Ministry spokesman "said that China would use its diplomatic influence to encourage a settlement of the Darfur crisis, but that China would not publicly pressure Sudan or threaten it with sanctions." Assistant Foreign Minister Zhai Jun said at a news conference in Beijing that "using pressure and imposing sanctions is not practical and will not help settle the issue."

DOJ_NMG_0121209

US Analyst Criticized For Support Of Spy. The Washington Times (1/25, Gertz, 88K) reports a "senior US intelligence analyst has been formally criticized for 'poor judgment' after writing a letter and e-mails in support of a convicted former Defense Intelligence Agency analyst," US intelligence officials said. Lonnie Henley, the deputy national intelligence officer (NIO) for East Asia, "was given a letter of reprimand several months ago after an investigation within the Office of the Director of National Intelligence (DNI)." Henley was "a close friend and protégé of former DIA analyst Ronald Montaperto, who was convicted in June on espionage charges that included supplying secrets to Chinese military intelligence." DNI spokesman Carl Kropf "declined to comment on the reprimand, noting that it was an administrative matter."

"Blackmail Journalism" Seen As Growing Problem In China. The Washington Post (1/25, A1, Cody, 690K) reports in a front page article on "the blackmail journalism metastasizing through China's news media," which journalists and officials say Chinese reporters "are demanding…hush money with increasing regularity from businesses and government agencies in exchange for the withholding of unfavorable news." In "many ways," the Post says "blackmail journalism grew naturally out of a system in which Communist Party censors control the news rigorously, barring reports that could be seen as unfavorable to the party or contrary to the government's political goals."

Reactions To China Missile Test Mixed. Bruce Berkowitz, a research fellow at the Hoover Institution at Stanford University, writes in the Wall Street Journal (1/25, A18, 2.04M) that while China's foreign ministry acknowledged Tuesday "what the world press had reported for almost two weeks: a test of an anti-satellite weapon in space," the "danger now is that partisans and pundits will overreact. Some will claim the launch represents a new threat to the United States. Others will warn of the militarization of space." However, Berkowitz says, "They are both wrong. The real threat is that Washington will miss an opportunity to move China along the path to more diplomatic openness and democracy, and deter it from aggression against its neighbors and American interests."

Meanwhile, Elizabeth Economy, director of Asia studies at the Council on Foreign Relations, writes in the Washington Post (1/25, A25, 690K) that the test "has sparked a political firestorm, as analysts have tried to ascertain who in China knew what when and to what end." But Economy says the "truth is that China…exerts an unsettling and often negative impact on the world," and the missile strike "also underscores perhaps the greatest challenge of China's rise as a global power: The lack of transparency, official accountability and rule of law that defines China on the domestic front plays poorly on the international stage." She notes that "Chinese leaders' inability to be forthcoming on matters of international importance -- whether SARS, the Harbin pollution disaster or this missile strike -- erodes whatever goodwill and trust they earn from their tireless sojourns abroad and suggests that they are not ready for prime time."

Russia Defense Minister Criticizes US Missile Plans. The Washington Times/AP (1/25, Isachenkov) reports Russia's defense minister Wednesday "harshly criticized US plans to deploy missile-defense sites in Central Europe, saying Moscow doesn't trust the US explanation that they are intended to counter missile threats posed by Iran and North Korea." During a trip to India, Sergei Ivanov said neither Iran nor North Korea has or will have a capability to build missiles that can reach Europe. Speaking to reporters, Ivanov said, "They don't and won't have intercontinental ballistic missiles. And a question comes: whom it's directed against?"

Putin's India Visit Seen As Sign Growing Ties. The New York Times (1/25, A14, Sengupta, 1.16M) reports from New Delhi, "A new nuclear accord, booming trade and an ever closer partnership with the United States notwithstanding, the guest of honor this week at India's Republic Day ceremony, an annual display of military pomp, will be a symbol of New Delhi's newest old friend: President Vladimir V. Putin of Russia." Putin's visit is seen "as testament to the enduring ties between India and Russia," which "have been revived by the strategic demands of a prospering India, namely energy and arms."

DOJ_NMG_0121210

Plot To Smuggle Uranium Shows Gaps In Anti-Proliferation Efforts. On its front page, the New York Times (1/25, A1, Sheets, Broad, 1.16M) details a plot carried out last January by Russian Oleg Khinsagov, who smuggled "100 grams of uranium so refined that it could help fuel an atom bomb" into Georgia. The case "has alarmed officials because they had thought that new security precautions had tamped down the nuclear black market that developed in the 1990s, after the Soviet Union collapsed." The Times adds, "An examination of the episode, and a similar one in 2003, suggests that the region's political instability and culture of rampant corruption continue to provide a fertile breeding ground for illicit commerce in atomic materials." This latest uranium seizure, said American Ambassador in Tbilisi, John F. Tefft, "highlights how smuggling and loose border control, associated with Georgia's separatist conflicts," pose a threat "not just to Georgia but to all the international community." But "what is most worrisome about the two most recent case, nuclear experts say, is the material itself: in large enough quantities, it could provide a terrorist with an instant solution to the biggest challenge in making a nuclear weapon, obtaining the fuel."

Litvinenko's Poisoning Jump Starts Development Of New Radiation Exposure Treatments. Under the headline, "Death Of Spy Who Ingested Polonium Spurs Drug Makers," the Wall Street Journal (1/25, B1, Levine, 2.04M) reports that following last November's case in which polonium-210, "a rare radioactive isotope, was used to murder former Russian intelligence agent Alexander Litvinenko" Ovation Pharmaceuticals Inc. of Deerfield, Ill., "got a call from the National Institute of Allergy and Infectious Diseases: Could the company brief the agency on Chemet? Ovation is one of a few US drug companies and laboratories that are attracting new attention because of Mr. Litvinenko's death in London from poisoning by polonium-210." The Journal adds, "Last fall, the National Institute of Allergy and Infectious Diseases in Bethesda, Md., and the Pentagon separately offered funding for research into promising radiation-injury treatments." Now, "pharmaceutical companies are giving notice that drugs they have developed, or are developing, for cancer and other diseases can also be used for exposure to radioactive elements, including possibly polonium-210. Most must be taken within hours of exposure to be effective."

Davos Forum Highlights Globalization Debate. The Wall Street Journal (1/25, A10, Walker, 2.04M)) reports that a "new refrain is emerging in Davos this year: Globalization isn't working for everyone. Stagnating wages and rising job insecurity in developed countries are creating popular disenchantment with the free movement of goods, capital and people across borders. If unchecked, popular fears could turn into a political backlash that could lead to protectionism -- or at least make broad free-trade agreements harder to achieve in the future." In an interview last week, German Chancellor Angela Merkel said, "The anxiety is there, because we have competitors that didn't exist 10 or 15 years ago." Governments in the developed world, "she said, have to persuade their own middle class -- a group used to a relatively stable economy in the postwar decades -- to embrace a life of constant change and challenge."

Liberia's President Seen As Making Progress During First Year In Office. The Los Angeles Times (1/25, A1, Dixon, 850K) profiles Liberian President Ellen Johnson-Sirleaf, who it calls "a feisty, ambitious economist trying to turn around one of the most damaged and traumatized countries on Earth, with a ferociousness that has earned her another nickname: the Iron Lady." Today, a year after Johnson-Sirleaf took office, "the most visible progress in this grimy, bullet-pocked capital is a few wan strings of fairy lights draped on dilapidated street awnings" after spending "years without electricity." Johnson-Sirleaf is "under no illusions: A few more months or a year without bringing jobs and her people's love and admiration will themselves blink out. But for now she offers hope of a new beginning to a nation torn by war's atrocities."

OPEC President Not Worried About Recent Slide In Oil Prices. The Wall Street Journal (1/25, A10, Smallman, 2.04M) reports, "OPEC's new president said that he would like higher oil prices than current levels, but that the long-term outlook was more important than a near-term price slide." Mohammed al-Hamli, who is also oil minister for the United Arab Emirates, "said he would be at ease if the cartel's reference basket of 11 of its members' crude oils was about $55 a barrel. His statement implied a price for U.S. markets of roughly $60 a barrel. U.S. benchmark crude-oil futures settled yesterday at $55.37, up 33 cents." Al-Hamli's "remarks underscore some of the uncertainty OPEC faces amid the volatile oil prices of recent weeks."

DOJ_NMG_0121211

THE BIG PICTURE:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages.

Los Angeles Times:
"Senate Panel Opposes Troop Buildup In Iraq."
"Liberians Love Their Iron Lady, For Now."
"Tightwad Bank Is Beyond Saving."
"U.S. Motorists Cutting Back A Bit."
"Mayor Keeps High Profile On D.C. Trip."

USA Today:
"Senators Say 'No' On Bush Iraq Plan."
"Distractions Challenge Teen Drivers."
"Cities See Crime Surge As Threat To Their Revival."

New York Times:
"Big States' Plan for Earlier Primaries Scrambles Race."
"Bush Iraq Plan Is Condemned by Senate Panel."
"Congress Office Forecasts Drop in U.S. Deficit."
"Smuggler's Plot Highlights Fear Over Uranium."
"At the Libby Trial, Hints of Intrigue and Betrayal."
"Police Won't Use $140 Million Radio System."
"Of Gay Sheep, Science and Peril of Bad Publicity."
"Hedge Fund Chiefs, With Cash, Join Political Fray."

Washington Post:
"Senators Rebuff Bush On Troop Plan."
"Bush Plans New Focus On Afghan Recovery."
"New Teen Taunt: You Call Those Advanced Classes?."
"Obama's Appeal to Blacks Remains An Open Question."
"Defending Iraq War, Defiant Cheney Cites 'Enormous Successes'."

Washington Times:
"Bush Rebuke Advances."
"GOP Renews 'Amnesty' Defiance."
"Rumsfield's Transition Raises Questions."
"Obama On Tightrope In Bid For Black Vote."
"Is Jimi The King Of Pop?"
"Modern-Day Jonah Escapes Jaws Of Killer Shark."

Detroit Free Press:
"Wary GOP Lawmakers Bail On Bush."
"Record Number of Region's Homeowners Are In trouble As Economy Flounders."
"A Battle Takes Shape Over Fuel Rules."

Atlanta Journal-Constitution:
"DeKalb Police Get Oversight."
"No Golden Net For New Dept Chief."
"Drive For New Cities Hits Detour."
"Questions Linger, But Cops Insist Vick's Case 'Is Over.'"

Houston Chronicle:
"Bonuses In HISD Strike A Nerve."
"Students Ill After Pills Given Out 'Like Candy'."
"Senate Panel Lays Into Bush War Plans."
"A Bright Spot Amid Days Of Gloom."
"After Decades Of Waiting Arrest Made In Slayings."
"Doctors Find A Long Wait To See Patients On Texas."

Story Lineup From Last Night's Network News:
ABC: Senate-Iraq Resolution; Senate Iraq Resolution-Analysis; Bush Health Care Plan; Bush Health Care Plan-Analysis; Sen. Kerry Not Running; Helicopter Crash-Iraq; Iraqi Children; A Soldier's Story; Duke Lacrosse Rape Case; Norovirus Outbreak; Pope John Paul II.
CBS: Senate-Iraq Resolution; Cheney Interview; Troops On Patrol-Iraq; Afghanistan War; Bush Energy Plan; Climate Change Report; Sen. Kerry Not Running; Medical Care Discounts; Hurricane Katrina Forgotten; Fallen Soldier; Reality TV.
NBC: Senate-Iraq Resolution; State Of The Union-Aftermath; Iraq Resolution-Analysis; Sen. Kerry Not Running; State Of The Union-Public Response; Iraq Sectarian Violence; Cold Case; Terrorism Plot-London; Birth Control Pills; Stock Market; Helping The Grieving.

Story Lineup From This Morning's Radio News Broadcasts:
ABC: Senate Committee-Iraq Resolution; Cheney-Defends Iraq Strategy On CNN; Senate Committee-Petraeus Nomination; Baghdad-Motorcycle Bomb; Chávez-Castro; MO-Powerball Lottery Winner; Tokyo Stock Exchange; R&B Singer Brandy-Car Accident Investigation; Noriega-Panama Return; CareerBuilder.com Job Satisfaction Survey.
CBS: House Republicans-Strategy Session; Senate Committee-Iraq Resolution; Libby Trial; MS-42-Year-Old Racial Murder Case; IN-Abducted Woman; John Kerry-2008 Plans.
NPR: Bush-Missouri; John Kerry-2008 Plans; Iraqi Court Puts Off Death Penalty Decision On Saddam Deputy; Baghdad-Motorcycle Bomb; Congress-Airlines Merger; US Ambassador To Canada-Terrorist Watch List Controversy;

DOJ_NMG_0121212

Georgian Authorities Arrest Man For Trying To Sell Uranium; Putin-India.

WASHINGTON'S SCHEDULE:

Today's Events In Washington.

White House:

PRESIDENT BUSH — Tours Saint Luke's East-Lee's Summit, Lee's Summit, Mo.; participates in a roundtable on healthcare initiatives. Saint Luke's East-Lee's Summit, Lee's Summit, Mo.

VICE PRESIDENT CHENEY — No public schedule.

US Senate: 9:15 a.m. FOREIGN RELATIONS _ Full Committee. Hearing on Iraqi reconstrtuction strategy. State Department Iraq Coordinator David Satterfield. Location: Room 216, Hart.

9:30 a.m. ARMED SERVICES _ full Committee. Hearing on the futurte in Iraq. Former Defense Secretary William Perry, Dennis Ross of the Washington Institute for Near East Policy, retired Gen. John Keane, former Army vice chief of staff. Location: Room 106, Dirksen.

9:30 a.m. BANKING, HOUSING AND URBAN AFFAIRS _ Full Committee. Hearing on billing, marketing and disclosure practices of the credit card industry and their impact on consumers. Location: Room 538, Dirksen.

9:30 a.m. ENERGY AND NATURAL RESOURCES _ Full Committee. Hearing on oil and gas resources on the Outer Continental Shelf and areas available for leasing in the Gulf of Mexico. Assistant Interior Secretary Stephen Allred, Chairman and CEO J. Larry Nichols of Devon Energy, New Jersey Environmental Protection Commissioner Lisa Jackson, Chevron Corp. Vice President Paul Siegele, Athen Manuel of the Sierra Club, Majorie McKeithen of the Louisiana Mineral Resources Department. Location: Room 366, Dirksen.

9:30 a.m. INDIAN AFFAIRS _ Full Committee. Organizational meeting. Location: Room 485, Russell.

10 a.m. BUDGET _ Full Committee. Hearing on the budget and the CBO outlook. CBO Director Peter Orszag. Location: Room 608, Dirksen.

10 a.m. JUDICIARY _ Full Committee. Organizational meeting, and consideration of pending judicial nominations. Location: Room 226, Dirksen.

2:30 p.m. FOREIGN RELATIONS _ full Committee. Hearing on political strategy in Iraq. Laith Kubba of the National Endowment for Democracy, Ahmed Hashim of the Naval War College, Qubad Talabani of the Kurdistan Regional Government, and Toby Dodge of the International Institute for Strategic Studies. Location: Room 216, Hart.

2:30 p.m. HOMELAND SECURITY AND GOVENRMENTAL AFFAIRS _ Oversight and Government Management, the Federal Workforce and the District of Columbia Subcommittee. Hearing on the federal government's efforts to develop a foreign language strategy. Assistant Air Force Secretary Michael Dominguez, Holly Kuzmich of the Education Department, Everette Jordan of the FBI, Rita Oleksak of the American Council on the Teaching of Foreign Language, Michael Petro of the Committee for Economic Development, and Diane Birckbichler of the Foreign Language Center at Ohio State University. Location: Room 342, Dirksen.

2:30 p.m. SELECT INTELLIGENCE _ Full Committee. Hearing on intelligence revision proposals regarding the FBI and Homeland Security. Deputy FBI Direcvtor John Pistole, Charles Allen of DHS, D.C. Police Chief Cathy Lanier, West Virginia Public Safety Secretary James Spears. Location: Room 219, Hart.

US House: No Scheduled Events.

Other: MAYORS _ The United States Conference of Mayors holds its 75th Winter Meeting. Highlights: 8 a.m. Mayors and Business Leaders Plenary Breakfast featuring awards presentations and address by Sen. Hilary Rodham Clinton, D-N.Y. 9:30 a.m. Children, Health and Human Services Standing Committee, with Sen. Jack Reed. 12 p.m. News conference on climate protection, with Mayors Douglas Palmer of Trenton, Manuel Diaz of Miami, Greg Nickels of Seattle, Rep. Edward Markey, others. 12:30 p.m. - 2 p.m. Luncheon, featuring release of Report: 2007 U.S. Metro Economies: Engines of Americas Growth, with Kwame M. Kilpatrick, Mayor of Detroit, chairman, US Conference of Mayors, Council for the New American City; presentation: 2006 Municipal Water Conservation Achievement Awards, with Martin J. Chavez, Mayor of Albuquerque; Mayor Dan Coody of Fayetteville; Donald L. Correll, president & CEO. American Water; announcement of the 2007 City Water Taste Test Competition. 2 p.m. News conference on poverty in America, with Los Angeles Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa, Chicago Mayor Richard Daley, Miami Mayor Manuel Diaz, Detroit Mayor Kwame Kilpatrick, others. 2:30 p.m. - 3 p.m. Plenary session with address by Sen. Norm Coleman, R-Minn. Location: Capital Hilton, 16th and K Sts. NW.

DOJ_NMG_0121213

HEALTH CARE _ Families USA holds its annual Health Action Conference. Highlights: 9 a.m. - 10:30 a.m. Opening plenary session with Sen. Barack Obama, D-Ill.; and Uwe Reinhardt, Professor of Economics & Public Affairs, Princeton University. 12:30 p.m. - 2:30 p.m. Lunch with Sen. Gordon Smith, R-Ore., and announcement of ``When An Apple a Day Isn't Enough" National Essay Contest Grand-Prize Winners. 2:15 p.m. Plenary with Sen. Sherrod Brown, D-Ohio. Location: Renaissance Mayflower Hotel, 1127 Connecticut Ave. NW.

INDIAN COUNTRY _ 8:30 a.m. The National Congress of American Indians, others, host an Indian Country Congressional Breakfast, with a panel discussion with Sen. Byron Dorgan, former Sen. Ben Nighthorse Campbell, others. Location: Room 385, Russell.

LEGAL REFORM _ 9 a.m. The Washington Legal Foundation sponsors a briefing on the state and federal civil justice reform agenda for 2007, with Victor Schwartz, Chair, Public Policy Group, Shook, Hardy and Bacon, Steven Hantler, Assistant General Counsel, Daimler Chrysler, and President Sherman Hoyce of the American Tort Reform Association. Location: 2009 Massachusetts Ave. NW.

KASHMIR _ 10:30 a.m. - 12 p.m. The Brookings Institution hosts a panel discussion with Navnita Chadha Behera and other leading experts to discuss her new book, ``Demystifying Kashmir," and its policy recommendations. Behera will discuss the upcoming meeting between Prime Minister Singh and President Musharraf, the effect this meeting will have on the peace process, and the internal politics of Kashmir on both sides of the line of control. Participants include: Thomas Pickering, former U.S. ambassador to India; Hasan Askari Rizvi, former visiting professor of Pakistan studies, Columbia University; and Ashley Tellis, senior associate, Carnegie Endowment for International Peace. Location: Brookings Institution, Falk Auditorium, 1775 Massachusetts Ave. NW.

IRAN-NUCLEAR _ 12 p.m. The Cato Institute holds a briefing on Iran's nuclear program and its costs and benefits regarding American policy, with Ted Galen Carpenter of the institute and Justin Logan of the institute. Location: Room B-354, Rayburn.

OMAN _ 12 p.m. Amb. Hunaina Sultan Ahmed Al Mughairy, the first woman to represent an Arab nation as an ambassador in Washington, gives a lecture on promoting economic growth in the Arab world, sponsored by George Washington University. Location: City View Room, 7th floor, 1957 E St. NW.

US COURTS-INTERNATIONAL _ 12 p.m. - 2 p.m. The American Society of International Law, in conjunction with the Washington Foreign Law Society, hosts a luncheon talk on the use of foreign and international law in U.S. courts by Dr. Rubens Medina, Law Librarian, Director of Legal Research, and Director of the Global Legal Information Network at the Law Library of Congress. Location: City Club of Washington, Columbia Square, 555 13th St. NW.

WAR CHANGES _ 2 p.m. - 4 p.m. The Straus Military Reform Project holds a press briefing on retired Army Maj. Donald E. Vandergriff's newest work ``Raising the Bar: Creating and Nurturing Adaptability to Deal with the Changing Face of War." Location: Choate Room, first floor, Carnegie Building, 1779 Massachusetts Ave. NW.

HOMELAND SECURITY _ 3 p.m. Homeland Security Civil Rights and Civil Liberties Director Daniel Sutherland presents the ``Introduction to Arab American and Muslim American Cultures for DHS Personnel." Location: American-Arab Anti Discrimination Committee, 1732 Wisconsin Ave. NW.

HOLOCAUST DENIAL _ 4:30 p.m. The Holocaust Museum and the State Department hold a briefing on U.S. efforts to combat denial of the Holocaust through the United Nations. Participants include Deputy Assistant Secretary of State Mark Lagon. Location: Classroom B, Holocaust Museum.

THE MIDDLE CLASS _ 6 p.m. - 8 p.m. There will be a party celebrating the the publication of Thom Hartmanns Book, ``Screwed: The Undeclared War Against the Middle Class and What We Can Do About It." Location: Virginia Room, second floor, Renaissance Mayflower Hotel, 1127 Connecticut Ave. NW.

IRAQ _ 6:30 p.m. George Washington University sponsors a town hall meeting on the future in Iraq, with security experts, others, including Christopher Kojm of the 9/11 Discourse Project. Location: Room 213, 1957 E St. NW.

DOJ_NMG_0121214

Copyright 2007 by the Bulletin News Network, Inc. Reproduction without permission prohibited. Editorial content is drawn from thousands of newspapers, national magazines, national and local television programs, and radio broadcasts. The Attorney General's News Briefing is published five days a week for the Office of Public Affairs by BulletinNews, which creates custom news briefings for government and corporate leaders and also publishes the White House Bulletin, Frontrunner and Washington Morning Update. We can be found on the Web at BulletinNews.com, or called at (703) 749-0040.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL'S NEWS BRIEFING

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: THURSDAY, JANUARY 25, 2007 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Gonzales' Remarks On Habeas Spark Debate 3
No Penalty For Attorney Who Leaked Transcript Of Padilla Call .. 4
Chilling Video Shown At London Terror Trial 4
US-Georgian Operation Thwarts Sale Of Weapons-Grade Uranium 4

Homeland Response:

Taheri-Azar Pleads Not Guilty To SUV Attack Charges 4
Senate Unlikely To Approve Cargo Screening Provisions Of House Bill 5
Biden Proposes Tax Increase To Boost Homeland Security Spending 5
TSA Said To Have Chosen Lockheed For TWIC Contract 5
Bush Criticized For Speech's Lack Of Katrina Mention 5

War News:

Senate Panel Approves Resolution Against Bush's Iraq Strategy 6
Senate Panel Approves Petreaus Nomination 9
"Defiant" Cheney Defends US Actions In Iraq 9
Cheney Thinks Bin Laden Is Alive, Defends US Efforts Against Al Qaeda 10
Rumsfeld Remains "Nonpaid Consultant" To DOD During Transition 10
Gates Orders Reduction Of Stop-Loss Policy 10
White House Quieting Planning Overhaul Of Afghan Mission 10
US, Iraqi Forces Fighting Insurgents House By House In Baghdad 11
High-Ranking Officers Killed In Copter Crash 12
Spanish Court Issues International Search and Capture Warrant For US Soldiers 12
Military Tests Nonlethal Ray Gun 13
Military Scholar Urges Increase In Defense Spending 13

DOJ:

Arkansas Lawyer Challenges Authority For US Attorney's Appointment 13
Unisys To Continue Supporting DOJ Asset Tracking System..... 14

Corporate Scandals:

Former Enron Official Begins 18-Month Prison Term..... 14

Criminal Law:

Former Official Says Libby Sought To Blame CIA For Faulty Iraq Intel 15
Mayors Blame Federal Government For Crime Surge 16
Navy Contractor Jailed In Mexico On Kidnapping Charges 16
DOJ Asked To Probe "Hounddog" Movie For Possible Porn Law Violations 16
New Mexico Treasurer Sentenced To Prison For Extortion Plot. 17
FBI Arrests Memphis Police Officer On Money Laundering Charges 17
Neteller Co-Founder Vows To Fight US Charges 17
FBI Arrests UC Riverside Official On Bribery Charges 17
Federal Investigators Widening Pirro Probe 17
Florida Man Convicted Of Defrauding Medicare With Stolen Patient IDs 18
Chicago Investment Adviser Convicted Of Fraud 18
New York Man Pleads Guilty To Scamming $200,000 From Priests 18
Former BLA Members Were Living "Comparatively Quiet Lives."18
Convicted Cop Killer Had Stolen Pennsylvania Man's ID 19
Coke Formula Theft Trial Delayed By Dispute Over Sensitive Documents 19
Duncan "Confession" To FBI Insufficient To Bring Murder Charges 19
Federal Prosecutors Reveal Deal With Jeffs Over Seized Documents 19
Closing Arguments Made At Federal Abortion Murder Trial 19
Texas Man Sentenced To 10 Months In Prison For Red Cross Relief Fraud 20
NC Bar Brings Ethics Charges Against Prosecutor In Duke Case20
Mortgage Fraud On The Rise Across The Nation 20
Prosecutors Want DeLay Charge Reinstated 20
NYTimes Criticizes Mandatory Sentencing Laws 20

Civil Law:

PBS&J Settles Contract Claims With DOJ For $6.4 Million 21
Winners Of FBI Wrongful Death Suit Drop Additional Claims Against Agents 21

Civil Rights:

Former Deputy Charged With 1964 Racial Murders 21

Federal, State Authorities To Monitor Police-Involved Shootings In Georgia ... 22
Cleveland Police Officer Under Probe For Allegedly Beating Drug Suspect ... 22
Testimony Begins In Former Agent's Discrimination Suit Against FBI ... 22
Port Chester, NY, Challenges DOJ Suit On Election System ... 23
NAACP Criticizes Medicare For Not Covering Heart Drug For Blacks ... 23

Antitrust:

Senators Ponder Implications Of Airline Merger ... 23
CME To Dominate Leadership Of Merger CME-CBOT ... 24
Juror Dismissed From Iowa Microsoft Trial ... 25
Italian Fuel Refiner Denies Price-Fixing Scheme ... 25
EU Expands Anti-Cartel Efforts With Fines ... 25
Norway Rebuffs Apple's ITunes ... 25
Siemens To Buy UGS For $3.5 Billion ... 25
Brazilian Legal Dispute Threatens CSN's Bid For Corus ... 26

Environment:

Bush Takes Fuel Efficiency Message To Delaware ... 26
Navy Sonar Exemption Angers Environmentalists ... 28
Appeals Court Blocks Craig Bid To Eliminate Fish Agency ... 28

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

"Operation Ragdoll" Nets 18 Arrests ... 28
NFL Players To Face Tougher Drug-Testing Rules ... 28
California Meeting Focuses On Anti-Gang Efforts ... 29
Former ATF Agent Testifies She Feared Corrupt Officer ... 29
Maine Woman Sentenced For Federal Firearms Violation ... 29

Immigration:

GOP Opponents Of Bush Immigration Plan Vow To Fight ... 30

Tax:

Judge Bars New York Tax Preparation Firm From Practice ... 30
WSJournal Notes Move To Cut, Abolish State Income Taxes ... 30

Congress-Administration:

Bush Health Care Proposals Could Face Hard Time On Capitol Hill ... 30
CBO Predicts Budget Surplus In 2012 If Tax Cuts Are Not Renewed ... 31
New Bush Education Proposals Would Boost Vouchers, Charter Schools ... 32
Signs Of Hope Seen For Bipartisan Cooperation ... 33
Webb Response Speech Gets Strong Reactions From Both Sides ... 35
SMU Faculty Continue To Question Bush Library Plans ... 35
Bush To Ask For Fast-Track Authority Next Week ... 35
Tax Breaks Could Stall Senate Minimum Wage Bill ... 35
Pelosi, Hoyer Relationship Appears To Have Improved ... 36
Mica Angered By Perceived Slight At Transportation Meeting ... 36
Democratic Control Of House Could Benefit Philip Morris ... 36
House Restores Voting Rights To Delegates ... 36
Cheney Says Question About Daughter's Pregnancy "Out Of Line." ... 37
Higgins Exits Church After Sermon Criticized Stem Cell Vote ... 37
Oldest-Ever Senate Showing Signs Of Aging ... 37
NTEU Challenges Federal Intern Program ... 37
Union Launches Organizing Campaign At GAO ... 38
White House Social Secretary Berman Stepping Down ... 38

Other News:

Dow Reaches Its 26th Record Since October ... 38
Kerry Won't Seek Democratic Nomination In 2008 ... 38
Obama Calls Claim He Studied At Madrassah "Scurrilous." ... 40
McCain Tops GOP Competitors In Arizona Poll ... 40
Republicans Wonder Whether Giuliani Is In A Stall ... 40
Four Large States Could Move Primaries Up To February ... 40
Gingrich Backs Bill To Make English Official Language ... 41
Bergen County Seen As Warning For GOP ... 41
Washington School Board Faces Backlash Over Ban On Gore Film ... 41
Steele To Head GOPAC ... 41
WPost Says Virginia GOP Finally Serious About Transportation Funding ... 41
WS Journal Provides Guide To Energy Security Flashpoints ... 42
Bolton Says US Iran Policy Flawed ... 42
Timing Of Mideast Talks Questioned ... 42
Rice Announces $770 Million Aid Package For Lebanon ... 43
Defense Officials Confirm New Airstrike In Somalia ... 44
Rice Dismisses Report Pyongyang Is Helping Iran Prepare Nuke Test ... 44
Greek Militants Claim Responsibility For Attack On US Embassy44
British Defense Ministry Denies Rift With US ... 44
Hu To Visit Sudan For Talks On Darfur Conflict ... 44
Reactions To China Missile Test Mixed ... 45
Russia Defense Minister Criticizes US Missile Plans ... 45
Plot To Smuggle Uranium Shows Gaps In Anti-Proliferation Efforts ... 45
Litvinenko's Poisoning Jump Starts Development Of New Radiation Exposure Treatments ... 45
Davos Forum Highlights Globalization Debate ... 46
Liberia's President Seen As Making Progress During First Year In Office ... 46
OPEC President Not Worried About Recent Slide In Oil Prices ... 46

The Big Picture:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages ... 46

Washington's Schedule:

Today's Events In Washington ... 47

Online Version

Visit www.bulletinnews.com/justice for searchable archive, interactive story index, and links to complete stories where appropriate.

DOJ_NMG_0121217

TERRORISM NEWS:

Gonzales' Remarks On Habeas Spark Debate. The San Francisco Chronicle (1/24, Page A1, Egelko) reports, "One of the Bush administration's most far-reaching assertions of government power was revealed quietly last week when Attorney General Alberto Gonzales testified that habeas corpus -- the right to go to federal court and challenge one's imprisonment -- is not protected by the Constitution. … 'The Constitution doesn't say every individual in the United States or every citizen is hereby granted or assured the right of habeas,' Gonzales told Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., during a Senate Judiciary Committee hearing Jan. 17." The Chronicle continues, "Gonzales acknowledged that the Constitution declares 'habeas corpus shall not be suspended unless ... in cases of rebellion or invasion the public safety may require it.' But he insisted that 'there is no express grant of habeas in the Constitution.'" The Chronicle adds, "Specter was incredulous, asking how the Constitution could bar the suspension of a right that didn't exist -- a right, he noted, that was first recognized in medieval England as a shield against the king's power to dispatch troublesome subjects to royal dungeons. … Later in the hearing, Gonzales described habeas corpus as 'one of our most cherished rights' and noted that Congress had protected that right in the 1789 law that established the federal court system. But he never budged from his position on the absence of constitutional protection -- a position that seemingly would leave Congress free to reduce habeas corpus rights or repeal them altogether." The Chronicle notes, "Justice Department spokesman Brian Roehrkasse said this week that Gonzales stood by his remarks but was asserting only that the text of the Constitution does not guarantee habeas corpus. The attorney general recognizes, Roehrkasse said, that the Supreme Court has declared 'the Constitution protects (habeas corpus) as it existed at common law' in England. Any such rights, he added, would not apply to foreigners held as enemy combatants."

In a column for the Weekly Standard (1/25), DC Attorney Adam J. White writes, "Gonzales's answer, though not unassailable, enjoys much historical support. Although the Constitution expressly provides that the writ of habeas corpus may only be 'suspended' in certain circumstances, it does not expressly provide that the writ is implemented in the first instance without an affirmative enactment by Congress. … Specter takes what may well be the more intuitive reading of the Constitution's provision: that Article I, Section 9 presumes that the privilege of habeas corpus exists absent a valid suspension. (Indeed, it's phrased in a manner similar to the First Amendment: 'Congress shall make no law . . . abridging the freedom of speech,' clearly presumes that there is a freedom of speech.) … But history suggests that Gonzales (whom Rolling Stone promptly deemed the 'Human Constitution Shredder') may well be correct. At the 1787 constitutional convention, the first habeas provision, proposed by South Carolina's Charles Pinckney, not only limited habeas's suspension, but also expressly created the writ. The final version, though, included only the former provision; when it was presented to the States for ratification, four States criticized the lack of an express habeas grant, and proposed alternatives resembling Pinckney's. … Shortly thereafter, the first Congress enacted the Judiciary Act of 1789, expressly granting Supreme Court justices and other federal judges the authority to grant the writ. If, as Specter suggests, the Constitution itself granted the writ, then such a statute would seem utterly superfluous." White adds, "None of this is to say that Specter is, in the end, certainly wrong. Specter's reading of the provision certainly enjoys as much--if not more--support than Gonzales's. Again, the Constitution's mention of the writ appears to imply its existence. Furthermore, in Federalist 84, Alexander Hamilton reassured his readers that the Constitution included the "establishment" of the writ, thereby suggesting that further statutory provision was unnecessary. … Surely the issue is due to be debated for another 200 years. In the meantime, it's probably premature for either Specter or Gonzales to declare victory."

In a piece in the Fort Worth (TX) Star-Telegram (1/25), editorial writer Linda P. Campbell writes, "Justice Robert Jackson famously wrote in 1949 that the Bill of Rights isn't 'a suicide pact.' … But loyalty to George W. Bush increasingly seems to be one -- at least in the way that Attorney General Alberto Gonzales reads the Constitution." Campbell continues, "Even if you believe, as I do, that the Bush administration has upset the balance among the three branches of government by arrogating excessive authority to the executive branch, you can understand that the president's lawyers would zealously defend his power. … When Gonzales switched from White House counsel to attorney general, though, he presumably became the people's top lawyer, defender of our rights. Instead, he sounds all too often like the evader in chief, the astounder, the contradicter, the rationalizer extraordinaire. … Just last week, he told members of the Senate Judiciary Committee that White House officials had discussed whether a secret wiretapping program unilaterally ordered by the president could be conducted under the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act, which is supposed to govern that kind of information gathering. … Those discussions were had, Gonzales testified, because of 'concerns raised' and 'questions asked here in this committee.' Odd that he should say that. Because he also has claimed that he started looking into bringing the wiretapping program under FISA as soon as he became AG in 2005, well before public disclosure of the program triggered alarms and questions from the Judiciary Committee. … But if that inconsistency eluded attention, his stubborn obtuseness about the Constitution did not." Campbell adds, "Gonzales and Sen. Arlen Specter, a Pennsylvania Republican, got into a did so/did not debate about whether the Supreme Court's 2004 ruling in Rasul v. Bush dealt with the statutory or constitutional right of habeas corpus. … Gonzales was right that the court based its ruling on statutory law: The justices said that the law gives federal courts jurisdiction to hear the prisoners' claims of unlawful detention. … Well, we'll just get that written out of the law, the Bush administration countered -- and did, last year. … Maybe Gonzales' hard line stems from an honest belief in a stingy reading of the Constitution -- unless, of course, provisions dealing with presidential power are involved." Campbell concludes, "Maybe he sees nothing to lose from continued myopic allegiance to the president he has served since their Texas days -- though it's questionable how much sway Gonzales has anymore. Jan Crawford Greenburg writes in her new book, Supreme Conflict, that Gonzales tried, and obviously failed, to warn Bush away from nominating fellow Texan Harriet Miers to the Supreme Court. … With his own Supreme Court ambitions certainly dashed, maybe Gonzales considers it a badge of honor to be lampooned on Comedy Central's Colbert Report. … That might be good for late-night guffaws, but it's hardly the promising future he took to Washington with him."

No Penalty For Attorney Who Leaked Transcript Of Padilla Call. The AP (1/25, Anderson) reports US District Judge Marcia Cooke found "a lawyer for suspected al-Qaida operative Jose Padilla violated a court order by leaking his wiretapped phone conversations." Judge Cooke did not impose a penalty, but "ordered all defense lawyers in the case to sign papers indicating they understood and would follow rules barring disclosure of certain evidence. Cooke also said she might hold in contempt anyone who receives such prohibited material, and she specifically mentioned several reporters attending Wednesday's hearing." Defense lawyers "have said that Padilla is never overheard discussing any violent acts and that many of the conversations involve family matters, casting doubt on the strength of the government's case."

Chilling Video Shown At London Terror Trial. NBC Nightly News (1/24, story 8, 2:20, Williams, 9.87M) reported on the use of surveillance video from the trial of four would-be suicide bombers in London. The video shows "just how narrow an escape it was for those Londoners riding the underground train in the summer of 2005." NBC (Myers) added, "Only two weeks after Britain's first home grown suicide bombers killed 52, these four men allegedly tried to inflict more carnage. This dramatic surveillance video is the first glimpse of what happened that day when the would-be bomber Ramzi Mohammad boards a train and places his back pack full of explosives next to a woman and a child in a stroller." Lord Toby Harris, London Metropolitan Police Authority: "Some of the footage showing the bomber close to a woman with a baby is frankly quite nauseating." Myers: "Mohammad fires the detonator but the bomb fails to explode." Although chased by fellow passengers, "Mohammad escaped that day but was arrested eight days later and is now on trial along with others whose bombs also failed to detonate." A "senior British intelligence official warns some 200 possible terror cells are now under investigation, and that British teenagers as young as 16 are being groomed to become suicide bombers."

US-Georgian Operation Thwarts Sale Of Weapons-Grade Uranium. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (1/15, Butler) reports, "Republic of Georgia authorities, aided by the CIA, set up a sting operation last summer that led to the arrest of Russian man who tried to sell a small amount of nuclear-bomb grade uranium in a plastic bag in his jacket pocket, U.S. and Georgian officials said. … Details of the investigation, which also involved the FBI and Energy Department, were provided to The Associated Press by U.S. officials and Georgian Interior Minister Vano Merabishvili. Authorities say they do not know how the man acquired the nuclear material or if his claims of access to much larger quantities were true. He and three Georgian accomplices are in Georgian custody and not cooperating with investigators." The AP notes, "The CIA declined to comment on the case. FBI spokesman Richard Kolko confirmed that the FBI was involved in the investigation and called it a success, but he would not provide details."

The New York Times (1/25, A1, Sheets, Broad, 1.16M) reports that the "smuggling case, which has not been previously reported, is expected to be noted in a report from the United Nations International Atomic Energy Agency on illicit nuclear activities, agency officials said. That report is expected to be released this week." The Times also notes Kolko "confirmed that the bureau had taken part in the inquiry but declined to elaborate." Georgian Interior Minister Ivane Merabishvili "said that agents had learned about the raw uranium from sources in the criminal underworld and that the investigation was continuing. The Georgian officials said they believed that corrupt law enforcement officials in Abkhazia had helped ensure the safe passage of the shipment."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Taheri-Azar Pleads Not Guilty To SUV Attack Charges. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (1/25) reports, "A man accused of trying to kill students at the University of North Carolina by driving through campus in an attack he said was intended to avenge the treatment of Muslims by the United States pleaded not guilty Wednesday.

DOJ_NMG_0121219

Mohammed Taheri-Azar, 23, said three weeks ago that he wanted his case to conclude as soon as possible and had said previously he intended to plead guilty to the charges stemming from the attack in March. James Williams, declined to discuss specifics about the case. But when asked after the brief hearing why his client pleaded not guilty, he said only, 'That's a very good question.'"

Senate Unlikely To Approve Cargo Screening Provisions Of House Bill. The AP (1/25, Lumpkin) reports, "House-passed requirements for intensified screening of cargo on passenger aircraft and ship-borne goods heading toward the U.S. are unlikely to survive in the Senate, a House leader on security issues conceded Wednesday." The provisions were "part of a House bill that was ballyhooed as the first legislation to pass in the Democratic-controlled Congress this year." But Rep. Bennie Thompson, D-Miss., "who chairs the House Homeland Security Committee, told reporters that two key provisions of the House bill are unlikely to make it through the Senate." Thompson said "his staff has heard from Senate staff members about what's realistic to expect as the Senate considers the House-passed homeland security bill."

Biden Proposes Tax Increase To Boost Homeland Security Spending. The Washington Times (1/25, Hudson, 88K) reports Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr. proposed legislation this week that "would raise taxes to fund billions in new Homeland Security spending on more police officers, interoperable communications equipment and 100 percent screening of cargo entering the United States." He "said by rolling back President Bush's tax cuts that up to $50 billion could be generated over five years for security improvements." The bill "calls for 'scanning' 100 percent of cargo containers, development of new 'screening' technology and the hiring of 50,000 new police officers and 1,000 FBI agents." Rep. Peter T. King referred to Biden's bill as a "gimmick," adding that the senator "is making a class warfare argument to raise money on an issue without any knowledge of the issue."

TSA Said To Have Chosen Lockheed For TWIC Contract. The Washington Post (1/25, D1, Witte, 690K) reports, "The Transportation Security Administration has decided to award a closely watched contract to supply high-tech identification cards at ports nationwide to Lockheed Martin of Bethesda, according to sources familiar with the choice." The Transportation Worker Identification Credential, with an estimated initial value of $70 million, "is the first of many identity contracts slated to be announced in the next few years." TSA spokesman Darrin Kayser "would not confirm yesterday that the agency had made its decision but indicated that an announcement is imminent."

Bush Criticized For Speech's Lack Of Katrina Mention. In a harshly critical report, the CBS Evening News (1/24, story 9, 2:10, Couric, 7.66M) said that "in his State of the Union address, President Bush took note of the unrest in Lebanon as well as the suffering in Darfur but there was no mention of Katrina though the suffering and hardship continue. The federal government has spent $80 billion on recovery efforts in the Gulf region, but there are still 13,000 people living in FEMA trailers." CBS (Keteyian) added, "Seventeen months after Katrina, nearly 200 people uprooted by a hurricane still live in Mount Olive Gardens -- whole families packed into 200 square foot FEMA trailers they now call home. … In places like Mount Olive Gardens, words like 'relief' and 'recovery' now seem as empty to them as last night's Presidential address."

The Los Angeles Times (1/25, Simmons, 850K) reports that as New Orleans "continues its struggle to recover from Hurricane Katrina, some observers thought the absence of any mention in…Bush's State of the Union address was telling. Mayor C. Ray Nagin was unfazed. 'We're 18 months into this thing," said Nagin as he announced a two-year pilot loan program. "I'm tired of complaining and bellyaching." However, "Other Louisiana residents and lawmakers took exception to the omission of the state's plight from Bush's speech." Rep. William Jefferson said it was shocking "that there was no mention at all of it, as if the problem has been solved or simply gone away."

Meanwhile, the AP (1/24, Burdeau) reported, "Gov. Kathleen Blanco angrily criticized President Bush on Wednesday for not mentioning" the hurricane. "'I guess the pains of the hurricane are yesterday's news in Washington,' Blanco said. 'But for us it's still very real, very real, and it's something that we live every single day,' the governor said." The AP ran the same Nagin quote as the LATimes, but reported that the mayor "echoed Blanco's disappointment at Bush's omission." Blanco also "accused the White House of repeatedly delivering less money than Louisiana has needed to repair the damage to housing, schools and hospitals. She said Mississippi has received much more help."

New Orleans Recovery Czar Envisions Smaller, Denser City. The Christian Science Monitor (1/25, Jonsson, 59K) profiles Ed Blakely, "the planning guru hired to steer New Orleans out of its muddle," likening him to "the Forrest Gump of disaster recovery. California earthquake? There he is, amid wrecked interstates. Tsunami? That's him touring rebuilt villages. Terror attacks in Manhattan? When the dust settles, the distinguished-looking African-American man is at the center of a phalanx of planners. His arrival in New Orleans two weeks ago as the city's new recovery czar may be the biggest challenge for the 'master of post-disaster,' as his hometown paper, the Los Angeles Times, calls him." His "plans in New Orleans are straightforward: Encourage a smaller, more dense city by offering landowners in wrecked neighborhoods the opportunity to swap their land for lots on higher ground. Get pilot projects launched by summer. Build community centers. Begin to generate private investment."

DOJ_NMG_0121220

Lenders Have Difficulty Tracking Homeowners' Compliance With Flood Insurance Requirement. USA Today (1/25, Chu, 2.27M) reports, "Nearly a year and a half after Hurricane Katrina, federally regulated lenders are still struggling to comply with a requirement that they force homeowners in high-risk flood zones to buy flood insurance. By law, homeowners in flood-prone areas — such as along the coast — must buy such a policy if they get a mortgage from a federally regulated lender. … One problem: Some homeowners who buy a flood insurance policy drop it later. Lenders 'do a fairly good job of finding out whether someone is in a flood plain, but they don't do as good a job of tracking if you lose (flood insurance),' says J. Robert Hunter, director of insurance at the Consumer Federation of America."

WAR NEWS:

Senate Panel Approves Resolution Against Bush's Iraq Strategy. The Senate Foreign Relations committee yesterday voted 12-9 to condemn President Bush's Iraq strategy. The vote came largely along party lines, with only GOP Sen. Chuck Hagel crossing the aisle to back the resolution. As a result, said George Stephanopoulos on ABC World News (1/24, story 2, 1:20, Gibson, 8.78M), "supporters of the President's policy in the White House, actually believe they made some progress today. … They've been working furiously behind the scenes. They're using the argument of David Petraeus, he'll be the commander in Iraq. He said, a vote for this resolution will hurt the morale of the troops and hurt the war effort in Baghdad. So people like Senator John McCain and Lindsey Graham say if you vote for it, you're going to be voting against the troops." But the CBS Evening News (1/24, lead story, 2:05, Attkisson, 7.66M) reported that while "right now there probably aren't enough Republican votes" for the Democratic measure, "with subtle language changes…it could be a done deal." CBS was referring to talks in the Senate between backers of the Democratic resolution and one sponsored by GOP Sens. John Warner and Susan Collins, among others.

The Wall Street Journal (1/25, A8, Rogers, 2.04M) says the committee vote gives Chairman Joseph Biden "a solid foothold from which to begin talks with Republicans who share his concern about sending more US troops to try to quell sectarian violence in Baghdad. Chief among these is…Warner…who last evening introduced an alternative resolution also challenging the increased commitment of 21,500 troops. Merging the two to achieve a larger consensus is the Democrats' goal and the quickest route may be to embrace much of Mr. Warner's proposal with some changes." Senate Majority Leader said, "It's pretty good, but it's not perfect." Reid "will play an increasing role with Mr. Biden in trying to reach some common ground, but he must walk a fine line."

The New York Times (1/25, Zeleny, 1.16M) reports that "even Republicans who opposed the resolution, including Senator Richard G. Lugar of Indiana, expressed deep doubt about whether the troop increase could succeed and suggested it was time for a new direction. … Some Republicans expressed reluctance to support the legislation because they feared it could be seen as a political attack on Mr. Bush, but left themselves open to backing a similar plan offered by…Warner." Democrats "say they believe that at least 8 of the 49 Republicans might join with nearly all Democrats in embracing a resolution -- Mr. Biden's or Mr. Warner's -- critical of the president's troop increase plan." The Washington Times (1/25, Hurt, 88K) notes Warner said last night "his nonbinding resolution is less politically combative than the Biden resolution and has the support of three fellow Republicans and six Democrats."

ABC World News (1/24, lead story, 2:40, Tapper, 8.78M) also said that other than Hagel, "all the other Republicans on the committee refused to sign on to the resolution." Last night, on MSNBC (1/24, O'Donnell), Collins discussed her opposition to the committee measure, "We worked very hard to come up with a resolution that didn't have some of the loaded words that the resolution reported today included in it. … One of them was struck today, and that is 'escalation.' That's become a politically loaded word. We also tried to keep our resolution really focused on Iraq. The resolution reported today has a lot of extraneous issues in it. It mentions North Korea, for example. … We're picking up co-sponsors on both sides of the aisle. And I hope we'll be able to go forward next week, perhaps as a substitute to the resolution reported today." USA Today (1/25, Kiely, 2.27M) notes the resolution "declares Bush's plan to send 21,500 additional troops to Baghdad and Anbar province 'not in the national interest.'"

The Los Angeles Times (1/25, Levey, 850K) says "not a single senator on the committee endorsed the White House plan." But in fact, NBC Nightly News (1/24, lead story, 3:25, Williams, 9.87M) reported, one Republican did make "a clear statement in favor of the President's build up -- and even for him, it was not easy." Sen. David Vitter was shown saying, "After a lot of careful thought, I decided to support the President's plan as a final attempt to stabilize a viable democracy in Iraq."

Tim Russert said, also on NBC Nightly News (1/24, story 3, 1:45, Williams, 9.87M) that "the biggest concern" for the White House "is the Republicans. … There is growing concern, deep concern and anxiety about Republicans, not only voting against the President, but at least speaking out in his defense. We heard so little of that today." The Washington Post (1/25, A1, Weisman, 690K) reports Lugar "called the Bush strategy 'dubious' even as he denounced the resolution as 'the legislative equivalent of a sound bite.' Sen. John E. Sununu (R-N.H.) said additional troops should not be deployed until the Iraqi government showed more resolve. Sen. Lisa Murkowski (R-Alaska) said she opposed the president and was not afraid to tell him so. And Sen. George V. Voinovich (R-Ohio) said he had delivered a tough message to the White House personally: 'You are not listening.'" Meanwhile, "Republican leaders' efforts in the House to placate their members with calls for tougher oversight also appeared to be faltering. Rep. Frank R. Wolf (R-Va.) introduced his own resolution of disapproval yesterday, calling for the administration to adopt in full the recommendations of the bipartisan Iraq Study Group, recommendations that Bush has largely rejected."

DOJ_NMG_0121221

On the network newscasts, much was made of Hagel's strong words during committee debate yesterday. ABC World News (1/24, lead story, 2:40, Gibson, 8.78M) showed Hagel saying of Bush's proposal, "This isn't a strategy. It's a ping-pong game with American lives. Hagel, added ABC (Tapper), "criticized his fellow Republicans for their cowardice." Hagel was shown saying, "What do you believe? What are you willing to support? What do you think? Why are you elected if you wanted a safe job? Go sell shoes." Both the CBS Evening News (1/24, lead story, 2:05, Couric, 7.66M) and NBC Nightly News (1/24, lead story, 3:25, Williams, 9.87M) also showed Hagel's "ping-pong" quote.

Hagel was also interviewed on PBS' NewsHour (1/24, Ifill), where he said, "If, in fact, the Senate passes a resolution, that's rather significant." The Senate "is part of a co-equal branch of our government. It's worked pretty well for 200 years. For a president to step away from that -- if, in fact, we would pass a resolution, putting the Senate on record opposing his plan -- that's rather significant, and it represents the voices of the people we represent. … We have not had a real, legitimate debate in four years on the most divisive issue facing this country since Vietnam. … The President can't sustain a war policy. He can't sustain any policy."

The Financial Times (1/25, Luce) portrays the vote as a sign that Bush has not "succeeded in stemming the rapid haemorrhaging of his authority," as "most Democrats and several prominent Republicans remained fixed on Mr Bush's unwillingness to listen to his growing army of critics over the war in Iraq, to which he devoted about a quarter of the 50-minute speech on Tuesday night." The Times adds, "In spite of an impassioned plea for Congress to give his Iraq strategy a chance, Mr Bush failed even to sway waverers within his own party." The AP (1/25, Espo) calls the vote "a calculated snub" to Bush.

A large number of local TV newscasts across the country took note of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee's vote. The coverage usually described the vote as an attempt by the committee to rebuke the President's for his comments on Iraq during his State of the Union Address. For example, WLNY-TV New York (1/24, 11:11 pm) said in its broadcast, "Just one day after...Bush addressed the situation in Iraq in his State of the Union, the Senate Foreign Relations Committee passed a resolution condemning his plan to send more troops overseas. Only one Republican, Senator Chuck Hagel, supported the non-binding resolution. … The measure is expected is come before the full Senate next week." WFLD-TV Chicago (1/24, 9:19 pm) reported, "The resolution has no teeth, but its supporters say it does send a message to the White House." And KABC-TV Los Angeles (1/24, 5:01 pm) noted Hagel "called the political wrangling over Iraq 'a ping pong game with American lives.'"

Democratic Rift Noted. The Hill (1/25, Schor) says "a separate rift opened yesterday between Biden and two fellow competitors in the 2008 White House chase over whether to attempt a further check on Bush by placing a binding cap on troop levels in Iraq. Sen. Chris Dodd (Conn.), the first Democrat to support a troop ceiling that would trigger a new congressional vote on authorizing the war, tried to add that cap as an amendment to the resolution." Dodd "failed by a wide margin, but Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.) backed his effort and another defender of a troop cap, Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.), awaits at the head of the presidential pack." Biden "suggested collaborating with Dodd and other supporters of binding action to limit Bush's Iraq policy, noting that the White House budget is likely to arrive with a yearlong war-funding request." Dodd "ultimately won just five of the 11 committee Democrats, including two onetime presidential aspirants, John Kerry (Mass.) and Russ Feingold (Wis.)."

Biden's Style As Chairman Mocked. In the Washington Post (1/25, A2, 690K), Dana Milbank writes that Biden "was trying to uphold two resolutions yesterday: one criticizing the Bush administration's Iraq policy and the other Biden's own resolution to himself -- to stop talking so much. The Iraq resolution passed 12 to 9. Biden's other resolution failed, by a voice vote -- Biden's voice." Biden "ran the hearing more like a talk show host than a chairman: inviting the other senators to speak and then commenting on each senator's remarks. He opened the hearing with a 3,000-word statement in which he used the word 'I' 88 times, including a lengthy discussion of the types of questions he has asked himself and how he has answered himself. Finally, the committee's ranking Republican, Richard Lugar (Ind.) got a chance to speak. Then Biden spoke again. Sen. Chris Dodd (D-Conn.) introduced an amendment. Biden interrupted him four times." Milbank adds, "Some of Biden's wordiness had to do with presidential jostling. Eclipsed in media exposure by presidential rivals Hillary Clinton and Obama -- Biden was bumped from network interviews Wednesday morning by Obama -- he relies on such hearings to boost his visibility for the presidential race. At one point, Sen. Barbara Boxer (D-Calif.) accidentally called Biden 'Mr. President.'"

DOJ_NMG_0121222

Snow Makes Case For Bush Strategy. White House Press Secretary Tony Snow said on MSNBC's Hardball (1/24, Barnicle), "We understand right now that there are going to be a lot of people having conversations on Capitol Hill. Meanwhile we're moving forces in to Iraq and furthermore a demonstration of American strength and determination. I think it is going to make a difference in Iraq. The President believes strongly that his way forward if the proper way. Members of Congress are going to assess it in the next few weeks. It'll be interesting to see what happens if in fact we have success on the ground and whether they'll have new resolutions. … The President understands wars are tough and he also understands if the United States were to leave without victory in Iraq it would up leash a chain of circumstances that could be catastrophic to us. It would allow a terror network to have access to the second-largest proven oil reserves on the face of the earth, the wealth that would generate, the be able to use that to train, equip, and send forth people to come and kill us and also create the ability to intimidate neighboring oil states make them calculate for themselves, 'Do we rely on the Americans for security or do we cut a side deal with these guys?' It would be catastrophic for our security. So he understands the importance of it."

Webb, Reed, Clark Blast "Surge." Sen. Jim Webb said on CNN's Lou Dobbs Tonight (1/24), "The key failure of this Administration, even from before we went into Iraq, was that it never clearly articulated a strategy that had an endpoint. That's the same place we are right now. You get measurements for success. They talk about a lot of rhetorical issues but not clearly what is it going to take, in specific terms, for us to decide that we are going to leave?"

Sen. Jack Reed said on MSNBC's Hardball (1/24, Barnicle), "I don't think" the President "listened effectively, because not only with members of Congress, but also the Iraqi Study Group, a significant opinion, I think, on the military side, in terms of the Joint Chiefs and others. And I think he tended to disregard that. He thinks he has a better way. I personally don't think it is the appropriate approach. In fact, I think even the terms as he described it, a 20,000 increase, is probably inadequate in terms of manpower to be a decisive factor in Iraq."

Retired Gen. Wesley Clark said on Fox News' Your World (1/24, Cavuto), "If you look at the response to last night's State of the Union address, if you look at what is happening in the United States Congress, this is not partisan. The American people have spoken. They have looked at it. … What President Bush said last night is, nobody voted to go over there and lose. That's true. But nobody went over there with the understanding that this was going to be the kind of problem that it has turned out to be."

Lieberman Says US "Making Progress." On PBS' NewsHour (1/24, Ifill), Sen. Joseph Lieberman said of the surge, "Why do I think it will work? … There is a cycle of sectarian violence in Baghdad. It's not armies of Shia and the Sunni clashing in open civil war. But until that stops in the capital city, there's not a chance either to create the economic growth that will tell the average Iraqi in Baghdad that they've got a chance to live a better life, nor is there the stability that will allow the Iraqi government to do what they want them to do, to begin to govern. … There's a second front in Anbar province. … We're making progress there. An additional 4,000 troops, which is part of the 21,000 that the President is sending, I think will turn that conflict in Anbar in the right direction, and actually it has the potential to achieve a victory for us."

Lieberman said on PBS' NewsHour (1/24, Ifill), "The Congress has the power to authorize war, which has been done, and to appropriate, to support that war. If members of Congress are opposed to the troop increase, then I think what they should do is to use the power given to Congress by the Constitution, and that is to directly try to cut off funds for additional troops in Iraq. Otherwise, what is being done here…is a nonbinding resolution. It will have no effect on the conduct of the war." But as Sen. Lugar said, it will "send a message of disarray and division, both to our friends and our enemies in Iraq and, more broadly, in the world."

Anti-Surge Rally Planned For This Weekend In Washington. The Washington Post (1/25, B6, Ruane, 690K) reports, "Tens of thousands of peace advocates from across the country are expected in Washington on Saturday for an anti-war rally that could be among the biggest since the war in Iraq began, organizers said yesterday. They said the rally on the Mall, followed by a march near the Capitol, will target…Bush's intention to send more troops to the Iraq war. … Among the featured speakers will be Vietnam War-era protester Jane Fonda, according to the organizers. Others include actors Danny Glover, Tim Robbins and Susan Sarandon, civil rights activist Jesse Jackson, and Carlos Arredondo, who in 2004 set himself on fire after learning of the death in Iraq of his Marine Corps son, Alexander."

More Commentary. In an editorial, the Wall Street Journal (1/25, A18, 2.04M) writes, "To understand why the Founders put war powers in the hands of the Presidency, look no further than the current spectacle in Congress on Iraq." The Journal says Bush was "conciliatory and respectful in his State of the Union Address Tuesday night, asking Congress to give his new Iraq strategy a chance. In a better world, the Members would do so. But if they insist on seeking political cover by trying to operate as a committee of 535

DOJ_NMG_0121223

Commanders-in-Chief, Mr. Bush will have to start reminding Congress who really has the job."

The Wall Street Journal's (1/25, A18) Daniel Henninger writes, "The United States is talking itself into defeat in Iraq. Its political culture is now in a downward spiral of pessimism. In the halls of Congress, across endless newspaper columns, amid the punditocracy and on Sunday morning talk shows -- all emit a Stygian gloom about America." While he concedes that "on any given day on some discrete issue, the criticism of the American role is not without justification," Henninger says "the cumulative effect of this unremitting ill wind is corrosive. We are not only on the way to talking ourselves into defeat in Iraq but into a diminished international status that may be harder to recover than the doom mob imagines."

Senate Panel Approves Petreaus Nomination. The Washington Post/AP (1/25) reports, "A Senate committee on Wednesday approved the nomination of Army Lt. Gen. David Petraeus to command American forces in Iraq, replacing Gen. George Casey. The Senate Armed Services Committee sent the nomination to the full Senate, which is expected to approve the nomination on Thursday, including promoting Petraeus to four-star rank for the top military post in Iraq."

Meanwhile, another AP story (1/25, Riechmann) reports "President Bush asked the Senate Wednesday to quickly confirm the top commanders he has chosen to oversee the war in Iraq. 'It is important to get these three fine individuals in their posts as soon as possible so that we have continuity as we do our duty to protect the American people,' the president said." Bush "was referring to Adm. William Fallon, chosen to replace Gen. John Abizaid, the top US commander overseeing the military theater that includes Iraq; Army Lt. Gen. David Petraeus…and Gen. George Casey, leaving the top Iraq job to take over from the retiring Gen. Peter Schoomaker as Army chief of staff."

WPost Welcomes Petraeus' Offer To Update Congress On Progress. In an editorial, the Washington Post (1/25, A24, 690K) notes that during a Senate Foreign Relations Committee hearing Tuesday, Lt. Gen. David H. Petraeus, "made his own suggestion…offering to report to Congress regularly about the mission, including updates on the performance by Iraqis on their commitments." Taking Gen. Petraeus "up on that," the Post says, "and closely and systematically monitoring the progress of events in Iraq during the coming months, is probably the best contribution that Congress can make to helping the new American commander address what he calls a 'dire' situation."

"Defiant" Cheney Defends US Actions In Iraq. Vice President Cheney gave a lengthy and at some points testy interview to Wolf Blitzer on CNN's The Situation Room (1/24) that largely focused on Iraq. The CBS Evening News (1/24, story 2, 1:05, Axelrod, 7.66M) said Cheney was, "in a word, defiant, saying about the idea of any kind of resolution from the Senate, quote, 'It won't stop us.'" CBS showed Blitzer saying, "So you're moving forward no matter what the Congress does." Cheney: "We are moving forward. The Congress has control over the purse strings. They have the right, obviously, if they want to cut off funding, but in terms of this effort the President has made his decision and I think it's far too soon for the talking heads on television to conclude that it's impossible to do, it's not going to work, it can't possibly succeed." In a front-page headline, the Washington Post (1/25, Baker, 690K) also calls Cheney "defiant," reporting that the Bush Administration "has achieved 'enormous successes' in Iraq but complained that critics and the media 'are so eager to write off this effort or declare it a failure' that they are undermining U.S. troops in a war zone, striking a far more combative tone than President Bush did in his State of the Union address the night before."

The AP (1/24) says Cheney said "it's 'hogwash' to suggest the Bush administration's credibility is on the line because of mistakes in Iraq," acknowledging that the "situation in Iraq was very unstable but said toppling Saddam Hussein had been the right thing to do." On CNN's The Situation Room (1/24, Blitzer), Cheney said, "The world is much safer today because of it. There have been three national elections in Iraq. There's a democracy established there, a constitution, a new democratically elected government. Saddam has been brought to justice and executed. His sons are dead. His government is gone. And the world is better off for it."

The Los Angeles Times (1/25, Reynolds, 850K) writes that "a day after President Bush struck a conciliatory tone toward critics of the Iraq war," Cheney "did the opposite Wednesday," defending the invasion and insisting "that 'there's been a lot of success' since then. His comments came during a CNN interview, an exception to the vice president's more common practice of talking to conservative media outlets."

Cheney Warns Against Giving Up; Hagel Calls Statement "Astounding." At another point in his interview with CNN's The Situation Room (1/24, Blitzer), Cheney said, "After 9/11, we learned that we have a vested interest in what happens on the ground in the Middle East. If you are going to walk away from Iraq today and say, well, gee, it's too tough, we can't complete the task, we just are going to quit, you will create exactly that same kind of situation again."

On PBS' NewsHour (1/24), Gwen Ifill asked Sen. Chuck Hagel about Cheney's comment that "part of what's going on here is that people do not have the stomach to complete this mission." Hagel said, "I'm so sorry the Vice President so underestimates the people of this country. He has so little faith in this country to say something like that. That's an astounding statement from the Vice President of the United States. You're telling me -- or maybe more directly, maybe the Vice President should tell the families of those who have lost their lives, over 3,000, and over 23,000 wounded, some very seriously for life -- that they don't have the stomach? Come on, let's get real here."

DOJ_NMG_0121224

Cheney "Out In The Open And On The Defensive." McClatchy (1/25, Hutcheson) headlines a report "Cheney Increasingly On The Defensive," saying that the man "often considered the hidden power behind the White House throne" is "increasingly out in the open and on the defensive. He's scheduled to testify at the perjury trial of his former top aide; congressional Democrats want to probe his role in the White House; and his unprecedented clout may be waning. Once widely considered a source of wisdom and experience in the White House, the vice president has become a frequent target of criticism."

Cheney Thinks Bin Laden Is Alive, Defends US Efforts Against Al Qaeda. On CNN's The Situation Room (1/24), Wolf Blitzer asked Vice President Dick Cheney, regarding Osama bin Laden, "Why can't you find this guy?" Cheney replied, "Well, he's obviously well hidden. We've been looking for him for some time. I think the fact is, that he's gone totally to ground. He doesn't communicate, except perhaps by courier. He's not up on the air. He's not putting out videos, the way he did oftentimes in the past. … If you've ever been in that part of the world, it is some of the most rugged territory imaginable. … And that general area is a remarkably difficult area to get people into." Asked if bin Laden is still alive, Cheney said, "I think so." Cheney went on to say, "We have not gotten Osama bin Laden, obviously, because he's very careful. … But we've taken out, several times, that whole layer of leadership underneath Osama bin Laden" and Ayman al-Zawahiri. We have "successfully defended the country for over five years against any further attacks."

Rumsfeld Remains "Nonpaid Consultant" To DOD During Transition. The Washington Times (1/25, Scarborough, 88K) reports that while Donald Rumsfeld has "left the Pentagon" he has not left the Defense Department. Earlier this month, Rumsfeld "opened a government-provided transition office in Arlington and has seven Pentagon-paid staffers working for him. … The Pentagon lists Mr. Rumsfeld as a 'nonpaid consultant,' a status he needs in order to review secret and top-secret documents." The transition office "has raised some eyebrows inside the Pentagon. Some question the size of the staff, which includes two military officers and two enlisted men. They also ask why the sorting could not have been done from the time Mr. Rumsfeld resigned Nov. 8 to when he left the building Dec. 18."

Gates Orders Reduction Of Stop-Loss Policy. The Hill (1/25, Tiron) reports Defense Secretary Robert Gates "is ordering military service chiefs to reduce the use" of the "controversial" stop-loss policy "intended to keep troops in war zones beyond the end of their original commitments." According to a memo sent to the chiefs and other top DOD decision-makers, "Gates asked to see plans to minimize the use of the so-called stop-loss policy for active duty and reserve components by the end of next month." Last week, several House Republicans sent Gates a letter "asking that members of the National Guard and Reserve not be kept on active duty beyond their original commitment."

White House Quieting Planning Overhaul Of Afghan Mission. The Washington Post (1/25, A1, Abramowitz, 690K) reports, "After the bloodiest year in Afghanistan since the US invasion, the Bush administration is preparing a series of new military, economic and political initiatives aimed partly at preempting an expected offensive this spring by Taliban insurgents, according to senior US officials. Even as it trumpeted a change of course in Iraq this month, the White House has completed a review of US policy in Afghanistan. It will ask Congress for $7 billion to $8 billion in new funds for security, reconstruction and other projects in Afghanistan as part of the upcoming budget package, officials said." That "would represent a sizable increase in the U.S. commitment to the strife-torn country; since the 2001 U.S.-led invasion that toppled the Taliban, the United States has provided a little more than $14 billion in assistance for Afghanistan, the State Department says."

CBS Evening News (1/24, story 4, 1:55, Couric, 7.66M) reported "a troop build up is continuing" in Afghanistan "as well. There are now a total of 24,000 soldiers and Marines fighting in Afghanistan, the most ever."

Pakistani Prime Minister Blames Weak Afghan Government For Border Problems. The New York Times (1/25, Bennhold, Landler, 1.16M) reports, "Pakistan's prime minister, Shaukat Aziz, acknowledged Wednesday that people sympathetic to the Taliban were active in the frontier regions near the border with Afghanistan. But he insisted that the root of the problem was the Afghan government's weak authority, not Pakistani support of the Taliban. 'We believe the core of the problem is in Afghanistan,' Mr. Aziz said, in an interview at the World Economic Forum here in Davos." Aziz also "said three million Afghan refugees were crowded into Quetta, Peshawar and other Pakistani cities close to the 1,700 mile-border between the countries. Despite what he described as stepped-up Pakistani efforts to root out extremists, the refugee population remains a recruiting pool for the Taliban insurgency, Mr. Aziz said."

DOJ_NMG_0121225

US, Iraqi Forces Fighting Insurgents House By House In Baghdad. The CBS Evening News (1/24, story 3, 2:25, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "In Baghdad…we have a vivid and riveting example of what US forces are up against. Weeks have gone by and US and Iraqi troops are still fighting insurgents house by house for control of one notorious neighborhood. Iraq's government says as many as 30 insurgents were killed today, 27 other captured. But the street is still not secure." CBS (Logan) added, "This is Operation Tomahawk Strike 11 underway in central Baghdad just a mile-and-a-half from the heavily guarded Green Zone, launched as President Bush was addressing the nation in Washington last night."

NBC Nightly News (1/24, story 6, :30, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "There were conflicting reports on the number of Iraqi casualties. The US military says one American was killed in fighting today," and "two other Americans died yesterday in fighting in Anbar Province."

The Washington Post (1/25, A20, Londono, Partlow, 690K) reports, "The recurring fighting on Haifa Street illustrates the severe challenges facing the 17,500 additional U.S. troops that President Bush plans to send to Baghdad to try to secure the city. In a treacherous, cramped urban setting, and surrounded by civilians, US and Iraqi troops have repeatedly fought for control of neighborhoods in the capital, only to have insurgents return to fight again." Yesterday, "US and Iraqi forces came under attack around Haifa Street and responded with mortar fire, the military said in a statement. … More than 30 'terrorists' were arrested during the operation and roughly 25 were killed." A US military spokesman, Lt. Col. Scott Bleichwehl, "said he was aware of seven arrests and did not know whether anyone had died."

The Washington Times/AP (1/25, Mroue) reports, "Apache attack helicopters buzzed past the tall buildings and radio towers, with several Humvees on the tree-lined street below. Gunfire rang in the background as shells fell, according to AP Television News footage. Black smoke rose from the area, on the west bank of the Tigris River about one mile north of the Green Zone, site of the US and British embassies as well as the Iraqi government headquarters." The clashes "were the second major fighting to break out in the area in less than a month."

The Los Angeles Times (1/25, Zavis, 850K) reports, "Sunni political and religious leaders protested the operation, which Adnan al-Dulaimi, a lawmaker with the main Sunni bloc, called 'barbaric.' Residents accused the United States of unwittingly aiding Shiite Muslim militiamen accused of trying to force the mostly Sunni Arab inhabitants from their homes in recent weeks, as part of a pattern of sectarian cleansing that is redrawing the map of the once largely integrated capital." The US military "stressed in a statement that the operation did not target only Sunni insurgents, but was 'rather aimed at rapidly isolating all active insurgents and gaining control of this key central Baghdad location.'"

Iraqi Forces Arrives Late With "The Air Of A Class Outing." The New York Times (1/25, Cave, Glanz, 1.16M) says "Haifa Street has changed hands so often that it has taken on the feel of a no man's land, the deadly space between opposing trenches. On Wednesday, as American and Iraqi troops poured in, the street showed why it is such a sensitive gauge of an urban conflict marked by front lines that melt into confusion, enemies with no clear identity and allies who disappear or do not show up at all." The Times adds that "as the sun rose, many of the Iraqi Army units who were supposed to do the actual searches of the buildings did not arrive on time, forcing the Americans to start the job on their own. When the Iraqi units finally did show up, it was with the air of a class outing, cheering and laughing as the Americans blew locks off doors with shotguns. A s the morning wore on and the troops came under fire from all directions, another apparent flaw in this strategy became clear as empty apartments became lairs for gunmen who flitted from window to window and killed at least one American soldier, with a shot to the head."

Mahdi Army Negotiating With British. The New York Times (1/25, Tavernise, 1.16M) reports, "An Iraqi official authorized to speak on behalf of field commanders for the country's most powerful militia has approached Western military officials and laid out a plan to avoid armed confrontation, senior Iraqi and American officials said this week. The official is Rahim al-Daraji, the elected mayor of the Sadr City district, the vast grid in the northeast corner of the capital that is the stronghold of the militia, the Mahdi Army." Daraji "has met twice in the past two weeks with Lt. Gen. Graeme Lamb, a British officer who is the deputy commanding general in Iraq, said a senior Iraqi official in the office of the prime minister." The groups "were eager to head off a major American military offensive in the district, home to two million Shiites, as the Americans begin a sweeping new effort to retake the streets of Baghdad. Mr. Daraji said in an interview that field commanders would forbid their foot soldiers to carry guns in public if the American military and the Iraqi government met several basic demands, mostly involving ways to ensure better security for Sadr City. He is communicating with the commanders through a Shiite politician who is close to them." The Times adds, "The talks appeared to have been the first between an intermediary for the Mahdi militia and a senior commander from the American effort."

50% Of Iraq Children Have Been Affected By Violence. ABC World News (1/24, story 7, 2:20, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "Almost every night on this broadcast, we do report on the casualties in Iraq. The numbers of soldiers and civilians killed. It's easy in doing so to overlook another category of victims -- those traumatized by violence, especially Iraqi children. One study indicates almost 50% of the children in Baghdad report they have been touched by a major traumatic event." ABC (Harris) added, "This is child's play in the new Iraq. A video that Iraqis are trading via e-mail and cell phones, shows young boys reenacting the hanging of Saddam Hussein. 'Go to hell' they're shouting. In this country, where nearly 50% of the population is under 18 a new generation is being raised on violence. The violence, which has turned so many neighborhoods here in Baghdad into virtual ghost towns, is keeping a staggering number of children out of school. The education ministry says elementary school attendance rates dropped from 75% in 2005, to only 30% last year."

DOJ_NMG_0121226

Palestinians In Difficult Position In Post-Saddam Iraq. The Washington Post (1/25, A20, Partlow, 690K) reports, "Baghdad is a dangerous place for anyone to live, and the fighting between Sunni and Shiite Muslims has displaced hundreds of thousands. Largely forgotten amid this violence is the plight of thousands of Palestinians in Iraq, who face an increasingly hostile environment because they are predominantly Sunni and perceived as having been favored during the rule of Iraqi President Saddam Hussein. Palestinians and human rights officials in Baghdad say members of the group are being targeted by roving Shiite militias and Iraqi police in efforts to expel them." The Post adds, "Iraqi officials said the 17 Palestinian men were detained Tuesday for 'investigation purposes' because they seemed suspicious, according to Brig. Gen. Saad Abdullah of the Interior Ministry. During the detention, the officials discussed steps to 'get the approvals for them to be refugees in other countries,' he said." An "estimated 19,000 Palestinians have fled Iraq since 2003, leaving about 15,000 behind, according to the United Nations. About 350 Palestinians are now stranded in a desolate refugee camp in a no man's land at the Al Tanf border crossing into Syria."

Brooks Warns Of Worsening "Tactics Of Genocide" In Iraq. In his New York Times (1/25, A25, 1.16M) column, David Brooks writes, "Iraq is at the beginning of a civil war fought using the tactics of genocide, and it has all the conditions to get much worse. As a Newsweek correspondent, Christian Caryl, wrote recently from Baghdad, 'What's clear is that we're far closer to the beginning of this cycle of violence than to its end.' As John Burns of The Times said on 'Charlie Rose' last night, 'Friends of mine who are Iraqis -- Shiite, Sunni, Kurd -- all foresee a civil war on a scale with bloodshed that would absolutely dwarf what we're seeing now.' Iraq already has the warlord structures that caused mass murder in Rwanda, Bosnia, Sierra Leone and elsewhere. Violent, stupid men who would be the dregs of society under normal conditions rise amid the trauma, chaos and stress and become revered leaders. … Once this mental descent has begun, it is possible to kill without compunction."

High-Ranking Officers Killed In Copter Crash. ABC World News (1/24, story 6, :25, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "We learned…of an extraordinary loss by the US Army in Iraq. Among the 12 personnel killed in that helicopter crash on Saturday, were high-ranking officers. They included the military's chief medical officer, for Iraq, Colonel Brian Allgood. A 46-year-old surgeon from Oklahoma. Another colonel, a Lieutenant Colonel, a Major, a Captain and two Sergeants Major also were killed. It is believed the helicopter was shot down."

USA Today (1/25, 6A, Brook, 2.27M) reports the crash "was the deadliest single incident for National Guard troops in at least 50 years, the National Guard Bureau said Wednesday. Ten National Guard soldiers died in the crash Saturday, including Col. Paul Kelly, the highest-ranking Guard member to die since the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks. President Bush's plan to commit 21,500 more troops to Iraq relies in part on sending National Guard troops, raising the possibility of more casualties among the citizen-soldier units."

Four Or Five Americans Shot Execution Style After Tuesday Crash. The Washington Times/AP (1/25, Mroue) reports "new details…emerged about the downing of a private US security company helicopter on Tuesday, with US and Iraqi officials saying four of five Americans who died in the incident were shot execution-style -- in the back of the head." The AP adds, "A senior Iraqi military official said a machine gunner downed the helicopter, but a US military official in Washington said there were no indications that the aircraft, owned by Blackwater USA, had been shot out of the sky. Two Sunni insurgent groups, separately, took responsibility for the crash."

Spanish Court Issues International Search and Capture Warrant For US Soldiers. The Christian Science Monitor (1/25, Abend, Pingree, 59K) reports that four years after the death of Spanish TV cameraman José Couso, shot by US forces, "Spain's Supreme Court agreed" that his relatives "may have a case, and last week, the lower National Court issued an international search and capture warrant for the American soldiers implicated in the incident. Although it is unlikely the three will ever stand trial in a Madrid courtroom, the case has drawn worldwide attention and is raising serious questions about wartime justice and the right of one country to judge another's citizens." The Monitor adds, "According to the New York-based Committee to Protect Journalists, which conducted interviews with eyewitnesses, many Western reporters were observing the struggle for Baghdad from the hotel's balconies when the American M1A1 Abrams tank, stationed roughly three quarters of a mile away, turned toward the Palestine and fired a single round which mortally injured both Couso and…cameraman Taras Protsyuk. The American tank sergeant, Thomas 'Shawn' Gibson, later said he reported a suspicious spotter on the roof of the hotel to his superior, Capt. Philip Wolford, and received an order to fire."

DOJ_NMG_0121227

Military Tests Nonlethal Ray Gun. The New York Times/AP (1/25, A21) reports the US military is testing "a ray gun that shoots a beam that makes people feel as if they are about to catch fire. Apart from causing that terrifying sensation, the technology is supposed to be harmless -- a nonlethal way to get enemies to drop their weapons," according to military officials.

Military Scholar Urges Increase In Defense Spending. In a Washington Times (1/25, 88K) op-ed headlined "Boost Military Spending," Lt. Col. Peter Huggins of the School of Advanced Air and Space Studies writes, "Our nation stands at a crossroads. The versatility and robustness of our armed forces will be crucial to our country's future foreign-policy success in a world where the only certainty is uncertainty. Zero-sum arguments that advocate shifting money to one service at the expense of another overlook the other choice -- increasing the defense budget. While the nature of the current conflict suggests that boosting defense spending to a share in line with past conflicts, such as World War II, Korea and Vietnam, is not necessary, an increase to the levels seen at the end of the Cold War -- our nation's most recent 'long war' -- is warranted. It's the best, and smartest, decision we can make."

DOJ:

Arkansas Lawyer Challenges Authority For US Attorney's Appointment. The Arkansas Democrat Gazette (1/25, Satter) reports, "A Little Rock attorney appointed Friday to represent a man charged with capital murder and possibly facing the death penalty has filed a motion to declare Tim Griffin's appointment last month as U. S. attorney for the Eastern District of Arkansas unconstitutional." The Gazette continues, "John Wesley Hall Jr., who represents Antoine Demetrius Baker, said in a 16-page motion filed Tuesday that Griffin's appointment last month by U. S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales violates Article II, Section 2, of the U. S. Constitution, which covers presidential appointments. He said it also violates a section of the U. S. Code altered last year during Congressional reauthorization of the USAPATRIOT Act. … The reworded section of the act omits a subsection that previously caused an attorney general's appointment of a U. S. attorney to expire within 120 days. The effect is that an appointee may now serve indefinitely without having to go through the standard procedure of being nominated by the president and then scrutinized by the Senate, which then votes to confirm or deny the appointment." The Gazette adds, "Little noticed at the time, the revision has stirred anger since the discovery that a handful of U. S. attorneys across the country were inexplicably forced to resign recently and then were replaced under the new provision by appointees who had not gone through the standard procedure — although the Justice Department says it is subjecting all of them to the process. … Among those ousted was Bud Cummins, U. S. attorney for the Eastern District of Arkansas, whose job as chief federal prosecutor has generated praise in the legal community. Cummins said he was asked to resign so that Griffin, who had worked in the White House as a Republican strategist, could have a chance to serve as U. S. attorney." The Gazette notes, "Griffin declined to comment on Hall's challenge to the method in which Griffin secured the top legal position in the eastern part of the state. But the challenge was rebuffed Tuesday by the U. S. Department of Justice with more of the same language that the department has used over the past few weeks to defend its appointment of Griffin. … 'Congress provided the Attorney General the authority in federal law (28 United States Code § 546) to appoint a United States Attorney because we must ensure that someone is able to carry out the important function of leading a U. S. Attorney's office in the event a vacancy arise,' said Brian Roehrkasse, deputy director of public affairs. 'We have clearly stated our commitment to having a U. S. Attorney in every district who is confirmed by the Senate, and thus there is no merit to the assertion that we are using this authority in an attempt to circumvent the confirmation process.'"

The Los Angeles Times (1/25, Weinstein) reports, "Some Democrats have suggested that the moves were made to reward friends of the White House or punish prosecutors who had taken actions that angered the administration." The Times continues, "Administration officials have denied that the moves were political and assert that Gonzales has the authority to take these actions under a 2006 amendment to the Patriot Act that allows recess appointments. … But Hall's challenge contends that the section of the Patriot Act that Gonzales is relying on is an attempted 'end run' around the appointments clause, which mandates that the Senate confirm the president's appointees." The Times adds, "

The AP (1/25) reports, "Griffin was named interim U.S. attorney for the Eastern District of Arkansas by Attorney General Alberto Gonzalez in a 'recess appointment' after Congress adjourned for the year in 2006. The USA Patriot Act now allows Griffin to serve without having to be nominated by the president and go through Senate confirmation. … Previously, the appointment would have been good for 120 days." The AP notes, "Justice Department spokesman Brian Roehkrasse said the department is committed to having Senate confirmation hearings. … 'There is no merit to the assertion that we are using this authority in an attempt to circumvent the confirmation process,' he said."

DOJ_NMG_0121228

More Commentary. The New York Times (1/25) editorializes, "The federal investigation into Congressional corruption is approaching a crucial deadline and potential dead end. Feb. 15 is the last day on the job for United States Attorney Carol Lam of San Diego, the inquiry's dedicated prosecutor, who is being purged by the Bush administration." The Times continues, "Her investigation led to the imprisonment of former Representative Randy Cunningham, the California Republican who took millions of dollars in bribes in exchange for delivering lucrative government contracts. But just as Ms. Lam was digging into other possible wrongdoing, the White House decided to force her from office without explanation." The Times adds, "Ms. Lam has been investigating the dealings of Brent Wilkes, a private contractor and deep-pocketed political contributor who was designated co-conspirator No. 1 in the Cunningham case. … The question now is whether her successor, as yet unnamed, will pursue the inquiry with the same dedication or will quietly smother it. … The outlook isn't promising. The administration is defenestrating at least six other U.S. attorneys. Yet Attorney General Alberto Gonzales is refusing to provide Congress with details on these unmerited dismissals. He insists that there's no attempt to quash fresh Republican scandals and says only the 'very best' will be named as replacements." The Times concludes, "We are skeptical, especially since the White House's reported choice to replace Little Rock's federal attorney is a Republican operative close to Karl Rove. Congress must demand a clear explanation from Mr. Gonzales and the White House on why these prosecutors are being ousted. It must search out every shady aspect of this clearly politically motivated purge — with a particular eye on Feb. 15."

The Houston Chronicle (1/25) editorializes, "In the past year 11 U.S. attorneys have resigned their positions, some under pressure from their Justice Department superiors and the White House, even through they had commendable performance records. … Democratic senators are concerned that the high turnover is linked to an obscure, recently passed provision of the Patriot Act. … U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales denied political motives figured in the multiple resignations of top prosecutors, and pledged that all interim appointments would be submitted to the Senate for confirmation. He reiterated that U.S. attorneys serve at the pleasure of the president and can be removed for a number of reasons, including job performance and their standing in their districts. That isn't good enough for (Sen. Diane) Feinstein and her Democratic colleagues, who have introduced legislation to reinstate the appointment of interim prosecutors by federal judges." The Chronicle adds, "Gonzales is correct that the president is vested with the power to appoint U.S. attorneys. Unfortunately, the Patriot Act change eliminated the ability of the Senate to exercise its constitutional oversight of those nominations to make sure they are qualified and not simply political plums handed out to supporters in the waning years of the administration. … No president should be able to fire top government prosecutors from their positions for political reasons and then install successors without a thorough vetting by the constitutionally charged legislative body."

Unisys To Continue Supporting DOJ Asset Tracking System. Washington Technology (1/24, Welsh) reports, "Unisys Corp. will continue supporting a consolidated asset tracking system used by the Justice Department to monitor property seized from criminals under a new contract. The eight-year deal may be worth as much as $112 million, the company said." WTech continues, "Under a blanket purchase agreement, Unisys of Blue Bell, Pa., will provide applications and managed services support for all system operations. … Unisys will handle systems integration, systems development, engineering, network management, production support, and security and certification. The company also will be responsible for customer support, program management, verification and validation." WTech adds, "The Justice Department's asset tracking system tracks, monitors and reports on property seized and forfeited in the prosecution of criminal activities. Ten law enforcement agencies used the consolidated system. … The new contract extends Unisys work on the asset tracking system project. Over the past five years, Unisys has modernized all of the system's core business applications while maintaining legacy system operations during the process, the company said."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Former Enron Official Begins 18-Month Prison Term. The Houston Chronicle (1/25, Hays) reports, "Enron's former investor relations chief entered a federal prison in Texas today to serve an 18-month sentence for helping top executives mislead Wall Street about the company's financial viability." The Chronicle continues, "Mark Koenig, 51, surrendered at a men's prison in Three Rivers, about 74 miles south of San Antonio, at noon today, prison spokesman Michael Ginster said." The Chronicle adds, "With his surrender, Koenig became the eighth former Enron executive to serve prison time in the aftermath of the company's collapse more than five years ago. … Koenig pleaded guilty in August 2004 to aiding and abetting securities fraud for misleading Wall Street analysts to conceal Enron's precarious financial condition before the company collapsed in December 2001. As head of investor relations, he was Enron's main liaison to Wall Street. … Koenig's former second-in-command, Paula Rieker, pleaded guilty to insider trading earlier in 2004 and is serving probation for two years."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Former Official Says Libby Sought To Blame CIA For Faulty Iraq Intel. USA Today (1/25, Willing, 2.27M) reports I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby was "part of a White House strategy to use press leaks to blame the CIA for faulty intelligence about Iraq's efforts to acquire nuclear bomb material, a former top CIA official testified Wednesday." Robert Grenier, the CIA's former assistant secretary for operations, said Libby was "annoyed by reports that the administration had ignored evidence that its claims that Iraq sought nuclear fuel were wrong." Libby had "asked Grenier about former State Department official Joseph Wilson, who had investigated the claims about Iraq's nuclear intentions for the CIA. Grenier testified that he also told Libby that Wilson's wife, Valerie Plame, was a covert CIA official."

The Washington Post (1/25, A3, Leonnig, Goldstein, 690K) reports, "Summoned out of a meeting with the CIA director to take" Libby's "urgent call later that same afternoon," Grenier said "he relayed all he had learned about former ambassador Joseph C. Wilson IV, the man behind news reports of the trip that had Libby so concerned." Grenier said Wilson "had gone on a CIA-sponsored mission to check out intelligence that Iraq was trying to buy uranium for nuclear weapons and had concluded that the tip was unfounded," and he "told Libby, it appeared that Wilson's wife, a CIA officer, had suggested Wilson for the trip." The Post adds, "The timing of Grenier's response and Libby's anxiety over Wilson are central to the prosecution's allegation that Libby lied to investigators when he said that he believed he first learned CIA officer Valerie Plame's identity from NBC's Tim Russert a month later."

The New York Times (1/25, Lewis, 1.16M) reports prosecutors "paraded a roster of former government officials before the jury on Wednesday to testify that they had informed him about the identity of the C.I.A. operative Valerie Wilson, contrary to Mr. Libby's claim that he had learned about her weeks later from reporters." Libby's lawyers "spent their time cross-examining those witnesses in an effort to attack both their credibility and their memory." The "purpose of Mr. Grenier's testimony from the prosecutor's point of view was to cast doubt on Mr. Libby's account that he did not remember learning about Ms. Wilson from officials when he testified that he learned about her from journalists." But William H. Jeffress Jr., "one of Mr. Libby's lawyers, quickly set about taking apart Mr. Grenier's account. He noted that in his first appearance before a grand jury and in an interview with F.B.I. agents, Mr. Grenier did not say he had told Mr. Libby about Ms. Wilson." Libby's lawyers "seemed to have two agendas in mind. Not only did they want to underscore the fragility of memory — Mr. Libby has said that if he testified incorrectly about his conversations with reporters it was only because he simply remembered incorrectly — but also to create a vexing, lengthy and complicated narrative for the jury."

The Los Angeles Times (1/25, Schmitt, 850K) reports Libby's "defense against perjury charges, which rests in part on what he has described as innocent memory lapses, appeared to gain some ground Wednesday when his lawyers showed that two government witnesses in the case had memory issues of their own." Grenier, "questioned by Libby's lawyers, acknowledged that he initially told a federal grand jury in January 2004 that he did not believe he had shared information about the status of CIA operative Valerie Plame when he spoke with Libby weeks before she was identified in a newspaper column. But Grenier said he testified 18 months later in another grand jury appearance that he believed he had given Libby that information after all." Another official — Marc Grossman, "a former State Department undersecretary for political affairs — also testified Wednesday that he had discussed Plame with Libby but conceded there were discrepancies in the accounts that he had initially given FBI agents. Grossman said he could not account for the differences. "

Little "Known Evidence" To Support Libby Scapegoat Claim. The New York Times (1/25, Johnston, Rutenberg, 1.16M) reports "the assertion" by Libby attorneys "that White House aides had sacrificed him to protect Karl Rove, the senior political adviser, appears to be based primarily on Mr. Libby's own sense that the administration had failed to defend him adequately as the C.I.A. leak case unfolded." But there is "little known evidence to buttress the suggestion by Mr. Libby's defense team in his obstruction and perjury trial that unnamed White House officials were deliberately setting Mr. Libby up to be a scapegoat." The defense team's statements "set off a debate across Washington about whether they were part of a legal gambit to divert attention from the underlying charge that Mr. Libby lied to F.B.I. agents and the grand jury or whether his lawyers had evidence of an effort within the White House to focus the blame on Mr. Libby." Libby's lawyers have "so far offered few details about how he might have been set up as a fall guy for Mr. Rove. White House aides said little about the alleged rift on Wednesday, indicating they were prepared to grant their former colleague wide latitude to present an aggressive defense — even if it meant letting stand unanswered a story of intrigue and disloyalty involving President Bush's and Mr. Cheney's most trusted aides."

Libby Trial May Intensify White House Factionalism. The White House Bulletin/US News (1/25) reports the "new accusations in the Lewis 'Scooter' Libby trial are opening a window on the pattern of infighting within the Bush White House, which has been mostly kept hidden from public view." Libby attorney, Theodore Wells, Jr., argued at Libby's perjury trial "that White House officials tried to protect political guru Karl Rove from legal damage in the Valerie Plame CIA leak case and attempted to make Libby the scapegoat. White House insiders say these allegations could intensify hard feelings between the Libby faction, led by Vice President Dick Cheney who was Libby's boss, and the Rove faction, led by President Bush."

DOJ_NMG_0121230

Cheney Declines To Discuss Libby Trial. When asked about the trial of I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby on CNN's The Situation Room (1/24, Blitzer), Vice President Dick Cheney said, "I'm going to be a witness in that trial within a matter of weeks. I'm not going to discuss it. I haven't discussed it with anybody in the press yet; I'm not going to discuss it with you today. … I'm a strong friend and supporter of Scooter's. I have not contributed to his legal defense fund. I think he is an extraordinarily talented and capable individual."

Mayors Blame Federal Government For Crime Surge. USA Today (1/25, El Nasser) reports from Louisville, KY, "A minister who regularly conducts prayer vigils against violence and counsels crime victims is beaten by a gang of youths. Five people are shot and wounded at a community festival. A softball player is shot and wounded at a game, in front of 100 witnesses. One person is killed and four wounded in a shooting outside a funeral home as people gather for a wake." USA continues, "These crimes happened in very public settings here last year — two of them within 2 miles of the heart of this Ohio River city's downtown. Such incidents inevitably give communities the jitters, but cities are especially skittish now because the nation's violent crime rate is rising after more than a decade of decline, and the stakes are higher. … The drop in crime helped spark an urban revival that attracted thousands of residents and billions of dollars of investment to downtowns from Louisville to Miami, St. Louis and Denver. Now, city leaders across the nation are fearful that crime will kill the renaissance." USA adds, "For a city such as Louisville, where downtown is flourishing, keeping crime in check is paramount. More than $1 billion has been invested in the commercial heart of the city this decade. By 2010, at least another $1 billion is expected to come in. Five hotels are set to open, and the 2000 housing units now downtown are expected to double by 2009. … Rising crime 'has the potential of being damaging,' says Jerry Abramson, mayor of Louisville from 1985 to 1998. He was elected again in 2002 after Louisville merged with surrounding Jefferson County; he was re-elected in 2006. 'We all live day by day in terms of concern of some horrific thing happening in our central business district that would set us back.' … Murders and robberies continued to rise nationwide during the first six months of 2006, according to the FBI, and violent crime overall appears headed for a second straight year of increases. Mayors and police chiefs regularly assure the public that violent crimes still are confined mostly to poorer drug- and gang-infested areas, but they are sounding alarms:" USA notes, "Abramson and some other mayors also blame the federal government for cutting funding for crime prevention and phasing out a Clinton administration program that added 100,000 police officers nationwide. They say Washington's focus has shifted to homeland security at the expense of hometown security. … 'The consensus is that the federal government walked away from that partnership,' Abramson says. 'Crime all of a sudden begins to ratchet up but police on the street have ratcheted significantly down. We draw a correlation.' … Justice Department spokesman Brian Roehrkasse disagrees. 'The increase in violent crime in some areas does not appear to be related to federal spending for law enforcement,' he says. 'DOJ spending has never accounted for more than 4% of total spending on state and local law enforcement.'"

Navy Contractor Jailed In Mexico On Kidnapping Charges. NBC San Diego (1/25) reports, "A San Diego man is in jail in Tijuana, accused of kidnapping a 12-year-old girl." NBC San Diego continues, "The U.S. Department of Justice confirmed that Tijuana police arrested Manuel Martinez, 41, on Monday. He is accused of abducting the girl outside a school. … According to police, Martinez pulled the girl into a burgundy Toyota truck with California license plates, tied her up and threatened to rape and kill her. Police found the truck and rescued her, officials said. They also found U.S. Navy credentials, a military knife and various sexual aids in the truck, police said. … Martinez is a civilian contractor working for the U.S. Navy, according to the Justice Department. He is being held on kidnapping, attempted murder and other charges."

DOJ Asked To Probe "Hounddog" Movie For Possible Porn Law Violations. The AP (1/25, Hummel) reports from Park City, UT, "At a festival that features several films with sexual content, including full male nudity and a documentary about bestiality, a Southern Gothic tale that includes the rape of a young girl is causing the biggest stir. … 'Hounddog' is the story of Lewellen, a girl played by 12-year-old Dakota Fanning, who is growing up in the 1960s South. She is a free spirit obsessed with Elvis Presley and has little supervision by her abusive father and alcoholic grandmother." The AP continues, "Even before the first screening of 'Hounddog' at the Sundance Film Festival this week, a Christian film critic, citing Fanning's age, decried the movie as child abuse, and Roman Catholic activist Bill Donohue called for a federal investigation. … Fanning is defending her work as well as the movie, and so is the head of Sundance, who said it was courageous for director Deborah Kampmeier to tackle 'challenging material.' 'Hounddog' is entered in the festival's dramatic category." The AP adds, "The disturbing scene lasts a few minutes, but is not graphic. There is no nudity, the scene is very darkly lit and only Fanning's face and hand are shown. … Ted Baehr, chairman of the Christian Film and Television Commission and publisher of the Web site movieguide.org, claims 'Hounddog' breaks federal child-pornography law. He said the law covers material that 'appears' to show minors engaging in sexually explicit conduct. … Donohue, president of the Catholic League for Religious and Civil Rights, said he has asked the U.S. Justice Department to investigate whether antipornography laws have been broken."

DOJ_NMG_0121231

New Mexico Treasurer Sentenced To Prison For Extortion Plot. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (1/25, Korte) reports, "Former state Treasurer Robert Vigil was sentenced Wednesday to three years in federal prison for pressuring a contractor to hire the previous treasurer's wife, despite concerns that she was unqualified. Vigil, 53, was convicted in September of a single count of attempted extortion. Jurors acquitted him of 23 other counts of extortion and racketeering. Vigil remained free after sentencing, wearing an ankle monitoring bracelet, but the judge ordered him to report to prison within 60 days." The AP adds, "Vigil was also fined $97,000 and sentenced to three years of probation after his release."

FBI Arrests Memphis Police Officer On Money Laundering Charges. WMC-TV Memphis (1/24, Douglas) reported on its Web site from a broadcast story, "A Memphis Police officer was arrested Wednesday as a result of Operation Tarnished Blue." Officer Orlando Hebron allegedly "made several offers to launder money for an undercover informant. … Federal documents say that the informant agreed to give Hebron about $3,000 in cash. In exchange for the cash, Hebron promised to launder the money and return $2,400 of it in the form of a check." Hebron also allegedly "agreed to assist the informant in a robbery at a mini-storage last November where the informant says thousands of dollars in cash and two kilos of cocaine were stored. This time the informant gave Hebron $4,900 to launder." The Memphis Commercial Appeal (1/25, Conley, 163K) notes Hebron, "an officer since 1995 and currently assigned to Mitchell High School, was arrested by FBI agents Wednesday, after the return of a sealed indictment by a federal grand jury on Tuesday." He "Hebron is the 15th law enforcement officer snared in the FBI's ongoing investigation of police corruption dubbed 'Tarnished Blue.' Eight other officers have been charged in related anti-corruption operations in the past two years."

Neteller Co-Founder Vows To Fight US Charges. The Financial Times (1/25, Pimlott) reports, "John Lefebvre, the co-founder of Neteller who stands accused of laundering billions of dollars in illegal online gaming proceeds, plans to fight all of the charges against him, his lawyer said. 'He's going to be contesting everything we know about the charges right now,' said Vincent Marella, his attorney, outside the New York court where Mr Lefebvre was due to appear yesterday for a bail hearing." The Times adds, "The US justice department considers online gambling to be illegal although it is an established and regulated industry elsewhere in the world," and "some US lawyers have questioned whether criminal prosecutions are likely to be successful because the companies involved are not based on US soil."

FBI Arrests UC Riverside Official On Bribery Charges. The Orange County Register (1/25, Carcamo) reports, "Officials arrested a man Wednesday on suspicion of federal bribery charges after prosecutors said he solicited bribes from an Irvine-based company, U.S. Attorney's officials reported. Federal prosecutors accuse Theodore Chiu, 53, of Riverside of receiving a series of bribes from and Irvine-based general contractor in charge of the construction of a psychology building on the campus of UC Riverside. FBI agents arrested Chiu on the campus after they said he met with the president of the Irvine-based FTR International Inc. Chiu is an associate director of design and construction at the university." The Register notes that "Chiu allegedly received $18,000 in bribes from FTR. The company and its president cooperated with FBI agents during the investigation, prosecutors said." The Los Angeles Times (1/25, 850K) also briefly reported on Chiu's arrest.

Federal Investigators Widening Pirro Probe. The New York Daily News (1/25, Standora, 729K) reports, "The feds have again widened their criminal probe of former Westchester District Attorney Jeanine Pirro - this time to see if she used the resources of her office in her failed campaign against Sen. Hillary Clinton, WNBC reported yesterday. FBI agents and local investigators are focusing on whether Republican Pirro or her staffers ran background checks on donors to her 2006 senatorial campaign using computers and databases at the DA's office, the station's Jonathan Dienst reported. A number of former members of Pirro's campaign have been questioned by investigators, he said." However, "Pirro spokesman Michael Edelman told the Daily News last night that Pirro had done nothing wrong, calling the probe 'nonsense.'"

DOJ_NMG_0121232

Florida Man Convicted Of Defrauding Medicare With Stolen Patient IDs. The Naples Daily News (1/25, Freeman) reports, "A jury Wednesday convicted a Collier County man of stealing the identities of 1,130 patients at Cleveland Clinic Naples that were used to submit more than $7 million in false claims to Medicare, according to the U.S. Attorney's Office in Miami. Fernando Ferrer Jr. of Naples, a registered owner of Advanced Medical Claims in Naples, was convicted after a three-day trial in U.S. District Court in Fort Lauderdale on eight counts of conspiracy to defraud the U.S. government, computer fraud, wrongful disclosure of individual health information and aggravated identity theft." Ferrer and co-defendant Isis Machado "became the first individuals in South Florida convicted of criminal charges for violating the federal law protecting patients' privacy rights, known as the Health Insurance Portability and Accountability Act (HIPPA), according to the U.S. Justice Department."

The AP (1/25) notes Machado "worked as a front desk coordinator at Cleveland Clinic in Weston from May 2005 to June 2006. She downloaded patient files and then sold them to Ferrer, who then made false Medicare claims as owner of Advanced Medical Claims Inc. in Naples, the indictment said. Ferrer used the information to bill medical providers in Miami for services that were not rendered, resulting in $7 million fraudulently billed to Medicare, federal investigators said."

Chicago Investment Adviser Convicted Of Fraud. The Chicago Tribune (1/25, O'Connor, 617K) reports, "A former Chicago investment adviser whose business card touted him as 'Ambassador to Cash' was convicted Wednesday by a federal jury of conning an ailing woman out of more than a quarter million dollars. Jurors took about three hours to find Brian D. McGowan guilty on 18 counts of wire fraud and one count of investment-adviser fraud. During the nearly three-week trial, testimony by the mother of Michael Jordan and that of athletes with ties to Chicago denied claims by McGowan that he had managed their financial affairs. Following the verdict, U.S. District Senior Judge John Grady said McGowan's testimony was the most egregious perjury he had seen in more than three decades on the bench."

The Chicago Sun-Times (1/25) notes McGowan "tricked Camille La Mie, 63, into handing over the bulk of her wealth by boasting that his clients included Michael Jordan's mother and former NBA star Tim Hardaway. Prosecutors said McGowan used some of La Mie's money to pay his own bills. McGowan's attorney argued that La Mie, formerly of Chicago, was angry with McGowan because he'd failed to hide her income from the government. She then proceeded to set up McGowan, defense attorney Robert Gorence argued."

New York Man Pleads Guilty To Scamming $200,000 From Priests. The New York Times (1/25, 1.16M) reports, "Robert Riggio of Manhattan, who was charged with defrauding more than 60 priests over several years, pleaded guilty to wire fraud in Federal District Court yesterday, prosecutors said." US Attorney Michael Garcia "said that Mr. Riggio stole more than $200,000 from 2004 to 2006 by calling priests with bogus pleas for help and requests for money. The funds often came from the priests' personal savings, Mr. Garcia said. Mr. Riggio was arrested in September after he asked for money from an F.B.I. agent posing as the niece of a priest who had been defrauded, Mr. Garcia said."

Former BLA Members Were Living "Comparatively Quiet Lives." The AP (1/25, Curtis) reports, "They'd long since exchanged the radical idealism of their youth for comparatively quiet lives as janitors, job counselors and Little League coaches. They'd become husbands, fathers and grandfathers. But memories of a violent era in American history came rushing back this week when eight men with ties to the Black Panther Party were arrested in the 1971 killing of a San Francisco police officer." The AP notes, "Two years after the killing," alleged lookouts John Bowman and Harold Taylor "were arrested in New Orleans. But a judge dismissed the charges in 1976 because the men had allegedly been tortured by San Francisco police officers during an interrogation. Over three days, the men said, they were stripped, blindfolded and beaten." Bowman and Taylor "went public, speaking to activist and community groups from Boston to Chicago and vowing to dedicate the rest of their lives to stopping torture. … Two defense lawyers said Wednesday they believe the new charges are retaliation for the former Panthers' public statements." In a story also largely sympathetic toward the suspects, the San Francisco Chronicle (1/25, A1, Fulbright, Bulwa, 384K) reports on local reaction to the arrests, under the headline "Stunned Friends Laud The Men They Know Now."

Defense Lawyers Expect Former BLA Member To Be Key US Witness. The San Francisco Chronicle (1/25, Van Derbeken, 384K) reports, "More than 30 years ago, Ruben Scott testified against his alleged Black Liberation Army brethren in the slaying of two New York City police officers. Now, defense attorneys suspect, Scott will be alone among the former militants to testify against his one-time confederates, who were charged Tuesday in the 1971 slaying of San Francisco police Sgt. John Young and a larger conspiracy to kill police. While state prosecutors won't say whether Scott will take the witness stand, defense attorneys say he is the only insider whose testimony has ever been used to convict BLA members of a crime. And he is the only former BLA member previously indicted in the slaying of Young whom prosecutors have chosen not to name again in the current case. The charges against him were dismissed in 1976."

DOJ_NMG_0121233

Convicted Cop Killer Had Stolen Pennsylvania Man's ID. The AP (1/25, Kates) reports John T. Healy, of Yardley, Pa., "has endured a nightmare over the past two weeks after learning that the man who apparently stole his identity two years ago was charged with -- and ultimately convicted of -- killing an upstate New York police officer." The AP notes, "The man authorities prosecuted under the name John Healy was convicted Monday of second-degree murder for his role in the death of New Hartford Police Officer Joseph Corr following a million-dollar jewelry store robbery. … FBI Special Agent Jerri Williams in Philadelphia said Wednesday that the defendant is known to her agency as Toussaint Martin, 38, formerly of Philadelphia. He has been 'known to law enforcement for a number of years' and was a suspect in other jewelry store robberies when he was caught in New York, she said."

Coke Formula Theft Trial Delayed By Dispute Over Sensitive Documents. The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (1/25, Stanford, 379K) reports, "The judge in the Coke secrets trial sent the jury home Wednesday morning so attorneys could haggle over how to handle sensitive documents the company says contain proprietary trade information. Coke's lawyers and prosecutors had thought the judge was going to seal hundreds of pages of Coca-Cola documents from public view, showing them only to jurors who would be sworn to secrecy. But U.S. District Court Judge J. Owen Forrester told the lawyers they misunderstood his intentions. He said he had agreed to seal only two documents. That sent Coke's lawyers into a tizzy." The AJC adds, "The judge also admonished federal prosecutors for allowing the defense attorney to deal directly with Coke's lawyers. … 'You and you only are responsible for the representation you make to this court' about the introduction of evidence."

The AP (1/25, Clark) reports, "A government prosecutor asked for a recess to review more than 750 pages of defense documents to determine whether portions should be redacted before being shown to the jury." Forrester "granted the recess until 11 a.m. Thursday," when defendant Joya Williams' former boss, Coke executive Javier Sanchez Lamelas, "is expected to return to the stand." On Tuesday, Lamelas testified "that there was no reason for Williams to bring confidential Coca-Cola documents to her home." Bloomberg News (1/25) also briefly reports on the recess.

Duncan "Confession" To FBI Insufficient To Bring Murder Charges. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (1/25, Johnson) reports, "A convicted murderer's statements to the FBI about the deaths of two young girls in Washington are not sufficient to bring criminal charges in the deaths, though the man remains 'a viable person of interest' in the slayings, investigators said Wednesday. Federal prosecutors in Idaho said Tuesday that Joseph Edward Duncan III had confessed to the Washington killings and the slaying of a California boy in statements to the FBI after he was arrested in July 2005 with an Idaho girl who had vanished seven weeks earlier." The AP adds, "Though Duncan's statements revealed some knowledge of the case, he could have gleaned it from a fellow inmate or elsewhere, King County sheriff's spokesman Sgt. John Urquhart said. … 'Characterizing what Duncan said as a "confession" has a huge impact on the family,' Urquhart said. 'They think the case has been solved and that we know who killed their kids. But we don't know that for sure, and we continue to investigate.'"

Federal Prosecutors Reveal Deal With Jeffs Over Seized Documents. The Deseret Morning News (1/25, Winslow) reports, "Federal prosecutors say they have struck a deal with Fundamentalist LDS Church leader Warren Jeffs over documents, letters and other evidence seized when he was arrested. That deal voids any claims Jeffs has that the documents are privileged communications between the polygamist leader and his followers, the U.S. Attorney's Office for Utah said in a motion asking a federal judge to dismiss the evidence-dispute case in Nevada." The Deseret News adds, "In an affidavit obtained by the Deseret Morning News on Wednesday, an FBI agent revealed more details about Jeffs' arrest. Conflicting stories raised suspicions about a man in the car who identified himself as 'John Findley.' … After getting the driver's consent to search, the trooper found envelopes addressed to 'President Jeffs' and two yellow envelopes containing cash, debit cards and tools. FBI agents arrived on the scene and spoke to "John Findley," who admitted he was Warren Jeffs."

Closing Arguments Made At Federal Abortion Murder Trial. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (1/25, Thompson) reports, "Anti-abortion extremist James Kopp made a last attempt Wednesday to convince jurors he didn't mean to kill a doctor he shot, while a prosecutor countered there are 'no do-overs' when shooting someone. The two sides presented their closing arguments in Kopp's trial on charges he violated the federal Freedom of Access to Clinic Entrances Act by killing Dr. Barnett Slepian with a single shot from a Russian military rifle in 1998." The AP notes, "After the Oct. 23, 1998, shooting, Kopp fled to Mexico, Ireland and finally France, where he was captured in March 2001. He was added — along with Osama bin Laden — to the FBI's list of the Ten Most Wanted fugitives in June 1999. Jurors deliberated about an hour Wednesday before being sent home after asking to review testimony concerning the timeline of the shooting."

DOJ_NMG_0121234

Texas Man Sentenced To 10 Months In Prison For Red Cross Relief Fraud. The AP (1/25) reports, "A Dallas man who used stolen Hurricane Katrina debit cards is joining two of his siblings in prison over the same scam, authorities said. Abram Wesley Hines, 25, was sentenced Wednesday to 10 months behind bars, the U.S. attorney's office said." The trio "admitted stealing at least 80 Red Cross debit cards meant for victims of Katrina." Brian Hines "was sentenced to 30 months and ordered to make nearly $203,000 in restitution," and Charmaine Denise Hines "was sentenced to 41 months in prison and ordered to repay more than $23,000."

NC Bar Brings Ethics Charges Against Prosecutor In Duke Case. USA Today (1/25, Koch) reports, "Mike Nifong, whose prosecution of three Duke University lacrosse players on rape and sexual misconduct charges has faced growing criticism, has been hit with a second set of misconduct charges." USA continues, "In a complaint filed Wednesday, the North Carolina State Bar accused Durham County District Attorney Nifong of withholding evidence from the defense and making misleading statements in court. It charged him last month with violating rules of professional conduct by making misleading and inflammatory statements to reporters about the athletes, who were suspended from the university." USA adds, "Duke permitted two of the athletes, Reade Seligmann and Collin Finnerty, to return to school this month, following the dismissal Dec. 22 of rape charges, the most serious charges against them. The third defendant, David Evans, has graduated. All three say they are innocent. … The expanded ethics complaint, which says Nifong's actions amount to a 'systematic abuse of prosecutorial discretion,' could lead to his disbarment, says L. Thomas Lunsford II, the state bar's executive director."

The New York Times (1/25, Wilson) reports, "The new charges added to a previous ethics complaint accusing Mr. Nifong of making false and prejudicial remarks about the case to the news media. A three-member independent panel is expected to hear the matter against him this summer. Penalties could include disbarment." The Times adds, "Mr. Nifong's lawyer, David B. Freedman, denied yesterday that there had been 'any sort of intentional unethical conduct.' In a telephone interview, Mr. Freedman said that Mr. Nifong had a 'flawless record' for ethics in 28 years as a prosecutor and that a written response, to be issued within 30 days, would give his side of the case."

Mortgage Fraud On The Rise Across The Nation. USA Today (1/25, Knox) reports from Leavenworth, KS, "When Brent Barber tells you -- and he's about to -- how easy it is to steal your house out from under you, or take your money and ruin your credit, even while he's sitting in prison, you'd better listen. … A one-time millionaire with a house on a golf course, Barber was sentenced in October to 12 years in prison for masterminding the largest mortgage fraud ever prosecuted in Missouri, and most other states too, the FBI says. He pleaded guilty to a five-year scam that involved nearly 300 properties in Kansas City, Mo., and victimized more than 80 people." USA continues, "Nationally, mortgage fraud has spread in the past few years, with losses totaling around $1 billion last year, the FBI says. The real estate boom, along with looser lending standards, built an ideal breeding ground for smooth-talking con artists like Barber. Those hurt by fraud are not only lenders, but also the thousands of other homeowners who pay higher interest rates as a result, and the neighborhoods where foreclosures depress property values, invite crime and drain city resources. … Florida is the No. 1 hot spot for mortgage fraud, followed by Utah, Georgia, Colorado, Illinois and Missouri (chart, right)." USA adds, "Fraud cases are likely to continue rising this year and next, the Mortgage Asset Research Institute says. That's because fraud has become harder to hide in today's slower housing market, when lenders have more time to review applications and appraisals. And because fraudulent loans tend to fall into foreclosure after about three years, many bad loans from the real estate boom have yet to surface."

Prosecutors Want DeLay Charge Reinstated. The AP (1/25, Shannon) reports, "Prosecutors attempting to restore a conspiracy charge against former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay argued Wednesday that the 'plain language' of Texas law means he can be charged with conspiring to violate the election code." But "lawyers for DeLay and two co-defendants told the Court of Criminal Appeals the law is clear in their view -- that conspiracy was added to the state election code after prosecutors allege the crime happened." Travis County District Attorney Ronnie Earle's office "is appealing lower court rulings that threw out the charge accusing DeLay and Republican fundraisers Jim Ellis and John Colyandro of conspiring to violate the Texas election code and its ban on corporate campaign contributions. It could be weeks or months before the appeals court makes a decision."

NYTimes Criticizes Mandatory Sentencing Laws. The New York Times (1/25, 1.16M) says in an editorial that the US "is paying a heavy price for the mandatory sentencing fad that swept the country 30 years ago. After a tenfold increase in the nation's prison population — and a corrections price tag that exceeds $60 billion a year — the states have often been forced to choose between building new prisons or new schools. Worse still, the country has created a growing felon caste, now more than 16 million strong, of felons and ex-felons, who are often driven back to prison by policies that make it impossible for them to find jobs, housing or education." The "only real way to reduce the inmate population — and the felon class — is to ensure that imprisonment is a method of last resort. That means abandoning the mandatory sentencing laws that have filled prisons to bursting with nonviolent offenders who are doomed to remain trapped at the very margins of society."

DOJ_NMG_0121235

CIVIL LAW:

PBS&J Settles Contract Claims With DOJ For $6.4 Million. The Miami Herald (1/25, Danner, Christensen) reports, "The embezzlement by three former employees at engineering firm PBS&J continues to cost the firm: PBS&J paid more than $6.4 million to settle claims it overcharged the federal government on 'hundreds of contracts,' the Justice Department announced." The Herald continues, "The overbilling, the government said, arose from a $36 million embezzlement scheme perpetrated by PBS&J's former chief financial officer and two underlings between 1992 and 2005. … The embezzlement involved shifting funds and fabricating entries in the company's books to cover up the scheme and resulted in PBS&J's audited overhead rates being overstated, the Justice Department said in a statement. Overhead includes items like management salaries, rent, insurance and benefits." The Herald adds, "The settlement resolves claims that PBS&J violated the False Claims Act. … The three former PBS&J employees, ex-CFO W. Scott DeLoach, Maria A. Garcia and Rosario Licata, each pleaded guilty in September to their roles in the embezzlement. They are scheduled to be sentenced next month. … Joining the Justice Department in the civil investigation of PBS&J were the Office of the Inspector General for the Department of Transportation and the Defense Contract Audit Agency. … 'Companies that enter into contracts with the government must maintain accounting controls and procedures that ensure that the costs and rates that they submit to the government are accurate,' said Peter D. Keisler, assistant attorney general of the civil division in Washington."

Winners Of FBI Wrongful Death Suit Drop Additional Claims Against Agents. The Boston Globe (1/25, Murphy, 413K) reports, "It took 22 years for the family of slain Quincy fisherman John McIntyre to prove that the FBI's mishandling of longtime informants James 'Whitey' Bulger and Stephen 'The Rifleman' Flemmi caused his brutal killing in 1984. But after winning a landmark $3.2 million wrongful death suit against the government in September, lawyers for McIntyre's mother and brother notified a judge yesterday that they are dropping additional claims they had made against six retired FBI agents. 'We proved what we wanted to prove,' said McIntyre's brother, Christopher, adding that he and his mother want to get on with their lives and weren't up for another drawn-out legal battle that would once again rehash his brother's murder." The Globe notes, "US District Judge Reginald C. Lindsay…had yet to rule on the agents' assertions that federal law barred the McIntyres from seeking damages from them, since they had already won a damages claim against the government."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Former Deputy Charged With 1964 Racial Murders. The AP (1/25, Pettus, Jordan) reports from Jackson, MS, "A white former sheriff's deputy who was once thought to be dead was arrested on federal charges Wednesday in one of the last major unsolved crimes of the civil rights era — the 1964 killings of two black men who were beaten and dumped alive into the Mississippi River." The AP continues, "The break in the 43-year-old case was largely the result of the dogged efforts of the older brother of one of the victims, who vowed to bring the killers to justice. … James Ford Seale, a 71-year-old reputed Ku Klux Klansman from the town of Roxie, was charged with kidnapping hitchhikers Charles Eddie Moore and Henry Hezekiah Dee, both 19. … The victims' weighted, badly decomposed bodies were found by chance two months later in July 1964, during the search for three civil rights workers whose disappearance and deaths in Philadelphia, Miss., got far more attention from the media and the FBI. … Seale is expected to be arraigned Thursday in Jackson." The AP adds, "The arrest marked the latest attempt by prosecutors in the South to close the books on crimes from the civil rights era that went unpunished. In recent years, authorities in Mississippi and Alabama have won convictions in the 1963 assassination of NAACP activist Medgar Evers; the 1963 Birmingham, Ala., church bombing that killed four black girls; and the 1964 Philadelphia, Miss., slayings. … The U.S. Justice Department reopened the case after The Clarion-Ledger of Jackson uncovered documents indicating that the beatings had occurred in the Homochitto National Forest, giving the FBI jurisdiction. But the case languished until Seale was located."

USA Today (1/25, Mitchell) reports, "Since 1989, Mississippi and six other states have re-examined 29 killings, leading to 22 convictions, most recently in 2005 when a Neshoba County jury convicted Edgar Ray Killen of manslaughter for orchestrating the Klan's killings of three civil rights workers, James Chaney, Andrew Goodman and Michael Schwerner. … 'We are extremely pleased to see that the federal government is truly committed to taking care of its unfinished business from the civil rights era,' said Alvin Sykes, a Kansas City activist whose work helped lead to the reinvestigation of the 1955 killing of Emmet Till. … The Till case may be presented to a grand jury later this year." USA adds, "Sykes is now pushing legislation that would create a cold cases unit within the Justice Department to track down unpunished killers from the civil rights era. 'When Congress passes the Till bill, you can best believe there will be a lot more perpetrators from that era who will be facing the bar of justice for the lynchings they thought they got away with many years ago,' Sykes said."

DOJ_NMG_0121236

The New York Times (1/25, Dewan) reports, "The charges against Mr. Seale, some seven years after the Federal Bureau of Investigation reopened the case, are the latest in a string of prosecutions of racially motivated slayings from the 1950s and '60s. While virtually all the prosecutions so far have proved successful, investigators have long warned that every passing year makes it more difficult to build a case." The Times continues, "Many of those killings became nationally infamous, like the murder of three civil rights workers — James Chaney, Andrew Goodman and Michael Schwerner — portrayed decades later in the movie 'Mississippi Burning.' But like dozens of lynchings in that era, the deaths of the two victims in this case, Henry H. Dee and Charles E. Moore, both 19, were far more obscure. … The discovery of their bodies, in the Old River near Natchez, Miss., attracted attention mainly because it was initially thought that they might be those of two of the three missing rights workers, who, as the nation looked on, were being sought by federal agents, dozens of volunteers and 400 Navy sailors." The Times notes, "Still, the F.B.I. took on the Dee-Moore case, and in November 1964 Mr. Seale, the son of a chapter leader of the White Knights of the Ku Klux Klan, and another man, Charles M. Edwards, were arrested. Local authorities never prosecuted them, however, even though Mr. Edwards, according to the case file, had told federal agents that he, Mr. Seale and others had beaten Mr. Dee and Mr. Moore, who, Mr. Edwards said, were alive when he left them."

WLOX-TV, Biloxi, Gulfport, Pascagoula, MS (1/24, 10:00 p.m.) broadcasted, "71-year old James Seale is expected to be arraigned tomorrow in Jackson. US Attorney Dunn Lampton, who led the investigation, along with Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and FBI Director Robert Mueller will be holding a news conference tomorrow in Washington.

Federal, State Authorities To Monitor Police-Involved Shootings In Georgia. In Tucker, Georgia, the AP (1/24) reported that newly appointed DeKalb County Police Chief Terrell Bolton "said Wednesday that reducing the number of police-involved shootings is his top priority, and said federal and state authorities will now be called to the scene to monitor those incidents. … GBI and DEA agents will respond to police-involved shootings as they happen, working as monitors and reporting inappropriate behavior to DeKalb superior officers."

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (1/25, Simpson) reports DeKalb "apparently will be the first major metro Atlanta police department to bring state and federal officials to shooting scenes to observe the police investigation. … Bolton said the GBI and DEA agreed to his request to supply investigators who will be trained in DeKalb procedures so that they can go to shooting scenes."

Cleveland Police Officer Under Probe For Allegedly Beating Drug Suspect. The Cleveland Plain Dealer (1/25, Puente) reports, "A Cleveland police officer is under investigation over allegations he beat a suspected drug dealer to find out where he hid a package of cocaine." The Plain Dealer continues, "Narcotics Detective Jamal Ansari, a 22-year-veteran, is accused of dragging Damon Alexander, while handcuffed, around his Shaker Heights home last April until Alexander told him where he hid the cocaine. … Ansari is being investigated by the Cleveland police Internal Affairs unit, the U.S. Justice Department and the federal Drug Enforcement Administration." The Plain Dealer adds, "Alexander testified in a federal court hearing in November that Ansari repeatedly punched him in the face, kicked him in the chest and slammed his head into walls with enough force to break drywall, federal court records say. Alexander suffered cuts and bruises on his chest, and doctors gave him an electrocardiogram, according to court records. … Ansari testified that he hit Alexander 15 to 25 times to gain control of him even though he was handcuffed. But U.S. District Judge James Gwin did not believe Ansari. … 'This testimony is not credible,' Gwin wrote in a ruling last month. … Gwin also ruled Ansari violated Alexander's constitutional rights by continuing to question Alexander after his request for a lawyer."

Testimony Begins In Former Agent's Discrimination Suit Against FBI. The Minneapolis Star Tribune (1/25, Browning, 395K) reports, "Ex-FBI agent Jane Turner spent more than five years fighting to get her case against her former employer into federal court, and on Wednesday she told a jury in Minneapolis about what she said was a plot to wreck her career as retribution for a sexual discrimination complaint she filed against her boss in 1998." However, Assistant US Attorney Martha Fagg said of Turner in her opening argument, "She was seriously burned out. She just stopped working." Fagg added that "FBI supervisors didn't try to sideline Turner," and "to salvage her career, she said, they transferred her from an outpost in Minot, N.D., to Minneapolis, where they tried to help her get back on track." The Star Tribune notes Turner "testified…that she had never had an unsatisfactory job review until after she filed a sexual harassment complaint against her supervisor, Senior Supervisory Agent Craig Welkin." Meanwhile, "Assistant U.S. Attorney Clare Hochhalter testified that he never saw Turner 'stop working,'" and she "offered strong praise for Turner's investigative and interrogation skills."

DOJ_NMG_0121237

Port Chester, NY, Challenges DOJ Suit On Election System. The New York Journal News (1/25, Sadler) reports that the village of Port Chester, NY, "filed court papers yesterday that pick apart the federal lawsuit that accuses its election system of illegally suppressing the Hispanic vote." The News continues, "In the papers, the village asked U.S. District Judge Stephen Robinson to deny the government's request to block the March 20 election for two seats on the Board of Trustees. … 'There will be irreparable harm if the election does not go forward,' the papers say. The village contends that the move could disenfranchise voters in the March mayoral election and that 'government may come to an effective standstill due to the expiring terms of current members.'" The News adds, "The papers were filed in response to a lawsuit filed by the Justice Department in December claiming that the village's 'at- large' method of electing its six trustees violates the federal Voting Rights Act. … Though nearly half of the village's 28,000 residents and 22 percent of its eligible voters are Hispanic, no Hispanic has ever been elected to village office." The News notes, "The Justice Department is asking the judge to replace Port Chester's at-large system with one in which trustees are elected from six districts. … It has presented a proposal for voting districts, including a majority Hispanic ward. … But the village is questioning the validity of the proposed Hispanic district because the estimated number of Hispanic residents is only eight higher than the number of non-Hispanic residents, fewer than the margin of error, it claims."

NAACP Criticizes Medicare For Not Covering Heart Drug For Blacks. The Wall Street Journal (1/25, A20, Winstein, 2.04M) reports an NAACP official "condemned Medicare for declining to promote insurance coverage of a cardiac medication for African-Americans, in a letter that blamed government policy for disparity in the treatment of blacks with heart failure." The "sharply worded letter, addressed to the Boston regional office of the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services, or CMS, detailed tension between the local arm of the civil-rights organization and the agency over BiDil, the only drug approved for use by a single race." BiDil has "been shown to reduce deaths in blacks with congestive heart failure by about 40% a year, but NitroMed says it is used by only about 2% of the 750,000 African-Americans who have the condition." But many groups, "including the American Heart Association and the American College of Cardiology, say there is no evidence that the medication, which costs insurers roughly $1,400 to $2,800 a year to offer to a customer, works any better than its two generic parts -- isosorbide dinitrate and hydralazine -- taken separately."

ANTITRUST:

Senators Ponder Implications Of Airline Merger. The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (1/25, Geewax, 379K) reports, "Appearing at a packed hearing before the Senate Commerce Committee Wednesday, Delta Air Lines CEO Gerald Grinstein said both workers and consumers will suffer if US Airways' takeover bid for Delta succeeds. 'Delta does not need to be acquired to be saved,' Grinstein declared in an overstuffed hearing room ringed by Delta pilots, standing ramrod straight in their black uniforms."

The Wall Street Journal (1/25, Trottman, Dade, 2.04M) reports members of the Senate committee "expressed strong skepticism that sweeping consolidation in the US airline industry would be good for consumers and were particularly unenthused about US Airways Group Inc.'s $9.8 billion hostile bid for Delta Air Lines Inc. A three-hour hearing was punctuated by testiness as US Airways Chairman and Chief Executive Doug Parker defended the Tempe, Ariz., carrier's takeover offer, which was condemned by Gerald Grinstein, Delta's CEO, who insisted that the Atlanta airline would be best to emerge from bankruptcy on its own later this year." The Journal adds, "Despite a grilling from lawmakers on the Senate Committee on Commerce, Science and Transportation, the hearing was somewhat anticlimactic because in recent days the official committee of Delta creditors appears to have been shying away from the US Airways bid, according to people familiar with the situation. … One of the biggest concerns by committee members is that a merger could force Delta to remain in bankruptcy while a deal is ironed out and that resistance by Delta executives could derail the process."

USA Today (1/25, 4B, Adams, 2.27M) reports, "From the start, the tone of the hearing was critical. Many of the committee members hail from largely rural states -- Alaska, Minnesota, Maine, West Virginia, North Dakota -- and worried aloud that consolidation would reduce service to cities in their states." And the Washington Post (1/25, D1, Wilber, 690K) says "senators from Maine to Mississippi expressed skepticism. 'The inevitable will happen, which is to say that we're going to, you know, lose service and also, I think, [the outcome will] result in higher prices,' said Sen. Olympia Snowe (R-Maine)." Sens. Byron L. Dorgan and Trent Lott "said they did not think the merger would help their residents and were not pleased by the hostile nature of the bid."

DOJ_NMG_0121238

The Financial Times (1/25, Kirchgaessner, Cameron) reports, "Washington lawmakers on both sides of the aisle on Wednesday expressed deep scepticism about US Airways' $9.8bn hostile bid for Delta." The Times continues, "The poor reception for the deal in Congress raises significant questions about the future of the proposed transaction. The airline merger would lead to a wave of consolidation that would cut sharply the number of national carriers in the US, the lawmakers said. … In a small, packed hearing room to discuss the prospects of the deal, some Democratic and Republican senators appeared unconvinced by promises from Doug Parker, chief executive of US Airways, that the proposed deal, which would create the largest US carrier, would not lead to cuts in service, large-scale redundancies or increased fares." The Times adds, "While Congress does not have a formal say in deciding whether the deal could move forward, lawmakers – particularly those representing rural states – could put political pressure on both the airline industry and the Justice Department, which would review the deal on antitrust grounds. Although the White House has been largely hands-off on merger reviews, the Justice Department blocked a proposed merger between United and US Airways in 2001. … Andrew Steinberg, assistant secretary for aviation at the Department of Transportation, which would likely confer with antitrust authorities on the deal, declined to comment on the US Airways case, but presented mixed signals on where the Bush administration might stand on the issue."

Delta CEO Denies Merger Plans. The Detroit News (1/25, Shepardson) reports, "Delta Air Lines CEO Gerald Grinstein told Congress Wednesday the airline isn't interested in merging with US Airways or with Northwest Airlines, the largest carrier at Detroit Metropolitan Airport. … 'One such rumor is that Delta is negotiating a merger or similar deal with Northwest. One point we want to make very clear: We are not negotiating any such deal with Northwest,' Grinstein said in prepared testimony before the Senate Commerce, Science and Transportation committee." The News continues, "The hearing was called to discuss the potential impact of airline mergers and industry consolidation. … 'In the face of US Airways' hostile takeover bid, our Official Creditors Committee asked us to help gather information about potential strategic alternatives from other airlines, including Northwest.'" The News adds, "Grinstein said that to fulfill that request, the airline 'recently retained an investment banker to obtain that information, a far cry from negotiating a merger. We are compiling this information, but there has not been any negotiation regarding a merger or similar deal with Northwest or any other airline.' … Grinstein heavily criticized US Airways' $10 billion-plus hostile takeover bid, saying it would never be approved by the Justice Department. Analysts have noted that there is a great deal of overlap between the two carriers' route structure, and that a merger could result in the elimination of many duplicative flights."

CME To Dominate Leadership Of Merger CME-CBOT. The AP (1/25, Wisnefski, Packowitz) reports, "Chicago Mercantile Exchange Holdings Inc. and CBOT Holdings Inc. Wednesday named those who will be on their post-merger management team, with CME executives dominating the leadership roster." The AP continues, "The exchanges also said they 'believe they are on track' to complete the merger by mid-2007, noting that 'significant milestones' have been reached recently. The two largest U.S. futures exchanges cited, as examples, the filing in December of a registration statement with the Securities and Exchange Commission, and decisions made regarding a high-level organizational structure and a senior leadership team." The AP adds, "As previously announced, CME Chief Executive Craig Donohue will be CEO of the merged company, to be known as CME Group. CME Executive Chairman Terry Duffy will retain that role in the merged group, and CBOT Chairman Charles Carey will serve as CME Group vice chairman. Also as previously disclosed, CBOT CEO Bernard Dan will serve as a special advisor to the combined company for one year after the merger closes. … The only current CBOT executive who will be on the CME Group's management team is Bryan Durkin, who will serve as chief operating officer. Durkin, who currently serves as CBOT's chief operating officer and has been with the exchange since 1982, will be responsible for overseeing the transition of CBOT's electronically traded products to CME's Globex platform and the transition of CME trading floor operations to the CBOT facility."

Competition Abroad Seen As Leveling Playing Field For Financial Markets. The Wall Street Journal (1/25, A1, Ip, Scannell, Solomon, 2.04M) reports, "Prominent figures in the U.S." such as Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson and former White House economic adviser Glenn Hubbard "are warning that the nation's financial markets have been handicapped by post-Enron regulatory overreach." Their "key evidence is data suggesting that U.S. stock markets are increasingly unattractive places for companies to list shares." Yet this position, "which has gone largely unchallenged, downplays a different explanation for why U.S. exchanges are under pressure -- the changing nature of global finance. Stock markets around the world have become better and deeper, encouraging companies to seek IPOs in their home market. Trading across borders has become simpler, cutting the prestige and usefulness of a big-country listing everywhere. And private-equity buyouts are a global phenomenon, not a uniquely American one." Meanwhile, other countries "are stiffening their own rules, bringing them closer to the U.S. model."

DOJ_NMG_0121239

Juror Dismissed From Iowa Microsoft Trial. The AP (1/25, Pitt) reports from Des Moines, IA, "A juror was dismissed Wednesday for undisclosed reasons from the class-action antitrust lawsuit against Microsoft Corp." The AP continues, "The dismissal leaves 11 jurors to review allegations that Microsoft used anticompetitive practices that caused thousands of Iowans to pay more for the company's software than they would have otherwise. … Judge Scott Rosenberg said he considered the dismissal a personal matter and would not say why the juror was dismissed." The AP adds, "Plaintiffs attorneys Roxanne Conlin and Richard Hagstrom said juror dismissals are not unusual in lengthy trials. … 'It will not affect our case,' they said in a statement Wednesday." The AP notes, "Rich Wallis, a Microsoft lawyer, said he does not anticipate any other dismissals, though he expects the remaining jurors will be in court longer than the six months initially predicted. … Seven men and five women were seated Nov. 21 to hear the case in Polk County District Court. They began hearing opening statements Dec. 1."

Italian Fuel Refiner Denies Price-Fixing Scheme. The AP (1/25) reports, "ERG SpA, Italy's biggest independent refiner, denied on Wednesday it had conspired to fix retail fuel prices, in a statement released one day after the country's antitrust regulator started an investigation." The AP continues, "The Italian Competition Authority opened an inquiry into whether nine of the biggest oil companies agreed gasoline prices in the country's service station network, limiting competition and keeping prices at the pump at one of the highest levels in the European Union." The AP adds, "The companies being investigated are Eni SpA, the Italian units of Royal Dutch Shell PLC, Total SA and ExxonMobil Corp., as well as Kuwait Petroleum Italia SpA, Tamoil SpA, local firms ERG SpA, Anonima Petroli Italiana SpA, or API, and IP SpA. Privately-held API bought IP from Eni in 2005. … ERG said it had a 'total lack of involvement' with the alleged price fixing of gasoline and diesel. Eni declined to comment."

EU Expands Anti-Cartel Efforts With Fines. AFP (1/25) reports, "EU antitrust chief Neelie Kroes stepped up her anti-cartel crusade, hitting 11 companies with a record fine for fixing prices and carving up the market in electrical generation equipment." AFP continues, "After bumper fines in 2006, the EU competition watchdog demanded ABB, Alstom, Areva, Fuji, Hitachi Japan AE Power Systems, Mitsubishi Electric Corporation, Schneider, Siemens, Toshiba and VA Tech pay 750 million euros (972 million dollars) for running a cartel. … The total fine was the second biggest EU regulators have imposed in a cartel case after slapping 855 million euros in penalties on eight vitamin makers in 2001. That fine was later reduced to 790 million euros by an EU court." AFP adds, "Siemens was told to pay 418 million euros (543 million dollars) for its leading role, the biggest fine EU regulators have ever slapped on a single company for participating in a cartel. … 'The Commission has put an end to a cartel which has cheated public utility companies and consumers for more than 16 years,' EU Competition Commissioner Kroes said. … She has made cracking down on cartels a top priority and last year imposed fines totalling 1.8 billion euros against the illegal clubs, a new annual record for regulators at the European Commission."

Norway Rebuffs Apple's ITunes. The Financial Times (1/25, Ibison, Terazono, Waters) reports, "Apple was dealt a blow in Europe on Wednesday when Norway's powerful consumer ombudsman ruled that its iTunes online music store was illegal because it did not allow downloaded songs to be played on rival technology companies' devices." The Times continues, "The decision is the first time any jurisdiction has concluded iTunes breaks its consumer protection laws and could prompt other European countries to review the situation. … The ombudsman has set a deadline of October 1 for the Apple to make its codes available to other technology companies so that it abides by Norwegian law. If it fails to do so, it will be taken to court, fined and eventually closed down." The Times adds, "Apple, whose iTunes dominates the legal download market, has its proprietory system Fairplay. Songs and tunes downloaded through iTunes are designed to work with Apple's MP3 player iPod, but cannot be played on rival devices. … Torgeir Waterhouse, senior adviser to the Norwegian Consumer Council, who originally launched the complaint, told the Financial Times he was in negotiations with pan-European consumer groups to present a unified position on iTunes' legality. … Sweden and Finland have already backed Norway's stance, but have yet to take action, and Mr Waterhouse said the campaign was joined on Wednesday by Germany and France."

Siemens To Buy UGS For $3.5 Billion. The Financial Times (1/25, Saigol, Milne, Buck, Politi) reports, "Siemens, Europe's largest engineering group, is set to strengthen its core automation division by paying about $3.5bn to buy private equity-owned UGS as it seeks to show it has not been paralysed by bribery allegations." The Times continues, "Details of the plan emerged as Siemens suffered a fresh blow to its reputation and finances on Wednesday, when the European Commission ordered the German engineering group to pay a record €397m fine for its "leadership role" in a long-running price-fixing cartel." The Times adds, "In addition to the UGS deal, the German conglomerate was last night also considering whether to float its VDO division, one of the world's largest car parts suppliers with annual sales of about €10bn, according to people close to the situation. Both measures were discussed last night at a supervisory board meeting but because of worker sensitivities on disposals, it is possible the plans could be disrupted. The approach on VDO was 'undecided', one person familiar with the discussions said. … The moves highlight the determination of Klaus Kleinfeld, Siemens' chief executive, to push ahead with strengthening and restructuring his businesses despite being enmeshed in harmful corruption allegations. UGS, a US company specialising in product lifecycle management, is currently owned by US private equity groups Silver Lake, Bain Capital and Warburg Pincus."

DOJ_NMG_0121240

The Wall Street Journal (1/25, C4, Esterl, Singer, Berman) reports, "The steps follow a flurry of moves in the past 18 months by Germany's largest conglomerate, which is overhauling far-flung industrial holdings that manufacture items including steam turbines, medical scanners, high-speed trains and light bulbs." The Journal continues, "A share listing of Siemens VDO Automotive could generate significant cash for the Munich-based company. The unit booked €10 billion ($13 billion) in revenue and €669 million in operating profit in the most recent fiscal year ended Sept. 30. Siemens didn't say how big a minority stake it would float. … Management said last year it would narrow its focus to three fast-growing areas: energy and environment; automation, and public and private infrastructure; and health-care." The Journal adds, "The UGS acquisition marks Siemens's largest purchase since last June, when it agreed to pay €4.2 billion for the medical-diagnostics division of Bayer AG. Europe's largest engineering company by sales, Siemens also has been investing heavily in areas such as wind power and water treatment."

Brazilian Legal Dispute Threatens CSN's Bid For Corus. The Financial Times (1/25, Wheatley, Marsh) reports, "The bid by Companhia Siderurgica Nacional, the Brazilian steelmaker, to acquire the Anglo-Dutch group Corus for £5.7bn ($11.2bn) could be blown off course by a legal dispute in Brazil, it has emerged." The Times continues, "The dispute, over CSN's rights to an iron-ore supply that would be crucial to a merged business, could lend fresh impetus to rival bidder Tata Steel of India. Tata is expected in the next few days to raise its £5.5bn bid above CSN's offer. Both bidders are due to finalise their offers for the world's eighth biggest steelmaker by next Tuesday." The Times adds, "The tussle arose after Companhia Vale do Rio Doce, the Brazilian mining group, said it would challenge CSN's ability to supply iron ore to Corus should its bid succeed. A big part of the rationale behind CSN's offer is that it would be able to supply cheap iron ore from its Casa de Pedra mine in Brazil to Corus's European plants. Tata has limited supplies of iron ore and, under Indian export regulations, is unlikely to be allowed in the next few years to ship it overseas. … But José Martins, CVRD's director for ferrous operations, told the Financial Times that CVRD would question CSN's ability to ship iron ore under the terms of a contract signed between the companies in 2001."

ENVIRONMENT:

Bush Takes Fuel Efficiency Message To Delaware. NBC Nightly News (1/24, story 2, 2:50, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "The day after the State of the Union address is traditionally when the President hits the road and the sales campaign begins. Today was no different and the President spent much of this day trying to point out the speech last night was about much more than Iraq." NBC (Gregory) added, "The morning after, and a big push on a new domestic agenda: the President in Delaware, meeting with microbiologists developing alternative fuels to power cars, part of an effort to wean the country off foreign oil that President Bush claims can bring Democrats and Republicans together." President Bush: "It doesn't matter what side of the aisle we sit on. What the American people expect is for people on both sides of the aisle to come together and solve problems." The CBS Evening News (1/24, story 5, :15, Couric, 7.66M) said Bush" today used the war on terror to frame his new alternative energy plan. He told employees at a chemical plant in Wilmington, Delaware, that our dependence on foreign oil is a natural security risk."

The New York Times (1/25, A21, Stolberg, 1.16M) says Bush "made a big deal about ethanol" in his Tuesday address, and on "Wednesday morning, he got up close and personal with it, poking his head through stalks of corn and wheat while scientists for DuPont gave him a crash course in ethanol production in a tour of their research greenhouse here. The presidential visit to the DuPont Experimental Station, which conducts federally financed research into the development of alternative fuels, amounted to a sales pitch for Mr. Bush's plan to reduce projected gasoline consumption by 20 percent over the next 10 years." USA Today (1/25, Jackson, 2.27M) reports Bush "toured a plant that develops biofuels from corn, switch grass and wood chips. He also touted his plan to reduce the use of gasoline over the next decade to an audience of more than 1,000, most of whom were DuPont employees."

The Los Angeles Times (1/25, Gerstenzang, Wilson, 850K) says the President "ordered the federal government Wednesday to move toward purchasing hybrid-powered vehicles and reducing the federal fleet's petroleum consumption by 2% each year, part of an effort to boost alternatives to gasoline." He "announced the executive order during a morning devoted to promoting new-technology fuels." The Delaware News Journal (1/25, Montgomery) says Bush discussed "what he described as 'an interesting opportunity for our country,'" saying that dependence on oil

DOJ_NMG_0121241

"creates both a national security problem for the country and environmental concerns."

WWAY-TV Wilmington (1/24, 11:05 p.m.) reported Bush "left behind the battle over the Iraq war as he visited an alternative fuels research complex in Delaware, pushing his new domestic agenda outlined in Tuesday's State of the Union address." WFMZ-TV Philadelphia (1/24, 6:01 p.m.) reported the President "spoke at the DuPont plant in Delaware in an effort to persuade Americans to curb their gas-guzzling habits."

Bush, Congress On "Collision Course" Over Fuel Efficiency. The Washington Post (1/25, D3, Freeman, 690K) reports Bush and Congress "appear to be on a collision course on how best to increase motor-vehicle fuel efficiency. Transportation Secretary Mary Peters said yesterday that Bush would oppose attempts by Congress to raise fuel-efficiency standards if its approach differs from the administration's." But "lawmakers from both parties are beginning to push for stronger action."

Energy Secretary Samuel Bodman said on Fox News (1/24, Smith), "The President has recommended to Congress that we need to set an alternative fuel standard that would be seven times as large as the current one. … What this really is, is setting a goal and then loosing the American inventive genius to go after it."

Bush Pleases Ethanol-Makers, Frustrates Oil Refiners. The Washington Post (1/25, D1, Mufson, 690K) writes that Bush's focus on alternative energy is "good news" for the ethanol industry, but "not everyone thinks Bush's speech is good news. Oil refiners complain about mandates telling them how to blend fuels," and critics say "it will be impossible to hit the proposed requirement of 35 billion gallons a year by 2017 because the main renewable fuel used now, ethanol made from corn, is already driving up corn prices and will use much or all of the U.S. corn harvest." In a piece headlined "Deck's Stacked Against Ethanol These Days," USA Today (1/25, 3B, Krantz, 2.27M) writes that "many investors trying to cash in on the gold rush in ethanol are coming away with husks," with high corn prices and dropping oil prices dampening potential gains.

Bush Proposals Could Aid Auto Industry. The Wall Street Journal (1/25, McKinnon, Spector, 2.04M) reports on its front page that Bush's plans on both energy and health care could "boost the ailing American auto industry, whose pleas for help have largely been ignored by Washington in recent years. … The energy proposals -- crafted in a way that would erase some of the advantages enjoyed by the U.S. industry's Japanese competitors -- appear to have a shot at becoming law. The health program, which critics say could help auto companies but hurt auto workers, seems unlikely to gain traction anytime soon."

Blair, UN Official Pleased By Bush Comments On Climate Change. The Washington Times (1/25, Sands, 88K) reports Bush's "brief State of the Union comments on 'the serious challenge of global climate change' sparked sharp interest, comment and criticism around the globe." British Prime Minister Tony Blair, UN global-warming chief Yvo de Boer, and "senior business leaders at the posh annual gathering in Davos, Switzerland, all seized on Mr. Bush's Tuesday night remarks on energy, oil and the environment as a sign that the United States has a new appreciation for the problem." Blair said, "I do believe that this whole debate is now moving in a completely different and more positive direction." De Boer "called the energy-conservation measures outlined by Mr. Bush in his address 'very encouraging,' saying it was significant that the president linked his policies for the first time to the climate-change issue."

Meanwhile, the Financial Times (1/25, Giles, Tett) reports, "The twin demands of action to prevent climate change and enhance energy security requires Europe to commit to challenging mandatory controls on greenhouse gasses after 2012, Angela Merkel, the German chancellor, said on Wednesday." In "a marked contrast to George Bush's State of the Union address on Tuesday, when he set an ambition to reduce gasoline usage in the US by 20 per cent over the next 10 years, Ms Merkel said she welcomed the opportunity for the European Union to 'offer a [greenhouse gas] reduction target of 30 per cent, but we expect other large emitters to participate in that.'" The Times adds, "With the US still refusing to set a mandatory limit on its emissions, the transatlantic differences remain wide, even though Ms Merkel welcomed the moves made by President Bush."

But The Hill (1/25, Snyder) reports ex-EPA administrator Christine Todd Whitman said Bush "missed the 'perfect opening' to call for a cap on greenhouse gas emissions in his State of the Union address Tuesday night. While such a move would have represented a major policy shift for the administration, Whitman said she had hoped the fact that 10 major American companies called for a cap earlier this week would have provided sufficient political cover."

NYTimes, LATimes Skeptical About Bush Initiatives. The New York Times (1/25, A24, 1.16M) editorializes, "For six years, off and on, President Bush has been talking about the need for alternative fuels and conservation to make the country less beholden to unreliable sources of foreign oil. Yet all he has to show for it is a growing dependence on foreign oil, a growing climate problem and an increasingly cynical public. Mr. Bush talked the same game on Tuesday night, offering several impressively specific goals. But whether these new pledges turn out to be as empty as the old ones depends on his capacity for follow-through, and history is not encouraging. … Once again, we have heard this president make big promises about energy independence. Once again, we fear that very little will change. It would be nice, for once, to be surprised." "

DOJ_NMG_0121242

The Los Angeles Times (1/25, 850K) editorializes, "One of President Bush's crowd-pleasers on Tuesday was a new energy policy designed to show his environmental side. It deserved no more than a golf clap. Nice putt, Mr. President. Too bad it took you 10 strokes to reach the green. Bush's rigid attitude toward climate change is beginning to thaw, though not quite as fast as the polar ice caps. His ideas for reducing oil consumption were tougher than anything he's offered before, and his mandate for 35 billion gallons of alternative fuels by 2017 was a nice gesture. But his plan does much too little to make a dent in the carbon emissions that are fueling global warming."

Navy Sonar Exemption Angers Environmentalists. The AP (1/25, McAvoy) reports from Honolulu, "Angering environmentalists, the U.S. Defense Department exempted the Navy from complying with the Marine Mammal Protection Act for the next two years so sailors can practice tracking submarines with sonar." The AP continues, "Environmentalists on Tuesday said the Navy was not doing enough to protect whales, dolphins and other marine mammals from the harmful effects of the underwater sound technology." The AP adds, "Navy officials said they need the exemption, allowed for under the 2004 National Defense Authorization Act, to give them enough time to conduct environmental impact statements for sonar use at major underwater training ranges off Hawaii, southern California and the East Coast. … 'We cannot stop training for the next two years,' Don Schregardus, deputy assistant secretary of the Navy for the environment, told reporters. 'That would put our sailors in the Navy at considerable risk.'" The AP notes, "Sailors use active sonar by pumping sound waves through the ocean and listening to the echo as it bounces off objects. Navy leaders have made practicing sonar techniques a top priority as other nations have bought more advanced diesel submarines, which are quieter than earlier models and harder to find. … But environmentalists cite incidents of marine mammals that have died or been stranded en masse on beaches after being exposed to sonar."

Appeals Court Blocks Craig Bid To Eliminate Fish Agency. The Washington Post (1/25, A12, Harden, 690K) reports that in a "slap at the power of a single U.S. senator to change federal policy, the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 9th Circuit struck down today an attempt by Sen. Larry E. Craig (R-Idaho) to eliminate a small agency that counts endangered salmon in the Columbia River." Craig tried "to eliminate all funding in 2005 for the Fish Passage Center, which is based in Portland, Ore., and has 12 employees, because he said its data were 'cloaked in advocacy.'" Craig "inserted a sentence in a spending bill that directed the Bonneville Power Administration (BPA), which sells power generated by federal dams, to stop funding the center, which has a $1.3 million budget." The San Francisco-based appeals court "said that the BPA 'acted contrary to law in concluding that the congressional committee report language carried the force of law.'"

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

"Operation Ragdoll" Nets 18 Arrests. The Fall River (MA) Herald News (1/25) reports 19 people "have been charged in a multi-state drug trafficking ring in which the lead target of the federal investigation ran a drug distribution operation based in this city. Seized in the investigation, in which four others from this city were charged, were several kilograms of cocaine allegedly sent through U.S. Mail. … The charges stem from an Organized Crime and Drug Enforcement Task Force investigation, dubbed 'Operation Ragdoll,' which was spearheaded by the Drug Enforcement Administration in Hartford." As "alleged in the indictment, from January 2006 to June 20, 2006, the lead target of the investigation, Luis Joel Soto-Solivan, also known as 'The 27,' ran a drug trafficking operation based in Fall River, which supplied narcotics to various distributors in Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Connecticut, New York and Pennsylvania." The Herald News says 18 of the 19 people charged have been arrested.

NFL Players To Face Tougher Drug-Testing Rules. There are more than 400 media references to the NFL changing its drug-testing rules. In a widely reported story, the AP (1/25) says the NFL "is going deeper into the wallets of players who get caught using steroids and other performance-enhancing drugs. After four months of sometimes intense negotiations, the league and union announced Wednesday more extensive testing for performance-enhancing drugs and the addition of the blood-boosting substance EPO to its list of banned substances. The union also agreed that players suspended after testing positive will, for the first time, forfeit a portion of their signing bonuses in addition to the salary they will lose during their time away."

The New York Times (1/25, Battista) reports Gene Upshaw, the executive director of the National Football League Players Association, "said in an interview that as soon as next season, players who tested positive could also be barred from consideration for postseason awards. Such recognition became an issue during the regular season that ended last month when Shawne Merriman, a San Diego

DOJ_NMG_0121243

Chargers linebacker, was suspended for four games after a positive steroids test, but was named to the Pro Bowl."

The Washington Post (1/25, E7, Maske) reports, "In this round of modifications, the two sides agreed to increase the number of random tests from seven players per team to 10 players per team each week during the preseason, regular season and playoffs. Under the existing terms of the policy, every player is tested during training camp and a player can be tested as many as six times during the offseason. A first positive test results in the player being suspended four games without pay. A second positive test results in an eight-game suspension and a third positive test brings a one-year suspension."

USA Today (1/25, Wood) reports the program "does not include HGH, or human growth hormone, but the commissioner said he is 'investing money for doing that.' Blood tests are the reliable measure for HGH, and the players union has balked at taking blood from players."

For the AP (1/25), Tim Dahlberg writes, "Sure, it may have taken a bit of prodding from some Washington politicians to get everyone moving. But give some credit to the league for twisting the arm of its always-wary players' association and coming to terms on a tougher plan. Players will be tested more often, and it will be harder for them to cheat. When they are caught, they will fork over some of their lucrative signing bonuses as well as their weekly paychecks."

USA Today Profiles Lead Prosecutor In BALCO Case. USA Today (1/25) profiles Kevin Ryan, the outgoing U.S. attorney for the Northern District of California, who has been lead prosecutor since the BALCO case broke in 2002. USA Today (1/25) also has posted a BALCO investigation timeline on its Web site.

California Meeting Focuses On Anti-Gang Efforts. The San Francisco Chronicle (1/25, Johnson) reports, "A coalition of law enforcement, educators and civic leaders from 13 California cities meeting in Oakland today pledged to fight crime statewide by working together to address the root causes of street gangs." The Chronicle continues, "Participants in the first California Cities Gang Prevention Network, which includes San Francisco, Oakland, Richmond and Los Angeles, said during a press conference at the Waterfront Plaza Hotel that the two-day conference would produce a blueprint that could be used nationwide by cities struggling with rising crime rates." The Chronicle adds, "Oakland Deputy Police Chief Howard Jordan said he's looking for new ways to combat a surge in violence last year that resulted in 148 homicides, compared to 94 in 2005. About 38 percent of those murders were attributed to gang members. … Oakland had about 150 known gang members 10 years ago, compared to 1,500 today, Jordan said." The Chronicle notes, "Teams of delegates will meet to outline procedures for sharing crime data and information on successful anti-gang programs. Cities represented at the conference also include Santa Rosa, San Diego, Stockton and Fresno. The main sponsors are the National League of Cities and the Oakland-based National Council on Crime and Delinquency. … Violent crime rose 3.7 percent nationally and 4.1 percent in California in the first six months of 2006, compared with the same period in 2005, according to FBI statistics. … Gangs were involved in 56 percent of all crimes in the Western region of the country in 2005, according to the federal Justice Department's National Gang Threat Assessment."

Former ATF Agent Testifies She Feared Corrupt Officer. The Chicago Tribune (1/25, Coen) reports, "A former federal agent who alleges the Chicago Police Department protected corrupt officers and destroyed her career testified Wednesday that she feared for her life after confronting notorious former Officer Joseph Miedzianowski." The Tribune continues, "Diane Klipfel, a former agent with the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms, has sued the city and Miedzianowski, charging that Miedzianowski turned investigators against her after she tried to report that he had stolen from a drug dealer." The Tribune adds, "Miedzianowski eventually was arrested in 1998 for running a massive drug ring and was convicted of drug conspiracy and racketeering charges in federal court. … Klipfel's husband, ATF agent Michael Casali, also contends he was retaliated against by Miedzianowski. … Lawyers for the city and Miedzianowski have denied the accusations and promised to show that the Police Department was not notified in a timely fashion that Miedzianowski might be corrupt. … Klipfel told jurors hearing the federal civil trial that she began to suspect Miedzianowski six years earlier, when he was working an ATF detail that targeted gangs and drugs. Agents and officers conducted a search at the home of a drug dealer, she said, and she saw Miedzianowski going through the dealer's pants and wallet."

Maine Woman Sentenced For Federal Firearms Violation. Foster's (NH) Daily Democrat (1/25, Keefe) reports from Berwick, ME, "The recent sentencing of 36-year-old Bobbi Lynn Bolduc of Berwick is what U.S. Attorney Thomas P. Colantuono called an example of a commitment to the 'Project Safe Neighborhoods' initiative." The Democrat continues, "Bolduc was charged with making a false statement in the purchase of a firearm in New Hampshire in May 2006 as she showed a New Hampshire address on her ATF form, a document required by the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives at the time of a firearms purchase. … It is a violation of federal law to make a material false statement in connection with the purchase of a firearm." The Democrat adds, "The .22-caliber revolver Bolduc purchased from Renaissance Firearms in Gonic, N.H., was later recovered in Somersworth, N.H., by police in connection with the May 2006 arrests of a 19-year-old Rochester man, a 20-year old Philadelphia, Pa., man and a 19-year-old Bronx, N.Y., man on charges of possession of 43 grams of crack cocaine and the .22-caliber handgun with ammunition. … Bolduc was sentenced Monday in U.S. District Court in Concord to six months of home confinement and two years probation."

DOJ_NMG_0121244

IMMIGRATION:

GOP Opponents Of Bush Immigration Plan Vow To Fight. The Washington Times (1/25, Hurt, 88K) reports House Republicans "opposed to amnesty vowed yesterday to fight President Bush's proposal to legalize millions of illegal aliens as outlined in his State of the Union address on Tuesday." Rep. Tom Tancredo said, "The President worked hard to get a Congress that agrees with him on this and now he's got it. But we're still going to fight him on it." On Fox News (1/24), Tancredo said President Bush "said we're not going to do anything that's an amnesty, but of course, that's exactly what he is planning. … You want to stand up and say, Mr. President, say what you mean, and you mean an amnesty. And say what you mean when you say a temporary worker. You're talking about a guest worker program that will also include 15 million people who are here illegally. Say what you mean, Mr. President."

On NBC Nightly News (1/24, story 3, 1:45, Williams, 9.87M), Tim Russert said, "Immigration was debated thoroughly last year. People know where they stand on that issue. The Democrats are much closer to President Bush. They have told him if he can deliver half of the Republicans in his party in both houses of Congress, they can put forward a comprehensive immigration bill. But the Democrats want to put some pressure on the Bush White House to bring some Republicans along so it is simply not a Democratic immigration bill."

TAX:

Judge Bars New York Tax Preparation Firm From Practice. The Buffalo News (1/25) reports, "A federal judge has permanently barred a Hamburg tax preparation firm from preparing federal income taxes." The News continues, "Duffek, O'Connor & Associates of Hamburg can no longer legally prepare returns because an investigation showed that the firm prepared tax returns for clients that included deductions for 'fictitious and inflated charitable contributions,' the U.S. Justice Department said." The News adds, "According to the Internal Revenue Service, the firm understated tax liabilities of its customers by more than $2 million. … '[The] government alleged that the returns prepared by the defendants claimed fictitious and inflated employee expenses for such items as work clothes, teaching and coaching supplies, student and athlete rewards and cellular telephone expenses,' the Justice Department said in a news release issued Tuesday. … According to the release, U.S. District Judge William M. Skretny issued a permanent injunction barring the firm, Brian Duffek and Patrick O'Connor from preparing federal returns."

WSJournal Notes Move To Cut, Abolish State Income Taxes. The Wall Street Journal (1/25, 2.04M) says in an editorial that the "next big thing in American politics" could be "the abolition of state income taxes. In Georgia, Missouri and South Carolina, Governors and state legislatures are drafting serious proposals to repeal their income taxes to promote economic development. St. Louis, one of America's most distressed cities, may overturn its wage/income tax as a way to spur urban revival. And in Michigan, the legislature is in the last stages of phasing out its hated business income tax -- the most onerous in the land." Economist Arthur Laffer, who is advising several Governors and legislators on the issue, said, "States are now in a ferocious competition to attract jobs and businesses, and one of the best ways to win this race is to abolish the state income tax." State lawmakers "also seem to have learned from two of the most recent states to adopt an income tax: New Jersey and Connecticut. As recently as 1965 New Jersey had neither an income nor sales tax, but managed to balance its budget every year. Now it has both taxes -- its income tax is the 5th highest in the nation -- but the state is facing what Stateline.org calls a 'staggering budget deficit.'"

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush Health Care Proposals Could Face Hard Time On Capitol Hill. The Washington Post (1/25, A10, Lee, Montgomery, 690K) reports, "Economists are still sorting out the implications of the broad health-care proposals President Bush unveiled this week, but already some clear winners and losers are emerging. Families with generous employer-sponsored coverage would be worse off, while those who buy insurance on the individual market, or whose health plan costs less than $15,000 annually, would come out ahead. But some of the winners will probably become losers over time, analysts said." And while the President's plan "would alter a historic imbalance in the tax code that favors generally better-off consumers who get insurance through their jobs, it also could undermine coverage for some sicker, older people and erode the employer-sponsored system that still provides coverage to more than half of all Americans."

DOJ_NMG_0121245

USA Today (1/25, 3B, Block, 2.27M) headlines a report "Bush Plan Spotlights Uneven Tax Treatment Of Health Benefits," saying the Bush plan "faces stiff political resistance. Some lawmakers in the Democrat-led Congress said they wouldn't even hold hearings on the plan, arguing that it would hurt many Americans who do have insurance coverage. But Bush's proposal has managed to focus attention on the uneven tax treatment of health care benefits." The Christian Science Monitor (1/25, Trumbull, Lamb, 59K) says with his health plan, "Bush has launched what may be his most ambitious bid to tackle the issue from a free- market basis."

In a rather critical assessment, ABC World News (1/24, story 3, 2:15, Gibson, 8.78M) examined President Bush's "proposal to reform the health care system by way of the tax code. He said a series of new taxes, with tax breaks, will help more Americans afford held insurance." ABC (Stark) added that some worry the President's plan to provide "anyone who gets health insurance" with a tax deduction "will encourage businesses to stop offering health insurance." Paul Fronstin, Employee Benefit Research Institute: "Their workers will now be able to get the same tax break if they buy insurance on their own, as they now get through the work place. And employers will view this, and say, 'Why am I bothering to offer health insurance coverage for my workers?'" Stark: "The Administration disagrees. It says the tax break will allow three million to five million more Americans to buy health insurance. But that would still leave more than 40 million people uninsured." More criticism on ABC World News (1/24, story 4, 1:15, Gibson, 8.78M) came from the network's medical editor, Dr. Tim Johnson, who said, "I have several concerns. First, it doesn't make any kind of measurable dent in the horrible problem of the uninsured. Even more significant, I think, all the focus on taxes has diverted attention from the real problem, which is the terrible waste and inefficiency in our health insurance system. … I would call this proposal tinkering with taxes, rather than reforming health care. We're going to throw good money at a bad system."

The Wall Street Journal (1/25, A6, Zhang, Lueck, 2.04M) headlines its report "Bush Health Plan Shifts Onus To The Consumer," writing that Bush's "proposal for easing the nation's health-care woes…differs from approaches favored by Massachusetts and California as well as many Democrats in Congress." The Massachusetts plan, "which was supported by Democratic Sen. Edward Kennedy, requires all but the smallest employers to offer health insurance, or else pay an assessment to the state. In California, a similar requirement would compel employers that don't offer insurance to pay a 4% payroll tax. Both states would require all residents to have health insurance, offering government coverage or subsidies to those who are without coverage through an employer." The Bush plan, "in contrast, avoids mandates and instead would use the tax code to make individually purchased health insurance more appealing and affordable."

Leavitt Calls For "Rigorous And Robust Debate." During a Christian Science Monitor (1/25, 59K) "Monitor Breakfast" Wednesday, HHS Secretary Michael Leavitt said a "'rigorous and robust debate is about to ensue on how to accomplish' the goal of providing affordable health insurance for all." Leavitt added, "In my mind, it is simply indefensible for our country to have a tax policy that provides a tax benefit to part of our citizens and simply ignores the rest."

WPost Says Leavitt Opens Door For Possible Compromise. The Washington Post (1/25, A24, 690K) editorializes, "One of the tweaks that would make President Bush's new health-care proposal much more attractive would be changing the proposed tax deduction for those who purchase insurance to a tax credit." Leavitt "signaled the administration's openness to doing just that. … Leavitt said there were 'redeeming tax policy features to using a credit' but that the administration had decided to 'propose as a starting place' to use the mechanism of a standard deduction instead. That sounds like a door opening to us -- and a door skeptical Democrats ought to be willing to poke their heads through. Transforming the deduction into a credit would create a proposal that is fairer and that would do more to reduce the ranks of the uninsured."

CBO Predicts Budget Surplus In 2012 If Tax Cuts Are Not Renewed. The New York Times (1/25, Andrews, 1.16M) reports, "The nonpartisan Congressional Budget Office predicted on Wednesday that the federal budget deficit would shrink again this year and could actually swing into a surplus in 2012 -- but only if President Bush's tax cuts expire in 2010. The agency predicted that the deficit for 2007 would decline to about $200 billion. It would be the third big annual decline in a row, and it would come even though spending on the war in Iraq is expected to remain high this year." The Times adds, "The decline of the deficit comes on the heels of unexpectedly large increases in tax revenue over the last two years and slower-than-expected increases in spending on Medicare. Much of that increased revenue came from taxes on sharply higher corporate profits and big gains in the stock market, even though Congress reduced the tax rate on capital gains and stock dividends in 2003." It is "a rare piece of good news for President Bush, coming as he is struggling to persuade Congress to accept his strategy of sending more troops to Iraq and as his public approval ratings are at an all-time low." White House officials "boasted that the projections validated Mr. Bush's strategy of cutting taxes to stimulate the economy and ultimately generate higher tax revenues."

DOJ_NMG_0121246

USA Today (1/25, Wolf, 2.27M) headlines its story "Surpluses Could Be Just Promises," and says "Bush pledged to balance the federal budget by 2012 without raising taxes," but "Congress' budget agency said it probably can't be done." Bush and Congress, however, "are seeking tax changes that would wipe out the projected surpluses and drive up the deficit by hundreds of billions of dollars. Those changes include extending Bush's 2001 and 2003 tax cuts and preventing millions of taxpayers from being hit by the alternative minimum tax, which increases taxes on people with large deductions."

The Los Angeles Times (1/25, Havemann, 850K) reports, "The nonpartisan CBO, in its annual report on where current spending and tax policies would take the budget over the next 10 years, did not contradict Bush in so many words. But its tables painted an unmistakable picture of a budget that needed an extra infusion of cash or a sharp reduction in outlays if revenue were ever to exceed spending." And "even if the budget could be balanced by 2012, said Peter R. Orszag, the CBO's director, the retirement of the baby-boom generation could quickly unbalance it: Not only would the wave of retirees force the government to spend more for Social Security, Medicare and other benefit programs, he said, but it would drain the population of taxpaying wage-earners."

The Washington Post (1/25, A11, Montgomery, 690K) says "virtually nobody -- not even top CBO officials – believes" the CBO prediction about a surplus. That is "because the CBO…is required to make some whopping assumptions, including: that all of…Bush's tax cuts will expire on schedule in 2010; that the alternative minimum tax will be permitted to ensnare millions of additional taxpayers; and that the war in Iraq and other military operations will never cost much more than the $70 billion that has so far been approved for the fiscal year that ends in September. Back in the real world, even Democrats want to extend at least some of the Bush tax cuts" and "even the White House wants to halt the expansion of the alternative minimum tax."

The Wall Street Journal (1/25, A2, 2.04M) reports, "Congressional budget experts said the fiscal 2007 deficit could fall to $172 billion if current policies remain in place, down from $248 billion in 2006, but the gap could worsen depending on how Congress addresses several looming tax-policy decisions." The CBO projections, adds the Journal, "exclude the cost of an anticipated $100 billion war supplemental-spending bill. If that money is approved, CBO expects about $25 billion of it will be spent in 2007, bringing the year's deficit to about $200 billion, according to new CBO Director Peter Orszag. Fiscal year 2007 began Oct. 1, 2006." Office of Management and Budget Director Rob Portman "said the president's budget will likely result in a higher deficit for fiscal year 2007 than predicted by CBO. 'Our number will be a little higher than theirs,' Mr. Portman told reporters. 'But, it will be consistent with the broad theme of reducing deficits and [reaching] balance by 2012,' Mr. Portman said." Bush "will continue a US military buildup while offering a package of entitlement cuts as part of a plan to balance the budget by 2012, a senior administration official said yesterday."

The Washington Times (1/25, Dinan, 88K) notes Portman "said Mr. Bush's budget…will show declining deficits and a balanced budget in 2012. 'Congress should be encouraged by this news, and I am optimistic that we can work together -- across party lines -- to keep the economy strong and spend taxpayer dollars wisely,' he said."

The AP (1/25, Taylor) says "Bush has one significant advantage in the upcoming debate. In designing his budget, Bush can assume his changes are put in place. He does not have to consider the political difficulties of getting the Democrat-controlled Congress to go along with cuts to hospitals and other Medicare providers and new fees on airline passengers and veterans seeking health care." The chairman of the House Budget Committee, Rep. John Spratt, and his Senate counterpart, Sen. Kent Conrad, "have the difficult job of trying to advance a budget that unites politically fractious factions of their party. Their task is made even tougher because the CBO's figures understate the true magnitude of the nation's fiscal woes."

Byrd Says Without Increased Spending, Key Federal Workers Will Be Laid Off. Roll Call (1/25, Pierce) reports, "In an apparent attempt to head off conservative Republicans intent on restraining Congressional spending, Senate Appropriations Chairman Robert Byrd (D-W.Va.) is circulating a memo warning that without increased funding for some programs the federal government may have to lay off or furlough thousands of key homeland security, consumer safety and health care personnel." With "the current stopgap funding measure set to expire Feb. 15, Byrd and House Appropriations Chairman David Obey (D-Wis.) are gearing up for a fight with Republicans over how to make sure that 13 Cabinet agencies, Congress and countless independent government agencies continue to operate for the remainder of fiscal 2007, which ends Sept. 30. Congress already has approved fiscal 2007 funding for the Defense and Homeland Security departments." The current continuing resolution "freezes federal spending at fiscal 2006 levels, and conservative Senators such as Jim DeMint (R-S.C.) and Tom Coburn (R-Okla.) have pushed to keep the government funded at 2006 levels for the remainder of the fiscal year to trim as much as $7 billion from the discretionary spending budget."

New Bush Education Proposals Would Boost Vouchers, Charter Schools. The New York Times (1/25, Schemo, 1.16M) reports on changes to the No Child Left Behind Act proposed by U.S. Secretary of Education

DOJ_NMG_0121247

Margaret Spellings in a telephone news conference that "would give local school officials new powers to override both teachers' contracts and state limits on charter schools in the case of persistently failing schools." Spellings said that "the goal was to provide students in failing schools with other options and 'to make sure we have our best personnel in the neediest places.'" She said that there are "about 1,800" schools that are persistently failing, but "loopholes in the current law allowed them to avoid serious action indefinitely." The proposals were criticized by teachers union officials and Congressional Democrats. Yet some proposals, "seemed likely to be more acceptable, among them: a call for a federal fund that would give extra pay to teachers who are most effective in raising children's test scores, or who agree to teach in the neediest schools; and allowing districts with failing schools to first offer children tutoring before allowing them to transfer."

USA Today (1/25, 9D, Toppo, 2.27M) reports the Administration's "education wish list" includes "more leeway for administrators to move good teachers into poorly performing schools and would provide a $4,000 check for students who would rather leave the public system for private school." Spellings said that "she'll 'fight hard' for the vouchers and the rest of the plan" adding, "I see this as a very vigorous package of proposals that are sound and make sense when they are taken together."

The Washington Times (1/25, A1, Fagan, 88K) reports Spellings said that "the administration will fight tenaciously for a few key changes…including helping children in chronically failed public schools to attend private schools instead." Spellings said that "a bill to renew the law will be ready to move through the Senate education panel by March or April." The "top goal" of Congressional Democrats is said to be "to secure a steep funding boost for the law, and Mrs. Spellings indicated the administration will use that as a bargaining chip."

The Pittsburgh Post-Gazette (1/25, Chute, 230K) reports Spellings "emphasized the desire to keep the 'core principles,' which include having all students proficient in math and reading by 2014 and using annual tests and results broken down by race, income and other factors to hold schools accountable."

Democrats, Teachers Unions Oppose Plans. The Washington Post (1/25, A16, Paley, 690K) reports the plan to "allow poor students at chronically failing public schools to use federal vouchers to attend private and religious schools" upset "Democrats who vowed to fight the measure." They "assailed the plan…and expressed concern that the politically charged proposals could delay the reauthorization." Yet the proposals also include "measures that enjoy bipartisan support" such as limiting options of tutoring and transfers to "students in the categories that failed" to meet state standards. Spellings "insisted that the administration will try to push through even those proposals likely to face stiff resistance in Congress."

The AP (1/25, Zuckerbrod) reports, "Democrats and teachers' unions are criticizing the Bush administration for proposing to let school officials override collective bargaining agreements and state laws." Officials said that "the federal government has the right to include the charter school and contract language in a renewed No Child Left Behind law as strings attached to the billions of dollars in aid it provides to these schools." Yet "some aspects…won bipartisan praise" including proposals "to stick with the law's 2014 reading and math goal;" "to allow schools to consider how much students progress each year;" to "hold states accountable for students' science scores;" and to require "states to create standards and tests linked to what students should know when they start college or go to work."

The Chicago Tribune (1/25, Banchero, 617K) reports, "The plan already is coming under fire from some Democrats, who object to vouchers, and from teachers union officials, who are opposed to a plan that would allow districts to subvert collective bargaining agreements and move teachers to underperforming schools." NEA President Weaver said, "Once you put vouchers and teacher contracts out there, this is war."

Signs Of Hope Seen For Bipartisan Cooperation. The Christian Science Monitor (1/25, Feldmann, Grier, 59K) writes, "The final quarter of George W. Bush's presidency has begun, and a big question looms: Can he achieve anything significant in his remaining time in the White House?" There is "some hope. Both the Democrats in Congress and Mr. Bush, each for their own reasons, need to show accomplishments. The Democrats don't want to lose control of Congress in two years, after fighting so hard to regain it. And Bush has his legacy and the Republican Party's image to consider. Polls show the public clamoring for an end to the intense partisanship that has dominated national policymaking since the 1990s."

In his Washington Post (1/25, A25, 690K) column, David Broder writes, "Despite the raging controversy over Iraq military policy, President Bush's plea for bipartisan cooperation on the domestic agenda has a chance of success in the Senate. The reason has less to do with sympathy for the politically weakened chief executive than a dynamic that has gone largely unnoticed among the senators themselves. Since the midterm election created a near-even balance in the Senate -- 51 Democrats and 49 Republicans -- serious efforts at cross-party communication have developed momentum."

House Democrats "Hedging" On Bipartisanship. The Washington Times (1/25, Miller, 88K) reports House Democrats "say they intend to honor their pledge to allow Republicans to participate in writing legislation, but they won't say when." Majority Leader Steny Hoyer, "wary of Republicans using amendment votes as ammunition for future campaign attack ads," said, "I said we were going to be fair, not stupid." Hoyer added, "But we do intend to engage, involve and allow Republicans to have substantive opportunities as we consider legislation." The Times adds Hoyer "still hasn't said when the majority will open up the amendment process, known as using 'regular rules.' What's more, Republicans say, the majority is flouting the rules that are in place." Minority Leader John A. Boehner introduced "a resolution rebuking House Democrats" that failed in a party line vote. Boehner said, "You simply can't talk about cooperation at the same time you're circumventing the rules of the House to shut the other side out."

DOJ_NMG_0121248

Novak Says Bipartisan Efforts Could "Go Nowhere." In his Washington Post (1/25, A25, 690K) column, Robert Novak writes, "The self-confident Democratic leadership is uninterested in being cut into potentially disastrous outcomes in Iraq. It wants to function as a coordinate branch of government, not as friendly colleagues in the spirit of bipartisanship. … On both sides, the prevailing attitude is that Bush looks like a president at bay. Statements made to me this week by two prominent political figures, one from each party, were so candid that these sources did not want to be quoted by name. The Republican, a ranking House committee member, said: 'The president and his aides are irrelevant and out of touch, removed from realizing what happened in the election.' A Democratic state party leader said that 'Bush is in such bad shape that the result of the 2008 election is already decided.' In that atmosphere, pleas for consultation go nowhere."

Conservatives Fear Bush Is Ceding Ground On Key Issues. The Wall Street Journal (1/25, A8, Calmes, 2.04M) reports, "Fallout from the war in Iraq, which already has weakened President Bush among the general public and in Congress, now is causing problems with the group that has been his mainstay: social and economic conservatives." The "longtime loyalists, appreciative of Mr. Bush's record on issues ranging from tax cuts to his veto of federal funding for embryonic stem-cell research, also have supported his war policies." But this week's State of the Union address "aggravated their underlying fear: that the president might become so consumed by the worsening conflict in Iraq -- and chastened by Democrats' takeover of Congress -- that he will give up on the issues they care about."

Bush's Use Of "Democrat" Label Draws Attention. The Washington Post (1/25, C1, Copeland, 690K) writes, "The president in his State of the Union address Tuesday night left out a tiny little suffix that means a whole lot to some people. He did it so subtly you could have missed it. Just a little '-ic.'" Bush "started the speech on a bipartisan note, honoring the first Madam Speaker, Democrat Nancy Pelosi, and calling on the country to come together. Then: 'I congratulate the Democrat majority,' he said, dropping the last two letters from 'Democratic.' Bush does this a lot, and while it's hard to say if the omission was intentional in this instance, it is a semantic tactic that's been part of Republican warfare for decades."

More Commentary On Bush Agenda, Chances For Bipartisanship. In a Wall Street Journal (1/25, A19, 2.04M) op-ed, David Frum of the American Enterprise Institute writes, "On State of the Union night, Americans witnessed two President Bushes. The first President Bush delivered a firm foreign policy message in tones of passion and commitment. The second President Bush dragged his way wearily through a domestic agenda that seemed to interest him as little as it excited Congress. The first President Bush pledged himself to bold free-market reforms in health care -- including the removal of a treasured but destructive tax loophole from the wealthy and powerful. The second President Bush proposed to regulate America's way to energy security with a plan that might have been dusted off from the Carter administration. The first President Bush insisted that the budget can be balanced without raising taxes. The second shrugged off Medicaid, Medicare and Social Security as problems for later. The first President Bush spoke with realism about the generational struggle against Islamic extremism. The second President Bush offered false hopes about the good intentions of the government of Saudi Arabia and other sometime allies." Frum writes that Bush "has always been at his best in adversity. Americans face no shortage of adversity now."

In his New York Times (1/25, A25, 1.16M) column, Bob Herbert writes that Bush's address was "a study in governmental dysfunction. The audience kept mindlessly applauding -- up and down, like marionettes -- when in fact there was nothing to applaud. The state of the union is wretched, which is why the president's approval ratings are the worst since Nixon and Carter. If Mr. Bush is bothered by his fall from political grace, it wasn't showing on Tuesday night. He seemed as relaxed as ever, smiling, signing autographs, glad-handing."

In his Roll Call (1/25) column, Morton Kondracke writes, "A new, non-polarized, problem-solving politics is trying to be born in this country, but -- lip service aside -- most current politicians are stuck in the old model of nonstop partisan warfare. The old politics was richly on display Tuesday as President Bush delivered his State of the Union address and Congressional Democrats reacted. Bush enunciated -- once again -- the clear message of the 2006 elections: 'Our citizens don't care which side of the aisle we sit on -- as long as we are willing to cross that aisle when there is work to be done.' The agenda he offered created some opportunities for bipartisan agreement…but most Democratic commentary emphasized the negative."

DOJ_NMG_0121249

In his column in The Hill (1/25), Dick Morris writes that Bush "boldly broadened his presidential agenda and vision. He once again became the president of the United States, not the mayor of Baghdad. By articulating viable, and potentially bi-partisan, proposals on energy independence, global climate change, healthcare, immigration reform, education standards and a host of other issues, he renewed the 360-degree mandate that should be the span of vision of any president." Bush "finally seems to have grasped a crucial but ironic fact: The only way he can keep sufficient credibility and power to continue his commitment to victory in Iraq is to raise his approval ratings."

Webb Response Speech Gets Strong Reactions From Both Sides. The Washington Post (1/25, A4, Shear, 690K) reports Sen. Jim Webb "earned a full day of praise -- and some tough rhetorical jabs -- for his sharply worded response Tuesday night to President Bush's State of the Union address. Liberal bloggers, national pundits and local Virginia politicians said the freshman senator's critique of the economy and the Iraq war was among the best retorts to Bush's administration they could remember." But "conservatives scoffed at Webb's less-than-animated demeanor," and some "assailed his adherence to the Democratic orthodoxy, especially on the Iraq war."

Dobbs, Dionne Praise Webb's Candor. On CNN's Lou Dobbs Tonight (1/24), host Dobbs and Sen. Jim Webb discussed Webb's Democratic response to President Bush's State of the Union address. Dobbs told Webb, "The consensus amongst those that I have talked with is that you did extraordinarily well in very short order. … You were forthright in saying that this President lead us into war recklessly in Iraq."

Under the headline "Reagan Democrat," Washington Post (1/25, A25, 690K) columnist E.J. Dionne writes, "Like him or not, Ronald ('Tear Down This Wall') Reagan spoke in a clean, clear prose that almost always left listeners with a sense that he stood for something. It may thus be no accident that Jim Webb…was once a Reaganite." In his response, Webb "defined the two central moral issues that animate most of the Democratic Party's rank and file: the mess in Iraq and the fact that the fruits of a growing economy are not being shared by all Americans. Then Webb did something rather astonishing: He didn't fudge on his language or try to take the hard edge off his impatience with the status quo. … There was no mush from Webb."

SMU Faculty Continue To Question Bush Library Plans. The Washington Post (1/25, A10, Wright, 690K) reports Southern Methodist University faculty members "again raised concerns that the building of the George W. Bush presidential library on campus might damage the school's reputation," according to a "participant at a closed-door meeting." At the "tightly guarded meeting, several members of the faculty questioned school president R. Gerald Turner about the political institute that will accompany the library. The institute will conduct research on issues that will be determined by Bush. Many of the questioners wondered whether such a powerful institution on campus will influence the type of research that can be conducted by SMU faculty and whether it will have an impact on the university's reputation."

Bush To Ask For Fast-Track Authority Next Week. The Hill (1/25, Swanson) reports, "President Bush will ask Congress to extend fast-track negotiating authority in one of two speeches on the economy next week, according to administration sources, after choosing not to make the request in his State of the Union address." The White House "intends to announce more details of next week's economic speeches today, according to White House Deputy Press Secretary Tony Fratto. He said President Bush intends to get his trade agenda completed, and this would include a continuation of fast track."

Tax Breaks Could Stall Senate Minimum Wage Bill. The AP (1/25, Kuhnhenn) reports, "The minimum wage increase that was supposed to zip through Congress veered onto a collision course Wednesday as lawmakers argued over business tax breaks that would be attached to ensure Republican support. Democratic leaders in the House began laying groundwork to blame the Republicans for any impasse. Senate Democrats, however, cautioned their House colleagues not to jeopardize legislation they'd promised to approve if they gained control of Congress." House Democrats "demanded a clean bill from the Senate -- no tax attachment -- setting up a confrontation that could delay final congressional passage of the $2.10 an hour increase." The Senate "did vote 54-43 to advance a House-passed measure that would lift the pay floor without any accompanying tax cut. However, that was well short of the 60 votes needed to keep that version moving." The vote "was a signal to the House that without the tax breaks a minimum wage bill appeared doomed in the Senate. And the Senate promptly moved to a broader bill, backed by its Democratic leaders, that would raise the minimum wage to $7.25 an hour over 26 months and provide $8.3 billion in tax benefits to businesses over 10 years."

The New York Times/Bloomberg (1/25) reports "a spokesman for Mr. Rangel, Matthew Beck, said Wednesday: 'The Senate needs to pass a clean bill. They shouldn't hold the minimum wage hostage.' … Under Congressional rules, Mr. Rangel can block House consideration of the Senate's minimum-wage measure. Any legislation would have to be reconciled between the two chambers before being sent to President Bush for his signature."

DOJ_NMG_0121250

Pelosi, Hoyer Relationship Appears To Have Improved. The Washington Post (1/25, Romano, 690K) reports that after "years of tension between House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) and Majority Leader Steny Hoyer (D-Md.) , the two appear to be getting along much better these days, or so report the staff and allies of the Democratic leadership." Sources say the "tension and mistrust that long existed between the two native Marylanders is no longer evident. She no longer seems to be keeping him in the dark on insider maneuvering, and he no longer feels as if he's being kept out of the loop."

Pelosi, Dingell Make Nice At DC Auto Show. The Washington Post (1/25, A23, Layton, 690K) reports a "highly choreographed peace accord was reached in the middle of the Washington Convention Center yesterday, when Rep. John D. Dingell (D-Mich.) escorted House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) through the auto show, hoping to smooth over the public rift that erupted between them last week." Pelosi had "irritated Dingell by announcing her desire to create a special committee on global warming. As chairman of the House Energy and Commerce Committee, Dingell had planned hearings on global warming and saw Pelosi's proposed committee as an affront to his authority." To "soften the edges of the turf battle, Dingell's wife, Debbie, an executive with General Motors Corp., suggested that he invite Pelosi to the Washington Auto Show to see the hybrid vehicles manufactured in his home state." With "20 minutes of peacemaking over, Pelosi, Dingell and their entourage walked to a rear exit and climbed into two gas-guzzling Chevy Suburbans."

Mica Angered By Perceived Slight At Transportation Meeting. The Washington Post (1/25, Romano, 690K) reports Democratic Rep. Jim Oberstar of Minnesota, "the new chairman of the House Transportation Committee, wanted to show members of his panel how bipartisanship and policymaking can work in tandem." Oberstar and ranking Republican John Mica (Fla.), "organized a roundtable discussion for members last week. And to drive home the point, Oberstar invited back Bud Shuster (R-Pa.), the retired Republican chairman of the committee." The move "seemed like a great idea until Mica arrived for the roundtable and discovered that he did not have one of the nice, cushy chairs at the head of the table that were occupied by Oberstar, Shuster and other speakers, including New York financier Felix Rohatyn." Sources say Mica "threw a fit and demanded to know from staff why he didn't have a special chair of his own next to Oberstar and the others." But "before staff could rectify the situation, and as startled members looked on, a furious Mica stormed out of the room and ordered the other Republican members to leave. Among the uncomfortable departees was Shuster's own son and successor, Rep. Bill Shuster."

Democratic Control Of House Could Benefit Philip Morris. The Wall Street Journal (1/25, B1, O'Connell, Mullins, 2.04M) reports that while "the new Democratic Congress looks like big trouble for big tobacco," from the "point of view of the nation's largest cigarette maker, Philip Morris, the shift in power could be a blessing in disguise. That's because it could help ease the way for legislation to give the Food and Drug Administration new powers to control how cigarettes are made and marketed. That, ironically, could help Philip Morris maintain its current market domination." Most tobacco companies "are opposed to FDA regulation of cigarettes, which, among other things, would likely ban the use of descriptors such as 'light' and 'mild' and require big new warnings to cover at least 30% of cigarette packs." But Philip Morris "has embraced the idea that the FDA should have broad powers over tobacco." The "company's rivals contend that new restrictions would hurt them more because their brands are much less known than the famous Philip Morris Marlboro brand. With marketing potentially dramatically curtailed by FDA regulation, they would have fewer ways to promote themselves."

House Restores Voting Rights To Delegates. The New York Times (1/25, Hulse, 1.16M) reports, "The Democratic majority in the House restored limited floor voting rights to the Congressional delegates from the District of Columbia and four territories on Wednesday after a rancorous debate with echoes of the days before the Republicans won the majority in 1994." The change "approved on a party-line vote of 226 to 191 was mostly symbolic because the five delegates will be allowed to vote just on floor amendments, not on final approval of bills. If their votes influence the outcome on amendments, a new vote will be taken without their participation."

The Washington Post (1/25, B4, Sheridan, 690K) reports, "Democratic supporters acknowledged that it provided mainly symbolic privileges but said it would give delegates greater participation in Congress. 'It is not enough what we do today,' said Majority Leader Steny H. Hoyer (D-Md.), who has expressed strong support for the District having a full vote in the House. 'But it would be tragic if we do not do this basic step.'"

Roll Call (1/25, Brotherton) says Republicans "are considering challenging the rules change in court. … Rep. Tom Price (R-Ga.), who spent much of his week rallying against the proposal, called it 'flawed policy' and said Republicans will continue to fight it. 'At this point, because there are internal rules, the only option we have is through the courts,' Price said. 'We'll be in discussions with that.'"

DOJ_NMG_0121251

Cheney Says Question About Daughter's Pregnancy "Out Of Line." Near the end of Vice President Dick Cheney's interview with CNN's The Situation Room (1/24), Wolf Blitzer asked Cheney if he wanted to respond to criticism of daughter Mary Cheney's pregnancy. Cheney: "No, I don't. … I'm delighted I'm about to have a sixth grandchild. And obviously I think the world of both my daughters and all of my grandchildren. And I think, frankly, you're out of line with that question." Blitzer: "I think all of us appreciate..." Cheney: "I think you're out of -- I think you're out of line." Blitzer: "No, we like your daughters. Believe me, I'm very, very sympathetic to Liz and Mary. I like them both. That was just a question that's come up, and it's a responsible fair question." Cheney: "I just fundamentally disagree with you."

White House Press Secretary Tony Snow said on Fox News' Your World (1/24, Cavuto), "He said it was out of line, and he was right. You know what's interesting, is that in prior administrations -- think about Chelsea Clinton. Nobody ever butted into Chelsea Clinton's business, and good for the press back then. And the Clintons were rightly protective of their daughter. Nobody questioned Al Gore when he son ran into difficulty. Again, right choice to make. It is tough enough to become president or vice president that people should not be trying to draw family members in. I don't know why the rules are different in this Administration, but it does seem that for some members of the press it's been open season on the President's daughters, and it seems that it's a time for people to get into the private life of the Vice President's daughter."

The AP (1/24) says Cheney "bristled when asked to respond to critics who question his daughter Mary's decision to have a baby and raise it with her female partner." The Los Angeles Times (1/25, Reynolds, 850K) says Cheney's "words became most pointed when Blitzer asked" about the pregnancy. The Washington Post (1/25, A1, Baker, 690K) writes that Blitzer "has been in the Cheney doghouse since October, when he interviewed the vice president's wife, Lynne, and asked about steamy scenes in a novel she wrote. … Lynne Cheney angrily rebuffed Blitzer, and her husband later congratulated her for what he called 'the slapdown.'"

Higgins Exits Church After Sermon Criticized Stem Cell Vote. The AP (1/24) reports Democratic Rep. Brian Higgins "walked out of his Catholic church in Buffalo after a clergyman berated the lawmaker for his recent vote on stem cell research." The "public tongue-lashing" came "during last Sunday morning's Mass at Saint Thomas Aquinas Catholic Church in South Buffalo." Deacon Tom McDonnell "criticized Higgins for voting earlier this month for a bill that would allow federal funding for research involving stem cell lines derived from surplus embryos created in fertility clinics. The Catholic church opposes embryonic stem cell research." As McDonnell "spoke, Higgins -- who was baptized and married at Saint Aquinas -- walked out with his wife and son."

Oldest-Ever Senate Showing Signs Of Aging. The Politico (1/25, Martin, Bresnahan) reports that the "average age of members of the U.S. Senate is older than it has ever been," and "for many senators, advanced age is starting to show, raising questions about their ability to govern." The "average age of the 100 senators is 62, up from 60 in the last Congress. Among the new Democratic committee chairmen, it is 69. And, of the five longest-serving senators, three are there today," including 89-year-old Sen. Robert Byrd. In terms of illnesses, "at least 10 senators have fought various cancers or suffered severe injuries," and Sen. Tim Johnson "remains hospitalized here for a brain hemorrhage suffered last month."

McCain Would Be Oldest President At Inauguration. The Politico (1/25, Simon) reports writes that if John McCain is elected president, he would become the oldest ever inaugurated. And, "as is evident from the scar on the left side of his face, he has had malignant melanoma, the most invasive and dangerous form of skin cancer. … The media often demands the release of medical records these days, and the candidates sometimes comply. There were so many false rumors circulating about McCain's health when he ran for president in 2000, that he released 1,500 pages of medical and psychiatric records. They showed him to be in good health and not nuts."

NTEU Challenges Federal Intern Program. The Washington Post's (1/25, D4, Barr) "Federal Diary" column reports, "The Federal Career Intern Program has become one of the most popular ways for federal agencies to recruit on college campuses and hire young professionals. Agencies may hire interns at any time, do not have to advertise the job openings in advance, and can take advantage of the two-year job tryouts to evaluate the interns before deciding whether to offer them permanent civil service jobs." The Post adds that the NTEU "challenged" the popular program "in federal court" asserting "that the intern program 'has become the hiring method of choice' and has undermined century-old laws that require federal jobs to be filled through fair and open competition with applicants afforded equal opportunity. The union asked the US District Court for the District of Columbia to throw out the program's regulations and to stop agencies from using the hiring program." The Post adds, "NTEU also objected to the program's rule that places interns on probation for two years, instead of the one year that generally applies to civil service jobs, and to an IRS decision to extend the probation to three years for revenue agents."

DOJ_NMG_0121252

Union Launches Organizing Campaign At GAO. The Washington Post's (1/25, D4, Barr) "Federal Diary" column reports, "The International Federation of Professional and Technical Engineers announced yesterday that it has launched a union-organizing campaign to represent employees at the Government Accountability Office, the congressional auditing and investigations agency." Affiliated with the AFL-CIO, the union "represents federal scientists, engineers, immigration and administrative law judges and others, including the staff at the Congressional Research Service. A group of GAO analysts approached the CRS local union several months ago about forming an organizing committee, the union said."

White House Social Secretary Berman Stepping Down. The Washington Post reports in its "Reliable Source" column (1/25, Argetsinger, Roberts) that White House Social Secretary Lea Berman "is stepping down next month after two years on the job." The decision "to leave was entirely Berman's, said Susan Whitson, spokeswoman for Laura Bush. 'Mrs. Bush adores Lea and thinks her work is outstanding. Lea will be greatly missed.'" The Post adds the "prominent Republican hostess became the nation's most prestigious party planner in December 2004 -- after stints as social secretary for Dick Cheney, chief of staff to Lynne Cheney and a staffer in the president's 2004 reelection campaign."

OTHER NEWS:

Dow Reaches Its 26th Record Since October. The New York Times/AP (1/25) reports, "Wall Street soared yesterday, sending the Dow Jones industrial average to a new high. The Nasdaq composite index jumped 1.4 percent after profit reports from Yahoo and Sun Microsystems restored the confidence of investors in the technology sector." The Dow Jones "rose 87.97 points, or 0.7 percent, to 12,621.77, passing a record close of 12,582.59 set Jan. 16. It was the Dow's 26th record close since the surge began at the start of October. The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index reached a six-year high, rising 12.14 points, or 0.85 percent, to 1,440.13. The Russell 2000 index of smaller companies was up 8.65 points, or 1.10 percent, at 794.03." NBC Nightly News (1/24, story 10, :10, Williams, 9.87M) also noted the Wall Street numbers. The Washington Post/AP (1/25, D6) and Wall Street Journal (1/25, C1, Browning, 2.04M), among other newspapers, run similar reports.

"Growing Inequality" In America Triggers Debate On Fairness. The New York Times (1/25, Cowen, 1.16M) reports, "The growing inequality in wealth and income has led many people to question whether the contemporary American economy is rigged in favor of the rich. While there is little doubt that the gap between the wealthy and everybody else has widened in recent years, the situation is not as unfair as some of the numbers seem to imply. … In general, there is more income inequality among older populations than among younger populations, if only because older people have had more time to experience rising or falling fortunes. Furthermore, more-educated groups show greater income inequality than less-educated groups. … Since the United States is growing older and also more educated, income inequality will naturally rise."

Kerry Won't Seek Democratic Nomination In 2008. The Boston Globe (1/25, Klein, 413K) reports an "emotional Senator John F. Kerry today said he will not run in the 2008 presidential race and vowed to use his Senate perch to hasten an end to the war in Iraq, saying he would work with lawmakers from both parties to reverse President Bush's troop 'surge' and force him to withdraw virtually all troops from Iraq by early next year." Kerry "used the unusual forum of the Senate floor to announce his political ambitions. Choking up as he harkened back to his service in Vietnam, Kerry said he would work to make sure the next president doesn't have to cope with the consequences of a 'wider war' sparked by the failed policy in Iraq." Kerry's "decision to stay out of the presidential race reflects a realization that he would have had an uphill climb in capturing the Democratic nomination, given the other party heavyweights who are already in the race, according to Kerry associates." These associates said "the senator's plans changed dramatically in the fallout of his election-eve 'botched joke' about the education levels of US troops."

The Politico.com (1/24, Simon) reports, "Serious candidates and candidates who want to be serious in 2008 will have to raise more than a million and a half dollars a week in $2,000 increments starting right about now. And Kerry, who was criticized by many in his party for not running a more vigorous campaign last time, found it tough going." A source close to Kerry said, "He was calling around Wednesday and Thursday to close advisers and they had talked to donors several times and the money wasn't going to be there. That coupled with (Barack) Obama-mania, which gave people looking for a Hillary alternative a viable option, is what ended his plans."

The story was briefly reported by each of the networks. ABC World News (1/24, story 5, :20, Gibson, 8.78M) reported it was "a major political story tonight. Senator John Kerry has decided not to make another White House run in 2008. On the Senate floor this afternoon, the Massachusetts Democratic who lost the 2004 Presidential election said he will stay in the Senate and focus on trying to change the Bush Administration policy in Iraq."

DOJ_NMG_0121253

The CBS Evening News (1/24, story 7, :25, Couric, 7.66M) reported Kerry "made a hard choice of his own today." Kerry, "who lost to President Bush in 2004, said he was tempted to run again but decided this is not the time. At least nine others have decided this is the time for them." NBC Nightly News (1/24, story 4, :25, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "While most Americans might not have thought he was in the race to begin with, today Massachusetts Democratic Senator John Kerry said that he will not run for President in 2008."

The Boston Herald (1/25, Ratliff, Ross, 184K) reports that in "a speech to the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, Kerry put pressure on the current administration to set a date to withdraw U.S. troops from Iraq but dedicated the last few minutes of his time on the floor to announce to his colleagues that though he was 'tempted to try again,' he would not make a push for the presidency." Gov. Deval Patrick, "who has previously said he would support Kerry in a 2008 White House bid, is now undecided on who he will back on the Democratic side for the office."

The AP (1/25, Espo) reports Kerry, "who fell 118,601 Ohio votes short of the White House in 2004, said Wednesday he will not run for president in 2008." Kerry said, "There are powerful reasons to want to continue that fight now. But I have concluded this isn't the time for me to mount a presidential campaign." The AP adds Kerry's decision "leaves a field of nine Democrats running or signaling their intention to do so, including Sens. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York and Barack Obama of Illinois, and John Edwards, Kerry's 2004 vice presidential running mate." Edwards said "he knew the decision was a difficult one for Kerry 'because we know his first instinct is always to respond to any call to serve his country'"

The AFP (1/25) reports Kerry "alluded to his failed presidential bid, which hinged largely on his strong opposition to the US war in Iraq, in making his announcement." Kerry said, "We came close -- certainly close enough to be tempted to try again." AFP added Kerry's "decision to pull out is the latest major development in the accelerated 2008 presidential race, in which several candidates have felt compelled to declare their intentions earlier than ever to lock up vital funds and campaign staff, or to bow out."

CQ Politics (1/25, Giroux) reports Kerry "announced his decision in a 36-minute speech on the Senate floor Wednesday afternoon. In a long prelude to his brief announcement, Kerry issued a lacerating denunciation of how Bush has handled the war in Iraq — including the president's recently announced decision to increase American troop strength in that nation." The news "will disappoint some Kerry loyalists who say he was hindered in 2004 by attacks from Republicans that they view as unfair." But "less downcast will be many Democrats who criticized Kerry, contending he ran an ineffective campaign that allowed Bush to win re-election."

Bloomberg (1/25, Roberts) reports, "Kerry said he is determined to use his position in the Senate to force a withdrawal of most U.S. troops from Iraq by next year." Kerry said, "Congress bears some responsibility for getting us into this war and Congress must take responsibility for getting us out."

The Los Angeles Times (1/25, Neuman, 850K) reports analysts "said Kerry also may have surveyed the field of Democratic candidates -- with Sens. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York and Barack Obama of Illinois among the front-runners -- and determined that there was little interest in a candidate given to long speeches, a less charismatic style, and a similar position on the war." Jennifer Duffy of the Cook Political Report said, "The writing was on the wall. He was getting squeezed. Where once you saw the possibility of his running an 'I told you so' campaign, his position on Iraq is not unique anymore."

The New York Times (1/25, Nagourney, 1.16M) reports Kerry's announcement, "though it came in an unorthodox place, was not a surprise. He was bowing to a Democratic Party that was clearly unreceptive and had turned its attention to new candidates, in particular Senators Barack Obama of Illinois and Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York, who both got into the race this month." Many Democrats "had said they expected that Mr. Kerry would decide not to run after assessing how much support he had in his party. Already, most of his aides from the 2004 campaign have moved on."

The Hill (1/25, Blake) reports Kerry, "who has eyed the White House since coming up just short in 2004 and has raised money accordingly, had become a long shot for a repeat bid. He languished in early polls despite high name recognition." Kerry "damaged his cause with comments shortly before the 2006 midterm elections in which he told students at a rally in California that they had better take their education seriously. Otherwise, he said, 'you get stuck in Iraq.'"

The Washington Post (1/25, A4, Cillizza, 690K) reports, "Several people close to Kerry said he struggled with the decision over whether to run again, weighing the narrowness of his 2004 defeat against the obvious hurdles presented by a Democratic field filled with popular figures such as" Sens. Clinton and Obama. But the sources "said his decision was not motivated by national and state polling that showed him trailing Clinton, Obama and Edwards in hypothetical 2008 matchups. They noted that Kerry has nearly $13 million in the bank, which could have been used to reintroduce himself to voters. But there are real concerns that a second national candidacy could endanger Kerry's standing in his home state."

The Washington Times (1/25, Lambro, 88K) reports, "Democratic campaign strategists privately have been saying for some time that the senator was no longer a contender in a crowded field of candidates, led" by Clinton, Obama, and Edwards. Democratic leaders "in the early caucus and primary battlegrounds of Iowa and New Hampshire also said that Mr. Kerry was registering little support in their states, running far behind the front-runners, who already have considerable campaign organizations and fundraising pledges."

DOJ_NMG_0121254

Obama Calls Claim He Studied At Madrassah "Scurrilous." The AP (1/25, Pickler) reports Sen. Barack Obama "fought back Wednesday against an allegation that he was educated at a radical Islamic school as a child in Indonesia, determined to avoid being tripped up by unsubstantiated charges like those that undermined John Kerry in 2004." Interviews "by The Associated Press at the elementary school in Jakarta found that it's a public and secular institution that has been open to students of all faiths since before the White House hopeful attended in the late 1960s." Obama, who "was born in Hawaii, moved to Indonesia at age 6 to live with his mother and stepfather, attending schools in the country until age 10, when he returned to Hawaii to live with his maternal grandparents." The "contention that Obama was educated at a radical Muslim madrassa surfaced on the Web site of the conservative Insight magazine the day after Obama announced he was jumping into the 2008 presidential race. Conservative Internet blogs and the Fox News Channel picked up the story and spread the charges just as his candidacy was getting off the ground." Obama "on Wednesday called the reports 'scurrilous,' and his communications director e-mailed reporters a lengthy memo attempting to set the record straight."

The Hill (1/25, Schor) reports Obama "fired back yesterday against Insight magazine and Fox News for purveying a discredited report that he attended a radical Islamic religious school during his childhood years in Indonesia." In a memo to reporters, Obama communications director Robert Gibbs "reiterated that CNN has officially debunked claims published last week in Insight, a property of Washington Times owner Rev. Sun Myung Moon."

Obama Faces Dilemma In Appeal To Black Voters. The Washington Post (1/25, A1, Fletcher, 690K) reports in a front page story that the "question of how Obama chooses to define and approach race looms large as he moves closer to formally launching his campaign next month. Although he rides a wave of enthusiasm among Democrats who like his vision of a different kind of politics and see him as an alternative to Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (N.Y.), it is not clear that his multiracial message can excite black voters hungry for affirmation of their top concerns." Melissa V. Harris-Lacewell, "a Princeton University professor who has followed Obama's political ascent, said that he may be forced to choose: 'You can be elected president as a black person only if you signal at some level that you are independent from black people' -- a move she said would be 'guaranteed' to make black people angry." The Post adds, "Already, that balancing act is causing some strains. Some of Obama's longtime black supporters in Illinois are grumbling about the largely white crowd of advisers who now surround Obama as he gears up his national campaign."

The Washington Times (1/25, DeBose, 88K) reports Obama "will have a tough time generating support for his presidential bid among key black Democratic leaders -- many of whom are loyal to the Clintons -- and he must guard against undermining his electability by becoming the civil rights candidate, campaign strategists say." Several strategists "said Mr. Obama, Illinois Democrat, will have to walk the tightrope of wooing black liberal activists, including such polarizing figures as the Rev. Al Sharpton and Mr. Jackson, while avoiding limiting his appeal by leading with his race and running primarily on civil rights issues."

McCain Tops GOP Competitors In Arizona Poll. Phoenix Business Journal (1/25, Sunnucks) reports Sen. John McCain "fared well in a poll of Arizona voters, but trailed former New York Mayor Rudy Giuliani among Republicans in surveys taken nationally and in Iowa, a key primary state." A poll released Wednesday "by Arizona State University and KAET-TV 8 shows McCain with a mammoth lead over GOP rivals in a potential Arizona primary." The ASU survey "gives McCain a 54 percent edge. Former U.S. House Speaker Newt Gingrich checks in as the second most popular candidate, favored by 14 percent of respondents, followed by Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney. The ASU poll did not ask voters about Giuliani."

Republicans Wonder Whether Giuliani Is In A Stall. The White House Bulletin/US News (1/25) reports Republican insiders are asking if Rudy Giuliani will "back out of his fledgling presidential campaign." The insiders "note that while Giuliani leads in some national polls of GOP voters, he has not moved as aggressively as some of his rivals, especially John McCain and Mitt Romney, to recruit a campaign team or solicit support from key Republicans at the national, state, and local levels. The insiders point out that Giuliani didn't run against Hillary Rodham Clinton for the Senate in 2000 in a decision that disappointed many of his supporters." A "prominent GOP insider who formerly advised President Bush" said, "Some of us aren't sure he will really make this race this time, and if he does jump in, there will be doubts that he will stay in."

Four Large States Could Move Primaries Up To February. The New York Times (1/25, Nagourney, 1.16M) reports that as many as "four big states — California, Florida, Illinois and New Jersey — are likely to move up their 2008 presidential primaries to early next February, further upending an already unsettled nominating process and forcing candidates of both parties to rethink their campaign strategies, party officials said Wednesday." The changes "mean that the presidential candidates face the prospect of going immediately from an ordered series of early contests in relatively small states in January to a single-day, coast-to-coast battlefield in February, encompassing some of the most expensive advertising markets in the nation." The move would "appear to benefit well-financed and already familiar candidates and diminish the prospects of those with less money and name recognition going into such a highly compressed series of contests early next year." Associates of Sens. Hillary Clinton and John McCain "said that should either of them stumble early on, the respective party primaries in California and New Jersey — two states that would seem particularly hospitable to them — could offer an expensive but welcome firewall." But New Jersey and California "could provide an opening for Rudolph W. Giuliani, the former mayor of New York, who faces the daunting prospect of overcoming resistance among social conservatives in the Republican contests in Iowa and South Carolina in January."

DOJ_NMG_0121255

Gingrich Backs Bill To Make English Official Language. The Washington Times (1/25, Pfeiffer, 88K) reports former House Speaker Newt Gingrich "announced his support for legislation that would make English the nation's official language in order to combat what he calls 'an unprecedented influx of non-English-speaking immigrants.'" Gingrich "has said he is speaking out now to infuse his party's presidential primary with ideas and will not make a formal decision about running until September." Gingrich said, "If you are pro-immigration into America, you should be pro-assimilation into the American way of life. Bilingual education has been stunningly destructive."

Bergen County Seen As Warning For GOP. In his Roll Call column (1/25), Stuart Rothenberg says, "For Republicans, New Jersey, once a GOP-leaning, anti-tax state, stands as a stark reminder of how things have changed, particularly in the Northeast. But the better example — and warning of things to come — is Bergen County, a suburban bedroom community that has moved away from its Republican roots and toward the Democratic Party." The county, "once bedrock Republican territory and the most populous county in the state, has voted Democratic in the past four presidential elections — twice for Bill Clinton, and more recently for Al Gore and John Kerry." Republicans have "three major problems in the county: the national party, changing demographics and a fractured GOP that is being outworked by Democratic strategists." If Bergen "were an isolated case, it might not even be worth mentioning. But what's happening there could happen (and indeed has happened) in other northern suburbs. While the GOP has made gains in Georgia, Tennessee and Kentucky, it continues to lose ground in New Jersey, Illinois and southeast Pennsylvania."

Washington School Board Faces Backlash Over Ban On Gore Film. The Washington Post (1/25, A12, Harden, 690K) reports Frosty E. Hardiman of Federal Way, Washington, "is neither impressed nor surprised that 'An Inconvenient Truth,' the global-warming movie narrated by former vice president Al Gore, received an Oscar nomination this week for best documentary." Hardiman said, "Liberal left is all over Hollywood." The Post adds Hardiman, "a parent of seven here in the southern suburbs of Seattle, has himself roiled the global-warming waters. It happened early this month when he learned that one of his daughters would be watching 'An Inconvenient Truth' in her seventh-grade science class." Hardiman's "angry e-mail" to the local school board "(along with complaints from a few other parents) stopped the film from being shown to Hardiman's daughter." The e-mail "also pressured the school board to impose a ban on screenings of the film for the district's 22,500 students. The ban, which the school board says was merely a 'moratorium,' was lifted Tuesday night, subject to rigorous conditions. Still, the action has appalled the film's producers and triggered a ferocious national backlash."

Steele To Head GOPAC. The Washington Times (1/25, Lobianco, 88K) reports former Maryland Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele "will lead a major Republican fundraising group and start a public affairs consulting firm in Maryland." Steele will "be the chairman of GOPAC, the national fundraising outfit that former House Speaker Newt Gingrich elevated to national prominence in 1994, and start the Legacy Strategies public affairs firm, he told The Washington Times yesterday."

WPost Says Virginia GOP Finally Serious About Transportation Funding. The Washington Post (1/25, A24, 690K) says in an editorial, "Eyeball to eyeball with a potential electoral disaster in this fall's legislative elections, Virginia Republicans have finally blinked -- a little. They have put forward a transportation funding package that is at least partly serious, which is to say that it relies to a significant degree on new taxes and fees to address the state's most urgent problem. It is an imperfect plan but also a sound starting point for a deal." Having signed pledges "to oppose any new taxes and having torpedoed one funding plan after another, the conservative ideologues who hold sway in the House of Delegates haven't found the courage to raise taxes much themselves. But they have decided to allow the localities where traffic is worst -- in Northern Virginia and Hampton Roads -- to increase their own taxes, particularly on commercial real estate and home sales."

DOJ_NMG_0121256

WS Journal Provides Guide To Energy Security Flashpoints. The Wall Street Journal (1/25, A12, Cummins, Bahree, Minczeski, 2.04M) reports, "The past four years have seen the biggest oil-price spike in a generation. That shock has shown energy insecurity to be one of the chief political, economic and military challenges facing the world." The "worry is that the geopolitical and economic equilibrium that long enabled the oil industry to smoothly supply customers is a thing of the past." One concern is whether power has "permanently shifted to producers." Another "worry is turmoil in exporting nations." The "quest for energy security, in short, is a global scramble of power, money and ideas." The Journal provides a map-based "guide to flashpoints likely to shape the outcome of that scramble in 2007."

Bolton Says US Iran Policy Flawed. The AP (1/25) reports former UN Ambassador John Bolton says the United States "may not be able to prevent Iran from acquiring nuclear weapons because the Bush administration is following a flawed diplomatic strategy." In an interview with Fox News airing Wednesday night, Bolton "said that contrary to administration claims, the U.N. Security Council resolution against Iran that was approved last month is 'very weak.'" The former envoy said, "The disjunction between that objective and the diplomacy we have been pursuing is ultimately going to be a problem for the president."

Fox News' Special Report (1/24, story 13, 3:20, Rosen) reported, "Bolton urged the White House to pursue regime change in Iran" and his "conservative views generally aligned with those of some other members of the President's foreign policy team, notably Vice President Cheney and Robert Joseph, the Undersecretary of State for Arms Control." According to Fox News, "Conservatives in the State Department bureaucracy blame the undersecretary for political affairs, Nicholas Burns, who served under President Clinton, and whose portfolio has included the Iran file, with ceding too much control to the Europeans negotiating directly with Tehran."

Khalilzad Promises Evidence On Iran's Activities In Iraq. The Los Angeles Times (1/25, Daragahi, 850K) reports outgoing US Ambassador in Iraq, Zalmay Khalilzad, "said Wednesday that he would soon reveal details he asserted would show Iranian interference in the country, in the latest round of diplomatic jousting between Washington and Tehran." Khalilzad told a group of Western journalists that American officials would provide details "in the coming days" about Iranian officials detained and interrogated in Baghdad and the Kurdish city of Irbil within the last month. The presentation, Khalilzad said, "would include details about who the detained Iranians are and what they were doing in Iraq, as well as information about alleged contraband coming across the Iran-Iraq border." The upcoming presentation, he said, is "a response to public comments by Iranian Ambassador Hassan Kazemi-Qomi, who this week publicly challenged Americans to show 'any shred of evidence that Iran is working to destabilize Iraq,' according to Iranian news agencies."

Iran Receives Russian Defense Missiles. The AP (1/25, Karimi) reports Iranian officials "said Wednesday that they have taken delivery of advanced Russian air defense missile systems -- weapons intended, according to one Russian news agency, to defend Tehran's major nuclear facilities." Iran's Minister of Defense, Mostafa Mohammad Najjar, "did not say how many missiles were delivered or when they arrived." In New York, spokesman for the US mission to the United Nations, Richard Grenell, called the development "troublesome given that Iran is the leading state sponsor of terror in the world."

Olmert Says Israel Will Response To Iranian Nuke Threat With "All Means At Our Disposal." The AP (1/25, Gutkin) reports Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert "devoted one of his most important policy speeches of the year Wednesday to a single topic -- Iran -- saying Israel will respond to a nuclear threat 'with all the means at our disposal.'" Addressing an annual security conference in Tel Aviv, he "said the international community has no choice but to act forcefully" against Iran and its president, Mahmoud Ahmedinajad, who has repeatedly called for Israel's destruction. "When the leader of a country announces, officially and publicly, his country's intention to wipe off the map another country, and creates those tools which will allow them to realize their stated threat, no nation has the right to even to weigh its position," Olmert said. The AP says Olmert's decision to "devote the high-profile speech to Iran reflected his country's growing concern over" Iran.

Timing Of Mideast Talks Questioned. In a news analysis, the New York Times (1/25, A10, Erlanger, 1.16M) writes, "It would be hard to imagine a less promising moment for the United States to restart serious Palestinian-Israeli peace negotiations." Six years after the last round of talks, "the Palestinian government is controlled by Hamas, which preaches Israel's destruction. Approval ratings for the Israeli prime minister are barely in double digits. Gaza and neighboring Lebanon are in turmoil. President Bush is weak." Despite these factors, the Bush administration "is holding a meeting on Feb. 2 of the so-called Quartet…to be followed by 'informal talks' between Israeli and Palestinian leaders, with help from [Secretary] Rice, about the shape of a final peace treaty and the nature of a Palestinian state beside Israel." The Times says that "expectations are purposely low" and notes that a "senior US official" said while it is unlikely that either Ehud Olmer or Mahmoud Abbas has the political strength to deliver big concessions, "sometimes it's best to try to buy in at the bottom."

DOJ_NMG_0121257

Musharraf Proposes Mideast Peace Initiative. AFP (1/25) reports Pakistan President Pervez Musharraf "said that he had agreed with five Arab leaders to develop a Muslim peace initiative for the Palestinian conflict, which he said lay at the root of worsening violence around the region." Speaking with reporters in the United Arab Emirates at the end of a five-nation Middle East tour, Musharraf said, "Destructive violence is going on in Iraq, Lebanon is mired in crisis, and the most dangerous aspects of these two are the visible sectarian undertones which cause a special concern to us in Pakistan."

Rice Announces $770 Million Aid Package For Lebanon. The AP (1/25, Gearan) reports Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice announced Wednesday that the US "will offer nearly $770 million to help the fragile democratic government in Lebanon" in a "tripling of US aid announced a day after deadly protests in Beirut underscored the country's deep political and sectarian divisions." The donation, which must be approved by Congress, "would include $220 million in military aid" for the purchase of "small arms, ammunition, spare parts and Humvees," US officials said. Tuesday's violent protests "underscore the world's duty to help the democratic government survive in Lebanon, Rice said." Rice will meet privately with Prime Minister Fuad Siniora Thursday, "patching up a relationship strained by Saniora's frustration that it took 34 days to get a United Nations cease-fire in the Israeli-Hezbollah war."

The New York Times (1/25, A8, Cooper, 1.16M) says the US aid package demonstrates the "level of concern about the deteriorating situation" in Lebanon, and "in many ways, the donor conference [in Paris] on Thursday will serve as a snapshot of the larger proxy war between the United States -- joined by its Sunni Arab allies and Europe -- and Iran and Syria. Lebanon, like Iraq, is a battleground in that war, and Mr. Siniora, a Sunni Muslim, is fighting for his political survival." However, "Just how much money it will take to prop up Mr. Siniora is in question." Assistant Secretary of State C. David Welch told reporters in Paris, "You will find that the United States will be very supportive of Lebanon at this conference. Of course, you all know the importance of our political voice; now we are going to put some money behind that." How much "Saudi Arabia and other Sunni Arab countries come up with will also be of interest, analysts say."

The AP (1/25, Keaten) also quotes Assistant Secretary Welch as saying, "The government of Lebanon may be stressed by what's going on, but I believe they are strong and will weather this crisis."

The Washington Times (1/25, Kralev, 88K) notes McCormack said Rice was accompanied by chief executives of US companies with plans to invest in Lebanon, although he did not name them. The spokesman told reporters, "Long after direct US government assistance has gone through the pipeline and been delivered, investment by foreign companies and US companies is going to continue to create jobs and opportunity in Lebanon."

AFP (1/25, Millikin) notes Rice "linked the latest US aid, and other pledges expected during Thursday's 30-nation donors meeting, to efforts to strengthen Siniora's government in a power struggle with Hezbollah and other Syrian-backed parties in Lebanon." Rice said she hoped the pro-Syrian camp "would not want to push Lebanon into open conflict and to kill lots of innocent Lebanese to pursue their political goals." A senior official accompanying Rice "said the direct aid will be tied to 'benchmarks' in the implementation of Siniora's five-year reform plan, which calls for raising some taxes and privatizing the country's electricity and mobile phone sectors."

Hariri's Son Urges Support From International Community. Saad Hariri, son of the late Rafik Hariri and majority leader of Lebanon's national parliament, writes in the Wall Street Journal (1/25, A19, 2.04M) that his country "is truly at a crossroads; the choices and actions Lebanese government officials and their supporters in the international community make are critical for what my country will look like in the future." This week's donor conference, he continues, "will be decisive for the future of Lebanon as a democratic and moderate Arab country with a liberal economy, and as a beacon of coexistence and tolerance for the entire region." Hariri notes that "while the people of Lebanon are free today, we are not free of foreign intervention," citing "outside powers" that are "supporting a move by a coalition of Lebanese parties to topple the elected government."

Nasrallah Says Hezbollah Won't Topple Lebanese Government. The New York Times (1/25, A9, Bakri, 1.16M) reports Hezbollah's Sheik Hassan Nasrallah said Wednesday that Lebanon's opposition movement "had decided to stop short of toppling the government of Fouad Siniora, fearing civil strife." He warned, though, that Hezbollah and its allies "would continue to ratchet up the pressure on Mr. Siniora in coming weeks and vowed not to back down on their demands."

US Criticizes Iranian Overtures To Saudis. The Washington Times (1/25, Kralev, 88K) reports the United States Wednesday "criticized Iranian overtures to Saudi Arabia suggesting the two countries cooperate to resolve a political crisis between the Lebanese government of Prime Minister Fuad Siniora and the Shi'ite group Hezbollah." Tehran's proposal, made during a visit to Riyadh last week by

DOJ_NMG_0121258

Ali Larijani, head of the Supreme National Security Council, is "aimed at giving the Iranian-backed Hezbollah a bigger role in the Lebanese Cabinet," diplomats said. State Department spokesman Sean McCormack told reporters, "We certainly wouldn't support any effort to try to negotiate something over and above the heads of the Siniora government."

Defense Officials Confirm New Airstrike In Somalia. The AP (1/25, Burns) reports US defense officials Wednesday confirmed the United States launched a second airstrike in Somalia against suspected terrorist targets. The officials, "who spoke on condition of anonymity because the action was carried out in secret, provided few details about the strike by an Air Force AC-130 gunship earlier this week and were uncertain whether the intended target was killed." One official "suggested that early indications showed that no high-value target was killed or captured." At the Defense Department, spokesman Bryan Whitman declined to confirm any new strike but said in general that the United States is "going to go after al-Qaeda in the global war on terrorism wherever it takes us."

NYTimes Urges Washington To Broker Peace Accord. In an editorial, the New York Times (1/25, 1.16M) writes, "Thanks to an unusual and probably fleeting set of events, Somalia has a chance to return to the community of law-abiding and legitimate states. For a country that dissolved years ago into chronic clan warfare and became a way station for international terrorists, that would be an enormous gain -- and an enormous gain for the rest of the world. To make the most of this opportunity, Washington needs to move quickly, along with Arab and African leaders, to try to broker a political compromise between responsible leaders of the Islamic Courts Union…and the internationally endorsed transitional government installed in its place."

Rice Dismisses Report Pyongyang Is Helping Iran Prepare Nuke Test. AFP (1/25) reports Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice "sought to play down a report in a British newspaper that North Korea was helping Iran prepare an eventual nuclear test explosion." Responding to questions about a report published in The Daily Telegraph, Rice told reporters in Paris, "I don't see that it's based on anything that I've seen." Citing an unnamed senior European defense official, the newspaper "said that North Korea has agreed to share all the data it received from its nuclear test last year as both countries face Western pressures over the development of their own nuclear programs." The Secretary also said she had spoken with her South Korean counterpart Wednesday and the foreign ministers of China and Japan on Tuesday as part of efforts to hold a new round of six-party talks. Rice said, "We've had productive preparatory discussions with all of the parties, including the North Koreans, but there's not going to be an agreement until we're in the six-party format."

Greek Militants Claim Responsibility For Attack On US Embassy. The AP (1/25, Gatopoulos) reports, "A Greek militant group has claimed responsibility for a rocket attack on the US Embassy in Athens earlier this month, blaming American policy in Iraq and the Middle East for the strike." The "far-left" group Revolutionary Struggle issued a statement to the weekly Pontiki newspaper, its publisher Dimitris Benekos said Wednesday. He said the statement would be published on Thursday and police said forensic experts were examining the document. Benekos told the AP the five-page statement "explains why it chose the embassy as a target, linking (the attack) with US foreign policy in various parts of the world -- Afghanistan, Iran, Iraq, Palestine and so on."

British Defense Ministry Denies Rift With US. AFP (1/25) reports the British defense ministry "denied there was any rift with the United States over the two countries' plans for troop levels in Iraq following comments made" by outgoing US Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad to the BBC. The ambassador said the US "would like the British to co-ordinate and for us to have a joint plan." A ministry spokeswoman said, "There is no tension between US and UK objectives and activities in Iraq," stressing that "this is the strategy of transition, which we are working towards, as are the Americans."

Hu To Visit Sudan For Talks On Darfur Conflict. The New York Times (1/25, A6, French, 1.16M) reports Chinese officials announced Wednesday that President Hu Jintao "would visit Sudan in early February and would seek a diplomatic solution" to the conflict in Darfur. As part of an eight-country tour of Africa, a Foreign Ministry spokesman "said that China would use its diplomatic influence to encourage a settlement of the Darfur crisis, but that China would not publicly pressure Sudan or threaten it with sanctions." Assistant Foreign Minister Zhai Jun said at a news conference in Beijing that "using pressure and imposing sanctions is not practical and will not help settle the issue."

US Analyst Criticized For Support Of Spy. The Washington Times (1/25, Gertz, 88K) reports a "senior US intelligence analyst has been formally criticized for 'poor judgment' after writing a letter and e-mails in support of a convicted former Defense Intelligence Agency analyst," US intelligence officials said. Lonnie Henley, the deputy national intelligence officer (NIO) for East Asia, "was given a letter of reprimand several months ago after an investigation within the Office of the Director of National Intelligence (DNI)." Henley was "a close friend and protégé of former DIA analyst Ronald Montaperto, who was convicted in June on espionage charges that included supplying secrets to Chinese military intelligence." DNI spokesman Carl Kropf "declined to comment on the reprimand, noting that it was an administrative matter."

DOJ_NMG_0121259

"Blackmail Journalism" Seen As Growing Problem In China. The Washington Post (1/25, A1, Cody, 690K) reports in a front page article on "the blackmail journalism metastasizing through China's news media," which journalists and officials say Chinese reporters "are demanding…hush money with increasing regularity from businesses and government agencies in exchange for the withholding of unfavorable news." In "many ways," the Post says "blackmail journalism grew naturally out of a system in which Communist Party censors control the news rigorously, barring reports that could be seen as unfavorable to the party or contrary to the government's political goals."

Reactions To China Missile Test Mixed. Bruce Berkowitz, a research fellow at the Hoover Institution at Stanford University, writes in the Wall Street Journal (1/25, A18, 2.04M) that while China's foreign ministry acknowledged Tuesday "what the world press had reported for almost two weeks: a test of an anti-satellite weapon in space," the "danger now is that partisans and pundits will overreact. Some will claim the launch represents a new threat to the United States. Others will warn of the militarization of space." However, Berkowitz says, "They are both wrong. The real threat is that Washington will miss an opportunity to move China along the path to more diplomatic openness and democracy, and deter it from aggression against its neighbors and American interests."

Meanwhile, Elizabeth Economy, director of Asia studies at the Council on Foreign Relations, writes in the Washington Post (1/25, A25, 690K) that the test "has sparked a political firestorm, as analysts have tried to ascertain who in China knew what when and to what end." But Economy says the "truth is that China…exerts an unsettling and often negative impact on the world," and the missile strike "also underscores perhaps the greatest challenge of China's rise as a global power: The lack of transparency, official accountability and rule of law that defines China on the domestic front plays poorly on the international stage." She notes that "Chinese leaders' inability to be forthcoming on matters of international importance -- whether SARS, the Harbin pollution disaster or this missile strike -- erodes whatever goodwill and trust they earn from their tireless sojourns abroad and suggests that they are not ready for prime time."

Russia Defense Minister Criticizes US Missile Plans. The Washington Times/AP (1/25, Isachenkov) reports Russia's defense minister Wednesday "harshly criticized US plans to deploy missile-defense sites in Central Europe, saying Moscow doesn't trust the US explanation that they are intended to counter missile threats posed by Iran and North Korea." During a trip to India, Sergei Ivanov said neither Iran nor North Korea has or will have a capability to build missiles that can reach Europe. Speaking to reporters, Ivanov said, "They don't and won't have intercontinental ballistic missiles. And a question comes: whom it's directed against?"

Putin's India Visit Seen As Sign Growing Ties. The New York Times (1/25, A14, Sengupta, 1.16M) reports from New Delhi, "A new nuclear accord, booming trade and an ever closer partnership with the United States notwithstanding, the guest of honor this week at India's Republic Day ceremony, an annual display of military pomp, will be a symbol of New Delhi's newest old friend: President Vladimir V. Putin of Russia." Putin's visit is seen "as testament to the enduring ties between India and Russia," which "have been revived by the strategic demands of a prospering India, namely energy and arms."

Plot To Smuggle Uranium Shows Gaps In Anti-Proliferation Efforts. On its front page, the New York Times (1/25, A1, Sheets, Broad, 1.16M) details a plot carried out last January by Russian Oleg Khinsagov, who smuggled "100 grams of uranium so refined that it could help fuel an atom bomb" into Georgia. The case "has alarmed officials because they had thought that new security precautions had tamped down the nuclear black market that developed in the 1990s, after the Soviet Union collapsed." The Times adds, "An examination of the episode, and a similar one in 2003, suggests that the region's political instability and culture of rampant corruption continue to provide a fertile breeding ground for illicit commerce in atomic materials." This latest uranium seizure, said American Ambassador in Tbilisi, John F. Tefft, "highlights how smuggling and loose border control, associated with Georgia's separatist conflicts," pose a threat "not just to Georgia but to all the international community." But "what is most worrisome about the two most recent case, nuclear experts say, is the material itself: in large enough quantities, it could provide a terrorist with an instant solution to the biggest challenge in making a nuclear weapon, obtaining the fuel."

Litvinenko's Poisoning Jump Starts Development Of New Radiation Exposure Treatments. Under the headline, "Death Of Spy Who Ingested Polonium Spurs Drug Makers," the Wall Street Journal (1/25, B1, Levine, 2.04M) reports that following last November's case in which polonium-210, "a rare radioactive isotope, was used to murder former Russian intelligence agent Alexander Litvinenko" Ovation Pharmaceuticals Inc. of Deerfield, Ill., "got a call from the National Institute of Allergy and Infectious Diseases: Could the company brief the agency on Chemet? Ovation is one of a few US drug companies and laboratories that are attracting new attention because of Mr. Litvinenko's death in London from poisoning by polonium-210." The Journal adds, "Last fall, the National Institute of Allergy and Infectious Diseases in Bethesda, Md., and the Pentagon separately offered funding for research into promising radiation-injury treatments." Now, "pharmaceutical companies are giving notice that drugs they have developed, or are developing, for cancer and other diseases can also be used for exposure to radioactive elements, including possibly polonium-210. Most must be taken within hours of exposure to be effective."

DOJ_NMG_0121260

Davos Forum Highlights Globalization Debate. The Wall Street Journal (1/25, A10, Walker, 2.04M)) reports that a "new refrain is emerging in Davos this year: Globalization isn't working for everyone. Stagnating wages and rising job insecurity in developed countries are creating popular disenchantment with the free movement of goods, capital and people across borders. If unchecked, popular fears could turn into a political backlash that could lead to protectionism -- or at least make broad free-trade agreements harder to achieve in the future." In an interview last week, German Chancellor Angela Merkel said, "The anxiety is there, because we have competitors that didn't exist 10 or 15 years ago." Governments in the developed world, "she said, have to persuade their own middle class -- a group used to a relatively stable economy in the postwar decades -- to embrace a life of constant change and challenge."

Liberia's President Seen As Making Progress During First Year In Office. The Los Angeles Times (1/25, A1, Dixon, 850K) profiles Liberian President Ellen Johnson-Sirleaf, who it calls "a feisty, ambitious economist trying to turn around one of the most damaged and traumatized countries on Earth, with a ferociousness that has earned her another nickname: the Iron Lady." Today, a year after Johnson-Sirleaf took office, "the most visible progress in this grimy, bullet-pocked capital is a few wan strings of fairy lights draped on dilapidated street awnings" after spending "years without electricity." Johnson-Sirleaf is "under no illusions: A few more months or a year without bringing jobs and her people's love and admiration will themselves blink out. But for now she offers hope of a new beginning to a nation torn by war's atrocities."

OPEC President Not Worried About Recent Slide In Oil Prices. The Wall Street Journal (1/25, A10, Smallman, 2.04M) reports, "OPEC's new president said that he would like higher oil prices than current levels, but that the long-term outlook was more important than a near-term price slide." Mohammed al-Hamli, who is also oil minister for the United Arab Emirates, "said he would be at ease if the cartel's reference basket of 11 of its members' crude oils was about $55 a barrel. His statement implied a price for U.S. markets of roughly $60 a barrel. U.S. benchmark crude-oil futures settled yesterday at $55.37, up 33 cents." Al-Hamli's "remarks underscore some of the uncertainty OPEC faces amid the volatile oil prices of recent weeks."

THE BIG PICTURE:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages.

Los Angeles Times:
"Senate Panel Opposes Troop Buildup In Iraq."
"Liberians Love Their Iron Lady, For Now."
"Tightwad Bank Is Beyond Saving."
"U.S. Motorists Cutting Back A Bit."
"Mayor Keeps High Profile On D.C. Trip."

USA Today:
"Senators Say 'No' On Bush Iraq Plan."
"Distractions Challenge Teen Drivers."
"Cities See Crime Surge As Threat To Their Revival."

New York Times:
"Big States' Plan for Earlier Primaries Scrambles Race."
"Bush Iraq Plan Is Condemned by Senate Panel."
"Congress Office Forecasts Drop in U.S. Deficit."
"Smuggler's Plot Highlights Fear Over Uranium."
"At the Libby Trial, Hints of Intrigue and Betrayal."
"Police Won't Use $140 Million Radio System."
"Of Gay Sheep, Science and Peril of Bad Publicity."
"Hedge Fund Chiefs, With Cash, Join Political Fray."

Washington Post:
"Senators Rebuff Bush On Troop Plan."
"Bush Plans New Focus On Afghan Recovery."
"New Teen Taunt: You Call Those Advanced Classes?."
"Obama's Appeal to Blacks Remains An Open Question."
"Defending Iraq War, Defiant Cheney Cites 'Enormous Successes'."

Washington Times:
"Bush Rebuke Advances."
"GOP Renews 'Amnesty' Defiance."
"Rumsfield's Transition Raises Questions."
"Obama On Tightrope In Bid For Black Vote."
"Is Jimi The King Of Pop?"
"Modern-Day Jonah Escapes Jaws Of Killer Shark."

Detroit Free Press:
"Wary GOP Lawmakers Bail On Bush."
"Record Number of Region's Homeowners Are In trouble As Economy Flounders."
"A Battle Takes Shape Over Fuel Rules."

DOJ_NMG_0121261

Atlanta Journal-Constitution:
"DeKalb Police Get Oversight."
"No Golden Net For New Dept Chief."
"Drive For New Cities Hits Detour."
"Questions Linger, But Cops Insist Vick's Case 'Is Over.'"

Houston Chronicle:
"Bonuses In HISD Strike A Nerve."
"Students Ill After Pills Given Out 'Like Candy'."
"Senate Panel Lays Into Bush War Plans."
"A Bright Spot Amid Days Of Gloom."
"After Decades Of Waiting Arrest Made In Slayings."
"Doctors Find A Long Wait To See Patients On Texas."

Story Lineup From Last Night's Network News:
ABC: Senate-Iraq Resolution; Senate Iraq Resolution-Analysis; Bush Health Care Plan; Bush Health Care Plan-Analysis; Sen. Kerry Not Running; Helicopter Crash-Iraq; Iraqi Children; A Soldier's Story; Duke Lacrosse Rape Case; Norovirus Outbreak; Pope John Paul II.
CBS: Senate-Iraq Resolution; Cheney Interview; Troops On Patrol-Iraq; Afghanistan War; Bush Energy Plan; Climate Change Report; Sen. Kerry Not Running; Medical Care Discounts; Hurricane Katrina Forgotten; Fallen Soldier; Reality TV.
NBC: Senate-Iraq Resolution; State Of The Union-Aftermath; Iraq Resolution-Analysis; Sen. Kerry Not Running; State Of The Union-Public Response; Iraq Sectarian Violence; Cold Case; Terrorism Plot-London; Birth Control Pills; Stock Market; Helping The Grieving.

Story Lineup From This Morning's Radio News Broadcasts:
ABC: Senate Committee-Iraq Resolution; Cheney-Defends Iraq Strategy On CNN; Senate Committee-Petraeus Nomination; Baghdad-Motorcycle Bomb; Chávez-Castro; MO-Powerball Lottery Winner; Tokyo Stock Exchange; R&B Singer Brandy-Car Accident Investigation; Noriega-Panama Return; CareerBuilder.com Job Satisfaction Survey.
CBS: House Republicans-Strategy Session; Senate Committee-Iraq Resolution; Libby Trial; MS-42-Year-Old Racial Murder Case; IN-Abducted Woman; John Kerry-2008 Plans.
NPR: Bush-Missouri; John Kerry-2008 Plans; Iraqi Court Puts Off Death Penalty Decision On Saddam Deputy; Baghdad-Motorcycle Bomb; Congress-Airlines Merger; US Ambassador To Canada-Terrorist Watch List Controversy; Georgian Authorities Arrest Man For Trying To Sell Uranium; Putin-India.

WASHINGTON'S SCHEDULE:

Today's Events In Washington.
White House:

PRESIDENT BUSH — Tours Saint Luke's East-Lee's Summit, Lee's Summit, Mo.; participates in a roundtable on healthcare initiatives. Saint Luke's East-Lee's Summit, Lee's Summit, Mo.

VICE PRESIDENT CHENEY — No public schedule.

US Senate: 9:15 a.m. FOREIGN RELATIONS _ Full Committee. Hearing on Iraqi reconstrtuction strategy. State Department Iraq Coordinator David Satterfield. Location: Room 216, Hart.

9:30 a.m. ARMED SERVICES _ full Committee. Hearing on the futurte in Iraq. Former Defense Secretary William Perry, Dennis Ross of the Washington Institute for Near East Policy, retired Gen. John Keane, former Army vice chief of staff. Location: Room 106, Dirksen.

9:30 a.m. BANKING, HOUSING AND URBAN AFFAIRS _ Full Committee. Hearing on billing, marketing and disclosure practices of the credit card industry and their impact on consumers. Location: Room 538, Dirksen.

9:30 a.m. ENERGY AND NATURAL RESOURCES _ Full Committee. Hearing on oil and gas resources on the Outer Continental Shelf and areas available for leasing in the Gulf of Mexico. Assistant Interior Secretary Stephen Allred, Chairman and CEO J. Larry Nichols of Devon Energy, New Jersey Environmental Protection Commissioner Lisa Jackson, Chevron Corp. Vice President Paul Siegele, Athen Manuel of the Sierra Club, Majorie McKeithen of the Louisiana Mineral Resources Department. Location: Room 366, Dirksen.

9:30 a.m. INDIAN AFFAIRS _ Full Committee. Organizational meeting. Location: Room 485, Russell.

10 a.m. BUDGET _ Full Committee. Hearing on the budget and the CBO outlook. CBO Director Peter Orszag. Location: Room 608, Dirksen.

10 a.m. JUDICIARY _ Full Committee. Organizational meeting, and consideration of pending judicial nominations. Location: Room 226, Dirksen.

2:30 p.m. FOREIGN RELATIONS _ full Committee. Hearing on political strategy in Iraq. Laith Kubba of the National Endowment for Democracy, Ahmed Hashim of the Naval War College, Qubad Talabani of the Kurdistan Regional Government, and Toby Dodge of the International Institute for Strategic Studies. Location: Room 216, Hart.

2:30 p.m. HOMELAND SECURITY AND GOVENRMENTAL AFFAIRS _ Oversight and Government Management, the Federal Workforce and the District of Columbia Subcommittee. Hearing on the federal government's efforts to develop a foreign language strategy. Assistant Air Force Secretary Michael Dominguez, Holly Kuzmich of the Education Department, Everette Jordan of the FBI, Rita Oleksak of the American Council on the Teaching of Foreign Language, Michael Petro of the Committee for Economic Development, and Diane Birckbichler of the

DOJ_NMG_0121262

Foreign Language Center at Ohio State University. Location: Room 342, Dirksen.

2:30 p.m. SELECT INTELLIGENCE _ Full Committee. Hearing on intelligence revision proposals regarding the FBI and Homeland Security. Deputy FBI Direcvtor John Pistole, Charles Allen of DHS, D.C. Police Chief Cathy Lanier, West Virginia Public Safety Secretary James Spears. Location: Room 219, Hart.

US House: No Scheduled Events.

Other: MAYORS _ The United States Conference of Mayors holds its 75th Winter Meeting. Highlights: 8 a.m. Mayors and Business Leaders Plenary Breakfast featuring awards presentations and address by Sen. Hilary Rodham Clinton, D-N.Y. 9:30 a.m. Children, Health and Human Services Standing Committee, with Sen. Jack Reed. 12 p.m. News conference on climate protection, with Mayors Douglas Palmer of Trenton, Manuel Diaz of Miami, Greg Nickels of Seattle, Rep. Edward Markey, others. 12:30 p.m. - 2 p.m. Luncheon, featuring release of Report: 2007 U.S. Metro Economies: Engines of Americas Growth, with Kwame M. Kilpatrick, Mayor of Detroit, chairman, US Conference of Mayors, Council for the New American City; presentation: 2006 Municipal Water Conservation Achievement Awards, with Martin J. Chavez, Mayor of Albuquerque; Mayor Dan Coody of Fayetteville; Donald L. Correll, president & CEO. American Water; announcement of the 2007 City Water Taste Test Competition. 2 p.m. News conference on poverty in America, with Los Angeles Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa, Chicago Mayor Richard Daley, Miami Mayor Manuel Diaz, Detroit Mayor Kwame Kilpatrick, others. 2:30 p.m. - 3 p.m. Plenary session with address by Sen. Norm Coleman, R-Minn. Location: Capital Hilton, 16th and K Sts. NW.

HEALTH CARE _ Families USA holds its annual Health Action Conference. Highlights: 9 a.m. - 10:30 a.m. Opening plenary session with Sen. Barack Obama, D-Ill.; and Uwe Reinhardt, Professor of Economics & Public Affairs, Princeton University. 12:30 p.m. - 2:30 p.m. Lunch with Sen. Gordon Smith, R-Ore., and announcement of ``When An Apple a Day Isn't Enough" National Essay Contest Grand-Prize Winners. 2:15 p.m. Plenary with Sen. Sherrod Brown, D-Ohio. Location: Renaissance Mayflower Hotel, 1127 Connecticut Ave. NW.

INDIAN COUNTRY _ 8:30 a.m. The National Congress of American Indians, others, host an Indian Country Congressional Breakfast, with a panel discussion with Sen. Byron Dorgan, former Sen. Ben Nighthorse Campbell, others. Location: Room 385, Russell.

LEGAL REFORM _ 9 a.m. The Washington Legal Foundation sponsors a briefing on the state and federal civil justice reform agenda for 2007, with Victor Schwartz, Chair, Public Policy Group, Shook, Hardy and Bacon, Steven Hantler, Assistant General Counsel, Daimler Chrysler, and President Sherman Hoyce of the American Tort Reform Association. Location: 2009 Massachusetts Ave. NW.

KASHMIR _ 10:30 a.m. - 12 p.m. The Brookings Institution hosts a panel discussion with Navnita Chadha Behera and other leading experts to discuss her new book, ``Demystifying Kashmir," and its policy recommendations. Behera will discuss the upcoming meeting between Prime Minister Singh and President Musharraf, the effect this meeting will have on the peace process, and the internal politics of Kashmir on both sides of the line of control. Participants include: Thomas Pickering, former U.S. ambassador to India; Hasan Askari Rizvi, former visiting professor of Pakistan studies, Columbia University; and Ashley Tellis, senior associate, Carnegie Endowment for International Peace. Location: Brookings Institution, Falk Auditorium, 1775 Massachusetts Ave. NW.

IRAN-NUCLEAR _ 12 p.m. The Cato Institute holds a briefing on Iran's nuclear program and its costs and benefits regarding American policy, with Ted Galen Carpenter of the institute and Justin Logan of the institute. Location: Room B-354, Rayburn.

OMAN _ 12 p.m. Amb. Hunaina Sultan Ahmed Al Mughairy, the first woman to represent an Arab nation as an ambassador in Washington, gives a lecture on promoting economic growth in the Arab world, sponsored by George Washington University. Location: City View Room, 7th floor, 1957 E St. NW.

US COURTS-INTERNATIONAL _ 12 p.m. - 2 p.m. The American Society of International Law, in conjunction with the Washington Foreign Law Society, hosts a luncheon talk on the use of foreign and international law in U.S. courts by Dr. Rubens Medina, Law Librarian, Director of Legal Research, and Director of the Global Legal Information Network at the Law Library of Congress. Location: City Club of Washington, Columbia Square, 555 13th St. NW.

WAR CHANGES _ 2 p.m. - 4 p.m. The Straus Military Reform Project holds a press briefing on retired Army Maj. Donald E. Vandergriff's newest work ``Raising the Bar: Creating and Nurturing Adaptability to Deal with the Changing Face of War." Location: Choate Room, first floor, Carnegie Building, 1779 Massachusetts Ave. NW.

HOMELAND SECURITY _ 3 p.m. Homeland Security Civil Rights and Civil Liberties Director Daniel Sutherland presents the ``Introduction to Arab American and Muslim American Cultures for DHS Personnel." Location: American-Arab Anti Discrimination Committee, 1732 Wisconsin Ave. NW.

HOLOCAUST DENIAL _ 4:30 p.m. The Holocaust Museum and the State Department hold a briefing on U.S. efforts to combat denial of the Holocaust through the United Nations. Participants include Deputy Assistant Secretary of State Mark Lagon. Location: Classroom B, Holocaust Museum.

DOJ_NMG_0121263

THE MIDDLE CLASS _ 6 p.m. - 8 p.m. There will be a party celebrating the the publication of Thom Hartmanns Book, ``Screwed: The Undeclared War Against the Middle Class and What We Can Do About It." Location: Virginia Room, second floor, Renaissance Mayflower Hotel, 1127 Connecticut Ave. NW.

IRAQ _ 6:30 p.m. George Washington University sponsors a town hall meeting on the future in Iraq, with security experts, others, including Christopher Kojm of the 9/11 Discourse Project. Location: Room 213, 1957 E St. NW.

Copyright 2007 by the Bulletin News Network, Inc. Reproduction without permission prohibited. Editorial content is drawn from thousands of newspapers, national magazines, national and local television programs, and radio broadcasts. The Attorney General's News Briefing is published five days a week for the Office of Public Affairs by BulletinNews, which creates custom news briefings for government and corporate leaders and also publishes the White House Bulletin, Frontrunner and Washington Morning Update. We can be found on the Web at BulletinNews.com, or called at (703) 749-0040.

USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs

From:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Sent:	Thursday, January 25, 2007 8:10 AM
To:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Subject:	Department of Justice News Clips for Thursday, January 25, 2007
Attachments:	dojclips070125.pdf; dojclips070125.doc

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE NEWS CLIPS

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, US DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: THURSDAY, JANUARY 25, 2007 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Gonzales Says The Constitution Doesn't Guarantee Habeas Corpus (SFC) ... 4
Op-Ed: Specter V. Gonzales (WEEKST) ... 5
The Hair-splitter In Chief (FWST) ... 7
Judge: Lawyer Leaked Padilla Transcripts (AP) ... 8
Georgian Sting Seizes Bomb Grade Uranium (AP) ... 9
Georgia Says It Blocked Smuggling Of Arms-Grade Uranium (NYT) ... 10

Homeland Response:

Man Pleads Not Guilty To Running Over People In UNC Attack (AP) ... 11
Screening Provisions Unlikely To Survive (AP) ... 11
Bill Would Raise Taxes To Fund Security (WT) ... 12
Lockheed Chosen For ID Contract (WP) ... 13
New Orleans Looks Beyond State Of The Union Snub (LAT) ... 13
La. Gov.: Bush Forgetting Katrina (AP) ... 14
Big Easy Makes Way For New Recovery Czar (CSM) ... 14
Flood Coverage Tough To Enforce (USAT) ... 16

War News:

Biden Seeks Wider Support For Measure Against 'Surge' (WSJ) 16
Bush Iraq Plan Is Condemned By Senate Panel (NYT) ... 17
Bush Rebuke Advances (WT) ... 18
Senators Say 'No' On Bush Iraq Plan (USAT) ... 19
Senate Committee Approves Resolution Against Troop Surge (LAT) ... 20
Senators Rebuff Bush On Troop Plan (WP) ... 21
Bush Fails To Stem Erosion Of Authority (FT) ... 23
Senate Committee Repudiates Bush On Iraq (AP) ... 24
Senate Panel Passes Iraq Resolution (HILL) ... 25
No Resolution To Biden's Talk Show (WP) ... 26
Large Rally Planned Saturday On Mall (WP) ... 27
Senators-in-Chief (WSJ) ... 28
Talking Ourselves Into Defeat (WSJ) ... 29
Senators Approve Petraeus Nomination (WP/AP) ... 31
Bush Seeks Action On Iraq Confirmations (AP) ... 31
Congress's Iraq Quagmire (WP) ... 31
Defending Iraq War, Defiant Cheney Cites "Enormous Successes" (WP) ... 32
Cheney: Situation In Iraq Not Hopeless (AP) ... 33
Cheney Defends Actions In Iraq (LAT) ... 34
Cheney Increasingly On The Defensive (MCT) ... 35
Rumsfeld's Transition Raises Questions (WT) ... 36
Pentagon Cuts Stop-loss (HILL) ... 36
Bush Plans New Focus On Afghan Recovery (WP) ... 37
Pakistani Premier Faults Afghans For Taliban Woes On Border (NYT) ... 39
Troops Battle Insurgents In Central Baghdad (WP) ... 39
Street Battles Kill 30 Militants (WT/AP) ... 41
U.S., Iraqi Forces Work To Tame 'Sniper Alley' (LAT) ... 41
In A New Joint U.S.-Iraqi Patrol, The Americans Go First (NYT) 42
Iraqi Official Offers Terms From Militia To Avoid Fight (NYT) ... 43
Palestinians Under Pressure To Leave Iraq (WP) ... 44
Breaking The Clinch (NYT) ... 46
Crash Killed Most Guard Troops In Single Incident In 50 Years (USAT) ... 46
U.S. Military Tests A Nonlethal Weapon That Fires Heat Rays (NYT/AP) ... 47
Boost Military Spending (WT) ... 47

DOJ:

Authority For Office Disputed (ADG) ... 48
Appointment Called Unconstitutional (LAT) ... 49
Lawyer Challenges Griffin Appointment As U.S. Attorney (AP) .. 50
Editorial: Political Meddling With Justice (NYT) ... 50
Dropping Like Flies (HC) ... 51
Unisys To Continue Justice Asset Tracking System Work (WASHTECH) ... 51

Corporate Scandals:

Ex-Enron Executive Begins 18-month Prison Term (HC) ... 52

Criminal Law:

Witness: Libby Part Of Leak Plan (USAT) ... 52
Ex-CIA Official Testifies About Libby's Calls (WP) ... 53
Ex-Officials Testify They Informed Libby Of The Identity Of A C.I.A. Operative (NYT) ... 54
Libby Defense Says Witnesses Also Suffered Memory Lapses (LAT) ... 55
At The Libby Trial, Hints Of Intrigue And Betrayal (NYT) ... 57
Cities See Crime Surge As Threat To Their Revival (USAT) ... 58

Navy Contractor Jailed In Alleged Kidnapping Of Mexican Girl (NBCSD) ... 61
Rape Scene With 12-year-old Actress Stirs Debate (AP) ... 61
Former Treasurer Sentenced To Prison (AP) ... 62
Another Memphis Cop Snared In Operation: Tarnished Blue (WMC) ... 62
Neteller Founder Pledges To Fight Charges (FT) ... 63
UC Riverside Official Is Indicted In Bribery Case (LAT) ... 63
Feds Probing Pirro - Again (NYDN) ... 64
Naples Man Convicted Of Stealing Patient Information From Cleveland Clinic (NAPLESN) ... 64
Man Convicted Of Using Stolen Patient Data From Hospital (BRAH) ... 65
'Ambassador To Cash' Convicted In Con (CHIT) ... 65
Metro Briefs (CHIST) ... 66
Manhattan: Guilty Plea In Defrauding Of Priests (NYT) ... 67
Shooting Suspects Led Quiet Lives (AP) ... 67
Stunned Friends Laud The Men They Know Now (SFC) ... 68
THE DEATH OF SGT. JOHN YOUNG Ex-militant Seen As Likely To Testify At Cohorts' Trial (SFC) ... 70
Convicted NY Cop Killer Stole Pennsylvania Man's Identity (AP) 71
Documents Dispute Delays Coke Secrets Trial (AJC) ... 72
Testimony Delayed In Coca-Cola Trial (AP) ... 72
Coca-Cola Trial Halted As U.S., Company Seek To Shield Secrets (AR/BLOOM) ... 73
Killer's Statement Won't Lead To Charges (AP) ... 73
Deal Struck Over Jeffs' Evidence? (DESERET) ... 73
Jurors Hear Closings In Case Against Abortion Provider's Killer (AP) ... 74
3rd Dallas Sibling Gets Prison Over Katrina Relief Theft (DMN/AP) ... 75
New Ethics Charges For N.C. Prosecutor (USAT) ... 75
More Ethics Charges Brought Against Official In Duke Case (NYT) ... 76
Convicted Con Artist Tells How He Could Steal Your Home (USAT) ... 77
Prosecutors Want DeLay Charge Reinstated (AP) ... 79
Closing The Revolving Door (NYT) ... 80

Civil Law:

PBS&J Pays More Than $6.4M To Settle Claims (MH) ... 80
Claims Against Six Ex-FBI Agents Dropped (BOS) ... 81

Civil Rights:

Ex-deputy Arrested In 1964 Race Case (AP) ... 82
Former Mississippi Lawman Charged In 1964 Slayings Of 2 Black Teens (USAT) ... 83
Mississippi Man Arrested In Killing Of 2 Blacks In '64 (NYT) ... 85
State, Federal Law Enforcement To Monitor Police-involved Shootings In DeKalb County (AP) ... 86
DeKalb Police Shootings To Be Monitored (AJC) ... 86
Cleveland Officer Investigated On Claim He Beat Suspect (CLPD) ... 88
Female Former Agent Testifies In Case Against FBI (MINNST) 88
Port Chester Attacks Federal Lawsuit On Election System (NYJN) ... 89
NAACP Presses U.S. On Heart Drug (WSJ) ... 90

Antitrust:

Delta Supporters Pack Senate Hearing In DC Grinstein, Parker Both Testify On US Airways Takeover Bid (AJC) ... 91
Senators Worry Airline Deals Hurt Competition, Consumers (WSJ) ... 92
Air Merger Faces Flak From Senate Panel (USAT) ... 93
US Airways Defends Its Plan To Buy Delta (WP) ... 94
Senators Wary Of Hostile Bid For Delta (FT) ... 94
Rumors Of Delta Merger With Northwest Are False, Airline CEO Tells Congress (DEN) ... 95
CME To Dominate Management Of CME-CBOT (AP) ... 96
TRADE WINDS In Call To Deregulate Business, A Global Twist (WSJ) ... 97
Juror Dismissed In Microsoft Trial (AP) ... 100
ERG Denies Conspiring To Fix Fuel Prices (AP) ... 100
EU Steps Up Anti-cartel Crusade With Record Fine (AFP) ... 101
Norway Declares Apple's ITunes Illegal (FT) ... 101
Siemens Plans To Buy UGS For $3.5bn (FT) ... 102
Siemens To Buy UGS As Part Of Overhaul (WSJ) ... 103
Dispute Threatens CSN's Bid For Corus (FT) ... 103

Environment:

Bush Makes Sales Pitch For Proposal On Energy (NYT) ... 104
President Travels To Promote Emphasis On Alternative Fuels (USAT) ... 104
Bush Calls For Cleaner Federal Vehicles (LAT) ... 105
Bush Calls Biofuels "An Opportunity" (DELNJ) ... 106
Battle Lines Drawn On Fuel Economy (WP) ... 106
Ethanol Industry Gets A Boost From Bush (WP) ... 107
Deck's Stacked Against Ethanol These Days (USAT) ... 108
U.S. Car Makers Stand To Gain From Bush Plans (WSJ) ... 108
Bush Welcomed To Climate Debate (WT) ... 110
Merkel Calls For Challenging Emissions Controls (FT) ... 111
Whitman: Bush Missed Chance (HILL) ... 112
Energy Rhetoric, And Reality (NYT) ... 112
Fuel For Thought (LAT) ... 113
Environmentalists Angry As Navy Gets OK To Use Sonar (FINDLAW/AP) ... 114
Court Rejects Senator's Bid To Eliminate Fish Agency (WP) ... 114

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

19 Arrested In Federal 'Ragdoll' Investigation (FRHN) ... 115
NFL Toughens Drug-testing Rules (LAT/AP) ... 116
N.F.L. And Union To Strengthen Steroid Testing (NYT) ... 117
NFL, Union Beef Up Drug Program (WP) ... 118
NFL, Union Agree On Tougher Testing For Performance Enhancers (USAT) ... 119
Column: NFL Steps Up With Drug Testing (NYT/AP) ... 120
Prosecutor Stepping Down: Kevin Ryan Confident He Did Job (USAT) ... 121
BALCO Investigation Timeline (USAT) ... 123

DOJ_NMG_0121267

Coalition Meeting In Oakland Vows To Focus Gang Crime (SFC) ... 128
Ex-ATF Agent Says She Feared Corrupt Cop (CHIT) ... 128
Berwick Woman Sentenced In Federal Firearms Case (FDD). 129

Immigration:

GOP Renews "Amnesty" Defiance (WT) ... 130

Tax:

Tax Preparation Firm Banned From Practice (BUFFNEWS) ... 130
Rich States, Poor States (WSJ) ... 131

Congress-Administration:

Experts Examine Bush Health Plan (WP) ... 132
Bush Plan Spotlights Uneven Tax Treatment Of Health Benefits (USAT) ... 133
Bush's Gambit On Health Insurance (CSM) ... 134
Bush Health Plan Shifts Onus To The Consumer (WSJ) ... 135
Michael Leavitt (CSM) ... 136
Credit Offer (WP) ... 137
Congress Office Forecasts Drop In U.S. Deficit (NYT) ... 138
Surpluses Could Be Just Promises (USAT) ... 139
It's A Balanced Budget Or Tax Cuts, Report Says (LAT) ... 140
For What It's Worth, CBO Sees Zero Deficit (WP) ... 140
Tax Decisions Could Affect Deficit Outlook (WSJ) ... 141
CBO Projects Deficit Of $172 Billion In '07 (WT) ... 142
War Costs Extend Budget Deficit Gap (AP) ... 142
Byrd Fires Warning On Spending (RC) ... 143
Bush Proposes Broadening The No Child Left Behind Act (NYT)144
Bush Proposal Revives Private-school Vouchers (USAT) ... 145
Spellings Stands Firm On 'Real School Choice' (WT) ... 146
Feds Try To Build On No Child Left Behind Act (PPG) ... 147
Bush Proposes Adding Private School Vouchers To 'No Child' Law (WP) ... 148
New Education Reforms Get Mixed Reviews (AP) ... 149
Bush School Rule Changes Affect Chicago (CHIT) ... 150
What Can Bush Achieve In Two Years? (CSM) ... 151
Senate Firefighters (WP) ... 152
Democrats Hedge On Bipartisan Pledge (WT) ... 153
The Democrats' Rude Rebuff (WP) ... 154
Bush's Conservative Base Frets Key Issues Are Losing Focus (WSJ) ... 155
President's Sin Of Omission? (WP) ... 156
"Even More Of A Hodgepodge Than Usual" (WSJ) ... 156
Long On Rhetoric, Short On Sorrow (NYT) ... 158
Bush, Democrats Play "Old Politics." Voters Want "New" (RC) 159
Bush Expands His Presidency, May Gain Credibility On Iraq (HILL) ... 160
For Webb, Bouquets And A Few Brickbats (WP) ... 161
Reagan Democrat (WP) ... 162
University Holds Meeting On Bush Library (WP) ... 163
President To Request Fast Track Next Week (HILL) ... 163
Tax Break Talks Slow Minimum Wage Hike (AP) ... 165
Effort To Move On Minimum Wage Bill Falters In Senate (NYT)166
Roundtable Setup Left Some Republicans Feeling Like Squares (WP) ... 166
Desire To Be In Driver's Seat Takes Back Seat At Auto Show (WP) ... 167
Capitol Hill Power Shift Could Aid Philip Morris (WSJ) ... 168
House Restores Some Voting Rights To Congressional Delegates (NYT) ... 170
Delegates Gain Limited Voting Rights (WP) ... 170
GOP May Sue Over Delegates' Vote (RC) ... 171
Political Confrontation In Church For Lawmaker (AP) ... 172
Senate Shows Its Age; Health Problems Pose Challenge For Governing (POL) ... 173
McCain's Health And Age Present Campaign Challenge (POL)175
FEDERAL DIARY: Union Suit Against Intern Program May Revive Debate On Fairness In Hiring (WP) ... 176
The Reliable Source (WP) ... 177

Other News:

Dow Hits Record, Its 26th Since October (NYT/AP) ... 179
Tech Earnings Reports Restore Investors' Confidence, Lift Nasdaq (WP/AP) ... 180
Stocks Surge On Optimism And New Cash (WSJ) ... 180
Incomes And Inequality: What The Numbers Don't Tell Us (NYT) ... 181
Kerry Won't Run For President In '08 (BOS) ... 182
The Money Just Wasn't There For Kerry (POL) ... 183
'Not The Time' For Kerry In '08 (BOSH) ... 184
Kerry Will Not Seek White House In 2008 (AP) ... 185
US Senator Kerry Says He Won't Relaunch Bid For White House (AFP) ... 186
Kerry Says He'll Sit Out 2008 Race (LAT) ... 186
Kerry Will Not Enter Presidential Race (NYT) ... 187
In '08, Kerry To Run For Senate Not White House (HILL) ... 188
Kerry Rules Out 2008 Run For President (WP) ... 189
Kerry To Forgo White House Bid (WT) ... 190
Obama Debunks Claim About Islamic School (AP) ... 191
Obama Fires Back (HILL) ... 192
Obama's Appeal To Blacks Remains An Open Question (WP) 192
Obama On Tightrope In Bid For Black Vote (WT) ... 194
McCain Trounces Rivals In State Poll, Trails Giuliani Nationally (PBJ) ... 195
Big States' Plan For Earlier Primaries Scrambles Race (NYT) 196
Gingrich Backs English Push As Official Language (WT) ... 197
For Democrats, Bergen County Spells Success (RC) ... 198
Gore Film Sparks Parents' Anger (WP) ... 199
Steele To Head GOP Funding Outfit, Start Firm (WT) ... 200
Reality, At Last, In Richmond (WP) ... 201
Over A Barrel: The Global Scramble For Energy Security (WSJ)201
Bolton: U.S. Following Flawed Iran Plan (AP) ... 202
Details On Iran's Activity Pledged (LAT) ... 202
Iran Receives Russian Defense Missiles (AP) ... 203
Olmert Calls For Action Against Iran (AP) ... 204
U.S. Picks An Inauspicious Time To Restart Mideast Talks (NYT) ... 205

DOJ_NMG_0121268

Pakistan President Floats Muslim Mideast Peace Initiative (AFP) ... 206
US To More Than Triple Aid To Lebanon (AP) ... 206
Donors Gather To Help Lebanon's Government (NYT) ... 207
Lebanon's Pro-Western Premier Seeks Aid (AP) ... 208
U.S. Opposes Iranian, Saudi Meddling In Crisis (WT) ... 209
US Unveils 770 Million Dollar Aid Plan For Lebanon (AFP) ... 210
My Country Needs Help (WSJ) ... 211
Hezbollah Won't Topple The Lebanese Government, Its Leader Says (NYT) ... 212
U.S. Launches New Airstrike In Somalia (AP) ... 212
Moment Of Opportunity In Somalia (NYT) ... 213
Rice Dismisses Report North Korea Helping Iran Prepare Nuke Test (AFP) ... 213
Greek Militants Claim Embassy Attack (AP) ... 214
British Defence Ministry Denies Rift With US After Diplomat's Comments (AFP) ... 214
Chinese Leader To Visit Sudan For Talks On Darfur Conflict (NYT) ... 215
Analyst Rebuked Over His Support Of Spy For China (WT) ... 216
Blackmailing By Journalists In China Seen As 'Frequent' (WP) 217
Debris In Space (WSJ) ... 219
China's Missile Message (WP) ... 220
Russia Hits U.S. Anti-missile Plans (WT/AP) ... 220
Putin In India: Visit Is Sign Of Durability Of Old Ties (NYT) ... 221
Smuggler's Plot Highlights Fear Over Uranium (NYT) ... 222
Death Of Spy Who Ingested Polonium Spurs Drug Makers (WSJ) ... 224
Just How Good Is Globalization? (WSJ) ... 225
Liberians Love Their Iron Lady, For Now (LAT) ... 226
OPEC President Takes In Stride Decline In Prices (WSJ) ... 228

Online Version
Visit www.bulletinnews.com/justice for searchable archive, interactive story index, and links to complete stories where appropriate.

TERRORISM NEWS:

Gonzales Says The Constitution Doesn't Guarantee Habeas Corpus (SFC)

By Bob Egelko, Chronicle Staff Writer
San Francisco Chronicle, January 24, 2007
Attorney general's remarks on citizens' right astound the chair of Senate judiciary panel

One of the Bush administration's most far-reaching assertions of government power was revealed quietly last week when Attorney General Alberto Gonzales testified that habeas corpus -- the right to go to federal court and challenge one's imprisonment -- is not protected by the Constitution.

"The Constitution doesn't say every individual in the United States or every citizen is hereby granted or assured the right of habeas," Gonzales told Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., during a Senate Judiciary Committee hearing Jan. 17.

Gonzales acknowledged that the Constitution declares "habeas corpus shall not be suspended unless ... in cases of rebellion or invasion the public safety may require it." But he insisted that "there is no express grant of habeas in the Constitution."

Specter was incredulous, asking how the Constitution could bar the suspension of a right that didn't exist -- a right, he noted, that was first recognized in medieval England as a shield against the king's power to dispatch troublesome subjects to royal dungeons.

Later in the hearing, Gonzales described habeas corpus as "one of our most cherished rights" and noted that Congress had protected that right in the 1789 law that established the federal court system. But he never budged from his position on the absence of constitutional protection -- a position that seemingly would leave Congress free to reduce habeas corpus rights or repeal them altogether.

Gonzales did not propose any such drastic rollback and devoted most of his discussion to fending off senatorial attacks on a law signed by President Bush last October. That law included a provision stripping federal courts of authority to hear habeas corpus suits by noncitizens classified by the government as "enemy combatants." Specter and Sen. Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., the Judiciary Committee chairman, are sponsoring legislation to undo the restriction.

But critics on both ends of the ideological spectrum said the attorney general was claiming a broader and more chilling power.

"This is the key protection that people have if they're held in violation of the law," said Erwin Chemerinsky, a Duke University law professor who has criticized the administration's actions on civil liberties. "If there's no habeas corpus, and if the government wants to pick you or me off the street and hold us indefinitely, how do we get our release?"

DOJ_NMG_0121269

Chemerinsky was joined by Douglas Kmiec, a Pepperdine University law professor and former Justice Department official under Presidents Ronald Reagan and George H.W. Bush.

If Gonzales' view prevailed, Kmiec said, "one of the basic protections of human liberty against the powers of the state would be embarrassingly absent from our constitutional system."

Justice Department spokesman Brian Roehrkasse said this week that Gonzales stood by his remarks but was asserting only that the text of the Constitution does not guarantee habeas corpus. The attorney general recognizes, Roehrkasse said, that the Supreme Court has declared "the Constitution protects (habeas corpus) as it existed at common law" in England. Any such rights, he added, would not apply to foreigners held as enemy combatants.

Habeas corpus was recognized in English law at least as early as the Magna Carta, in 1215, and perhaps earlier. In the United States, it refers to bringing a prisoner's case before a federal judge, who has the power to order the government to release anyone who is being held illegally.

It has become an issue in Bush's efforts to hold military captives at the U.S. naval base in Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, with little or no access to civilian courts. The Supreme Court ruled in 2004 that that those prisoners could file habeas corpus claims in court, rejecting the administration's argument that inmates held outside the United States had no such right. That ruling was based on the court's interpretation of laws passed by Congress and did not discuss whether Guantanamo inmates had a constitutional right to habeas corpus.

The distinction is potentially crucial, because Congress, in the law signed last October, prohibited federal courts from reviewing habeas corpus suits by Guantanamo prisoners or any other noncitizens held as enemy combatants. The law's validity depends on whether the Supreme Court concludes that the prisoners' constitutional rights are being violated.

The issue of habeas corpus came up during last week's hearing when Specter asked Gonzales how a congressional statute could withdraw the right "when there's an express constitutional provision that it can't be suspended and an explicit Supreme Court holding that it applies to Guantanamo alien detainees?"

The court ruled only on the right to habeas corpus that was created by statute, Gonzales replied. He then asserted that the Constitution does not contain any express right of habeas corpus, only "a prohibition against taking it away."

The issue extends far beyond Guantanamo.

The Supreme Court has interpreted federal judges' powers of habeas corpus to apply to prison systems around the nation and the legality of convictions in state as well as federal court.

For example, federal judges, who are appointed for life, regularly invoke habeas corpus when overturning convictions or death sentences of state inmates, overruling decisions by elected state judges.

Bruce Fein, a former Reagan Justice Department attorney who has become an outspoken critic of the Bush administration, noted that the day before his Judiciary Committee appearance, Gonzales had denounced "activist judges" and advised them to stay out of national security matters.

Gonzales' comments to the committee on habeas corpus, Fein said, contained a message that "Congress doesn't have to let them (judges) decide national security matters."

"It's part of an attempt to create the idea that during conflicts, the three branches of government collapse into one, and it is the president," Fein said.

What Gonzales, Specter said

Excerpts from the exchange between Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., at a Senate Judiciary Committee hearing Jan. 17:

Gonzales: There is no express grant of habeas in the Constitution. There's a prohibition against taking it away. ...

Specter: Wait a minute. Wait a minute. The Constitution says you can't take it away except in cases of rebellion or invasion. Doesn't that mean you have the right of habeas corpus unless there's an invasion or rebellion?

Gonzales: I meant by that comment, the Constitution doesn't say every individual in the United States or every citizen is hereby granted or assured the right to habeas. Doesn't say that. It simply says the right of habeas corpus shall not be suspended except...

Specter: You may be treading on your interdiction and violating common sense, Mr. Attorney General.

Source: Senate Judiciary Committee transcript

E-mail Bob Egelko at begelko@sfchronicle.com.

Op-Ed: Specter V. Gonzales (WEEKST)

By Adam J. White

Weekly Standard, January 25, 2007

Senator Specter still misunderstands habeas corpus.

FOR ARLEN SPECTER, limits on the right of Guantanamo prisoners to petition for the writ of habeas corpus in federal courts have long been a sore point. When Alberto Gonzales appeared before the Senate Judiciary Committee last week, Pennsylvania's senior senator grilled him on two interrelated subjects: whether the Constitution expressly guarantees the right to petition federal courts for writs of habeas corpus, and whether the Supreme Court's recent Rasul decision affirmed such a constitutional right.

On the former question, Specter received Gonzales's answers with flippant incredulity, but in fact both sides of the argument enjoy substantial support. And on the latter question, Specter's ire was completely inappropriate, for his description of Rasul bore absolutely no resemblance to the Court's decision.

WITH ITS ROOTS IN ENGLAND'S Magna Carta and Habeas Corpus Act, the writ of habeas corpus--"the Great Writ"--affords fundamental protection against unlawful detention. The writ is referenced by name in Article I, Section 9 of the Constitution: "The privilege of the writ of habeas corpus shall not be suspended, unless when in cases of rebellion or invasion the public safety may require it."

Specter pressed Gonzales on the constitutionality of Congress's 2005 elimination of habeas corpus rights for Guantanamo prisoners. In answering that the 2005 law did not destroy any rights afforded detainees by the Constitution (rather than by mere statute), Gonzales stated, "there is no express grant of habeas in the Constitution. There's a prohibition against taking it away."

Specter responded in disbelief:

Wait a minute. Wait a minute. The Constitution says you can't take it away except in case of rebellion or invasion. Doesn't that mean you have the right of habeas corpus unless there's an invasion or rebellion? . . . You may be treading on your interdiction and common sense, Mr. Attorney General.

Not exactly. Gonzales's answer, though not unassailable, enjoys much historical support. Although the Constitution expressly provides that the writ of habeas corpus may only be "suspended" in certain circumstances, it does not expressly provide that the writ is implemented in the first instance without an affirmative enactment by Congress.

Specter takes what may well be the more intuitive reading of the Constitution's provision: that Article I, Section 9 presumes that the privilege of habeas corpus exists absent a valid suspension. (Indeed, it's phrased in a manner similar to the First Amendment: "Congress shall make no law . . . abridging the freedom of speech," clearly presumes that there is a freedom of speech.)

But history suggests that Gonzales (whom Rolling Stone promptly deemed the "Human Constitution Shredder") may well be correct. At the 1787 constitutional convention, the first habeas provision, proposed by South Carolina's Charles Pinckney, not only limited habeas's suspension, but also expressly created the writ. The final version, though, included only the former provision; when it was presented to the States for ratification, four States criticized the lack of an express habeas grant, and proposed alternatives resembling Pinckney's.

Shortly thereafter, the first Congress enacted the Judiciary Act of 1789, expressly granting Supreme Court justices and other federal judges the authority to grant the writ. If, as Specter suggests, the Constitution itself granted the writ, then such a statute would seem utterly superfluous.

Two decades later, in Ex Parte Bollman, Chief Justice John Marshall wrote for the Court that even if Congress "felt" a Constitutional "obligation" to provide for the writ, "the power to award the writ by any of the courts of the United States, must be given by written law." The writ would be available only where, "by any statute . . . the power to award a writ of habeas corpus . . . has been given to this court."

What, then was the value of the Suspension Clause under this theory of Framer intent? Theories vary but, as constitutional scholar (and no friend of the Bush administration) Erwin Chemerinsky noted in 1987 (emphasis added), William Duker's "authoritative" history of habeas "conclude[d] that the 'provision was designed to restrict Congress from suspending state habeas for federal prisoners.'"

None of this is to say that Specter is, in the end, certainly wrong. Specter's reading of the provision certainly enjoys as much--if not more--support than Gonzales's. Again, the Constitution's mention of the writ appears to imply its existence. Furthermore, in Federalist 84, Alexander Hamilton reassured his readers that the Constitution included the "establishment" of the writ, thereby suggesting that further statutory provision was unnecessary.

Justice Scalia appears to share Hamilton's view, writing in the 2004 Hamdi case that "[t]he writ of habeas corpus was preserved in the Constitution--the only common-law writ to be explicitly mentioned." The Supreme Court's four "war on terror" cases make clear that a majority of the Court shares Specter's view that the Constitution itself does create some basic level of habeas corpus protection for some or all prisoners.

DOJ_NMG_0121271

Surely the issue is due to be debated for another 200 years. In the meantime, it's probably premature for either Specter or Gonzales to declare victory.

IMMEDIATELY BEFORE CLASHING over the terms of the Constitution, Specter and Gonzales debated the Supreme Court's 2004 decision in Rasul v. Bush, where the Court held that 18 U.S.C. s. 2241, the habeas corpus statute, extended the writ to foreigners held at Guantanamo (before Congress, responding in 2005, amended the statute).

Gonzales disagreed with Specter's assertion that in Rasul the [word deleted] Court held that the Constitution--not merely the statute--created the habeas rights of Guantanamo prisoners. Gonzales suggested that Rasul was merely a statutory--not constitutional--interpretation.

Specter tartly replied, "[w]ell, you're not right about that. It's plain on its face they're talking about the constitutional right. . . . When did you last read the case?"

But if anyone needs to re-read the case, it's Specter. The Court went to great pains to make clear that it was merely interpreting the statute, and not the Constitution. And for good reason: To turn Rasul into a constitutional question, the Court would have had to overrule Eisentrager, the 1950 case in which the Court held that the Constitution's writ did not reach prisoners held outside the United States.

Instead, the Court recognized only a statutory right:

Persons detained outside [U.S. territory] no longer need rely on the Constitution as the source of their right to federal habeas review. . . . Eisentrager plainly does not preclude the exercise of [Section] 2241 jurisdiction over petitioners' claims.

This was no surprise to the litigants because, as Justice Scalia noted in his dissent, the prisoners agreed at oral argument that the case involved no Constitutional right. The briefs of the petitioners, Rasul and Al Odah, raised no constitutional arguments. Specter couldn't have been less correct.

Adam J. White is an attorney in Washington, D.C. The views expressed here are not intended to represent the views of his employers.

The Hair-splitter In Chief (FWST)

By Linda P. Campbell

The Fort Worth Star-Telegram, January 25, 2007

Justice Robert Jackson famously wrote in 1949 that the Bill of Rights isn't "a suicide pact."

But loyalty to George W. Bush increasingly seems to be one -- at least in the way that Attorney General Alberto Gonzales reads the Constitution.

Even if you believe, as I do, that the Bush administration has upset the balance among the three branches of government by arrogating excessive authority to the executive branch, you can understand that the president's lawyers would zealously defend his power.

When Gonzales switched from White House counsel to attorney general, though, he presumably became the people's top lawyer, defender of our rights. Instead, he sounds all too often like the evader in chief, the astounder, the contradicter, the rationalizer extraordinaire.

Just last week, he told members of the Senate Judiciary Committee that White House officials had discussed whether a secret wiretapping program unilaterally ordered by the president could be conducted under the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act, which is supposed to govern that kind of information gathering.

Those discussions were had, Gonzales testified, because of "concerns raised" and "questions asked here in this committee." Odd that he should say that. Because he also has claimed that he started looking into bringing the wiretapping program under FISA as soon as he became AG in 2005, well before public disclosure of the program triggered alarms and questions from the Judiciary Committee.

But if that inconsistency eluded attention, his stubborn obtuseness about the Constitution did not.

Gonzales and Sen. Arlen Specter, a Pennsylvania Republican, got into a did so/did not debate about whether the Supreme Court's 2004 ruling in Rasul v. Bush dealt with the statutory or constitutional right of habeas corpus.

(That's the right of accused persons to have the government justify holding them in custody. The Bush administration insisted that "enemy combatants" held at the Guantanamo Bay prison had no right to challenge their imprisonment -- until the Supreme Court said in Rasul that, indeed, they could get into federal court.)

Gonzales one-upped Specter by declaring that "there is no express grant of habeas in the Constitution. There's a prohibition against taking it away."

"Wait a minute," Specter replied. "The Constitution says you can't take it away except in cases of rebellion or invasion. Doesn't that mean you have the right of habeas corpus ... unless there's an invasion or rebellion?"

Gonzales just dug deeper: "The Constitution doesn't say every individual in the United States, or every citizen, is hereby granted or assured the right to habeas. It doesn't say that. It simply says the right of habeas corpus shall not be suspended except. ..."

Later in the hearing, a perturbed Chairman Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., pointed out that many key rights in the Constitution are written in terms of not what people can do but what government can't ("Congress shall make no law ..."; "... the right of the people to keep and bear arms shall not be infringed.").

At that, Gonzales backtracked, calling habeas corpus "one of our most cherished rights" and demurring that he was "simply making an observation as to the literal language of the Constitution."

Well, the literal language in Article I, Section 9 is this: "The Privilege of the Writ of Habeas Corpus shall not be suspended, unless when in Cases of Rebellion or Invasion the public Safety may require it."

And in the Rasul ruling, Justice John Paul Stevens recognized the long history and fundamental importance of the right: "Habeas corpus is, however, 'a writ antecedent to statute, ... throwing its root deep into the genius of our common law.' ... The writ appeared in English law several centuries ago, became 'an integral part of our common-law heritage' by the time the Colonies achieved independence, ... and received explicit recognition in the Constitution."

Gonzales was right that the court based its ruling on statutory law: The justices said that the law gives federal courts jurisdiction to hear the prisoners' claims of unlawful detention.

Well, we'll just get that written out of the law, the Bush administration countered -- and did, last year.

Maybe Gonzales' hard line stems from an honest belief in a stingy reading of the Constitution -- unless, of course, provisions dealing with presidential power are involved.

Maybe he sees nothing to lose from continued myopic allegiance to the president he has served since their Texas days -- though it's questionable how much sway Gonzales has anymore. Jan Crawford Greenburg writes in her new book, Supreme Conflict, that Gonzales tried, and obviously failed, to warn Bush away from nominating fellow Texan Harriet Miers to the Supreme Court.

With his own Supreme Court ambitions certainly dashed, maybe Gonzales considers it a badge of honor to be lampooned on Comedy Central's Colbert Report.

That might be good for late-night guffaws, but it's hardly the promising future he took to Washington with him.

Judge: Lawyer Leaked Padilla Transcripts (AP)

By Curt Anderson

AP, January 25, 2007

A lawyer for suspected al-Qaida operative Jose Padilla violated a court order by leaking his wiretapped phone conversations, a judge found Wednesday while not imposing a penalty.

Instead, U.S. District Judge Marcia Cooke ordered all defense lawyers in the case to sign papers indicating they understood and would follow rules barring disclosure of certain evidence.

Cooke also said she might hold in contempt anyone who receives such prohibited material, and she specifically mentioned several reporters attending Wednesday's hearing.

"The lash is about to fall on all," Cooke said. "We're going to have a trial, as much as possible as we can, a trial on the evidence, and not on anything else."

The leaked transcripts documented seven telephone conversations on which Padilla's voice is heard that were intercepted under the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act. Defense lawyers have said that Padilla is never overheard discussing any violent acts and that many of the conversations involve family matters, casting doubt on the strength of the government's case.

The transcripts are not classified but were covered under Cooke's order barring disclosure.

Michael Caruso, one of three Miami-based public defenders on Padilla's defense team, acknowledged that one of them was responsible for providing the material to The New York Times, which published the story Jan. 4.

The leaker was identified in a sealed court filing to Cooke, but it was not made public and none of the lawyers would name the person responsible.

"This was a simple misunderstanding, an honest mistake, and it has been rectified," Caruso said. "Your honor can rest assured that this matter is at an end. There have been no further disclosures."

Prosecutors had wanted Cooke to begin a formal investigation of the disclosure.

"What was the point? It was clearly calculated to influence the jury of public opinion and try this case there," Assistant U.S. Attorney Brian Frazier said. "It was a deliberate violation."

The Times has declined to comment.

DOJ_NMG_0121273

Padilla, 36, is accused along with two others of being part of a North American cell that provided cash, supplies and recruits to Islamic extremist causes worldwide. Padilla, a U.S. citizen, was accused after his 2002 arrest of being on an al-Qaida mission to detonate a radioactive "dirty bomb" in a major U.S. city, but those allegations are not part of the Miami case.

Padilla was held without charge for 3 1/2 years at a Navy brig after President Bush designated him as an enemy combatant. He was added to the Miami case in late 2005 amid an escalating legal battle over the president's powers to indefinitely detain Padilla and others during wartime.

Padilla and his co-defendants have pleaded not guilty. Trial is scheduled to begin April 16, and that could hinge on whether Padilla is found competent. His lawyers say he is suffering mental problems stemming from his long, isolated military confinement.

Georgian Sting Seizes Bomb Grade Uranium (AP)

By Desmond Butler

AP, January 25, 2007

WASHINGTON - It was one of the most serious cases of smuggling of nuclear material in recent years: A Russian man, authorities allege, tried to sell a small amount of nuclear-bomb grade uranium in a plastic bag in his jacket pocket.

The buy that took place last summer, it turned out, was a setup by Republic of Georgia authorities, with the help of the CIA. Their quiet sting operation - neither U.S. nor Georgian officials have publicized it - is an unsettling reminder about the possibility of terrorists acquiring nuclear bomb-making material on the black market.

No evidence suggests this particular case was terrorist-related.

"Given the serious consequences of the detonation of an improvised nuclear explosive device, even small numbers of incidents involving HEU (highly enriched uranium) or plutonium are of very high concern," said Melissa Fleming of the U.N.'s International Atomic Energy Agency.

Details of the investigation, which also involved the FBI and Energy Department, were provided to The Associated Press by U.S. officials and Georgian Interior Minister Vano Merabishvili.

Authorities say they do not know how the man acquired the nuclear material or if his claims of access to much larger quantities were true. He and three Georgian accomplices are in Georgian custody and not cooperating with investigators.

Georgian attempts to trace the nuclear material since the arrest and confirm whether the man indeed had access to larger quantities have foundered from a lack of cooperation from Russia.

Merabishvili said he was revealing the story out of frustration with Russia's response and the need to illustrate the dangers of a breakdown in security cooperation in the region.

A message left with the press office of the Russian Embassy was not returned. A duty officer at the Russian Foreign Ministry told The Associated Press that there was no one authorized to comment Wednesday night.

Russia has tense relations with Georgia, like Russia a former Soviet republic. Georgia has been troubled by Russia's support for separatists in two breakaway Georgian border regions, Abkhazia and South Ossetia.

The sting was set up after Georgian authorities uncovered extensive smuggling networks while investigating criminal groups operating in the breakaway republics, Merabishvili said.

"When we sent buyers, the channels through Abkhazia and South Ossetia began to expand, and we started seeing a huge flow of materials," he said. "Sometimes it was low-grade enriched materials, but this was the first instance of highly enriched material."

According to his account, during an investigation in South Ossetia, a Georgian undercover agent posing as a rich foreign buyer made contact with the Russian seller in North Ossetia, which is part of Russia.

After the Russian offered to sell the sample, the agent rebuffed requests that the transaction occur in North Ossetia, insisting the Russian come to Tbilisi, the Georgian capital.

At a meeting in Tbilisi, the man pulled out from his pocket a plastic bag containing the material.

"He was offering this as the first stage in a deal and said he had other pieces, Merabishvili said. "We don't know if that was true."

Uranium has a low level of radioactive emission and can be transported more safely than other radioactive materials.

The man was arrested and sentenced to eight to 10 years in prison on smuggling charges. His accomplices were sentenced on lesser charges.

Russian authorities took a sample of the material but failed to offer any assistance despite requests for help from the Georgians, Merabishvili said.

DOJ_NMG_0121274

"We were ready to provide all the information, but unfortunately no one arrived from Russia, not even to interview this person," Merabishvili said. "It is surprising because it is in Russian interests to secure these materials. There are terrorist organizations in Russia who would pay huge amounts of money for this."

The Georgians asked for U.S. assistance. Agents from the FBI and the Energy Department took the material back to the United States, where it was tested by the Energy Department's National Nuclear Security Administration.

"The material was analyzed by agency nuclear experts and confirmed to be highly enriched uranium," said Bryan Wilkes, a spokesman for the agency.

Fleming, of the IAEA, said the agency was aware of the Tbilisi seizure and was expecting formal notification from Georgia soon.

The CIA would not comment on the case, and the FBI confirmed its involvement in the investigation but nothing more.

Merabishvili, who was visiting Washington this week, said he did not have some details of the investigation, including the exact date the arrest was made or the full name of the suspect. Further efforts to clarify with the Georgian Embassy were not successful.

None of the U.S. officials would confirm the weight of the seizure or its quality, but Merabishvili said it was about 100 grams (3.5 ounces) of uranium enriched by more than 90 percent.

Uranium enriched at 90 percent is weapons grade.

A nuclear bomb of a design similar to the one exploded over Hiroshima in 1945 would require about 50 kilograms (110 pounds) of uranium enriched at over 90 percent, according to Matthew Bunn, a senior research associate who focuses on nuclear theft and terrorism at Harvard University's Kennedy School of Government. Bunn said that a more sophisticated implosion type nuclear bomb would require 15 to 18 kilograms (33 to 40 pounds).

According to an IAEA database, there have been 16 previous confirmed cases in which either highly enriched uranium or plutonium have been recovered by authorities since 1993.

In most cases the recoveries have involved smaller quantities than the Tbilisi case. But in 1994, 2.72 kilograms (6 pounds) of highly enriched uranium intended for sale were seized by police in the Czech Republic. In 2003, Georgian border guards using detection devices provided by the United States caught an Armenian man with about 170 grams (5 ounces) of HEU, according to the State Department.

Fleming said examples of stolen or missing bomb-grade nuclear material, including highly enriched uranium and plutonium, are rare and troubling.

David Albright, a former U.N. weapons inspector and head of the Washington-based Institute for Science and International Security, said that lacking help from Russia, the CIA may be looking to other allies to help identify who has access to lost nuclear material.

"Russian cooperation in answering these questions is critical, but it has not been forthcoming," he said. "One way to identify who is active in trading these materials is to conduct sting operations."

Georgia Says It Blocked Smuggling Of Arms-Grade Uranium (NYT)

By Lawrence Scott Sheets And William J. Broad

New York Times, January 25, 2007

TBILISI, Georgia, Jan. 24 — Georgian authorities intercepted an illicit shipment of highly enriched uranium last January, the second seizure of weapons-grade material here in two and a half years, officials here say.

The interior minister, Ivane Merabishvili, said in a recent interview that agents had arrested a Russian man carrying 100 grams of uranium, a little under four ounces, into Georgia from Russia. The authorities had previously reported that they had arrested a man in 2003 trying to cross the border between Georgia and Armenia with 170 grams of uranium.

Although nuclear experts said neither episode involved enough material to build a nuclear weapon, the two seizures raised concerns about illicit trade in material from the nuclear operations of the former Soviet Union. These cases are believed to be the first involving smuggling of highly enriched uranium in the region in at least five years.

Russian officials did not respond to requests for comment.

This activity “in the worst-case scenario could be very detrimental to international security,” said John F. Tefft, the American ambassador to Georgia. Georgia and the United States have focused on detecting smuggling of radioactive materials across the borders of former Soviet republics like Russia and Armenia.

The 2006 smuggling case, which has not been previously reported, is expected to be noted in a report from the United Nations International Atomic Energy Agency on illicit nuclear activities, agency officials said. That report is expected to be released this week.

DOJ_NMG_0121275

Georgian and American officials said United States law enforcement and nuclear experts had been involved in the investigation of the second seizure. Richard J. Kolko, an F.B.I. spokesman, confirmed that the bureau had taken part in the inquiry but declined to elaborate.

In addition to the two cases involving enriched uranium, Mr. Merabishvili said, Georgian authorities intercepted an illicit shipment of raw uranium, or yellowcake, in August 2006.

That case involved 2.2 pounds of raw uranium that the authorities said was being smuggled from the separatist region of Abkhazia. One man was arrested, said Archil Pavlenishvili, Georgia's chief investigator for nuclear trafficking.

He said that agents had learned about the raw uranium from sources in the criminal underworld and that the investigation was continuing.

The Georgian officials said they believed that corrupt law enforcement officials in Abkhazia had helped ensure the safe passage of the shipment. Officials in Abkhazia said they had not been informed about the arrest, but they promised to assist in any investigation.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Man Pleads Not Guilty To Running Over People In UNC Attack (AP)

AP, January 25, 2007

HILLSBOROUGH, N.C. -- A man accused of trying to kill students at the University of North Carolina by driving through campus in an attack he said was intended to avenge the treatment of Muslims by the United States pleaded not guilty Wednesday.

Mohammed Taheri-Azar, 23, said three weeks ago that he wanted his case to conclude as soon as possible and had said previously he intended to plead guilty to the charges stemming from the attack in March.

James Williams, Taheri-Azar's court-appointed lawyer, declined to discuss specifics about the case. But when asked after the brief hearing why his client pleaded not guilty, he said only, "That's a very good question."

Taheri-Azar, an Iranian native who grew up in Charlotte, faces nine counts of attempted first degree murder and another nine counts of felony assault.

Nobody was seriously injured in the March incident, when investigators say Taheri-Azar, a UNC Chapel Hill graduate, drove a rented SUV through a popular campus gathering spot, hitting nine people. Minutes after the attack, Taheri-Azar called 911 to surrender.

During the 911 call, Taheri-Azar told an emergency dispatcher he wanted to "punish the government of the United States for their actions around the world." He later told investigators he intentionally rampaged through campus to "avenge the deaths of Muslims around the world."

Taheri-azar also sent dozens of letters to local media organizations. Orange County District Attorney Jim Woodall said Wednesday he may ask some of the reporters who received letters to testify in the case.

"The issue is not confidentiality," Woodall said. "The media is still just a witness if you do something publicly."

Taheri-Azar said last June that he planned to plead guilty and wanted to represent himself. He has since accepted Williams as his public defender.

Taheri-Azar is now in Raleigh's Central Prison with bond set at $5.5 million. He is due to return to court for a motions hearing March 27.

Screening Provisions Unlikely To Survive (AP)

By Beverley Lumpkin

AP, January 25, 2007

House-passed requirements for intensified screening of cargo on passenger aircraft and ship-borne goods heading toward the U.S. are unlikely to survive in the Senate, a House leader on security issues conceded Wednesday.

The provisions were part of a House bill that was ballyhooed as the first legislation to pass in the Democratic-controlled Congress this year. Approval was meant to signal the new leadership's priorities in pushing through security recommendations of the 9/11 Commission.

Rep. Bennie Thompson, D-Miss., who chairs the House Homeland Security Committee, told reporters that two key provisions of the House bill are unlikely to make it through the Senate.

"With the exception of ports and cargo screening," he said, "everything else should go through."

DOJ_NMG_0121276

In addition to the cargo-screening measures, the House bill provided funds to improve emergency communications systems, make it harder for terrorists to obtain nuclear weapons, and improve information-sharing between federal, state and local agencies.

Thompson said his staff has heard from Senate staff members about what's realistic to expect as the Senate considers the House-passed homeland security bill. It is uncertain when the Senate will begin considering its version of the measure.

The Bush administration and other opponents of the two screening proposals have said the technology does not exist to scan all U.S.-bound cargo in foreign ports for radiation, and all air cargo loaded onto passenger planes for explosives.

Critics have further complained that implementing the measures would slow global commerce to a crawl.

Homeland Security Department officials contend that through a variety of methods, they now screen all high-risk cargo, but only a small percentage is actually physically inspected.

Sen. Joe Lieberman, I-Conn., chairman of the Senate Homeland Security Committee, believes his panel's bill "will be compatible with the goals and spirit of the House bill," Lieberman spokeswoman Leslie Phillips said in a statement.

Thompson also indicated to reporters that the Senate may balk at the percentage of homeland security grants guaranteed to states as a bare minimum, before any consideration is given to the risk of a terrorist attack.

In the House bill, that percentage was agreed to as 0.25 percent. Thompson said the figure might go up to 0.50 or 0.75.

Since the terror attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, the Bush administration and the House have generally supported spending more money based on risk. The Senate, where many leaders come from smaller or rural states, have been more inclined to support traditional funding formulas that guarantee some share of the pot to all, irrespective of risk.

Thompson also indicated he hopes that by the mid-March anniversary of the Madrid, Spain, train bombing of 2004, his committee will be able to introduce legislation in the House to provide rail security grant funding.

"We clearly do not do nearly enough to secure passenger-rail traffic," he said.

Meanwhile, a Government Accountability Office report on progress made since the Sept. 11 attacks found potential weaknesses in the handling of radioactive materials.

During an undercover test, a small amount of radioactive material was carried across the border by GAO investigators with phony documents. GAO is Congress' investigative arm.

Even though the radiation monitors properly signaled the presence of radioactive material, the investigators were able to enter the U.S. because of fake documents that customs inspectors failed to check for authenticity.

Bill Would Raise Taxes To Fund Security (WT)

By Audrey Hudson

The Washington Times, January 25, 2007

Legislation proposed by a key Democrat this week would raise taxes to fund billions in new Homeland Security spending on more police officers, interoperable communications equipment and 100 percent screening of cargo entering the United States.

Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr., Delaware Democrat and chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, said by rolling back President Bush's tax cuts that up to $50 billion could be generated over five years for security improvements.

"To protect our homeland, we have to radically reorder our priorities," said Mr. Biden, who did not specify which tax cut would be eliminated, only that it affected people who make more than $1 million a year.

Mr. Biden's Homeland Security Act of 2007 calls for "scanning" 100 percent of cargo containers, development of new "screening" technology and the hiring of 50,000 new police officers and 1,000 FBI agents.

"This is all about setting the right priorities for America. Instead of giving a tax cut to the richest Americans who don't need it, we should be focusing on the security of all Americans," Mr. Biden said.

Rep. Peter T. King, New York Republican and ranking member of the House Homeland Security Committee, called the bill a "gimmick."

"Money is not the only issue; the fact is many cities have not come up with real plans to make it work. He's creating a false problem," Mr. King said. "He is making a class warfare argument to raise money on an issue without any knowledge of the issue."

The Homeland Security Department has allocated $2.9 billion for interoperable communications efforts, but hundreds of cities have yet to agree on which system they want to use.

As chairman of the committee last year, Mr. King passed legislation to address port security, which already requires 100 percent cargo screening through manifest checks and other procedures put in place by the Coast Guard at ports overseas.

"We want to scan it or X-ray it overseas before it reaches our ports, where it can blow up," Mr. King said.

DOJ_NMG_0121277

More than $60 million from the Homeland Security Department and the Energy Department has been set aside to install radiation portal monitors at U.S. ports.

Since 2004, $10 billion has been spent on port security.

Lockheed Chosen For ID Contract (WP)

By Griff Witte

The Washington Post, January 25, 2007

The Transportation Security Administration has decided to award a closely watched contract to supply high-tech identification cards at ports nationwide to Lockheed Martin of Bethesda, according to sources familiar with the choice.

The initial value of the contract, which involves issuing ID cards to 850,000 maritime workers, was estimated at $70 million. The contract could prove far more valuable, however, if it leads to other, related deals for the firm: Identity technology is a fast-growing sector for government contractors, and the Transportation Worker Identification Credential, known as TWIC, is the first of many identity contracts slated to be announced in the next few years.

The program, a key element of the government's attempts to secure the nation's ports, was initially supposed to provide transportation workers with ID cards embedded with microchips by the end of 2003. But it has been bogged down with technology glitches and privacy concerns, and now Lockheed will have 18 months to finish rolling out its cards.

Darrin Kayser, a TSA spokesman, would not confirm yesterday that the agency had made its decision but indicated that an announcement is imminent. "It is fundamental to our nation's security that individuals who pose a security threat do not gain access to our nation's ports," Kayser said. "The TWIC contract, which will be awarded in the coming days, allows us to move forward and begin enrollment at selected ports in March."

A spokeswoman for Lockheed Martin, Leslie Holoweiko, referred all questions to the TSA, as did other competitors for the contract. "We haven't heard anything yet," she said.

However, multiple sources familiar with the decision, who spoke on condition of anonymity because it had not been made public, said Lockheed is the winner.

The company, which is the Defense Department's biggest contractor, beat out a relatively large field of competitors to win the work. The TSA had narrowed the competition late last year to eight finalists.

Among the finalists was BearingPoint of McLean, which had held the contract to run a prototype program. This is the second time in three months that BearingPoint has been disappointed on an identity contract. In November, the General Services Administration opted to rebid a deal to supply federal employees with new ID cards rather than renew a contract it had awarded to BearingPoint just two months earlier.

The new security card program is likely to come under scrutiny from Congress.

"History tells us that large security programs emanating from the Department of Homeland Security have a tendency to be fraught with waste and poor management," said Bennie Thompson (D-Miss.), chairman of the House Committee on Homeland Security, in a statement. "Important security initiatives like TWIC provide no room for error."

Edward Wytkind, president of the AFL-CIO's Transportation Trades Department, said labor unions worry the government will require that workers foot the bill for new credentials, which some have estimated will cost $150 per ID. "The technology issues are still being reconciled," Wytkind said. "So for us, it's a $150 tax on our members with no real measurable security results."

New Orleans Looks Beyond State Of The Union Snub (LAT)

By Ann M. Simmons

The Los Angeles Times, January 25, 2007

NEW ORLEANS — Mayor C. Ray Nagin is way beyond caring whether President Bush mentioned New Orleans in his State of the Union address Tuesday night.

"We're 18 months into this thing. I'm tired of complaining and bellyaching," Nagin said Wednesday when asked about the speech at a news conference.

The city continues its struggle to recover from Hurricane Katrina, which pummeled New Orleans in August 2005, and some observers thought the absence of Katrina recovery from Bush's speech was telling.

Nagin was unfazed. "We're going to take whatever nickels we have, whatever pennies we have, whatever dollars we have, and we're going to stretch it, and we're going to make this recovery work," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0121278

The mayor made his remarks as he announced a two-year pilot program that would offer loans — interest-free for six months — to homeowners waiting to receive aid from the sluggish Road Home recovery initiative, a state program that distributes federal funds. Almost 101,700 families have applied to the program, but as of Monday, money had been made available to 258.

City officials and residents are frustrated by the slow pace; many homeowners doubt they will ever receive Road Home assistance.

Other Louisiana lawmakers and residents took exception to the omission of the state's continued plight from Bush's speech, which focused on Iraq and domestic issues such as healthcare reform and energy consumption.

"Last year we were disappointed that the administration mentioned Katrina almost as an afterthought," Rep. William J. Jefferson (D-La.), said in a phone interview. "This year … we are shocked that there was no mention at all of it, as if the problem has been solved, or simply gone away."

Also Wednesday, Jefferson and other Louisiana lawmakers introduced a bill that would allow the federal government to forgive loans made to local governments after disasters.

"I guess the pain of the hurricane is yesterday's news in Washington," Louisiana Gov. Kathleen Babineaux Blanco told a news conference in New Orleans, according to the Associated Press.

"But for us, it's still very real, very real, and it's something that we live with every single day."

Some critics have blamed Blanco's administration for the slow disbursement of the Road Home money.

Nagin's "gap-loan" plan — which is funded by $11 million in federal grants and will be administered by Chase and Liberty Banks — will initially allow up to 1,000 homeowners who lived in Orleans Parish when Katrina hit to borrow up to $50,000, interest-free for six months, while waiting for Road Home grants. The fund would gradually be replenished as homeowners received Road Home grants and paid off their loans, Nagin said.

Among the eligibility requirements, loan applicants must agree to live in their renovated home for at least three years after it has been repaired.

La. Gov.: Bush Forgetting Katrina (AP)

By Cain Burdeau

AP, January 25, 2007

Gov. Kathleen Blanco angrily criticized President Bush on Wednesday for not mentioning 2005's destructive hurricanes in his State of the Union speech, and said Louisiana is being shortchanged in federal recovery funding for political reasons.

"I guess the pains of the hurricane are yesterday's news in Washington," Blanco said.

"But for us it's still very real, very real, and it's something that we live every single day," the governor said. "But we will continue to fight, and we will continue to come on, and we will effect a recovery."

Mayor Ray Nagin echoed Blanco's disappointment at Bush's omission of New Orleans' recovery from Hurricane Katrina, but he cautioned against reopening political rifts that developed after the storm.

"We're 18 months into this thing. I'm tired of complaining and bellyaching," the mayor said. "We're going to take whatever nickels we have, whatever pennies we have, whatever dollars we have, and we're going to stretch it, and we're going to make this recovery work."

The White House had no immediate comment on Blanco's remarks.

Blanco accused the White House of repeatedly delivering less money than Louisiana has needed to repair the damage to housing, schools and hospitals. She said Mississippi has received much more help.

"I just want an end to the disparities, once and for all," the governor said.

She said Louisiana's unfair treatment set the state's recovery back by six months.

Big Easy Makes Way For New Recovery Czar (CSM)

By Patrik Jonsson

The Christian Science Monitor, January 25, 2007

NEW ORLEANS

Ed Blakely, the planning guru hired to steer New Orleans out of its muddle, is like the Forrest Gump of disaster recovery.

California earthquake? There he is, amid wrecked interstates. Tsunami? That's him touring rebuilt villages. Terror attacks in Manhattan? When the dust settles, the distinguished-looking African-American man is at the center of a phalanx of planners. His arrival in New Orleans two weeks ago as the city's new recovery czar may be the biggest challenge for the "master of post-disaster," as his hometown paper, the Los Angeles Times, calls him.

DOJ_NMG_0121279

Though largely unknown outside the circle of urban planners, Mr. Blakely is becoming a household name in New Orleans. Nearly 18 months after the storms, returnees have slowed to a trickle, the city is borrowing truckloads of money it has little hope of repaying, and actual recovery dollars from Congress have tightened from promises of billions to less than $10 million received.

What happens in the next year under Blakely's tutelage, experts say, will affect the city for decades to come.

"All of us are saying that this is a big one to take on, and it'll be either the culmination of his career or it's going to be a disaster," says Juliann Allison, associate director of the Edward J. Blakely Center for Sustainable Suburban Development in Riverside, Calif.

Brusque, yet funny, Blakely is one of the most effective planners in America today, his friends say. He's hypereducated with both an MBA and a PhD. Coming from a poor background in San Bernardino, Calif., Blakely went on to make enough money as a developer by age 30 to be able to retire. Blakely is known for balancing economic, environmental, and social interests in projects, including the "green" village of Dos Lagos in Corona, Calif., according to his friend, L.A. developer Ali Sahabi.

Civic duty drives the former college football star, who once lost a race for mayor to former California Gov. Jerry Brown in Oakland. "It's like the old adage about the fire horse: When there's a fire, he wants to get going," says Robert Yaro, president of the Regional Plan Association in New York, who came to know Blakely during the 9/11 recovery effort. "[New Orleans] is clearly the biggest planning challenge in America right now. Ed ... doesn't inspire a lot of warm huggies. But he has a remarkable ability to pull people together, to inspire confidence, grit, and determination."

Blakely's plans in New Orleans are straightforward: Encourage a smaller, more dense city by offering landowners in wrecked neighborhoods the opportunity to swap their land for lots on higher ground. Get pilot projects launched by summer. Build community centers. Begin to generate private investment. Last week, the new recovery czar led a delegation to Wall Street and was "warmly received" by bankers.

Blakely will conduct "charettes," or public planning sessions, with neighborhoods, but won't have meetings behind closed doors, he says. And as he always does when he arrives in a new city, he will "buy a bike for a few hundred bucks and ride around, talking to the cab drivers, garbage men, and even the prostitutes," he says, to get an unvarnished look around.

"The planning job here is relatively easy," says Blakely in a phone interview, "because the city pretty much shows you how to plan it. But what's happened is fragmentary leadership and ad hoc [planning] well before Katrina killed the opportunity structure. It has lost its structural identity and that's what has to be restored. This city has great bones, but you forget that she had a great face."

So what should be done now? "We have to go to scale – I have to start building 1,000 houses a day," he says.

Since hurricane Katrina bowled over the Gulf Coast and sunk most of New Orleans under the surface of Lake Pontchartrain, recovery is piecemeal, contested and, some say, myopic. Only half the residents of New Orleans, perhaps 200,000, have returned.

Much of the problem lies with sunken neighborhoods, where pockets of people have come back to a rotting wasteland of homes from Gentilly Woods to the Lower Ninth Ward. Plans to discourage people from returning to the lowest-lying areas failed after Mayor Ray Nagin put forth a "laissez-faire" rebuilding effort in his campaign for reelection last year. The concept was to leave things alone for a year and see which neighborhoods came back and which didn't. But the city is growing restive.

Elvira Robertson is one of the 20 percent of people who returned to Pontchartrain Park, the city's first black suburban-style subdivision. It was soaked by breaches in both the London Canal and Industrial Canal after Katrina hit. Now, in the middle of a residential wasteland, she has created an oasis of green lawn and flowers, a feeble attempt to not only create normalcy but also urge others to return. "We need people; we need a lot of people," she says.

Her frustration is widespread, observers say. "New Orleans has lacked leadership on these issues. People have had it with the let's see what happens, and let's muddle through approach," says Mr. Yaro.

It's the kind postdisaster malaise that Blakely handled in New York. As part of the Civic Alliance, he envisioned a Lower Manhattan as a better place than it was before 9/11. Similarly, Katrina has given New Orleans an opportunity to become a wealthier and less provincial city, experts say.

From rebuilding housing to establishing services, Blakely can help "to bring the public and private sectors together, to leverage resources and to paint a vision of hope for the future that's realistic and uplifting," says Sen. Mary Landrieu (D) of Louisiana, in an e-mail.

But unlike in New York after 9/11, there is no "unified politics" behind New Orleans's struggle. Divisiveness still rules at City Hall, a situation that will test Blakely's skills, critics say.

"He's just an appointee; he's not the mayor," says John McIlwain, of the Urban Land Institute in Washington. "As smart as he is, he's not smarter than the hundreds of planners who have been talking about this. Ed can give the right recommendations, but will the city back him up? Nobody knows."

DOJ_NMG_0121280

"We'll be watching him very closely," says Mary Louise Johnson, one of the returnees to Pontachartrain Park. "Right now, he's our best hope."

Flood Coverage Tough To Enforce (USAT)

By Kathy Chu

USA Today, January 25, 2007

Nearly a year and a half after Hurricane Katrina, federally regulated lenders are still struggling to comply with a requirement that they force homeowners in high-risk flood zones to buy flood insurance.

By law, homeowners in flood-prone areas — such as along the coast — must buy such a policy if they get a mortgage from a federally regulated lender. Government-issued flood insurance covers homeowners for up to $250,000 in flood damage to property and $100,000 to contents. (Unlike homeowners insurance, though, it doesn't insure against rain or wind damage.)

Katrina raised awareness of the need for flood insurance. While lenders and regulators have made progress in requiring homeowners to buy polices, "We're still not there yet," says David Maurstad, an insurance administrator at the Federal Emergency Management Agency, which oversees the flood-insurance program.

One problem: Some homeowners who buy a flood insurance policy drop it later. Lenders "do a fairly good job of finding out whether someone is in a flood plain, but they don't do as good a job of tracking if you lose (flood insurance)," says J. Robert Hunter, director of insurance at the Consumer Federation of America.

After Katrina, critics blamed banks' sometimes lax enforcement of the flood-insurance rule for homeowners' inability to recoup losses. Vicki Vidal of the Mortgage Bankers Association argues, though, that "lenders who are required to mandate flood insurance as a condition of making loans are doing so."

Still, last year, the Federal Deposit Insurance Corp., which regulates lenders, fined banks $297,815 for flood-insurance violations, an 82% increase from 2005. Other regulators, such as the Office of Thrift Supervision and the Federal Reserve, levied fewer fines on banks last year than in 2005. Yet, "the (lower) numbers probably show that … if anything, the hurricanes significantly raised awareness for institutions" about the need for flood insurance, says Kevin Petrasic, an OTS spokesman.

Getting homeowners to buy flood insurance "sounds easy, and it should be, but you're dealing with customers, and some of them don't understand that they have to have it," says James Clayton, chairman of Planters Bank and Trust in Indianola, Miss.

Some lenders are changing their computer systems to more closely track flood insurance sales. United Bank of Parkersburg, W.Va., says it did so last year to make it easier to determine whether homeowners had flood insurance on second as well as first mortgages.

Others are taking advantage of a provision in the law that lets them expand their flood-insurance requirement. Eureka Homestead, of Metairie, La., now requires that all homeowners below Interstate 12 — north of New Orleans — get this policy. That includes homes outside flood-prone zones.

As banks increasingly enforce the flood insurance requirement, affected homeowners will have to pay more to insure their homes. But, "The fact that it's more expensive to buy an unsafe house is not necessarily a bad thing," Hunter says. "It's a way of warning a buyer, 'This house has risk.' "

WAR NEWS:

Biden Seeks Wider Support For Measure Against 'Surge' (WSJ)

By David Rogers

The Wall Street Journal, January 25, 2007

WASHINGTON -- The Senate Foreign Relations Committee approved a nonbinding resolution that challenges President Bush's Iraq policy and will provoke a major floor debate next week, when Democrats hope to get more Republicans to buck the administration.

The 12-9 committee vote gives Chairman Joseph Biden (D., Del.) a solid foothold from which to begin talks with Republicans who share his concern about sending more U.S. troops to try to quell sectarian violence in Baghdad.

Chief among these is Sen. John Warner (R., Va.), former chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, who last evening introduced an alternative resolution also challenging the increased commitment of 21,500 troops. Merging the two to achieve a larger consensus is the Democrats' goal and the quickest route may be to embrace much of Mr. Warner's proposal with some changes.

"It's pretty good, but it's not perfect," said Majority Leader Harry Reid (D., Nev.).

DOJ_NMG_0121281

Mr. Reid will play an increasing role with Mr. Biden in trying to reach some common ground, but he must walk a fine line. The new Senate majority is quickly learning what a rocky road it can be en route to building the bipartisan relationships it promised to nurture.

Among the 10 Republicans on Foreign Relations, only Nebraska Sen. Chuck Hagel supported the committee resolution, for example. And the vote followed a 54-43 roll call on the Senate floor in which just five Republican senators joined an effort to bring to a vote a House-passed bill raising the federal minimum wage.

Just as Republicans appeared wary of challenging the president following his State of the Union address, Democrats faced criticism for being too intent on having their way.

Regarding the minimum-wage bill, for example, Republicans complained that Mr. Reid was backtracking on promises to couple $8 billion of tax breaks with the measure, which would gradually raise the minimum wage $2.10 an hour over the next two years. Yesterday's vote makes it almost certain such a bill will now emerge from the Senate, but Minority Leader Mitch McConnell (R., Ky.) complained that it is "somewhat hypocritical" for Democrats to argue "that we ought to have a bipartisan package and then vote to eliminate it."

As for Iraq, the Biden-Hagel alliance was crucial to jump-starting the Senate debate, but the White House hopes to keep Mr. Warner out of any talks that could lead to the strongest slap yet by Congress of the president's Iraq policy.

"I'm a free man," Virginia's senior senator said in an interview yesterday, but he is cautious about negotiations. "At the moment I see no basis for me to alter it," he said, and Republican moderates will defer to his judgment. "John Warner is going to set the strategy," said Sen. Susan Collins (R., Maine.)

In an interview with CNN, Vice President Cheney was dismissive of the Senate debate, saying Mr. Bush "has made his decision...We need to get the job done."

Mr. Cheney's attitude could compound Democratic fears already that Mr. Warner's resolution is too deferential to the president in its tone. And if the Virginian becomes a one-man standard of what's "bipartisan" he could insist on conditions that make it harder for Mr. Reid to hold onto his liberal members.

Nonetheless the Republican's proposal actually goes further than Mr. Biden on military matters -- even addressing the rules of engagement for U.S troops in Iraq. And the administration also can't ignore the growing skepticism among Foreign Relations panelists who stood with the president yesterday.

Indiana Sen. Richard Lugar, the ranking Republican, said some of the assumptions in the president's plan were "dubious." And on a 13-8 vote, the panel rejected an effort to add language committing the Senate to never cut off funds for the war.

"It is an inverted political logic for people to basically say that we have to continue doing this for the good of the troops," said Sen. James Webb (D., Va.). "We are not continuing this war for the troops. The troops are fighting this war on our behalf because we are continuing it."

Bush Iraq Plan Is Condemned By Senate Panel (NYT)

By Jeff Zeleny

The New York Times, January 25, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 24 — One day after President Bush implored Congress to give his Iraq strategy a chance to succeed, the Senate Foreign Relations Committee approved a resolution on Wednesday denouncing the plan to send more troops to Baghdad, setting up the most direct confrontation over the war since it began nearly four years ago.

The full Senate is poised to consider the nonbinding, yet strongly symbolic, repudiation of Mr. Bush as early as Wednesday. Democratic leaders agreed to tone down the language in the resolution, hoping to make it more acceptable to Republicans in an effort to send a strong, bipartisan rebuke to the White House.

“This is not designed to say, ‘Mr. President, ah-ha, you’re wrong,’ ” said Senator Joseph R. Biden Jr., a Delaware Democrat and chairman of the committee. “This is designed to say, ‘Mr. President, please don’t go do this.’ ”

Even as the White House delicately worked to persuade some Republicans to consider the president’s approach, the administration also said Congressional action would not interrupt the plan to send more than 20,000 American troops to Iraq. In a television interview on CNN, Vice President Dick Cheney declared, “It won’t stop us.”

The Foreign Relations Committee approved the resolution by a vote of 12 to 9, with a Republican senator, Chuck Hagel of Nebraska, joining 11 Democrats in supporting it. But even Republicans who opposed the resolution, including Senator Richard G. Lugar of Indiana, expressed deep doubt about whether the troop increase could succeed and suggested it was time for a new direction.

The committee rejected amendments that would have strengthened or softened the resolution, which described Mr. Bush’s plan to increase troops as contrary to the national interest.

DOJ_NMG_0121282

Some Republicans expressed reluctance to support the legislation because they feared it could be seen as a political attack on Mr. Bush, but left themselves open to backing a similar plan offered by Senator John W. Warner, a Virginia Republican.

The Foreign Relations Committee tends to carry a more centrist outlook than the Senate as a whole, but Democrats say they believe that at least 8 of the 49 Republicans might join with nearly all Democrats in embracing a resolution — Mr. Biden's or Mr. Warner's — critical of the president's troop increase plan.

Senator George V. Voinovich, an Ohio Republican, said he was disappointed that the administration had failed to extend an olive branch to Congress. He said he told a White House official at the State of the Union address on Tuesday that the stalemate in Iraq was threatening to consume the Bush presidency.

"It's time to recognize that if you keep going the way you are, you are never going to achieve what you want to achieve," Mr. Voinovich said. "And, beyond that, it's going to fall over on your domestic initiatives and make your presidency uneventful and not have meaning."

Hours after the hearing on Wednesday, the effort led by Mr. Warner was gaining ground, with six Democrats and three other Republicans signing on as co-sponsors of his proposal, which also bluntly opposes sending more troops to Iraq. Mr. Warner was declining offers from Democratic leaders to merge his proposal with theirs, saying he wanted to keep his plan as neutral as possible, so it could attract wide bipartisan support. "It's not a question of who is the most patriotic or who is trying to set up a confrontation with the president," Mr. Warner said, speaking from the floor of the Senate. "To have a vote all on one side or all on the other side will not help."

While details of the two resolutions vary somewhat, their message is the same: many members of Congress do not support the plan to expand the military operation in Iraq.

The White House is shying away from an overt lobbying effort to thwart the Iraq resolutions, as it might do more harm than good. Instead, the administration is leaving it mainly to the Republican leadership, including the Senate Republican leader, Mitch McConnell of Kentucky, and the Republican whip, Trent Lott of Mississippi, to work toward an alternative.

Still, the White House has sought to head off overwhelming votes against the president in both the Senate and the House. Since Mr. Bush delivered his Iraq speech on Jan. 10, the national security adviser, Stephen J. Hadley, and his deputy, J. D. Crouch, have met with members of both parties. Officials, aware that a majority of senators are likely to vote in favor of the Warner resolution, say those meetings will continue. But the remarks by Mr. Cheney on Wednesday suggested that the White House was not focused on the resolutions. "We are moving forward," Mr. Cheney said in the CNN interview. "The Congress has control over the purse strings. They have the right, obviously, if they want, to cut off funding. But in terms of this effort, the president has made his decision."

A preview of next week's full debate on Iraq unfolded Wednesday in the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, with senator after senator recounting the stories of troops from their states who had died in Iraq. Under the new Democratic majority, the committee has held nearly daily hearings on Iraq.

Senator James Webb, a Virginia Democrat who fought as a marine in Vietnam, urged his colleagues not to draw a link between the Iraq and Vietnam wars. Such comparisons, he feared, could force people away from backing the Iraq resolutions.

"I think there are parallels and there were many people at this table who opposed the Vietnam War, but some of those parallels are superficial," Mr. Webb said. "We're losing the support of a lot of people who supported the Vietnam War and who have problems with this if we try to lump it together."

Mr. Hagel, who also served in Vietnam, has derided the president's Iraq strategy as the worst foreign policy since Vietnam. Yet on Wednesday, Mr. Hagel took a different approach as he addressed fellow Republicans — from the administration or the Congress — who have questioned the motives of those who have spoken critically of the war.

"I think all 100 senators ought to be on the line on this. What do you believe? What are you willing to support? What do you think? Why were you elected?" Mr. Hagel said, his voice booming. "If you wanted a safe job, go sell shoes."

Bush Rebuke Advances (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, January 25, 2007

Senate Democrats rebuked President Bush yesterday over his handling of the war in Iraq with a rare wartime vote condemning the commander in chief's plan to add troops to the battlefield.

"Our resolution of disapproval is not -- I emphasize not -- an attempt to embarrass the president. It is not an attempt to demonstrate isolation," Senate Foreign Relations Committee Chairman Joseph R. Biden Jr., Delaware Democrat, said before his panel declared Mr. Bush's proposal as "not in the national interest."

"It's an attempt to save the president from making a significant mistake with regard to our policy in Iraq," Mr. Biden said.

DOJ_NMG_0121283

Hours after the 12-9 vote, which fell nearly along party lines, Sen. John W. Warner went to the Senate floor and offered his own amendment condemning Mr. Bush's "surge" proposal. The Virginia Republican said his nonbinding resolution is less politically combative than the Biden resolution and has the support of three fellow Republicans and six Democrats.

"We have put a greater emphasis on urging the president to consider other options, given that we have a general disagreement with the very significant level of troops that are specifically set forth in the president's plan," Mr. Warner said. The Warner proposal was offered as a substitute for Mr. Biden's.

Sen. Chuck Hagel of Nebraska was the only one of the panel's 10 Republicans to join all 11 Democrats in favor of the nonbinding Biden resolution.

Mr. Hagel, Mr. Biden and three other committee members supporting the resolution yesterday were among those who voted on Oct. 11, 2002, to authorize the war in Iraq. The others were Sens. John Kerry of Massachusetts, Christopher J. Dodd of Connecticut and Bill Nelson of Florida, all Democrats.

"Most of our colleagues understand this is a mistake," said Mr. Kerry, who as a soldier returned from Vietnam to protest the war and testify before Congress about atrocities he said were committed by fellow Americans.

"I asked the question in 1971: How do you ask a man to be the last man to die for a mistake?" he said yesterday on the Senate floor. "I never thought that I would be reliving the need to ask that question again. We are there."

Sen. Richard G. Lugar, Indiana Republican, warned that the resolution could demoralize the troops and embolden insurgents in Iraq.

"Usually, nonbinding resolutions are designed to show unity on an issue or to highlight an issue that few members know about," he told his colleagues. "In this case, we are laying open our disunity without the prospect that the vehicle will achieve meaningful changes in our policy. This vote will force nothing on the president, but it will confirm to our friends and allies that we are divided and in disarray."

Mr. Hagel disagreed. "This is not a defeatist resolution," he said. "This is not a cut-and-run resolution. We are not talking about cutting off funds."

Mr. Kerry was more resigned. "We all want success," he said, but "we can't achieve the kind of clean and simple victory that the administration promised."

Mr. Hagel, who is considering a run for the White House, was among the most vociferous critics of the Bush administration.

"There is no strategy," he said. "This is a pingpong game with American lives. These young men and women that we put in Anbar province, in Iraq, in Baghdad are not beans. They're real lives. And we better be damn sure we know what we're doing, all of us, before we put 22,000 more Americans into that grinder."

Sen. Barbara Boxer, California Democrat, said she was relieved to have voted against the war in 2002.

"I thank God I voted the way I did: against it," she said. "I thank God every single time I sign a letter to the families who have lost a loved one. And unfortunately, in California, we have lost the most."

Democrats offered few specifics about how to proceed. Mr. Kerry urged more diplomacy, which he compared to riding a bicycle.

"As long as you're riding, even if you're going around in circles, you're OK. You don't fall off," he said, citing an analogy by former Secretary of State Madeleine K. Albright. "But if you stop riding, you fall off."

Sen. John E. Sununu, New Hampshire Republican, echoing a word often used on the subject, warned against "micromanaging" the war.

Earlier this month on NBC's "Meet the Press," Mr. Biden said, "I think it is unconstitutional to say, 'We're going to tell you you can go, but we're going to micromanage the war.' "

Sen. Barack Obama, Illinois Democrat and a panel member who has begun a presidential exploratory committee, said in November 2005: "I have neither the expertise nor the inclination to micromanage war from Washington."

Political evolution on the war has emerged elsewhere.

Mr. Kerry, appearing on "Meet the Press" in 2004, said: "I believe the following very deeply. No. 1, we cannot fail. I've said that many times. And if it requires more troops in order to create the stability that eliminates the chaos, that can provide the groundwork for other countries, that's what we have to do."

Mr. Biden said the resolution will not be the final word on the war.

"I assure you -- and I know you know this -- oversight will be consistent, maybe even daily," he told members of his committee. "And we will have not only the hearings you had, but we will have continuous hearings on this issue."

Senators Say 'No' On Bush Iraq Plan (USAT)

By Kathy Kiely

DOJ_NMG_0121284

USA Today, January 25, 2007

WASHINGTON — The stage is set for a dramatic debate in the Senate next week on President Bush's Iraq war policy following a vote of no-confidence Wednesday by a key committee.

"All 100 senators should be on the line on this," said Sen. Chuck Hagel, a Nebraska Republican who co-sponsored a resolution opposing the president's planned increase in troop levels. "If you wanted a safe job, go sell shoes."

Hagel's resolution, which he wrote with two ranking Democrats, declares Bush's plan to send 21,500 additional troops to Baghdad and Anbar province "not in the national interest."

Congressional efforts to redirect military policy are not unprecedented. The House and Senate voted to remove U.S. troops from Somalia in 1993, Haiti in 1994 and Bosnia in 1997.

The Senate Foreign Relations Committee vote was 12-9, with Hagel the only Republican in favor. Indications are the floor vote may be more bipartisan:

•Hours after the Foreign Relations Committee voted, Sen. John Warner of Virginia, the top-ranking Republican on the Senate Armed Services Committee, introduced a resolution that calls on Bush to reduce troop levels; Republican Sens. Susan Collins of Maine, Norm Coleman of Minnesota and Gordon Smith of Oregon are co-sponsors.

•The four-hour committee debate produced far more consensus than the roll call indicated, exposing deep misgivings in both parties about Bush's plans.

Only Sen. David Vitter, R-La., said he backed the president's policy. He said he is doing so "as a final attempt" to bring stability in Iraq. Other Republicans who opposed the resolution made it plain their vote should not be interpreted as support for Bush's plan.

"I'm more skeptical about what we're doing than I have ever been," said Sen. George Voinovich, R-Ohio. Coleman called it a "bad idea" to send more troops to Baghdad. "Iraq is a mess," he said.

Sen. Bob Corker, R-Tenn., said that while he opposed the largely symbolic "sense of the Senate" measure, he's reserving the option to vote for a binding resolution to change direction in Iraq.

A number of alternatives are likely to be offered during the Senate debate, including Warner's, which urges Bush to reduce force levels in Iraq. Possible proposals run the gamut from capping troop strength in Iraq at the current levels to mandating a phased withdrawal.

In an interview with CNN on Wednesday, Vice President Cheney called a suggestion that some Republicans had lost faith in the administration because of blunders in Iraq "hogwash." He said a congressional resolution "won't stop us."

In order to pass the Senate, any anti-war resolution may need 60 votes: Republican leader Mitch McConnell of Kentucky is threatening a filibuster.

Senate Committee Approves Resolution Against Troop Surge (LAT)

By Noam N. Levey

The Los Angeles Times, January 25, 2007

Washington — A Senate committee approved a toughly worded resolution Wednesday to oppose a troop buildup in Iraq, moving Congress a step closer to an official repudiation of President Bush's leadership of the increasingly violent four-year-old war.

In a sign of how partisan the debate over Iraq remains, only one Republican joined Democrats on the Senate Foreign Relations Committee to support the resolution, which bluntly declares "it is not in the national interest of the United States to deepen its military involvement in Iraq."

But the vote -- the day after the president asked Congress to give his proposal "a chance to work" -- followed hours of criticism of the latest Iraq policy by Democratic as well as Republican lawmakers. Not a single senator on the committee endorsed the White House plan.

And with that resolution headed to a debate on the Senate floor as soon as next week, momentum also continued to build behind a second, more bipartisan resolution opposing the Bush Iraq plan.

As support builds for some legislative action, it appears increasingly likely Bush could face the equivalent of a no-confidence vote.

Both resolutions are nonbinding and stop well short of limits that Congress has used to scale back other unpopular military operations, including the Vietnam War. But they mark a sharp departure from the largely deferential posture the Republican-led Congress assumed after Bush sought and won approval for the invasion in 2002.

The resolution passed 12-9 on Wednesday by the Foreign Relations Committee is sponsored by Sens. Joseph Biden, D-Del., Chuck Hagel, R-Neb., and Carl Levin, D-Mich.

DOJ_NMG_0121285

The second resolution, championed by veteran Virginia Republican Sen. John Warner, has now attracted four GOP co-sponsors and six Democratic co-sponsors. And several Republican senators who voted against Biden's resolution in committee expressed interest in the measure.

One of Warner's co-sponsors, Sen. Susan Collins, R-Maine, said Wednesday evening that the measure's authors are talking with even more lawmakers about joining onto the resolution.

Warner's stature as a former chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee and a former Navy secretary has helped draw Republican support. His proposal also is not complicated by presidential politics. Both Biden and Hagel have expressed interest in running for the White House.

The Warner resolution "disagrees" with the president's plans to send 17,500 additional troops in Baghdad, noting the rising sectarian violence in the capital and the poor record of Iraqi cooperation with U.S. initiatives.

But it also includes deferential language recognizing the president's authority as commander in chief and accepts the possibility that the 4,000 additional troops the president wants in Anbar Province may be needed.

The Biden measure is broadly similar, although it does not distinguish between Baghdad and Anbar, a hotbed of Sunni insurgent activity.

Nearly all the Democrats on the Foreign Relations Committee said they hoped the resolution would be only the first step in a congressional drive to start bringing the war to an end.

"Kids are dying over there," said Sen. Christopher Dodd, D-Conn., another presidential hopeful and vocal war opponent. "We need to do something meaningful."

Dodd offered two amendments to cap the number of troops in Iraq and force the president to seek congressional authorization for further troop increases. The amendments failed.

But Biden, who chairs the committee, assured senators that he is also interested in additional legislation to force the president to start withdrawing troops. "We should be drawing down forces," Biden said. "We need a radical change in course."

Hagel, a Vietnam veteran and longtime war opponent, pointedly chided his Republican colleagues for their hesitation.

"The Congress has stood in the shadows ... for four years," he said. "I think all 100 senators ought to be on the line on this. What do you believe? What are you willing to support? ... If you want a safe job, go sell shoes."

The harangue did not move any of the nine other GOP lawmakers on the committee, many of whom are uncomfortable with the tone of the Democratic opposition to Bush's Iraq plans.

Sen. Richard Lugar, R-Ind., a widely respected moderate who used to chair the committee, said he did not believe any resolution opposing the president's policy would be productive.

"It is the wrong tool for this stage in the Iraq debate," Lugar said, warning that it would be divisive and unlikely to affect the president's thinking.

Other Republican senators expressed concern that it might send the wrong message to American troops and that it fails to spell out any alternative to the president's plan.

"We all have a right to be against a plan. I also think we all have a responsibility to be for a plan. This resolution is clearly not a plan," said Sen. David Vitter, R-La., who has called for specific benchmarks to measure progress in Iraq.

The Republican opposition to the resolution did not stop the GOP lawmakers from criticizing Bush's plans, however.

"I'm more skeptical about what we're doing than I ever have been before," said Sen. George Voinovich, R-Ohio, who noted that the more he has learned from Bush administration officials about the buildup the more concerned he has become.

After Wednesday's committee vote, aides to Sens. John Sununu, R-N.H., and Lisa Murkowski, R-Alaska, both of whom voted against the Biden resolution, said the lawmakers were more comfortable with the language in the Warner resolution.

Biden and his co-sponsors, as well as Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., have expressed the desire to work with Warner to reach a compromise.

Hagel, who has already had several lengthy discussions with Warner, said he anticipates more. "We'll be doing a lot of talking," he said.

Senators Rebuff Bush On Troop Plan (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman

The Washington Post, January 25, 2007

A day after President Bush pleaded with Congress to give his Iraq policy one last chance, the Senate Foreign Relations Committee rebuffed him by approving a nonbinding resolution declaring his troop increase in Iraq to be against "the national interest."

DOJ_NMG_0121286

The committee voted 12 to 9 to send a resolution of disapproval of the president's Iraq policy to the Senate floor next week, setting up what could be the most dramatic confrontation between Congress and the Bush administration since the war was launched four years ago. Many Republicans voiced anguish over the president's policy, but only one, Sen. Chuck Hagel (Neb.), a co-sponsor, voted in support of the resolution.

While some lawmakers and antiwar activists have dismissed the resolution as largely meaningless, senior Republicans and White House officials have worked furiously to minimize Republican defections, worried that a large, bipartisan vote would have significant political and international repercussions.

"In an open democracy, we voice our agreements and disagreements in public, and we should not be reticent to do so. But official roll-call votes carry a unique message," said Sen. Richard G. Lugar (Ind.), the Foreign Relations Committee's ranking Republican. A vote for the resolution "will confirm to our friends and allies that we are divided and in disarray," he said.

But Hagel implored his colleagues to take a stand after four years of docile acquiescence.

"What do you believe? What are you willing to support? What do you think? Why were you elected?" he asked. "If you wanted a safe job, go sell shoes. This is a tough business."

But the committee's partisan divide belied the deep undercurrent of GOP misgivings, as one Republican after another spoke out against the deployment of 21,500 additional troops to bolster the faltering government of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki.

Lugar called the Bush strategy "dubious" even as he denounced the resolution as "the legislative equivalent of a sound bite." Sen. John E. Sununu (R-N.H.) said additional troops should not be deployed until the Iraqi government showed more resolve. Sen. Lisa Murkowski (R-Alaska) said she opposed the president and was not afraid to tell him so. And Sen. George V. Voinovich (R-Ohio) said he had delivered a tough message to the White House personally: "You are not listening."

"Congress has allowed this war to go on without anyone having a stake," said an exasperated Sen. Bob Corker (R-Tenn.). "We passed the debt on to future generations. Nobody has sacrificed but the military men and women and the families."

Republican leaders' efforts in the House to placate their members with calls for tougher oversight also appeared to be faltering. Rep. Frank R. Wolf (R-Va.) introduced his own resolution of disapproval yesterday, calling for the administration to adopt in full the recommendations of the bipartisan Iraq Study Group, recommendations that Bush has largely rejected.

Democratic divisions were also on display, with the most ardent antiwar voices pleading for more dramatic action. Sen. Christopher J. Dodd (D-Conn.) tried to amend the nonbinding resolution with firm legislative language capping troop levels in Iraq at January levels, around 137,500.

"This is not a time for legislative nuancing," said Sen. Russell Feingold (D-Wis.). "This is not a time for trying to forge a compromise that everybody can be a part of. This is a time to stop the needless deaths of American troops in Iraq."

But the Dodd amendment was defeated, 15 to 6, with five Democrats joining all Republicans in opposition.

The committee's partisan vote strengthened the hand of Sen. John W. Warner (R-Va.) and a bipartisan group of senators backing a less forceful resolution of opposition.

Warner and his co-sponsors, Ben Nelson (D-Neb.) and Susan Collins (R-Maine), went to the Senate floor last night to introduce their resolution of opposition, brandishing a raft of new co-sponsors, including Democrats Ken Salazar (Colo.), Mary Landrieu (La.), Claire McCaskill (Mo.) and Bill Nelson (Fla.), as well as Republicans Gordon Smith (Ore.) and Norm Coleman (Minn.).

Senate Foreign Relations Chairman Joseph R. Biden Jr. (D-Del.) and Hagel said negotiations with Warner would begin immediately to try to find common ground on a resolution that would attract far more Republican support.

But they said that whatever language is sent to the floor will have to include the policy prescriptions that are in both resolutions: a statement against further deployments; a call for U.S. troops to be re-deployed to guard Iraq's borders, focus on counterterrorism and speeding up the training of Iraqi troops; and a call for diplomatic efforts to engage Iraq's neighbors in the pursuit of a political settlement to the war.

Yesterday's debate foreshadowed what could be wrenching deliberations next week, haunted by the ghosts of Vietnam and the more than 3,000 U.S. dead in Iraq. The Foreign Relations Committee featured three decorated combat veterans of Vietnam, Hagel, Sen. John F. Kerry (D-Mass.) and Sen. James Webb (D-Va.), all of whom voted for the resolution of opposition.

Webb warned yesterday against drawing what he called superficial parallels between the Iraq and Vietnam conflicts, but Kerry evoked the same language he had used in the early 1970s as an antiwar activist: "How do you ask a man to be the last to die for a mistake?"

While Republicans called for lawmakers to support the troops in Iraq, Kerry and Dodd recalled a meeting they had before Christmas with Capt. Brian S. Freeman, a 31-year-old Californian who had sought them out on an Iraqi helicopter landing pad to express his frustrations with the war. Freeman was on his way home on a short leave to visit his 14-month-old daughter and 4-year-old son.

DOJ_NMG_0121287

He was killed last weekend in an insurgent attack in Karbala.

"How many times are we going to repeat that before we accept our responsibility to get it right?" Kerry asked.

Opponents did not so much defend the president's policies as castigate the Democrats' chosen method of confrontation.

"We do not need a resolution to confirm that there is broad discomfort with the president's plan within Congress," Lugar said. "In fact, a vote on this resolution is likely to reveal far less discomfort than actually exists, since some members will vote against it because of its format."

But several Republicans indicated they would vote for a resolution of opposition if the language were toned down. Sen. Sam Brownback (R-Kan.), a presidential candidate, said he was in talks with Warner on a resolution he could embrace. Others were still awaiting some sign of compromise from the president.

"I have been waiting for the administration to extend an olive branch in an attempt to forge a compromise -- a compromise that clearly expresses our concerns while leaving no doubt in the minds of our troops as well as our enemies that we stand united as a nation," Voinovich said.

Bush Fails To Stem Erosion Of Authority (FT)

By Edward Luce In Washington

Financial Times, January 25, 2007

Although it had been billed as one of the most important speeches of his presidency, there were few signs on Wednesday that George W. Bush's State of the Union address had succeeded in stemming the rapid haemorrhaging of his authority.

A number of leading Democrats, including Barack Obama, a front-runner for the 2008 presidential campaign, evinced cautious welcomes for Mr Bush's modest proposals to address global warming and healthcare reform.

But most Democrats and several prominent Republicans remained fixed on Mr Bush's unwillingness to listen to his growing army of critics over the war in Iraq, to which he devoted about a quarter of the 50-minute speech on Tuesday night.

In spite of an impassioned plea for Congress to give his Iraq strategy a chance, Mr Bush failed even to sway waverers within his own party.

Several leading Republicans, including John Warner, the former chairman of the senate armed services committee, plan to go ahead with resolutions that oppose Mr Bush's 21,500 troop "surge" to Iraq.

"If people like John Warner, who represents the southern and military heart of the Republican party, are now abandoning Mr Bush over Iraq then he is going to come under acute pressure to reverse course," said Bruce Riedel at the Saban Centre for the Middle East in Washington DC. "His speech failed to dent those defections."

On domestic policy, meanwhile, the Democratic leadership in both houses dismissed Mr Bush's proposals as either too timid or irrelevant. Mr Bush was also criticised for failing to mention reconstruction in New Orleans following the devastation of Hurricane Katrina in 2005.

"We were very surprised last night when the president talked about the city of Baghdad that he did not mention the city of Detroit or Louisville or Minneapolis or, most importantly, the city of New Orleans," said Debbie Stabenow, Democratic senator for Michigan.

In contrast to his six previous State of the Union addresses, Mr Bush appealed to Congress, which turned Democrat last November for the first time in his presidency, to work "across the aisle" in a bipartisan way in order to "achieve big things for the American people". But the already-weak prospects for a fruitful White House legislative agenda over the next 18 months appear only to have waned further.

"If you want to see bold bipartisan action between now and 2008 you should look to America's democratic laboratories at the state level where states like California and Massachusetts are showing the way on issues like healthcare and global warming," said Ted Halstead, president of the Centre for the New America Foundation, a centrist think tank in Washington.

As authority drains from the White House, Washington is also increasingly looking to the large and growing field of 2008 presidential candidates – most of whom are in the Senate – to provide a lead on big policy ideas, such as healthcare, Iraq and climate change. With the exception of John McCain, who dutifully welcomed Mr Bush's restated Iraq plan, almost all others were either critical or lukewarm.

Hillary Clinton, who entered the race last weekend, spoke for most Democrats when she opposed Mr Bush's proposal to put a cap on employer-provided health benefits and extend higher subsidies to individuals. The former first lady said it would do very little to bring in the 47m Americans who have no health insurance.

Likewise on global warming, Mr Bush's ideas were dismissed as too little too late. "In last year's State of the Union, Mr Bush said we were addicted to oil and nothing happened," said Evan Bayh, Democratic senator for Indiana. "Doing little or nothing on this issue is not good enough any more."

DOJ_NMG_0121288

But it was Jim Webb, the newly elected Democratic senator for Virginia, who best summarised Mr Bush's prospects when he gave his party's response straight after the president's speech on prime time television.

Mr Webb, a Vietnam veteran, called on the president to follow the lead of some of his most illustrious predecessors who had changed course dramatically in mid-stream. "If he does, then we will join him," said Mr Webb, "If he does not, then we will be showing him the way."

Senate Committee Repudiates Bush On Iraq (AP)

By David Espo

AP, January 25, 2007

In a calculated snub of President Bush, the Democratic-controlled Senate Foreign Relations Committee dismissed plans for a troop buildup in Iraq on Wednesday as "not in the national interest" of the United States.

"The president has made his decision," Vice President Dick Cheney fired back, a response that made it clear the administration would go ahead anyway. "We need to get the job done."

The committee vote, 12-9 along party lines, capped hours of debate in which Republicans and Democrats vented their frustration and anger — both with the administration and their own past unwillingness to change the course of a war that has claimed the lives of more than 3,000 U.S. troops.

"There is no strategy. This is a pingpong game with American lives," said Republican Sen. Chuck Hagel of Nebraska.

"This Congress was never meant to be a rubber stamp," added Sen. Barbara Boxer, D-Calif., "Read the Constitution. The Congress has the power to declare war. And on multiple occasions, we used our power to end conflicts."

Hagel was the only one of 10 committee Republicans to support the nonbinding measure. Several of the panel's 11 Democrats said they favored stronger legislation to register their opposition to the war.

In the wake of midterm election losses, Bush announced two weeks that he would order an additional 21,500 troops into the war zone. In Tuesday night's State of the Union address, he implored skeptical lawmakers to give the strategy a chance.

Bush got his answer in less than 24 hours, the timing dictated by Democrats, and Sen. Joseph Biden. D-Del., the panel's chairman, said tougher measures were likely to follow.

"Unless the president demonstrates very quickly that he is unlikely to continue down the road he's on, this will be only the first step. ... I will be introducing ... constitutionally legitimate, binding pieces of legislation. We will bring them up," he said.

Taken together, the committee's vote and Cheney's response suggested the Democrats and the White House were on a collision course — lawmakers drafting ever-stronger measures to change policy in Iraq, and the president exercising his prerogatives as commander in chief — and his veto pen.

"We are moving forward," Cheney said in an interview with CNN in which he was asked about the troop buildup. "The Congress has control over the purse strings. They have the right, obviously, if they want, to cut off funding. But in terms of this effort, the president has made his decision."

The vice president added: "We've consulted extensively with them. We'll continue to consult with the Congress. But the fact of the matter is, we need to get the job done."

Inside the Senate committee, all Republicans but Hagel opposed the measure, denying Democrats the strong bipartisan vote they had sought.

Biden, who has announced he intends to run for president in 2008, said the legislation is "not an attempt to embarrass the president. ... It's an attempt to save the president from making a significant mistake with regard to our policy in Iraq."

Democrats intend to bring the measure to the Senate floor for a vote next week, and Biden said he is willing, in the interim, to make changes in the hopes of gaining additional Republican support.

Some committee Republicans sought unsuccessfully to temper the measure before it was approved. Additionally, more than a half-dozen GOP lawmakers in the Senate have signaled interest in an alternative that merely expresses disagreement with the president's policy rather than deeming it not in the national interest.

"The thing that I'm deeply concerned about is putting American troops in the middle of this — the cross-hairs of this sectarian battle before the Iraqis" deliver on a series of promised reforms, said Sen. Norm Coleman, R-Minn.

While he said he opposes deploying additional troops in Baghdad, Coleman added he wants to leave open the possibility of a bigger force in the Anbar province in the western part of the country.

Sen. Richard Lugar of Indiana, the committee's senior Republican, readily conceded he was not sure Bush's new policy would succeed. But he voted against the measure, saying, "It is unclear to me how passing a nonbinding resolution that the president has already said he will ignore will contribute to any improvement or modification of our Iraq policy."

Lugar also said sponsors of the measure were underestimating their power to force a change.

DOJ_NMG_0121289

"We have the ability to require weekly updates from our diplomats and military commanders about the status in Iraq. We should be engaging the administration on almost a daily basis concerning the mission and needs of our troops," he said.

"We should demand of the president precise explanations of his political and diplomatic strategy. We should conduct what amounts to a continuous audit of our economic assistance, to ensure that we are maximizing results."

Some of the most emotional rhetoric of the day came as committee members challenged one another to take a stand.

"If you wanted a safe job, go sell shoes," said Hagel.

"This is a tough business. But is it any tougher, us having to take a tough vote, express ourselves and have the courage to step up on what we're asking our young men and women to do?"

Senate Panel Passes Iraq Resolution (HILL)

By Elana Schor

The Hill, January 25, 2007

Senate Democrats won committee passage yesterday of their leadership-backed resolution renouncing President Bush's plan for more troops in Iraq, but it is unclear whether the measure will overcome anticipated obstacles on the floor as presidential rivals continue to muddy the debate.

The Foreign Relations Committee approved a resolution co-written by its chairman, Joseph Biden (D-Del.), and second-ranked Republican, Chuck Hagel (Neb.), asserting that a new military commitment in Iraq "is not in the national interest" of the nation. Yet the resolution failed to win over another panel Republican despite public criticism of the troop "surge" by several GOP senators, setting up a Senate floor showdown unless the Foreign Relations resolution can be united with a competing measure by next week.

"We're concerned about our next election," Hagel, who continues to mull a possible Republican or Independent presidential bid, told his colleagues. "So we tinker. So we figure out wordsmithing. Should we oppose the president or just not support the president?"

Speaking emotionally and without prepared notes, Hagel called on ranking GOP Sen. Richard Lugar (Ind.) and others to weigh their doubts about the wisdom of the surge against their doubts about the impact of the nonbinding resolution. Biden, Hagel and fellow author Sen. Carl Levin (D-Mich.), chairman of the Armed Services Committee, have voiced willingness to negotiate with backers of a resolution that uses less-strong language in its disapproval, but no common ground was achieved yesterday.

Dealing a potential blow to Democratic leaders' hopes for consensus, several members of their caucus are embracing the competing resolution, whether instead of or alongside the Foreign Relations language.

"Sens. Bill Nelson (D-Fla.) and Ken Salazar (D-Colo.) support both versions, while Mary Landrieu (D-La.) has backed the alternative, which was formally introduced Monday by Sens. John Warner (R-Va.), Ben Nelson (D-Neb.), Susan Collins (R-Maine) and Norm Coleman (R-Minn.)."

A separate rift opened yesterday between Biden and two fellow competitors in the 2008 White House chase over whether to attempt a further check on Bush by placing a binding cap on troop levels in Iraq. Sen. Chris Dodd (Conn.), the first Democrat to support a troop ceiling that would trigger a new congressional vote on authorizing the war, tried to add that cap as an amendment to the resolution.

Dodd failed by a wide margin, but Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.) backed his effort and another defender of a troop cap, Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.), awaits at the head of the presidential pack.

"Just setting the level at 137,500 [Dodd's suggested level] sends the wrong message," Biden told his committee, predicting that Dodd's amendment would sink the resolution. "We're codifying the status quo."

Biden suggested collaborating with Dodd and other supporters of binding action to limit Bush's Iraq policy, noting that the White House budget is likely to arrive with a yearlong war-funding request. Dodd ultimately won just five of the 11 committee Democrats, including two onetime presidential aspirants, John Kerry (Mass.) and Russ Feingold (Wis.).

Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) has met with Warner to discuss merging the two Iraq resolutions with an eye to a floor vote next week. Democrats aim to put a bipartisan imprimatur on their view that, as stated in leadership talking points distributed yesterday, "support for the escalation and support for the troops is not the same thing."

Senate Republican leaders, however, would be in a better position with multiple amendments and substitutes on the floor to splinter the dozen or so members of their conference with qualms about adding to the military presence in Iraq. Four Republicans up for reelection in 2008 — including Sen. Gordon Smith (R-Ore.) — already have cosponsored the less strongly worded alternative resolution, which echoes the bipartisan Iraq Study Group's recommendations.

DOJ_NMG_0121290

Another GOP senator facing the campaign trail this year, Ted Stevens (Alaska), said yesterday he would wait to see what language appears on the floor but stressed that he does not want to send a negative message to troops in Iraq. Alaska's junior senator, Lisa Murkowski (R), said yesterday that she has "a degree of comfort" with the alternative resolution, hinting that she might support it and criticizing the surge.

Sen. Sam Brownback (R-Kan.), who will vie for the GOP's presidential nod, said late Tuesday that he was considering signing on to the alternative resolution as a means to convey his objections to Bush.

Seven of the dozen Democratic senators up for reelection in 2008, meanwhile, are cosponsors of the Foreign Relations-passed resolution: Biden, Levin, Jay Rockefeller (W.Va.), Jack Reed (R.I.), Majority Whip Dick Durbin (Ill.), John Kerry (D-Mass.) and Frank Lautenberg (N.J.).

Other senators up this cycle, including Landrieu, Collins, Warner, Smith and Coleman, back the less strongly worded alternative.

No Resolution To Biden's Talk Show (WP)

By Dana Milbank

The Washington Post, January 25, 2007

Chairman Joe Biden of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee was trying to uphold two resolutions yesterday: one criticizing the Bush administration's Iraq policy and the other Biden's own resolution to himself -- to stop talking so much.

The Iraq resolution passed 12 to 9. Biden's other resolution failed, by a voice vote -- Biden's voice.

The Delaware Democrat and presidential hopeful ran the hearing more like a talk show host than a chairman: inviting the other senators to speak and then commenting on each senator's remarks.

He opened the hearing with a 3,000-word statement in which he used the word "I" 88 times, including a lengthy discussion of the types of questions he has asked himself and how he has answered himself. Finally, the committee's ranking Republican, Richard Lugar (Ind.) got a chance to speak. Then Biden spoke again. Sen. Chris Dodd (D-Conn.) introduced an amendment. Biden interrupted him four times, the last time stating, "I don't want to belabor the point."

By this point, Sen. John Sununu (R-N.H.) had heard enough Biden. "We're going to be here a long time, and I'd certainly like to speak," he announced with irritation. Biden yielded the floor to Sununu, but then interrupted him, too -- five times.

"Senator," Sununu eventually pleaded. "You've had a wonderful opportunity to express your views. I think many on the committee would at least like to express their own views, and I'm sure you'll have ample opportunity to respond."

For Biden, verbosity frequently tramples what might otherwise be profound points. Friends have urged him to put a sock in it, and he knows that his wordiness prevents him from being, as he has put it, "the best Biden I can be."

But, like any addict, he is prone to lapses. "I'll not interrupt again," he promised after one of his monologues yesterday -- this one after remarks by Sen. Lisa Murkowski (R-Alaska) -- and then he broke the promise minutes later.

The veteran legislator is hardly the only one in the Senate, or on the committee, to suffer from long-windedness. Sen. John Kerry (D-Mass.) used his time to rehash the 2004 campaign, arguing that everything he said about the Vietnam War decades ago was true. Kerry later went to the Senate floor to announce that he would not run for president in 2008 but meandered through the better part of half an hour before getting to the point.

But Biden suffers more publicly from the need to explain every contour of his thinking; he at once seems keenly aware that he should keep things moving, yet unaware of the need to stop himself from talking. Returning from a recess in yesterday's hearing, he vowed to finish the proceedings in 90 minutes, "God willing and the creek not rising, as my grandpop used to say." He urged fellow senators to be brief, saying that "even though there's much more to say, there will be plenty of opportunities to say it." More than once he referred to the senators waiting to speak in a "queue" -- he pronounced it "kway" -- but then extended the queue by inserting himself between each speaker.

"Let me just make two brief comments," he said after Lugar voiced opposition to the Iraq resolution.

"Let me respond briefly," he said after Dodd tried to strengthen the resolution. "And I'll try to be brief." One thousand words later, Dodd tried, with limited success, to reclaim the floor.

Sen. Norm Coleman (R-Minn.) acknowledged that "Iraq is a mess" but spoke hopefully about Anbar province. "I've made seven trips into Anbar," Biden said in his rebuttal.

Sen. Russ Feingold (D-Wis.) wanted the Senate to be tougher with President Bush. "If you find a person who's spoken more frankly to seven presidents in the past, tell me who it was," Biden challenged.

Sen. David Vitter (R-La.) raised objections to the resolution. "I will not engage the senator in debate now," the chairman responded -- then engaged the senator in a debate.

DOJ_NMG_0121291

Sen. Johnny Isakson (R-Ga.) spoke. Biden responded. Sen. George Voinovich (R-Ohio) spoke. Biden responded. Sen. Bob Corker (R-Tenn.) spoke. Biden responded. Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.) tried to speak but got only as far as "I've enjoyed listening to the debate that's taken place" before Biden broke in with a logistical update.

"I beg your pardon," the chairman told Obama.

Some of Biden's wordiness had to do with presidential jostling. Eclipsed in media exposure by presidential rivals Hillary Clinton and Obama -- Biden was bumped from network interviews Wednesday morning by Obama -- he relies on such hearings to boost his visibility for the presidential race. At one point, Sen. Barbara Boxer (D-Calif.) accidentally called Biden "Mr. President."

"I should say 'Mr. Chairman,' " she amended. "I know you'd like 'Mr. President.' "

"Well, you noticed, nine heads turned when you said that," he replied, referring to the other senators on the committee who have contemplated candidacies.

"I noticed you responded immediately," Boxer needled.

For a moment, the chairman was not ready with a reply. But it passed quickly.

Large Rally Planned Saturday On Mall (WP)

By Michael E. Ruane

The Washington Post, January 25, 2007

Tens of thousands of peace advocates from across the country are expected in Washington on Saturday for an anti-war rally that could be among the biggest since the war in Iraq began, organizers said yesterday.

They said the rally on the Mall, followed by a march near the Capitol, will target President Bush's intention to send more troops to the Iraq war.

The president's policy is "fight, war, occupation, death, destruction, spend our tax dollars," Leslie Cagan, national coordinator of United for Peace and Justice, the umbrella group that is one of the main organizers of Saturday's events, said at a media briefing.

Citing what she called "this devastating debacle of lies and horror," Cagan said: "The people of this country have had it. This Saturday, January 27, on the heels of the Bush administration's decision to send another 21,000 U.S. troops into Iraq, hundreds of thousands of people from all across this country will come to this capital city to make it clear."

The marchers are calling for an end to the occupation of Iraq and the beginning of "an orderly, speedy and safe" withdrawal of troops, said Hani Khalil, a spokesman for the group. They want dates announced for the start of troop withdrawal as well as a specific deadline for its completion, he added.

United for Peace and Justice describes itself as a coalition of 1,400 local and national organizations. Among them are the National Organization for Women, United Church of Christ, the American Friends Service Committee, True Majority, Military Families Speak Out, Iraq Veterans Against the War, the U.S. Campaign to End the Israeli Occupation, CodePink, MoveOn.org, and September 11th Families for Peaceful Tomorrows.

Among the featured speakers will be Vietnam War-era protester Jane Fonda, according to the organizers. Others include actors Danny Glover, Tim Robbins and Susan Sarandon, civil rights activist Jesse Jackson, and Carlos Arredondo, who in 2004 set himself on fire after learning of the death in Iraq of his Marine Corps son, Alexander.

The rally is scheduled to begin at 11 a.m. at the east end of the Mall, at Third Street and Madison Drive NW, the organizers said. The march is to kick off at 1 p.m.

The route and march permits were being finalized yesterday, the National Park Service said. Cagan said organizers want to march from the Mall north on Louisiana Avenue to Union Station, then south on Delaware Avenue to the Capitol.

The march comes after several large Iraq war protests, which date to before the March 2003 invasion. One of the biggest was held Sept. 25, 2005, and was billed as the largest since the war's start. Organizers at the time claimed a turnout of 300,000, while police pegged the number at about half that.

Cagan declined yesterday to predict a Saturday turnout. "We learned a long time ago not to put out numbers," she said. "There are many variables, especially in the winter."

An anti-war protest described as the largest since the Vietnam War drew several hundred thousand Jan. 18, 2003, on the eve of the Iraq war, in subfreezing Washington weather. The high temperature reported that day was in the mid-20s.

Saturday's weather should be sunny, with highs in the low 50s, according to the National Weather Service.

Fonda, 69, an actress, author and peace activist who was vilified during the Vietnam War for making an appearance in Hanoi on a North Vietnamese gun emplacement, has previously avoided attending anti-Iraq war functions.

DOJ_NMG_0121292

"I realized that I would provide too much of a distraction for the right-wing media," she told the San Jose Mercury News last year. "I didn't want to take away from what's happening in the movement."

Cagan, the protest organizer, said Fonda was traveling yesterday and was unavailable for an interview, but "Jane Fonda is definitely coming. She is speaking at the rally and marching in the lead contingent."

Fonda is scheduled to be joined at the rally podium by Bob Watada, 67, of Honolulu, a retired executive with the state of Hawaii whose Army officer son, Ehren, is to be court-martialed next month for refusing to deploy to Iraq.

"There is no doubt in my mind that the invasion and occupation of Iraq is wholly unwarranted," Bob Watada said in a telephone interview. "The Iraqi people have done absolutely nothing to the United States. They've done nothing to deserve the massacre and the pummeling they're getting . . . the plunder, the torture, the rape, the murder of innocent people. It's got to stop."

Watada's son, a 28-year-old Army lieutenant based at Fort Lewis, Wash., "refused to deploy to Iraq after he found out that the president had lied to the country, lied to the military, about there being weapons of mass destruction in Iraq," the elder Watada said.

Watada said his son refused to get on a deployment plane in June and spoke out against the war. The younger Watada has been charged with "missing a movement" and conduct unbecoming an officer, his father said.

Watada said he plans to participate fully in Saturday's rally and march. "I got my plane tickets and hotel reservations, and I'll be there," he said.

Senators-in-Chief (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, January 25, 2007

To understand why the Founders put war powers in the hands of the Presidency, look no further than the current spectacle in Congress on Iraq. What we are witnessing is a Federalist Papers illustration of criticism and micromanagement without responsibility.

Consider the resolution pushed through the Senate Foreign Relations Committee yesterday by Joe Biden and Chuck Hagel, two men who would love to be President if only they could persuade enough voters to elect them. Both men voted for the Iraq War. But with that war proving to be more difficult than they thought, they now want to put themselves on record as opposing any further attempts to win it.

Their resolution -- which passed 12-9 -- calls for Iraqis to "reach a political settlement" leading to "reconciliation," as if anyone disagrees with that necessity. But then it declares that the way to accomplish this is to wash American hands of the Iraq effort, proposing that U.S. forces retreat to protect the borders and hunt terrorists. The logic here seems to be that if the Americans leave, Iraqis will miraculously conclude that they have must settle their differences. A kind of reverse field of dreams: If we don't come, they will build it.

The irony is that this is not all that far from the "light footprint" strategy that the Bush Administration was following last year and which these same Senators called a failure. It is precisely the inability to provide security in Baghdad that has led to greater sectarian violence, especially among Shiites victimized by Sunni car bombs. The purpose of the new Bush counterinsurgency strategy is to provide more security to the population in the hopes of making a political settlement easier.

But then such analysis probably takes this resolution more seriously than most of the Senators do. If they were serious and had the courage of their convictions, they'd attempt to cut off funds for the Iraq effort. But that would mean they would have to take responsibility for what happens next. By passing "non-binding resolutions," they can assail Mr. Bush and put all of the burden of success or failure on his shoulders.

This is not to say that the resolution won't have harmful consequences, at home and abroad. At home, it further undermines public support for the Iraq effort. Virginia Republican John Warner even cites a lack of public support to justify his separate non-binding resolution of criticism for Mr. Bush's troop "surge." But public pessimism is in part a response to the rhetoric of failure from political leaders like Mr. Warner. The same Senators then wrap their own retreat in the defeatism they helped to promote.

In Iraq, all of this undermines the morale of the military and makes their task that much harder on the ground. When John McCain asked Lieutenant General David Petraeus that precise question during his confirmation hearing Tuesday, the next commander of Coalition operations in Iraq said, "It would not be a beneficial effect, sir."

And when Joe Lieberman asked if such a resolution would give the enemy cause to believe that Americans were divided, he added, "That's correct, sir." Several Senators protested and demanded that the general stay out of domestic politics, but his only offense was telling the truth. Of course the enemy would take comfort from any Senate declaration that Mr. Bush lacks domestic support.

DOJ_NMG_0121293

All of this also applies to the many Congressional efforts to set "benchmarks" or otherwise micromanage the battlefield. Hillary Rodham Clinton says she is "cursed with the responsibility gene" that makes her unwilling to cut off funds, but instead she proposes to set a cap on U.S. troops in the theater. So while General Petraeus says he needs more troops to fulfill his mission, General Clinton says he doesn't. Which battlefield commander do you trust?

House Republicans are little better. They blame Mr. Bush and Iraq for their loss of Congress, rather than their own ethics, earmarks and other failures. So looking ahead to 2008 they now want to distance themselves from the war they voted for, albeit also without actually having to vote against it. Thus their political brainstorm is to demand monthly "benchmarks for success" that the Bush Administration and Iraqis will have to meet.

So every 30 days, General Petraeus and his men will have to take their attention away from the Baghdad campaign and instead report to Congress on how well Iraqis and Americans are communicating with one another, among other crucial matters. Minority Leader John Boehner is even asking Speaker Nancy Pelosi to create another special Congressional committee to look over the general's shoulder. It's a shame Ulysses S. Grant isn't around to tell them where to put their special committee. * * *

In addition to being feckless, all of this is unconstitutional. As Commander-in-Chief, the President has the sole Constitutional authority to manage the war effort. Congress has two explicit war powers: It has the power to declare war, which in the case of Iraq it essentially did with its resolution of 2002. It also has the power to appropriate funds.

There is a long and unsettled debate over whether Congress can decide to defund specific military operations once it has created a standing Army. We lean toward those who believe it cannot, but the Founders surely didn't imagine that Congress could start dictating when and where the 101st Airborne could be deployed once a war is under way.

Mr. Bush was conciliatory and respectful in his State of the Union Address Tuesday night, asking Congress to give his new Iraq strategy a chance. In a better world, the Members would do so. But if they insist on seeking political cover by trying to operate as a committee of 535 Commanders-in-Chief, Mr. Bush will have to start reminding Congress who really has the job.

Talking Ourselves Into Defeat (WSJ)

By Daniel Henninger

The Wall Street Journal, January 25, 2007

Daniel Henninger is deputy editor of The Wall Street Journal's editorial page. Mr. Henninger joined Dow Jones in 1971 as a staff writer for the National Observer. He became an editorial-page writer for the Journal in 1977, arts editor in 1978 and editorial features editor in 1980. He was appointed assistant editor of the editorial page in 1983 and chief editorial writer and senior assistant editor in October 1986, with daily responsibility for the "Review & Outlook" columns. In November 1989 he became deputy editor of the editorial page.

Mr. Henninger was a finalist for a Pulitzer Prize in editorial writing in 1987 and 1996, and shared in the Journal's Pulitzer Prize in 2002 for the paper's coverage of the attacks on September 11. He won the Gerald Loeb Award for commentary in 1985. In 1998 he received the Scripps Howard Foundation's Walker Stone Award for editorial writing, for editorials on a range of issues, including the International Monetary Fund, presidential politics and cloning. He won the 1995 American Society of Newspaper Editors' Distinguished Writing Award for editorial writing, and he was a finalist in that award in 1985, 1986 and 1993. A native of Cleveland, Mr. Henninger graduated from Georgetown University with a bachelor's degree from the School of Foreign Service.

Mr. Henninger invites comments to henninger@wsj.com1.

Talking Ourselves Into Defeat

January 25, 2007; Page A18

The United States is talking itself into defeat in Iraq. Its political culture is now in a downward spiral of pessimism. In the halls of Congress, across endless newspaper columns, amid the punditocracy and on Sunday morning talk shows -- all emit a Stygian gloom about America.

Yes, on any given day on some discrete issue (Prime Minister Maliki's bona fides, for example), the criticism of the American role is not without justification. But the cumulative effect of this unremitting ill wind is corrosive. We are not only on the way to talking ourselves into defeat in Iraq but into a diminished international status that may be harder to recover than the doom mob imagines. Self-criticism has its role, but profligate self-doubt can exact a price.

Maine GOP Sen. Susan Collins wonders "whether the clock has already run out." To U.S. presidential candidate Hillary Clinton the new strategy is "a dead end." For the Bush troop request, presidential candidate Joe Biden predicted "overwhelming rejection." (His committee resolution to that effect yesterday passed by three votes.) Presidential candidate Chuck Hagel: "We have anarchy in Iraq. It's getting worse." And not least, Sen. John Warner this week heaved his tenured eminence against the war effort, proposing another "non-binding" resolution against more troops.

DOJ_NMG_0121294

To pick one amid scores of similar characterizations in the media, the Associated Press wrote from Washington before the State of the Union speech that "Democrats -- and even some Republicans -- scoffed at his policy." "Scoff" is a strong word, suggesting eye-rolling ridicule. (The line was so good that the AP ran it after the speech as well, under another writer's byline, this time from Baghdad.) But of course amid the giddy vapors of mass mockery, they all "support the troops."

Our slide to a national nervous breakdown because of Iraq is not going unnoticed. Australia's foreign minister, Alexander Downer, has been visiting across the U.S. this week. "I've been pretty worried about what I've heard," Mr. Downer said in an interview. Walking on Santa Monica beach Sunday before last, Mr. Downer said he encountered a display of crosses in the sand, representing the American dead in Iraq.

"What concerns me about this," he said, "is that it's sort of an isolationist sentiment, subconsciously, not consciously, and that would be an enormous problem for the world. I hope the American people understand the importance of not retreating and thinking the world's problems aren't theirs."

Some of this is politics as usual, but even normal partisanship comes dressed now in the language of apocalypse. In his SOTU rebuttal, Democratic Sen. Jim Webb ripped into the current economy, saying it reminded him of the early 1900s: "The dispossessed workers at the bottom were threatening revolt." Ah, we've fallen to the level of czarist Russia.

You know the pessimism has turned manic when no one is allowed to depart the asylum. Sen. John McCain's support for Iraq and the new Bush plan is now being described in press reports as not only costing him support in the polls (the asylum's inkblot of reality) but worse, the support of campaign contributors.

It is a phenomenon fascinating to behold. Its causes are multiple, but here are several:

Bush schadenfreude. Partisan pleasure in George Bush's pain dates to the anguish of the contested 2000 election loss. The Democrats have run against something called "Bush" for so long that this sentiment is now bound up in any act or policy remotely attached to the president. Iraq's troubles, or Iran or North Korea, are merely an artifact of crushing this one guy.

The Iraq Study Group. The ISG report wasn't defeatist, but it enabled the vocabulary of defeat. Its warning of a "slide toward chaos" was re-defined as the current Iraqi status quo. They called their bipartisan solution "phased withdrawal," but it was a euphemism for defeat. Momentum was already building in this direction, and the ISG propelled it.

The leadership vacuum. The administration never rallied the nation behind the war in a concrete way. A young Marine officer recently returned from combat in Iraq told me this week he is taken aback at how disassociated the American people seem from Iraq, no matter how constantly it's in the news. He says it's as if the problem is not so much what is actually happening in Iraq but that the war is "annoying" to Americans, as if to say: Can't it just go away or not be on the front page all the time? Rallying a nation at war is a president's job.

The opposition vacuum. One reason the negative mood in politics is so disconcerting is that the opposition's alternative vision is nonexistent. On joining the opposition recently, GOP Sen. Norm Coleman announced, "I can't tell you what the path to success is." Joe Biden says the "primary" Iraq strategy should be to force its leaders to make the political compromises necessary to "end the violence."

As a political strategy, unremitting opposition has worked. Approval for the president and the war is low. The GOP lost sight of its ideological lodestars and so control of Congress. But the U.S. still occupies a unique position of power in the world, and we are putting that status at risk by playing politics without a net.

On the "Charlie Rose Show" this month, former Army vice chief of staff Gen. Jack Keane, who supports the counterinsurgency plan being undertaken by Gen. David Petraeus, said in exasperation: "My God, this is the United States. We are the world's No. 1 superpower. This isn't about arrogance. This is about capability and applying ourselves to a problem that is at its essence a human problem."

At our current juncture, Gen. Keane's words probably rub many the wrong way. But there's a Cassandra-like warning implicit in them. The mood of mass resignation spreading through the body politic is toxic. It is uncharacteristic of Americans under stress. Some might call it realism, but it looks closer to the fatalism of elderly Europe, overwhelmed and exhausted by its burdens, than to the American tradition.

In 1966, Sen. George Aiken delivered a speech on Vietnam famously translated for history as "declare victory and go home.'" On current course, it looks like we may declare defeat and go home.

URL for this article:

http://online.wsj.com/article/SB116969564694987247.html

Hyperlinks in this Article:

(1) mailto:henninger@wsj.com

Copyright 2007 Dow Jones & Company, Inc. All Rights Reserved

This copy is for your personal, non-commercial use only. Distribution and use of this material are governed by our Subscriber Agreement and by copyright law. For non-personal use or to order multiple copies, please contact Dow Jones Reprints at 1-800-843-0008 or visit www.djreprints.com.

Senators Approve Petraeus Nomination (WP/AP)

The Washington Post, January 25, 2007

WASHINGTON -- A Senate committee on Wednesday approved the nomination of Army Lt. Gen. David Petraeus to command American forces in Iraq, replacing Gen. George Casey.

The Senate Armed Services Committee sent the nomination to the full Senate, which is expected to approve the nomination on Thursday, including promoting Petraeus to four-star rank for the top military post in Iraq.

Bush named Petraeus to replace Casey as part of a revamping of his top military and diplomatic officials in Iraq and the Middle East. While the president's proposal to add 21,500 more U.S. troops to the roughly 132,000 already in Iraq is being widely criticized in Congress, the choice of Petraeus has not been controversial.

Petraeus, 54, has served two previous yearlong tours in Iraq _ as commander of the 101st Airborne Division during the invasion in March 2003 and as commander of the training program for the Iraqi Army in 2004-05.

Casey has been nominated to be the next Army chief of staff.

The committee approved the nomination without opposition at an impromptu meeting in the Capitol, said Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., a member of the panel.

Bush Seeks Action On Iraq Confirmations (AP)

By Deb Riechmann

AP, January 25, 2007

President Bush asked the Senate Wednesday to quickly confirm the top commanders he has chosen to oversee the war in Iraq.

"It is important to get these three fine individuals in their posts as soon as possible so that we have continuity as we do our duty to protect the American people," the president said.

He was referring to Adm. William Fallon, chosen to replace Gen. John Abizaid, the top U.S. commander overseeing the military theater that includes Iraq; Army Lt. Gen. David Petraeus, nominated to be the new chief commander in Iraq; and Gen. George Casey, leaving the top Iraq job to take over from the retiring Gen. Peter Schoomaker as Army chief of staff.

The Senate must approve all three nominations. Late Wednesday, the Senate Armed Services Committee unanimously voted to approve Petraeus and sent his nomination to the full Senate.

Bush's comments came before an annual gathering with top military brass, a meeting in the Cabinet Room that drew the Joint Chiefs of Staff and combatant commanders to talk about Iraq, Afghanistan, terrorism, maintaining a strong military and the defense budget. Dinner in the residence was planned for afterward.

The meeting came shortly after a Senate committee dismissed the president's decision to send 21,500 more U.S. troops to Iraq as "not in the national interest." The Democratic-controlled Senate Foreign Relations Committee voted 12-9 to pass the nonbinding resolution — a rare repudiation of a commander in chief during wartime.

Bush did not mention the vote, but his spokesman said it is not the last word on the president's troop-increase plan.

"The president as commander-in-chief has an obligation to succeed in Iraq and defend Americans, and he believes this is the most effective way to do it," White House press secretary Tony Snow said. "We'll see what they have to say down the road."

Congress's Iraq Quagmire (WP)

The Washington Post, January 25, 2007

ON TUESDAY nearly every member of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee warmly endorsed Lt. Gen. David H. Petraeus, the new U.S. commander in Iraq, and a number wished him success or "Godspeed" in his mission. Yesterday some of the same senators voted for a resolution that opposes the increase of troops for Gen. Petraeus's command -- even though the general testified that he could not accomplish his mission without the additional forces and hinted that such a resolution could encourage the enemy. Such is the muddle of Congress on Iraq: A majority may soon go on record opposing the new offensive in Baghdad even while encouraging the commander who leads it.

That's not to say that senators who are piling on to bipartisan resolutions drawn up by Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr. (D-Del.) or Sen. John W. Warner (R-Va.) don't have good reasons for skepticism. We share some of their main concerns: that the Iraqi government won't deliver on the long list of "benchmarks" the administration has set and that U.S. troops will end up fighting on one or both sides of an ugly sectarian war. Even if the objective of pacifying Baghdad with American troops were a good one, it's not clear that enough troops are being sent for long enough to succeed.

It doesn't help that accounts of the new plan given by its principal architects vary significantly. Gen. Petraeus said in his Senate testimony that the goal is to protect the Iraqi population in Baghdad so that reconstruction and the political process can move forward. The man he will replace, Gen. George W. Casey Jr., and his spokesmen say the idea is to accelerate training and the handover of security operations to Iraqis. So does Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, who seems to barely tolerate the plan for additional American troops.

The outgoing Iraq commander has said two additional U.S. brigades could accomplish the mission. The incoming general says he has asked that orders be issued for all five brigades and stressed that he has the authority to ask for further reinforcements. He testified: "None of this will be rapid. In fact, the way ahead will be neither quick nor easy."

Our guess is that it is Gen. Petraeus's concept that will govern U.S. actions on the ground. Until now, Gen. Petraeus had been the most successful American commander in the war; in that sense senators are right to support him and quickly approve his nomination. But legislators need a better way to act on their opposition to the current policy than the passage of nonbinding resolutions that may cover them politically but have no practical impact -- other than, perhaps, the negative one suggested by the general.

As it happens, Gen. Petraeus made his own suggestion at Tuesday's hearing, offering to report to Congress regularly about the mission, including updates on the performance by Iraqis on their commitments. "I want to assure you that should I determine that the new strategy cannot succeed, I will provide such an assessment," he said. Taking Gen. Petraeus up on that, and closely and systematically monitoring the progress of events in Iraq during the coming months, is probably the best contribution that Congress can make to helping the new American commander address what he calls a "dire" situation.

Defending Iraq War, Defiant Cheney Cites "Enormous Successes" (WP)

By Peter Baker

The Washington Post, January 25, 2007

Vice President Cheney said yesterday that the administration has achieved "enormous successes" in Iraq but complained that critics and the media "are so eager to write off this effort or declare it a failure" that they are undermining U.S. troops in a war zone, striking a far more combative tone than President Bush did in his State of the Union address the night before.

In a television interview that turned increasingly contentious as it wore on, Cheney rejected the gloomy portrayal of Iraq that has become commonly accepted even among Bush supporters. "There's problems" in Iraq, he said, but it is not a "terrible situation." And congressional opposition "won't stop us" from sending 21,500 more troops, he said, it will only "validate the terrorists' strategy."

The defiant tenor contrasted sharply with Bush's speech Tuesday night, when the president congratulated Democrats on their election victory, offered to work with them on a variety of domestic policies, and told skeptics of his latest Iraq plan that he respects their arguments even as he asked them to give him one more chance to win the war. Bush acknowledged deep troubles in Iraq and made little effort to paint it a success. In a recent interview, Bush said his old policy was heading for "slow failure."

Cheney, on the other hand, rejected the idea that there has been any failure and gave voice to the aggravation many in the White House feel as Democrats step up their attacks on the administration. As leading Democrats lace their rhetoric with words such as "blunder" and "reckless," the White House has tried to calibrate how hard to push back. On a day when the Senate Foreign Relations Committee passed a resolution denouncing Bush's troop increase, Cheney decided not to hold back.

"The pressure is from some quarters to get out of Iraq," he told CNN. "If we were to do that, we would simply validate the terrorists' strategy that says the Americans will not stay to complete the task, that we don't have the stomach for the fight."

Cheney said the administration would disregard the nonbinding resolution opposing the troop increase and suggested it undermines soldiers in a war zone. "It won't stop us," he said. "And it would be, I think, detrimental from the standpoint of the troops."

Cheney has been criticized in the past for presenting what some called an overly rosy view of the situation in Iraq, most notably in 2005 when he said the insurgency was in its "last throes." The view he expressed yesterday seemed no less positive, and he sparred repeatedly with "Situation Room" host Wolf Blitzer, telling him "you're wrong" and suggesting he was embracing defeat.

When Blitzer asked whether the administration's credibility had been hurt by "the blunders and the failures" in Iraq, Cheney interjected: "Wolf, Wolf, I simply don't accept the premise of your question. I just think it's hogwash."

In fact, Cheney said, the operation in Iraq has achieved its original mission. "What we did in Iraq in taking down Saddam Hussein was exactly the right thing to do," he said. "The world is much safer today because of it. There have been three national elections in Iraq. There's a democracy established there, a constitution, a new democratically elected government. Saddam has been brought to justice and executed. His sons are dead. His government is gone."

DOJ_NMG_0121297

"If he were still there today," Cheney added, "we'd have a terrible situation."

"But there is," Blitzer said.

"No, there is not," Cheney retorted. "There is not. There's problems -- ongoing problems -- but we have in fact accomplished our objectives of getting rid of the old regime, and there is a new regime in place that's been here for less than a year, far too soon for you guys to write them off." He added: "Bottom line is that we've had enormous successes and we will continue to have enormous successes."

Cheney said Blitzer was advocating retreat. "What you're recommending, or at least what you seem to believe the right course is, is to bail out," the vice president said.

"I'm just asking," Blitzer objected.

"No, you're not asking."

Blitzer has been in the Cheney doghouse since October, when he interviewed the vice president's wife, Lynne, and asked about steamy scenes in a novel she wrote. The subject came up because James Webb, a Democrat then running for Senate from Virginia, had cited her novel in trying to defend explicit scenes he had written. Lynne Cheney angrily rebuffed Blitzer, and her husband later congratulated her for what he called "the slapdown."

Yesterday, the CNN host mentioned that Cheney's lesbian daughter, Mary, has become pregnant and asked whether he wanted to respond to conservatives who have criticized her.

"I'm delighted I'm about to have a sixth grandchild, Wolf," Cheney said. "And obviously, I think the world of both my daughters and all of my grandchildren. And I think, frankly, you're out of line with that question."

Blitzer tried to defend himself: "I think all of us appreciate --" Cheney cut him off: "I think you're out of line."

"We like your daughters," Blitzer replied. "Believe me, I'm very sympathetic to Liz and to Mary. I like them both. That was a question that's come up, and it's a responsible, fair question."

"I just fundamentally disagree with you," Cheney said.

Cheney was terse, too, about leading Democrats. Asked whether he thinks Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (N.Y.) would make a good president, Cheney said simply, "No, I don't."

"Why?"

"Because she's a Democrat. I don't agree with her philosophically and from a policy standpoint."

And how did it feel to sit next to Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.), the first woman to serve as House speaker?

"I prefer Dennis Hastert."

Cheney: Situation In Iraq Not Hopeless (AP)

AP, January 24, 2007

Vice President Dick Cheney said Wednesday it's "hogwash" to suggest the Bush administration's credibility is on the line because of mistakes in Iraq.

Cheney acknowledged the situation in Iraq was very unstable but said toppling Saddam Hussein had been the right thing to do. He said he trusted Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, who he said had demonstrated a willingness to take on lawbreakers regardless of their religious or ethnic affiliations.

"The critics have not suggested a policy — they haven't put anything in place," Cheney said in an occasionally testy interview with CNN anchor Wolf Blitzer.

"All they've recommended is to redeploy or to withdraw our forces. The fact is, we can complete the task in Iraq. We're going to do it. We've got (Lt. Gen. David) Petraeus — Gen. Petraeus taking over. It is a good strategy. It will work. But we have to have the stomach to finish the task."

Cheney bristled when asked to respond to critics who question his daughter Mary's decision to have a baby and raise it with her female partner. "I think you're out of line with that question," replied Cheney, who said he was delighted about having a sixth grandchild.

The vice president said he does not think Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York would make a very good president "because she's a Democrat."

"I don't agree with her philosophically and from a policy standpoint," he said.

Cheney said he believes Osama bin Laden is alive, but would not speculate about whether he might be hiding in Afghanistan, Pakistan or along their shared border. "I don't want to be that precise," Cheney said.

DOJ_NMG_0121298

The vice president said passage of a Senate resolution opposing President Bush's decision to send more troops to Iraq would not change the administration's new strategy in Iraq.

"The Congress has control over the purse strings. They have the right, obviously, if they want, to cut off funding," Cheney said.

"But in terms of this effort, the president has made his decision. We've consulted extensively with them. We'll continue to consult with the Congress. But the fact of the matter is, we need to get the job done."

Asked point-blank if the administration's credibility was at stake, Cheney shot back: "I simply don't accept the premise of your question. I just think it's hogwash."

The vice president said the biggest mistake the United States has made in the war was underestimating the psychological effect the Saddam Hussein regime had on Iraqi citizens.

"I think we underestimated the extent to which 30 years of Saddam's rule had really hammered the population, especially the Shia population, into submissiveness," he said. "It was very hard for them to stand up and take responsibility in part because anybody who had done that in the past had had their heads chopped off."

Cheney Defends Actions In Iraq (LAT)

By Maura Reynolds, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, January 25, 2007

WASHINGTON -- A day after President Bush struck a conciliatory tone toward critics of the Iraq war, Vice President Dick Cheney did the opposite Wednesday, denouncing as "hogwash" the assertion that the administration had lost credibility because of blunders in Iraq.

Cheney defended the decision to invade Iraq nearly four years ago, and insisted that "there's been a lot of success" since then. His comments came during a CNN interview, an exception to the vice president's more common practice of talking to conservative media outlets.

"There's problems, ongoing problems, but we have, in fact, accomplished our objectives of getting rid of the old regime," Cheney said, adding that "there is a new regime in place that's been there for less than a year, far too soon for you guys to write them off."

In his annual State of the Union address the previous evening, Bush acknowledged a string of setbacks in Iraq over the past year, but urged Congress not to give up.

"This is not the fight we entered in Iraq," Bush conceded, "but it is the fight we're in. Every one of us wishes this war were over and won."

By contrast, Cheney suggested that the administration's critics were "dead wrong" about the war.

"For the first time, we've had elections, and majority rule will prevail there. But the notion that somehow the effort hasn't been worth it, or that we shouldn't go ahead and complete the task, is just dead wrong," Cheney said.

Recent polls show increasing public dissatisfaction with the war and a majority of Americans say that the war was not worth the effort. A Gallup poll earlier this month showed 58 percent of respondents agreeing that the costs of the war outweighed its benefits and roughly the same number -- 59 percent -- said they opposed the president's plan to send more troops to stabilize Baghdad.

Cheney long has been a polarizing figure for the administration, which is one reason why he has generally limited his public appearances to conservative groups. But in recent months, Cheney has become an increasingly problematic figure even among stalwart Republicans, in part for his defense of former Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld.

Rumsfeld, who drew the wrath of Republicans as well as Democrats for refusing to acknowledge failures or to shift strategy in Iraq, was forced to resign after Republican losses in November elections put control of Congress in Democrats' hands for the first time in Bush's two-term presidency.

During the CNN interview, Wolf Blitzer noted that Democrats and some Republicans "are now seriously questioning your credibility because of the blunders, of the failures."

"Wolf, I simply don't accept the premise of your question," Cheney responded. "I just think its hogwash."

Cheney generally spoke in soothing tones during the televised interview, which also touched on topics ranging from the whereabouts of Osama bin Laden to whether Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, D-N.Y., would make a good president. But his words were combative.

"No, I don't," the vice president replied to the Clinton question.

"Why?" asked the interviewer.

"Because she's a Democrat. I don't agree with her philosophically and from a policy standpoint."

DOJ_NMG_0121299

But it was when Blitzer asked about his daughter's pregnancy that Cheney's words became most aggressive. Mary Cheney, who is openly lesbian and involved a long-term homosexual partnership, is pregnant with what will be the vice president's sixth grandchild.

In his question, Blitzer cited a statement by Focus on the Family, a conservative organization critical of the pregnancy. "Just because it's possible to conceive a child outside of the relationship of a married mother and father, doesn't mean it's best for the child," the group said last month.

"I'm delighted I'm about to have a sixth grandchild, Wolf, and obviously think the world of both of my daughters and all of my grandchildren. And I think, frankly, you're out of line with that question," Cheney said.

Later in the day, White House spokesman Tony Snow defended the vice president's responses about his daughter.

"People should not be trying to draw family members in," Snow said on Fox News Channel. "I think that family members ought to be off the limits."

Cheney Increasingly On The Defensive (MCT)

By Ron Hutcheson

McClatchy, January 25, 2007

WASHINGTON - Vice President Dick Cheney, often considered the hidden power behind the White House throne, is increasingly out in the open and on the defensive.

He's scheduled to testify at the perjury trial of his former top aide; congressional Democrats want to probe his role in the White House; and his unprecedented clout may be waning. Once widely considered a source of wisdom and experience in the White House, the vice president has become a frequent target of criticism.

On Wednesday, a testy Cheney sparred with CNN anchor Wolf Blitzer over Iraq and al-Qaida and insisted that Bush administration policies have succeeded in both cases. While he's acknowledged mistakes in Iraq, he bristled when Blitzer suggested that Cheney had lost credibility because of blunders there.

"I just simply don't accept the premise of your question," he said, cutting the interviewer off in mid-sentence. "I just think it's hogwash."

Even some Republican lawmakers have become increasingly vocal about their concerns over Cheney's role in the administration, especially as an aggressive and influential advocate for invading Iraq. He's also been instrumental in White House efforts to expand presidential power and restrict civil liberties in the pursuit of suspected terrorists.

"The president listened too much to the vice president," Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., told The Politico, a new Capitol Hill publication. McCain, a leading GOP presidential hopeful for 2008, said Bush was "very badly served" by Cheney and former Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, who was one of Cheney's closest allies.

Cheney told CNN that McCain is "a good man" with whom he sometimes disagrees.

Democrats have been more scathing.

"The vice president doesn't know what he's talking about," Sen. Joe Biden, D-Del., the chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, told Fox News last Sunday. "He has yet to be right one single time on Iraq. Name me one single time he's been right. It's about time we stop listening to that ideological rhetoric."

Cheney insisted on CNN Wednesday that "there's been a lot of success" in Iraq, and said that if the Senate passes a non-binding resolution opposing the administration's troop buildup there, "it won't stop us." The biggest threat to victory, he said, is if "we don't have the stomach for the fight."

The vice president also claimed success in weakening al-Qaida, removing the terrorist group's leadership below Osama bin Laden and his deputy, Ayman al-Zawahiri, "several times". "We've had great success against al-Qaida," Cheney said.

Democrats, emboldened by their recent takeover of Congress, say they may hold hearings to probe Cheney's roles in the Iraq war, Bush's expansion of presidential power and the administration's energy policies. Critics, including some former administration officials, have accused Cheney of pressuring intelligence analysts to support the case for war and promoting intelligence from Iraqi exile groups that proved to be bogus.

White House officials say Bush values Cheney's advice as much as ever, but there's little doubt that the vice president has lost some clout. His ally Rumsfeld was recently replaced by Defense Secretary Robert Gates, whose views aren't always in sync with the vice president's.

In another step back from Cheney's hard-line approach, the administration announced last week that it had agreed to stop warrantless wiretapping and instead seek court approval for any surveillance. Cheney had insisted that court oversight wasn't necessary.

DOJ_NMG_0121300

The vice president could face more difficulty when he's called to testify at the perjury trial of his former chief of staff, I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby. Cheney told CNN that he'd testify "within a matter of weeks."

The case stems from allegations that White House officials disclosed the identity of former CIA spy Valerie Plame because her husband, former Ambassador Joseph Wilson, had challenged the administration's claim that Saddam Hussein had shopped for uranium in the African country of Niger. That claim also proved to be false.

Prosecutors say that Cheney was determined to counter Wilson's criticism and directed Libby to undermine Wilson's credibility with reporters. Libby is charged with obstruction of justice and lying to a grand jury investigating the Plame affair.

Libby's lawyers say that Cheney felt that his aide was made a White House scapegoat to protect presidential adviser Karl Rove, whom Bush was counting on to direct Republican election strategy. Rove has since acknowledged that he tipped off at least one reporter to Plame's identity.

The vice president told CNN he remains "a strong friend and supporter" of Libby's, but he declined to discuss the case.

"This'll all unfold here in the very near future," he told Fox News recently. "I have strong views on this subject, but I'm not going to talk about it."

Rumsfeld's Transition Raises Questions (WT)

By Rowan Scarborough

The Washington Times, January 25, 2007

Former Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld has left the Pentagon, but not the Defense Department.

On Jan. 4, Mr. Rumsfeld opened a government-provided transition office in Arlington and has seven Pentagon-paid staffers working for him, a Pentagon official said.

The Pentagon lists Mr. Rumsfeld as a "nonpaid consultant," a status he needs in order to review secret and top-secret documents, the official said.

Mr. Rumsfeld and his aides, who include close adviser Stephen Cambone, are sifting through the thousands of pages of documents generated during his tenure.

The Pentagon official said former secretaries are entitled to a transition office to sort papers, some of which can be taken with them for a library, for archives or to write a book.

The transition office has raised some eyebrows inside the Pentagon. Some question the size of the staff, which includes two military officers and two enlisted men. They also ask why the sorting could not have been done from the time Mr. Rumsfeld resigned Nov. 8 to when he left the building Dec. 18.

The Pentagon official, who asked not to be named, said Mr. Rumsfeld served nearly six years as secretary, more than any other defense chief but one, meaning he accumulated an above-average pile of paper.

What's more, Mr. Rumsfeld managed the bureaucracy via "snowflakes," his typed directives on white paper that fell all over the Pentagon by the hundreds.

Mr. Rumsfeld, who resigned under pressure after Republicans lost control of Congress in an election largely decided on the stalemated Iraq war, reportedly is undecided about his long-term plans. But he thinks he has a lot to contribute in the debate over new ideas and national security. He has talked about writing a book and articles on foreign affairs, but he has made no final decision.

Mr. Rumsfeld's two immediate predecessors handled their transitions differently.

William Cohen, President Clinton's last defense secretary, went straight to his new consulting firm in Washington, said a top adviser, Robert Tyrer.

The Pentagon set up an office with two military personnel to sort through his papers for about six weeks.

"It was useful to have a place to make sure things were sorted correctly and all issues of classification strictly reviewed and observed," said Mr. Tyrer, who is now president of the Cohen Group.

The unclassified documents were transferred to the University of Maine's William S. Cohen Center, he said.

Mr. Cohen's predecessor, William Perry, left office in January 1997 and returned immediately to his home state of California. He did not open a transition office in Washington. He began teaching at Stanford University, said Deborah Gordon, his spokeswoman.

His papers arrived in compact disc form and were deposited at the Hoover Institution on the Stanford campus, she said.

Pentagon Cuts Stop-loss (HILL)

By Roxana Tiron

The Hill, January 25, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0121301

Secretary of Defense Robert Gates is ordering military service chiefs to reduce the use of a controversial policy intended to keep troops in war zones beyond the end of their original commitments, according to a document obtained by The Hill.

In a memo sent to the service chiefs, the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff and undersecretaries of defense, Gates asked to see plans to minimize the use of the so-called stop-loss policy for active duty and reserve components by the end of next month.

Gates's directive comes at a time when the White House's plan to increase the number of troops in Iraq by 21,500 is coming under intense criticism on both sides of the aisle, in part because it would extend the tours of duty of troops already on the ground and trigger stop-loss orders.

"They're extending and stop-lossing people in the country [Iraq] themselves," Rep. John Murtha (D-Pa.), chairman of the House defense appropriations committee and an outspoken critic of the White House's Iraq strategy, said on MSNBC earlier this month. "And it is very unpopular, even with the troops themselves, when they don't understand the mission."

Several House Republicans sent a letter to Gates last week asking that members of the National Guard and Reserve not be kept on active duty beyond their original commitment.

"The stop-loss program is, in essence, a hidden draft," said Rep. Randy Kuhl (R-N.Y.), one of the members who wrote to Gates.

The letter to Gates also says that the Pentagon's use of stop-loss "betrays [soldiers'] trust, separates families and threatens to devastate the likelihood that active-duty soldiers will follow up their service with time serving in the reserves."

Reps. Christopher Shays (Conn.), Steven LaTourette (Ohio) and Jim Ramstad (Minn.) also signed the letter to Gates.

A stop-loss order for National Guard and Reserve units activated for the war against terrorism has been in effect since November 2002. The policy allows the Pentagon to keep soldiers whose enlistment is due to expire in order to maintain troop strength and unit integrity.

Specifically, the president may suspend any provision of law relating to promotion, retirement, or separation applicable to any member of the armed forces whom the president determines is essential to the national security of the United States.

But the policy has attracted a myriad of lawsuits from reservists who have argued that the policy illegally makes them stay in the military once their required term of service is complete.

The Pentagon has successfully argued that under federal law it can extend the deployment of any reserve officer who is on active duty, if the president believes doing so is essential to national security.

For the Pentagon, stop-loss orders are a tool to stem a large reduction of personnel and maximize cohesion and experience for units fighting in Iraq and Afghanistan.

Gates's directive to reduce the use of stop-loss is part of a wider initiative to change deployment policies for reserve forces and the use of the so-called total force, which encompasses both active and reserve units.

In the memo, Gates outlines the changes to the deployment of reserve and active forces, which he first announced the day after Bush announced his new Iraq strategy.

Members of the reserve forces will have an involuntary deployment time for one year, followed by five years on their home bases.

But there may be some exceptions to that policy.

"Today's global demands will require a number of selected Guard/Reserve to be remobilized sooner than this standard," Gates wrote. "Our intention is that such be temporary."

However, he urged the services to plan their force structure based on a one-year deployment time and five years of demobilization.

Meanwhile, ground combat and combat support will be managed on a unit basis. "This will allow greater cohesion and predictability in how these Reserve units train and deploy," Gates said. "Exceptions will require my approval."

Active-duty forces will deploy for one year at a time and will spend two years at their home bases, according to Gates. Currently most active units deploy for one year and spend just one year at their home bases, after which they immediately deploy again.

For those in the active and reserve force who have to deploy earlier and often, or have to extend their tours beyond the rotation policy, Gates is planning to establish a compensation and incentives program, according to the memo.

The Pentagon chief is also directing all commands and units to review how they administer a so-called hardship waiver program to ensure that they are properly taking into account exceptional circumstances facing military families of deployed service members.

Bush Plans New Focus On Afghan Recovery (WP)

DOJ_NMG_0121302

By Michael Abramowitz

The Washington Post, January 25, 2007

After the bloodiest year in Afghanistan since the U.S. invasion, the Bush administration is preparing a series of new military, economic and political initiatives aimed partly at preempting an expected offensive this spring by Taliban insurgents, according to senior U.S. officials.

Even as it trumpeted a change of course in Iraq this month, the White House has completed a review of U.S. policy in Afghanistan. It will ask Congress for $7 billion to $8 billion in new funds for security, reconstruction and other projects in Afghanistan as part of the upcoming budget package, officials said.

That would represent a sizable increase in the U.S. commitment to the strife-torn country; since the 2001 U.S.-led invasion that toppled the Taliban, the United States has provided a little more than $14 billion in assistance for Afghanistan, the State Department says.

The U.S. military said yesterday that about 3,500 soldiers in the Army's 10th Mountain Division will have their tours in Afghanistan extended by four months, as part of an effort to beef up U.S. troop strength. And Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice will meet with other NATO foreign ministers in Brussels on Friday to discuss Afghanistan, part of a new diplomatic offensive U.S. officials say is aimed at securing more international support for the government of President Hamid Karzai.

Although U.S. officials say the Taliban insurgency does not pose an immediate threat to the Karzai government, they are eager to nip in the bud a potentially bloody Taliban spring offensive that could erode Afghani confidence in the central government and in the staying power of the international coalition that is trying to establish security across the country.

Violence escalated last year in Afghanistan as allied forces confronted an emboldened Taliban movement in the south, and the central government encountered continuing problems providing basic services. Many government and outside experts on Afghanistan are also worried that the border regions between Pakistan and Afghanistan are once again turning into safe havens for Taliban militants and their al-Qaeda allies. One senior official said the Taliban maintains "command and control" of the insurgency from Pakistan.

"Everyone talks about the Taliban military offensive this spring," said Kurt D. Volker, a senior State Department official involved with NATO policy. "We should be the ones taking the offensive if there is an offensive to be done. . . . It needs to be across the board. It's not just a military issue; it's a comprehensive issue -- development, counternarcotics, reconstruction and military." Volker said U.S. officials want to cut off the Taliban's ability to impose its will on groups in Afghanistan.

The U.S. politics surrounding Afghanistan offer an intriguing counterpoint to the U.S. politics regarding Iraq. While most Democrats fiercely oppose President Bush's plan to send another 21,000 troops to Iraq, they support a more invigorated battle in Afghanistan. If anything, they say, the administration has neglected Afghanistan, failing to insist that NATO allies assume more of the burden in maintaining stability there.

Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (N.Y.), the leading Democratic presidential contender for 2008, returned from a trip to Afghanistan and Iraq last week saying U.S. priorities are "upside down" in the focus on Iraq. She told reporters, "We should be adding more American military forces [in Afghanistan], and we should be requiring the NATO countries to fulfill their commitments to the forces that they had promised us."

Rep. Tom Lantos (D-Calif.), the chairman of the House Foreign Affairs Committee, said he complained sharply to Rice this week about what he called an "appalling" lack of willingness to share the burden in Afghanistan by key allies like Germany and France. "I sense that fundamentally she agrees with me," Lantos added.

The issue of burden-sharing has been a flashpoint for trans-Atlantic relations as NATO has gradually taken over much of the responsibility for security in Afghanistan in the past two years. There are about 34,000 NATO troops in Afghanistan, including about 12,000 U.S. soldiers, and another 12,000 U.S. troops operate there under U.S. command, according to Pentagon figures.

Bush and other U.S. officials have been pressing countries such as Germany, Italy and Spain to lift restrictions on their troops being deployed to the more violent southern areas of Afghanistan, where the Taliban insurgency is strongest. NATO countries did not fully meet former NATO supreme commander James L. Jones's calls for additional troops and equipment.

Jones's successor as NATO commander, Army Gen. Bantz J. Craddock, is working on a new assessment of troop and equipment needs for Afghanistan, and when that is complete, U.S. officials say, they will be pressing allies to help provide additional support for the mission. As officials described it, they are talking about a possible increase of several thousand troops for Afghanistan -- not all in U.S. contributions.

One senior administration official said that Rice's trip this week, coupled with follow-up visits by her subordinates and defense officials, are intended to demonstrate to European governments that the United States is committed to Afghanistan and would not abandon it to NATO simply because it was overwhelmed by the turmoil in Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0121303

There are "serious questions across the board" in Europe about the depth of the U.S. commitment, the official said, including worries that the buildup in Iraq would take troops from Afghanistan. The official, like several others interviewed for this article, spoke on the condition of anonymity because the results of the administration's Afghanistan review are not public.

Officials said the review began in the middle of last year and was prompted by a desire to reevaluate U.S. strategy in the wake of political changes in the country, as well as the resurgent Taliban militia. One senior official said a major conclusion of the review was the need to accelerate efforts to build roads, schools and other reconstruction projects in the wake of efforts to clean out insurgents. "We are talking about large amounts of money to kick-start the effort," this source said.

Another senior official involved with Afghanistan policy, offering a private briefing recently, said allied troops are facing a "bloody year in the south" in fighting the Taliban and slow progress in tackling the problems in the country, including corruption, opium production, and lack of roads and other infrastructure. "We still can succeed," he said, but "it is going to be a long project."

Staff writers Ann Scott Tyson, Thomas E. Ricks and Glenn Kessler contributed to this report.

Pakistani Premier Faults Afghans For Taliban Woes On Border (NYT)

By Katrin Bennhold And Mark Landler

The New York Times, January 25, 2007

DAVOS, Switzerland, Jan. 24 — Pakistan's prime minister, Shaukat Aziz, acknowledged Wednesday that people sympathetic to the Taliban were active in the frontier regions near the border with Afghanistan. But he insisted that the root of the problem was the Afghan government's weak authority, not Pakistani support of the Taliban.

"We believe the core of the problem is in Afghanistan," Mr. Aziz said, in an interview at the World Economic Forum here in Davos.

Mr. Aziz also said three million Afghan refugees were crowded into Quetta, Peshawar and other Pakistani cities close to the 1,700 mile-border between the countries. Despite what he described as stepped-up Pakistani efforts to root out extremists, the refugee population remains a recruiting pool for the Taliban insurgency, Mr. Aziz said. But he dismissed allegations that his country was supporting the militants.

"This notion that Pakistan may be in some way or other supporting these people or giving them safe haven is ridiculous," he said.

As for suspicions that elements in Pakistan's intelligence service, the I.S.I., might be acting independently in support of the Taliban, he said, "That's equally ridiculous."

"The Pakistani intelligence service is a disciplined service, and they act in line with the government," Mr. Aziz insisted.

On Sunday, a correspondent for The New York Times, Carlotta Gall, reported that she had found anecdotal evidence in and around Quetta to support charges by Western diplomats and Pakistani opposition figures that the Pakistani intelligence agencies were encouraging the Taliban insurgency in Afghanistan.

While reporting in Quetta, Ms. Gall was assaulted by plainclothes intelligence agents in her hotel room, and her photographer, Akhtar Soomro, was detained. Their computers, notes and cellphones were taken, and since then Pakistani agents have tracked down their sources. Ms. Gall said her visa to report in Pakistan had no restrictions.

Mr. Aziz said Ms. Gall "should not have been where she was, legally," and that she had violated the terms of her visa by visiting Quetta without authorization from the government. He added that it was "regrettable she got bruised in that interaction" and said the government was investigating the matter.

"We don't condone behavior that is physical harassment," Mr. Aziz said. "That's not on."

Pakistan has come under increasing criticism from NATO officials and Western leaders for not doing enough to clamp down on terrorist networks. This month, in his most recent threat assessment, the American director of national intelligence, John D. Negroponte, said Al Qaeda continued to operate from "their leaders' secure hide-out in Pakistan."

Mr. Aziz said the Pakistani government did not know the whereabouts of Osama bin Laden, Al Qaeda's leader, or of Mullah Muhammad Omar, the leader of the Taliban. But he said, "Certainly they are not in Pakistan."

On Wednesday, President Pervez Musharraf dismissed allegations that Pakistani officials were sheltering the head of the Taliban, and said the United States-led war in Afghanistan could not be won without Pakistan's help, [a news agency] reported from Abu Dhabi, capital of the United Arab Emirates.

"The fight against terrorism and extremism, whether it is Al Qaeda or Taliban, can never succeed without Pakistan's cooperation and Pakistan is the only country that has delivered the maximum on both," Mr. Musharraf said at a news conference in Abu Dhabi.

Troops Battle Insurgents In Central Baghdad (WP)

DOJ_NMG_0121304

By Ernesto Londono And Joshua Partlow

The Washington Post, January 25, 2007

BAGHDAD, Jan. 24 -- With attack helicopters circling overhead, U.S. and Iraqi forces waged an intense battle Wednesday to clear armed men from high-rise buildings in a strategic Baghdad neighborhood that had been the scene of a similar day of combat two weeks ago.

The fighting along Haifa Street, a Sunni-dominated area on the west bank of the Tigris River, began before dawn and lasted well into the day, with insurgents firing down from tall buildings, U.S. military officials said.

"We have intelligence information that the terrorist group is back and trying to take some other places," said Ali Dabbagh, a spokesman for the prime minister. "It's a very strategic and important location. It's in the middle of Baghdad; it has a view of all of Baghdad."

The recurring fighting on Haifa Street illustrates the severe challenges facing the 17,500 additional U.S. troops that President Bush plans to send to Baghdad to try to secure the city. In a treacherous, cramped urban setting, and surrounded by civilians, U.S. and Iraqi troops have repeatedly fought for control of neighborhoods in the capital, only to have insurgents return to fight again.

On Wednesday, U.S. and Iraqi forces came under attack around Haifa Street and responded with mortar fire, the military said in a statement. "As light broke on the city, troops met enemy resistance, including hand-held grenades, small arms fire and rocket-propelled grenades from high-rise buildings," the statement said.

Explosions could be heard coming from the area and thick black smoke rose above the high-rises that line the street. The military said it seized a cache of weapons, including numerous rocket-propelled grenades and antitank rounds, during the raid.

More than 30 "terrorists" were arrested during the operation and roughly 25 were killed, Dabbagh said Wednesday night. A U.S. military spokesman, Lt. Col. Scott Bleichwehl, said he was aware of seven arrests and did not know whether anyone had died.

A U.S. soldier died Wednesday in central Baghdad after being shot, the military said in a statement. It was unclear whether the soldier died in the Haifa Street operation.

The military also disclosed Wednesday that two Marines were killed Tuesday in Anbar province, west of Baghdad.

The U.S. ambassador in Iraq, Zalmay Khalilzad, told reporters Wednesday that he was encouraged by early indications that Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki was taking a tougher stance against Shiite militias in Baghdad.

"We will have to wait and see what happens, but I believe that recent trends . . . [are] more positive than in the past," Khalilzad said. "But there is ongoing concern about death squad activities, about the future of the militias, concern that they might be lying low, avoiding a conflict now, in order to fight another day."

Speaking at the embassy in Baghdad's heavily fortified Green Zone, Khalilzad questioned whether radical Shiite Muslim cleric Moqtada al-Sadr, leader of the powerful Mahdi Army militia, was sincere in his appeals to end the violence. "Is it a change of tactic or is it a change of heart?"

Khalilzad said Maliki's change of stance was likely driven by the failure of political engagement with Sadr and other Iraqi factions to slow the sectarian killing.

This week, the U.S. military said in a statement that Iraqi and U.S.-led troops had launched 52 operations against the Mahdi Army and that 600 militiamen were in detention, including 16 high-level figures. In previous efforts to pacify Baghdad, Maliki has failed to rein in Shiite militias.

Khalilzad also discussed briefly the five American security contractors, employees of Blackwater USA, who were killed in Baghdad on Tuesday. U.S. officials have said a Blackwater helicopter was shot down while assisting a U.S. Embassy convoy that came under attack in central Baghdad.

"We lost five fine men," Khalilzad said. "They helped me, I've traveled with them, so I went and visited them and saw them while in the morgue yesterday. I felt very bad, because as I said, I knew these people."

Khalilzad said the helicopter crash was under investigation. U.S. officials on Wednesday did not confirm reports that some of the contractors might have been shot after their small helicopter crashed.

A Sunni insurgent group known as the 1920 Revolution Brigades posted a video clip on the Internet that purports to show the downed Blackwater helicopter smoldering near a building and the corpses of at least two men. The authenticity of the video could not be verified.

In Baghdad, police said Wednesday that they had found 17 bodies of people shot in the head during the past 24 hours. Also Wednesday, mortar shells killed at least six civilians, while makeshift bombs in markets killed at least eight, according to Brig. Gen. Abdullah Muhsin of the Interior Ministry.

DOJ_NMG_0121305

Street Battles Kill 30 Militants (WT/AP)

By Bassem Mroue

The Washington Times, January 25, 2007

BAGHDAD -- U.S. and Iraqi troops clashed with gunmen firing heavy weapons from concrete high-rises in a Sunni insurgent stronghold north of the heavily fortified Green Zone yesterday. Iraqi's Defense Ministry said as many as 30 militants were killed and 27 captured.

Apache attack helicopters buzzed past the tall buildings and radio towers, with several Humvees on the tree-lined street below. Gunfire rang in the background as shells fell, according to AP Television News footage.

Black smoke rose from the area, on the west bank of the Tigris River about one mile north of the Green Zone, site of the U.S. and British embassies as well as the Iraqi government headquarters. The clashes were the second major fighting to break out in the area in less than a month.

New details also emerged about the downing of a private U.S. security company helicopter on Tuesday, with U.S. and Iraqi officials saying four of five Americans who died in the incident were shot execution-style -- in the back of the head.

A senior Iraqi military official said a machine gunner downed the helicopter, but a U.S. military official in Washington said there were no indications that the aircraft, owned by Blackwater USA, had been shot out of the sky. Two Sunni insurgent groups, separately, took responsibility for the crash.

A Sunni insurgent group called the Ansar al-Sunnah Army posted identity cards of men who were on the helicopter on a Web site, including at least two that bore the name of Arthur Laguna, who was later identified by his mother as among those killed.

Mr. Laguna, was a 52-year-old pilot for Blackwater who previously served in the Army and the California National Guard, said his mother, Lydia Laguna, of Rio Linda, Calif. She said she received a call from her other son, also a Blackwater pilot in Baghdad, notifying her of Mr. Laguana's death.

There were conflicting numbers of insurgents reported killed and captured in yesterday's fighting, which began before dawn. Iraq's Defense Ministry spokesman Mohammed al-Askari said 30 insurgents were killed and 27 arrested, including four Egyptians and a Sudanese man.

The U.S. military said seven suspected insurgents were detained, and rocket-propelled grenades, anti-tank rounds and 155 mm artillery rounds were seized. The U.S. statement did not mention deaths.

The military reported separately that a U.S. soldier was killed yesterday in clashes near the city's center. Officials declined to give more specifics or say whether it was connected to the Haifa Street fighting. The military also said that two Marines were killed Tuesday in western Anbar province.

U.S. and Iraqi troops are gearing up for a broader security crackdown to quell the sectarian violence in the capital. Mr. al-Askari said the fighting yesterday was not part of that plan.

Haifa Street has been the site of numerous clashes, including a major battle on Jan. 9, just three days after Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki announced his new security plan for pacifying Baghdad.

U.S., Iraqi Forces Work To Tame 'Sniper Alley' (LAT)

By Alexandra Zavis

The Los Angeles Times, January 25, 2007

BAGHDAD, Iraq -- Attack helicopters pumped rockets at gunmen holed up in office towers and apartment blocks Wednesday, as U.S. and Iraqi forces swept through a notorious Sunni-insurgent enclave in the heart of Baghdad.

The U.S. military said the fighting around Haifa Street was part of a new offensive launched before dawn to disrupt illegal militias and bring the volatile area at the heart of Baghdad under the control of Iraqi security forces.

The attack began within hours after President Bush, in his State of the Union speech, urged Congress to get behind his plan to boost troops and crackdown on violence in Baghdad and other volatile areas of Iraq.

The low thud of mortar blasts rocked the capital for hours, and smoke billowed into the sky above Haifa Street, dubbed "Sniper Alley," which U.S. and Iraqi forces have struggled to tame.

It was the second time this month that U.S. and Iraqi forces clashed with insurgents on the commercial and residential street just north of the Green Zone, which is home to the U.S. and British embassies, as well as the Iraqi parliament.

Iraqi officials said the operation was not part of a planned security offensive for the capital, but that it would prepare the way for a more concerted ground effort to clear out and hold troubled neighborhoods.

DOJ_NMG_0121306

"What kind of security plan is this?" asked one terrified resident, who spent the morning cowering in his home near Haifa Street. "They are destroying us, pounding an area less than 1-square-kilometer with mortars, shells from helicopters and their tanks."

As many as 31 gunmen were killed and 35 detained Wednesday, including numerous foreign fighters, the Ministry of Defense said in a statement. The U.S. military confirmed only seven arrests.

At least one U.S. soldier was killed in small-arms fire in central Baghdad Wednesday, the military said, but it did not specify whether the death was related to the Haifa offensive.

The U.S. military also announced the deaths of two Marines in combat Tuesday in Anbar province, west of the capital, bringing the total number of U.S. personnel killed since the start of the Iraq war in 2003 to 3,063, according to the Web site icasualties.org.

In the Haifa Street sweep, Iraqi soldiers and police were joined by elements of the U.S. 2nd Brigade Combat Team, 1st Cavalry Division, and the 3rd Stryker Brigade Combat team, 2nd Infantry Division for the operation dubbed Tomahawk Strike 11.

Iraqi forces said they uncovered a large weapons cache near Karkh High School, where the late President Saddam Hussein studied in his youth. Numerous rocket-propelled grenades, as well as anti-tank and artillery rounds were seized, the U.S. military said.

Sunni political and religious leaders protested the operation, which Adnan al-Dulaimi, a lawmaker with the main Sunni bloc, called "barbaric."

Residents accused the United States of unwittingly aiding Shiite Muslim militiamen accused of trying to force the mostly Sunni Arab inhabitants from their homes in recent weeks, as part of a pattern of sectarian cleansing that is redrawing the map of the once largely integrated capital.

The U.S. military stressed in a statement that the operation did not target only Sunni insurgents, but was "rather aimed at rapidly isolating all active insurgents and gaining control of this key central Baghdad location."

Bush has pledged to send about 17,500 troops to Baghdad and another 4,000 to western Anbar province to help Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki quell the violence, despite opposition from Democrats who now control both houses of Congress. Critics say the plan risks drawing U.S. troops into a complicated civil war and exposes them to the possibility of increased casualties.

Wednesday's battle took place across the river from the site where a private helicopter crashed Tuesday. U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad offered his condolences Wednesday for five killed contractors from Blackwater USA, which provides security to U.S. officials and other clients in Baghdad.

Violence continued Wednesday, with at least 51 Iraqis reported killed in attacks across the country.

In A New Joint U.S.-Iraqi Patrol, The Americans Go First (NYT)

By Damien Cave And James Glanz

The New York Times, January 25, 2007

BAGHDAD, Jan. 24 — In the battle for Baghdad, Haifa Street has changed hands so often that it has taken on the feel of a no man's land, the deadly space between opposing trenches. On Wednesday, as American and Iraqi troops poured in, the street showed why it is such a sensitive gauge of an urban conflict marked by front lines that melt into confusion, enemies with no clear identity and allies who disappear or do not show up at all.

In a miniature version of the troop increase that the United States hopes will secure the city, American soldiers and armored vehicles raced onto Haifa Street before dawn to dislodge Sunni insurgents and Shiite militias who have been battling for a stretch of ragged slums and mostly abandoned high rises. But as the sun rose, many of the Iraqi Army units who were supposed to do the actual searches of the buildings did not arrive on time, forcing the Americans to start the job on their own.

When the Iraqi units finally did show up, it was with the air of a class outing, cheering and laughing as the Americans blew locks off doors with shotguns. As the morning wore on and the troops came under fire from all directions, another apparent flaw in this strategy became clear as empty apartments became lairs for gunmen who flitted from window to window and killed at least one American soldier, with a shot to the head.

Whether the gunfire was coming from Sunni or Shiite insurgents or militia fighters or some of the Iraqi soldiers who had disappeared into the Gotham-like cityscape, no one could say.

"Who the hell is shooting at us?" shouted Sgt. First Class Marc Biletski, whose platoon was jammed into a small room off an alley that was being swept by a sniper's bullets. "Who's shooting at us? Do we know who they are?"

Just before the platoon tossed smoke bombs and sprinted through the alley to a more secure position, Sergeant Biletski had a moment to reflect on this spot, which the United States has now fought to regain from a mysterious enemy at least three times in the past two years.

DOJ_NMG_0121307

"This place is a failure," Sergeant Biletski said. "Every time we come here, we have to come back."

He paused, then said, "Well, maybe not a total failure," since American troops have smashed opposition on Haifa Street each time they have come in.

With that, Sergeant Biletski ran through the billowing yellow smoke and took up a new position.

The Haifa Street operation, involving Bradley Fighting Vehicles as well as the highly mobile Stryker vehicles, is likely to cause plenty of reflection by the commanders in charge of the Baghdad buildup of more than 20,000 troops. Just how those extra troops will be used is not yet known, but it is likely to mirror at least broadly the Haifa Street strategy of working with Iraqi forces to take on unruly groups from both sides of the Sunni-Shiite sectarian divide.

The commander of the operation, Lt. Col. Avanulas Smiley of the Third Stryker Brigade Combat Team, Second Infantry Division, said his forces were not interested in whether opposition came from bullets fired by Sunnis or by Shiites. He conceded that the cost of letting the Iraqi forces learn on the job was to add to the risk involved in the operation.

"This was an Iraqi-led effort and with that come challenges and risks," Colonel Smiley said. "It can be organized chaos."

The American units in the operation began moving up Haifa Street from the south by 2 a.m. on Wednesday. A platoon of B Company in the Stryker Brigade secured the roof of a high rise, where an Eminem poster was stuck on the wall of what appeared to be an Iraqi teenager's room on the top floor. But in a pattern that would be repeated again and again in a series of buildings, there was no one in the apartment.

Many of the Iraqi units that showed up late never seemed to take the task seriously, searching haphazardly, breaking dishes and rifling through personal CD collections in the apartments. Eventually the Americans realized that the Iraqis were searching no more than half of the apartments; at one point the Iraqis completely disappeared, leaving the American unit working with them flabbergasted.

"Where did they go?" yelled Sgt. Jeri A. Gillett. Another soldier suggested, "I say we just let them go and we do this ourselves."

Then the gunfire began. It would come from high rises across the street, from behind trash piles and sandbags in alleys and from so many other directions that the soldiers began to worry that the Iraqi soldiers were firing at them. Mortars started dropping from across the Tigris River, to the east, in the direction of a Shiite slum.

The only thing that was clear was that no one knew who the enemy was. "The thing is, we wear uniforms — they don't," said Specialist Terry Wilson.

At one point the Americans were forced to jog alongside the Strykers on Haifa Street, sheltering themselves as best they could from the gunfire. The Americans finally found the Iraqis and ended up accompanying them into an extremely dangerous and exposed warren of low-slung hovels behind the high rises as gunfire rained down.

American officers tried to persuade the Iraqi soldiers to leave the slum area for better cover, but the Iraqis refused to risk crossing a lane that was being raked by machine-gun fire. "It's their show," said Lt. David Stroud, adding that the Americans have orders to defer to the Iraqis in cases like this.

In this surreal setting, about 20 American soldiers were forced at one point to pull themselves one by one up a canted tin roof by a dangling rubber hose and then shimmy along a ledge to another hut. The soldiers were stunned when a small child suddenly walked out of a darkened doorway and an old man started wheezing and crying somewhere inside.

Ultimately the group made it back to the high rises and escaped the sniper in the alley by throwing out the smoke bombs and sprinting to safety. Even though two Iraqis were struck by gunfire, many of the rest could not stop shouting and guffawing with amusement as they ran through the smoke.

One Iraqi soldier in the alley pointed his rifle at an American reporter and pulled the trigger. There was only a click: the weapon had no ammunition. The soldier laughed at his joke.

Iraqi Official Offers Terms From Militia To Avoid Fight (NYT)

By Sabrina Tavernise

The New York Times, January 25, 2007

BAGHDAD, Jan. 24 — An Iraqi official authorized to speak on behalf of field commanders for the country's most powerful militia has approached Western military officials and laid out a plan to avoid armed confrontation, senior Iraqi and American officials said this week.

The official is Rahim al-Daraji, the elected mayor of the Sadr City district, the vast grid in the northeast corner of the capital that is the stronghold of the militia, the Mahdi Army. Mr. Daraji has met twice in the past two weeks with Lt. Gen. Graeme Lamb, a British officer who is the deputy commanding general in Iraq, said a senior Iraqi official in the office of the prime minister.

DOJ_NMG_0121308

During the meetings, which took place on Jan. 17 and, most recently, on Monday, Mr. Daraji laid out a proposal from what he said were all the major political and militia groups in Sadr City, the senior Iraqi official said. The groups were eager to head off a major American military offensive in the district, home to two million Shiites, as the Americans begin a sweeping new effort to retake the streets of Baghdad.

Mr. Daraji said in an interview that field commanders would forbid their foot soldiers to carry guns in public if the American military and the Iraqi government met several basic demands, mostly involving ways to ensure better security for Sadr City. He is communicating with the commanders through a Shiite politician who is close to them.

"The task is to eliminate the armed presence in Sadr City," he said. "To confiscate illegal weapons," carried openly by militia members in public places.

The talks appeared to have been the first between an intermediary for the Mahdi militia and a senior commander from the American effort. The military fought the militia twice in 2004, and the militia's leader, Moktada al-Sadr, a renegade cleric who is virulently anti-American, has resolutely refused to meet with American officials of any kind.

Even so, it was far from clear whether Mr. Daraji, who said he was not related to Abdel Hadi al-Daraji, the former spokesman for Mr. Sadr who was arrested on murder charges last week, was even able to speak for the sprawling, grass-roots militia, which, according to American military estimates, numbers at least 7,000 in Baghdad alone.

Saleh al-Agheli, a member of Parliament from Mr. Sadr's political bloc, said the bloc's political committee had "blessed and supported" the effort by Mr. Daraji.

The meetings were very preliminary, officials stressed, and came as the American military was stepping up pressure on Mr. Sadr's militia. It was not clear how American officials received the efforts. They are already making some headway against Shiite militias without help from Mr. Daraji and his supporters.

A spokesman for General Lamb declined to comment. "The general meets with a number of people in the course of his duty," he said. "We respect the confidence of those meetings."

The American ambassador, Zalmay Khalilzad, confirmed that meetings had taken place and said that Mr. Daraji had told representatives from the American Embassy and from the military that local residents would not challenge weapons searches by American soldiers.

"He said all the right things at this point," Mr. Khalilzad said, but added that it was too soon to tell if the offer would lead to anything more concrete.

Controlling the militia — at the heart of the new strategy President Bush announced this month — is no easy task. Mr. Sadr's political bloc was instrumental in installing Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki, and he has often gone out of his way to protect Mr. Sadr's allies.

But in recent months, Mr. Maliki appears to have changed his approach, Mr. Khalilzad said, allowing for more arrests and for the Americans to apply tough military action. Talks with Mr. Sadr had not produced the desired results, Mr. Khalilzad said.

"He felt that he had exhausted and relied too much on political engagement," Mr. Khalilzad said in a news briefing. "He became disappointed that he didn't produce as much results as he would have hoped."

Mr. Daraji said he represented 14 political and military groups in Sadr City. He said local residents, including Mahdi Army commanders, wanted to find ways to work with the Americans to avoid any large-scale confrontation. Commanders would tell militiamen to keep their weapons off the streets, he said, if Americans agreed to certain demands.

Some of the actions Mr. Daraji said he had requested in exchange for the promises from the militias seemed likely to draw stony stares from American military officials, namely to stop conducting raids in Sadr City and to release a number of those who had been arrested.

But other demands — to provide jobs for Sadr City residents, to bring in new construction projects and to triple the number of police stations there — seemed more realistic.

The government official, who works as an aide to Mr. Maliki, said he trusted Mr. Daraji.

"There is an honesty with this man," said the official. "The chances for success are higher than before."

Palestinians Under Pressure To Leave Iraq (WP)

By Joshua Partlow

The Washington Post, January 25, 2007

BAGHDAD, Jan. 24 -- The shouting in his Baghdad apartment building woke Luay Mohammed seconds before intruders broke down his door.

The men, some wearing police uniforms, entered before dawn demanding identification cards, Mohammed recalled. They tore the doors off the closet, threw the television on the floor and hauled Mohammed and his two barefoot brothers outside to be blindfolded. They and 14 other men were taken to what they thought was a government office, where a man others kept calling "sir" spoke to their huddled group.

DOJ_NMG_0121309

"You are Palestinians. Why are you still living in Iraq?" Mohammed recalled the man saying. "You have 48 hours to leave."

Within 24 hours, Mohammed was gone. The 36-year-old was among dozens of people who loaded their meager belongings onto buses at dawn Wednesday inside Baghdad's main Palestinian enclave in the Baladiyat neighborhood. They drove north toward the Syrian border, joining a growing exodus of Palestinians now following their familiar story line: an unwelcome people searching for a home.

Baghdad is a dangerous place for anyone to live, and the fighting between Sunni and Shiite Muslims has displaced hundreds of thousands. Largely forgotten amid this violence is the plight of thousands of Palestinians in Iraq, who face an increasingly hostile environment because they are predominantly Sunni and perceived as having been favored during the rule of Iraqi President Saddam Hussein.

Palestinians and human rights officials in Baghdad say members of the group are being targeted by roving Shiite militias and Iraqi police in efforts to expel them.

Iraqi officials said the 17 Palestinian men were detained Tuesday for "investigation purposes" because they seemed suspicious, according to Brig. Gen. Saad Abdullah of the Interior Ministry. During the detention, the officials discussed steps to "get the approvals for them to be refugees in other countries," he said.

An estimated 19,000 Palestinians have fled Iraq since 2003, leaving about 15,000 behind, according to the United Nations. About 350 Palestinians are now stranded in a desolate refugee camp in a no man's land at the Al Tanf border crossing into Syria. For more than six months they have been denied entry into Syria, and they refuse to return to Iraq. An additional 80 Palestinians are stuck on the Iraqi side of the line. Similar makeshift settlements have cropped up along the border with Jordan.

"Killings, threats, intimidations and kidnappings are becoming the norm for Palestinians in Iraq," the U.N. Assistance Mission for Iraq said in a report this month. "Many of these actions are reportedly carried out by the militias wearing police or special forces uniform[s]."

Mortar shells regularly crash down on the squalid cinder-block Baladiyat compound, the largest settlement of Palestinians in Iraq, with an estimated population of 4,000 to 7,000. In November and December, guerrillas staged at least six organized attacks on the area. On Dec. 13, three hours of mortar attacks killed as many as 11 people, the U.N. report said.

"Any country that wants us, we will go there," said Rafaat Musaa Ahmed, 36, a carpenter and father of four who lives in the Palestinian compound in Baladiyat. "Even if we would live in a barren place, even if it was a desert."

After evening prayers during Ramadan in October, a mortar round fell on Ahmed's apartment, injuring his wife with shrapnel. She now suffers seizures, he said, and has been denied treatment at clinics affiliated with Iraq's Health Ministry, which is run by loyalists of Shiite cleric Moqtada al-Sadr.

"She needs an operation. I think one more month is all that we can wait," he said.

Like many Palestinians here, Ahmed's parents took refuge in Iraq after the creation of Israel in 1948. Hussein later adopted the Palestinian cause, using the issue to further his image as an advocate for Arab nationalism. Hussein provided free or subsidized housing to Palestinian families, paid cash to those whose relatives had died in the conflict with Israel, and exempted them from obligatory military service imposed on Iraqis.

After the 2003 invasion, landlords drove thousands of Palestinians from their lodgings. As many as 1,500 Palestinians at a time took refuge in a squatter settlement organized by the United Nations and the Palestinian Red Crescent Society on the playground of the Haifa Sports Club in Baghdad.

Thaamer Asad Melham, a 41-year-old television actor, lived in the Haifa refugee camp for a year with his wife, two daughters and a son after his landlord expelled them from their home in July 2004. The U.N. refugee agency provided him with an apartment in Baghdad, but the escalating reprisal killings caused him to retreat to the Baladiyat compound last September.

During a mortar explosion on Oct. 19, a nail lodged in the skull of his older brother, Amar, leaving him brain damaged, he said. Melham now washes his brother and changes his diapers, and he has sold off a refrigerator and bedroom furniture to help pay for medicine. Unable to find work, he stays at home with his children, who have stopped going to school.

"I am Palestinian. I am Sunni. And I am an artist," he said. "I can't stay in Iraq."

